

VOLUME 77 • NUMBER 3 • JUNE 1972

The American Historical Review

THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

American Hist. Re ~~view~~

CUK-H02249-78-V2001051

Bimonthly

Vol. 77
Nos. 3-5

June-Dec.
1972

903
001/2A

Cover illustration. Courtesy of National Library of Ireland. (See p. 643.)

903
1001/2

G1051

The American Historical Review appears in February, April, June, October, and December of each year. It is published by the American Historical Association, 400 A Street, S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003, and is printed and mailed by the William Byrd Press, 2901 Byrdhill Road, Richmond, Virginia 23228.

The AHR is sent to members of the American Historical Association and to institutions holding subscriptions. Information concerning membership is contained in the announcement of the American Historical Association, which follows the last page of text in each issue. Information concerning subscriptions, the ordering of back issues, and the submission of manuscripts will be found on the page immediately preceding the advertisements.

Notice of nonreceipt of an issue must be sent to the Business Office of the Association within three months of the date of publication of the issue. Changes of address should be sent to the Business Office by the tenth of the month preceding the month of publication. The Association is not responsible for copies lost because of failure to report a change of address in time for mailing.

The AHR disclaims responsibility for statements, either of fact or opinion, made by contributors.

© THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION 1972
All rights reserved
Second-class postage paid at Richmond, Virginia

VOLUME 77 • FEBRUARY TO DECEMBER 1972

---

The American Historical Review

---

THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

400 A Street, S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003

1972

Managing Editor: R. K. WEBB

Associate Editor: NANCY LANE

Assistant Editors: JOHN T. APPLEBY, JANET CROLY HAYMAN, ANN HOFSTRA

Assistant Editor-Bibliographer: EDWARD C. PAPENFUSE, JR.

Editorial Assistants: JOAN ANSHELES, ROBIN E. BYRNES, ESTEN H. HARDEE

Advertising Manager: LOUISE M. DOUGLAS

Board of Editors

ALBERT FEUERWERKER
University of Michigan

KENNETH S. LYNN
Johns Hopkins University

NANCY LYMAN ROELKER
Boston University

PETER GAY
Yale University

BRYCE LYON
Brown University

GEORGE B. TINDALL
University of North Carolina

TOM B. JONES
University of Minnesota

EDMUND S. MORGAN
Yale University

GORDON WRIGHT
Stanford University

NUMBER 3 • JUNE 1972

Articles

|   |     |
|---|-----|
| The Devotional Revolution in Ireland, 1850-75, BY EMMET LARKIN  | 625 |
| The Vital Center, the Fair Deal, and the Quest fora Liberal Political Economy, BY ALONZO L. HAMBY | 653 |
| Marx and the Agrarian Question, BY OSCAR J. HAMMEN  | 679 |

Review Articles

|   |     |
|---|-----|
| Parliament and Society in Early Stuart England: The Legacy ofWallace Notestein, BY THEODORE K. RABB             | 705 |
| WALLACE NOTESTEIN. The House of Commons 1604-1610   |     |
| ROBERT ZALLER. The Parliament of 1621: A Study inConstitutional Conflict  |     |
| ROBERT E. RUGH. The Parliament of 1624: Politicsand Foreign Policy  |     |
| The Transition from Feudalism to Capitalism in Russia:A Major Soviet Historical Controversy, BY SAMUEL H. BARON | 715 |
| Perekhod ot feodalizma k kapitalizmu v Rossii:Materialy vsesoiuznoi diskussii                                   |     |

|                  |     |                             |     |
|------------------|-----|-----------------------------|-----|
| Reviews of Books | 730 | Other Books Received        | 873 |
| Communications   | 858 | Recently Published Articles | 879 |
| Recent Deaths    | 866 |                             |     |

Editorial

|                            |     |
|----------------------------|-----|
| The AHR and the AHA | 967 |
|----------------------------|-----|

Articles

|   |      |
|---|------|
| The Florentine Palace as Domestic Architecture,BY RICHARD A. GOLDTHWAITE  | 977  |
| The American Civil War Considered as a Crisis in Law and Order,BY PHILLIP S. PALUDAN                                  | 1013 |
| Buenos Aires as a Commercial-Bureaucratic City, 1880-1910:Characteristics of a City's Orientation, BY JAMES R. SCOBIE | 1035 |

Review Article

|   |      |
|---|------|
| New Perspectives on the Republican Party, 1877-1913,BY LEWIS L. GOULD | 1074 |
|---|------|

JOHN BRAEMAN. Albert J. Beveridge: American Nationalist

RICHARD JENSEN. The Winning of the Midwest: Social and Political Conflict, 1888-1896

HORACE SAMUEL MERRILL and MARION GALBRAITH MERRILL.
The Republican Command, 1897-1913

RICHARD E. WELCH, JR. George Frisbie Hoar and the Half-Breed Republicans

|                   |      |                                |      |
|-------------------|------|--------------------------------|------|
| Reviews of Books  | 1083 | Festschriften and Miscellanies | 1207 |
| Communications    | 1191 | Other Books Received           | 1209 |
| Recent Deaths     | 1198 | Recently Published Articles    | 1221 |
| Association Notes | 1206 |                                |      |

Articles

- Martyrs, Myths, and the Massacre: The Background of
St. Bartholomew, BY DONALD R. KELLEY 1323
- "The Sense of an Impending Clash": English Working-Class
Unrest before the First World War, BY STANDISH MEACHAM 1343
- Stalin and the Prospects of a Separate Peace in World War II,
BY VOJTECH MASTNY 1365

Review Article

- A Soviet Historian Evaluates Stalin's Role in History,
BY ROBERT M. SLUSSER 1389
- ROY A. MEDVEDEV. K sudu istorii (genezis i posledstviia Stalinizma)
- . Let History Judge: The Origins and Consequences of Stalinism. Tr. COLLEEN TAYLOR. Ed. DAVID JORAVSKY and GEORGES HAUPT

- |                      |      |                             |      |
|----------------------|------|-----------------------------|------|
| Reviews of Books     | 1399 | Index to Volume 77,         |      |
| Communications       | 1533 | compiled by John T. Appleby | 1543 |
| Other Books Received | 1535 |                             |      |

VOLUME 77 • NUMBER 3 • JUNE 1972

---

The American Historical Review

---

THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

Managing Editor: R. K. WEBB

Associate Editor: NANCY LANE

Assistant Editors: JOHN T. APPLEBY, ANN HOFSTRA

Assistant Editor-Bibliographer: EDWARD C. PAPENFUSE, JR.

Editorial Assistants: JOAN ANSHELES, ROBIN E. BYRNES, ESTEN H. HARDEE

Advertising Manager: LOUISE M. DOUGLAS

Board of Editors

ALBERT FEUERWERKER
University of Michigan

KENNETH S. LYNN
Johns Hopkins University

NANCY LYMAN ROELKER
Boston University

PETER GAY
Yale University

BRYCE LYON
Brown University

GEORGE B. TINDALL
University of North Carolina

TOM B. JONES
University of Minnesota

EDMUND S. MORGAN
Yale University

GORDON WRIGHT
Stanford University

Contributors:

EMMET LARKIN, professor of British history at the University of Chicago and author of James Larkin, Irish Labour Leader (London, 1965), is currently writing a history of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland in the nineteenth century. Mr. Larkin received his Ph.D. at Columbia University, where he studied with the late John Bartlett Brebner.

ALONZO L. HAMBY is associate professor of history at Ohio University. His other publications include "The Liberals, Truman, and FDR as Symbol and Myth," which was published in the Journal of American History in March 1970. Mr. Hamby, who is presently completing a study of American liberalism during the era of Harry S. Truman and working on an interpretive survey of American history since 1939, did his M.A. at Columbia University with John A. Garraty and his Ph.D. at the University of Missouri, where he was a student of Richard S. Kirkendall.

OSCAR J. HAMMEN, professor of history at the University of Montana, concentrated on early nineteenth-century German history under the late C. P. Higby and C. V. Easum at the University of Wisconsin. Since the publication of Mr. Hammen's

The Red '48ers: Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels (New York, 1969) he has been continuing the study of Marx and Engels, with an emphasis on their activities as revolutionary tacticians and promoters of revolution within the context of the age in which they lived.

THEODORE K. RABB, an associate professor of history at Princeton University, specializes in early modern Europe. He is the author of "Sir Edwin Sandys and the Parliament of 1604" (AHR, 69 [1963-64]: 646-70) and Enterprise and Empire (Cambridge, Mass., 1967) and coeditor of the Journal of Interdisciplinary History. Mr. Rabb is currently writing a biography of Sir Edwin Sandys.

SAMUEL H. BARON is professor of history at the University of California, San Diego, author of Plekhanov: The Father of Russian Marxism (Stanford, 1963), and translator and editor of The Travels of Olearius in Seventeenth Century Russia (Stanford, 1967). The present article stems from Mr. Baron's current exploration of the "failure of capitalist development" in Russia, with special reference to the seventeenth century. He received his Ph.D. from Columbia University in 1952.

Articles

- The Devotional Revolution in Ireland, 1850-75, BY EMMET LARKIN 625
- The Vital Center, the Fair Deal, and the Quest for a Liberal Political Economy, BY ALONZO L. HAMBY 653
- Marx and the Agrarian Question, BY OSCAR J. HAMMEN 679

Review Articles

- Parliament and Society in Early Stuart England: The Legacy of Wallace Notestein, BY THEODORE K. RABB 705
- WALLACE NOTESTEIN. The House of Commons 1604-1610
- ROBERT ZALLER. The Parliament of 1621: A Study in Constitutional Conflict
- ROBERT E. RUIGH. The Parliament of 1624: Politics and Foreign Policy
- The Transition from Feudalism to Capitalism in Russia:
A Major Soviet Historical Controversy, BY SAMUEL H. BARON 715
- Perekhod ot feodalizma k kapitalizmu v Rossii:
Materialy vsesoiuznoi diskussii

Reviews of Books

GENERAL

- JULIÁN MARIAS. Generations: A Historical Method. Tr. by HAROLD C. RALEY. By Paul Gottfried 730
- LEO BRAUDY. Narrative Form in History and Fiction: Hume, Fielding, & Gibbon. By George H. Nadel 730
- ÁGNES R. VÁRKONYI. A pozitívista történetzemlélet. By George Barany 731
- GEORGE LICHTHEIM. Imperialism. By Bernard Semmel 733
- Anarchici e anarchia nel mondo contemporaneo: Atti del Convegno promosso dalla Fondazione Luigi Einaudi (Torino, 5, 6 e 7 dicembre 1969)*. By Edward R. Tannenbaum 733
- MAURICE MANDELBAUM. History, Man, & Reason: A Study in Nineteenth-Century Thought. By Felix Gilbert 734
- WILLIAM J. BRAZILL. The Young Hegelians; DAVID MCLELLAN. The Young Hegelians and Karl Marx. By Oscar J. Hammen 735
- JOHN STUART MILL and HARRIET TAYLOR MILL. Essays on Sex Equality. Ed. by ALICE S. ROSSI. By Gertrude Himmelfarb 736
- LEWIS H. GANN. Guerrillas in History. By Theodore Ropp 737
- RAYMOND LISTER. Antique Maps and Their Cartographers. By George Kish 738
- OTTO MAYR. The Origins of Feedback Control; OTTO MAYR. Feedback Mechanisms in the Historical Collections of the National Museum of History and Technology. By Robert M. McKeon 738
- C. D. O'MALLEY, ed. The History of Medical Education: An International Symposium Held February 5-9, 1968. By Edward H. Beardsley 739
- JOHN R. PAUL. A History of Poliomyelitis. By Gert H. Brieger 740
- GILLIAN T. CELL. English Enterprise in Newfoundland 1577-1660. By Francis Coghlan 741
- JOHN HOHENBERG. Free Press/Free People: The Best Cause. By J. Cutler Andrews 741
- BRIAN CHAPMAN. Police State. By Howard C. Payne 742
- Mouvements nationaux d'indépendance et classes populaires aux XIX<sup>e</sup> et XX<sup>e</sup> siècles en Occident et en Orient*, 2 vols.; KONSTANTIN SYMMONS-SYMONOWICZ. Nationalist Movements: A Comparative View. By Louis L. Snyder 743
- BARRY M. COUGH. The Royal Navy and the Northwest Coast of North America, 1810-1914: A Study of British Maritime Ascendancy. By Charles S. Campbell 744
- ROBERT A. HUTTENBACK. Gandhi in South Africa: British Imperialism and the Indian Question, 1860-1914. By Ainslie T. Embree 745

- ARNOLD THACKRAY. Atoms and Powers: An Essay on Newtonian Matter-Theory and the Development of Chemistry. By Loren R. Graham 746
- THOMAS HAWKINS. Lebesgue's Theory of Integration: Its Origins and Development. By Carl B. Boyer 746
- CHARLES HARVARD GIBBS-SMITH. Aviation: An Historical Survey from Its Origins to the End of World War II. By Philip M. Flammer 747
- BARNET LITVINOFF, ed. The Letters and Papers of Chaim Weizmann. Ser. A, vol. 2, November 1902-August 1903. By Solon Beinfeld 748
- RONALD W. CLARK. Einstein: The Life and Times. By John L. Heilbron 748
- GLENN B. INFELD. Disaster at Bari. By Howard M. Smyth 749
- D. C. WATT. Survey of International Affairs, 1962. By Richardson Dougall 750

ANCIENT

- HANS GOEDICKE. The Report about the Dispute of a Man with His Ba. By P. L. Shinnie 750
- E. W. MARSDEN. Greek and Roman Artillery: Technical Treatises. By W. McLeod 751
- C. BRADFORD WELLES. Alexander and the Hellenistic World. By Lionel Pearson 752
- STYLIANOS SPYRIDAKIS. Ptolemaic Itanos and Hellenistic Crete. By Thomas Kelly 752
- JAMES H. OLIVER. Marcus Aurelius: Aspects of Civic and Cultural Policy in the East. By Fergus Millar 753
- JÜRGEN DEININGER. Der politische Widerstand gegen Rom in Griechenland, 217-86 v. Chr. By Stewart Irvin Oost 753
- CHESTER G. STARR. The Ancient Romans. By Erich S. Gruen 754
- DONALD R. DUDLEY. The Romans: 850 B.C.-A.D. 337. By Arther Ferrill 755
- ROBERT E. A. PALMER. The Archaic Community of the Romans. By Robert K. Sherk 755
- STEPHEN BENKO and JOHN J. O'ROURKE, eds. The Catacombs and the Colosseum: The Roman Empire as the Setting of Primitive Christianity. By Frank M. Clover 756
- EDITH MARY WIGHTMAN. Roman Trier and the Treveri. By Bernard S. Bachrach 757
- BARRY CUNLIFFE. Fishbourne: A Roman Palace and Its Garden. By Richard Brilliant 758
- JOHN HOLLAND SMITH. Constantine the Great. By J. A. S. Evans 758

MEDIEVAL

- EDWARD PETERS. The Shadow King: Rex Inutilis in

- Medieval Law and Literature, 751-1327.*
By Fredric Cheyette 759
- IRVING A. AGUS. The Heroic Age of Franco-German Jewry: The Jews of Germany and France of the Tenth and Eleventh Centuries, Pioneers and Builders of Town-Life, Town-Government and Institutions. By J. Lee Shneidman 760
- WOLFGANG VON STROMER. Oberdeutsche Hochfinanz, 1350-1450, 3 vols.; URSULA SCHWARZKOPF. Die Rechnungslegung des Humbert de Plaine über die Jahre 1448 bis 1452: Eine Studie zur Amtsführung des burgundischen Maître de la Chambre aux Deniers. By K. F. Drew 761
- JOSEPH RATZINGER. The Theology of History in St. Bonaventure. By Allen D. Breck 762
- ANTONY BLACK. Monarchy and Community: Political Ideas in the Later Conciliar Controversy, 1430-1450. By Richard Kay 762
- JANE E. SAYERS. Papal Judges Delegate in the Province of Canterbury, 1198-1254: A Study in Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction and Administration. By Charles R. Young 763
- J. A. WATT. The Church and the Two Nations in Medieval Ireland. By Joseph Dahmus 764
- RÉGINE PERNOUD. Héloïse et Abélard. By Jill N. Claster 764
- PETER LLEWELLYN. Rome in the Dark Ages. By Hilmar C. Krueger 765
- GABRIELLA ROSSETTI. Società e istituzioni nel contado lombardo durante il Medioevo: Cologno Monzese. Vol. 1, Secoli VIII-X. By Thomas W. Blomquist 766
- ALFRED HAVERKAMP. Herrschaftsformen der Frühstauffer in Reichsitalien, vols. 1, 2. By Peter Munz 766
- AUGUSTO VASINA. Romagna medievale. By Marvin B. Becker 768
- WOLFGANG WEHLEN. Geschichtsschreibung und Staatsauffassung im Zeitalter Ludwigs des Frommen. By Richard E. Sullivan 768
- KURT-ULRICH JÄSCHKE. Die älteste Halberstädter Bischofschronik. By Bernhard W. Scholz 769
- GEORGES and DÉMÉTRIOS TORNIKÈS. Lettres et discours. Tr. by JEAN DARROUZÈS. By Peter Charanis 770
- MODERN EUROPE
- PETER C. BIETENHOLZ. Basle and France in the Sixteenth Century: The Basle Humanists and Printers in Their Contacts with Francophone Culture. By E. William Monter 770
- DAVID C. STEINMETZ. Reformers in the Wings. By Claus-Peter Clasen 771
- W. FRED GRAHAM. The Constructive Revolutionary: John Calvin & His Socio-Economic Impact. By Robert W. Green 772
- Studia Leibnitiana: Supplementa. Vol. 4, Theologie; Ethik; Pädagogik; Ästhetik; Geschichte; Politik; Recht.* By Walter J. Brunhumer 772
- RAGNHILD HATTON and M. S. ANDERSON, eds. Studies in Diplomatic History: Essays in Memory of David Bayne Horn. By Herbert H. Rowen 773
- PIERRE CHAUNU. La civilisation de l'Europe des Lumières. By Raymond Birn 774
- FRANCO VENTURI. Utopia and Reform in the Enlightenment. By Caroline Robbins 775
- MICHEL DEVÈZE. L'Europe et le monde à la fin du XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. By R. R. Palmer 776
- DONALD DREW EGBERT. Social Radicalism and the Arts: Western Europe. A Cultural History from the French Revolution to 1968. By Walter Laqueur 777
- JONATHAN BEECHER and RICHARD BIENVENU, trs. and eds. The Utopian Vision of Charles Fourier: Selected Texts on Work, Love, and Passionate Attraction. By Nicholas V. Riasanovsky 779
- ORON J. HALE. The Great Illusion, 1900-1914. By Joachim Remak 780
- PAUL G. HALPERN. The Mediterranean Naval Situation, 1908-1914. By Regis A. Courtemanche 781
- ALBERT SEATON. The Russo-German War 1941-45. By George O. Kent 781
- KARL HWILICKA. Das Ende auf dem Balkan 1944/45: Die militärische Räumung Jugoslawiens durch die deutsche Wehrmacht. By Béla K. Király 782
- MAY MCKISACK. Medieval History in the Tudor Age. By W. Gordon Zeeveld 783
- CONRAD RUSSELL. The Crisis of Parliaments: English History, 1509-1660. By Brian P. Levack 783
- J. D. GOULD. The Great Debasement: Currency and the Economy in Mid-Tudor England. By Howard S. Reinmuth, Jr. 784
- WILLIAM S. MALTBY. The Black Legend in England: The Development of Anti-Spanish Sentiment, 1558-1660. By Carole Shammas 785
- K. R. WARK. Elizabethan Recusancy in Cheshire. By Sister Joseph Damien Hanlon 785
- RICHARD L. HILLS. Power in the Industrial Revolution; HAROLD CATLING. The Spinning Mule; J. GERAINT JENKINS. The Welsh Woollen Industry; KENNETH G. PONTING. The Woollen Industry of South-west England: An Industrial, Economic and Technical Survey. By David J. Jeremy 786
- GEORGE RUDE. Hanoverian London, 1714-1808. By Donald J. Olsen 788
- FRIDA KNIGHT. University Rebel: The Life of William Frend (1757-1841). By Carl B. Cone 789
- D. C. M. PLATT. The Cinderella Service: British Consuls since 1825. By H. Duncan Hall 789
- J. F. C. HARRISON. The Early Victorians, 1832-1851. By David Roberts 790
- C. H. S. FIFOOT. Frederic William Maitland: A Life. By Doris Mary Stenton† 791

J. K. CHAPMAN, ed. A Political Correspondence of the Gladstone Era: The Letters of Lady Sophia Palmer and Sir Arthur Gordon, 1884-1889.
By William Henry Maehl, Jr. 792

G. R. SEARLE. The Quest for National Efficiency: A Study in British Politics and Political Thought, 1899-1914. By Reba N. Soffer 793

P. F. CLARKE. Lancashire and the New Liberalism;
DAVID AYERST. The Manchester Guardian: Biography of a Newspaper. By Barry McGill 793

ARTHUR J. MARDER. From the Dreadnought to Scapa Flow: The Royal Navy in the Fisher Era, 1904-1919. Vol. 5, Victory and Aftermath (January 1918-June 1919). By Raymond Callahan 794

MAURICE COWLING. The Impact of Labour, 1920-1924: The Beginning of Modern British Politics. By Barbara Malament 795

NOREEN BRANSON and MARGOT HEINEMANN. Britain in the 1930's. By Paul B. Johnson 796

FRANKLIN REID GANNON. The British Press and Germany, 1936-1939. By M. A. Fitzsimons 797

K. THEODORE HOPPEN. The Common Scientist in the Seventeenth Century: A Study of the Dublin Philosophical Society, 1683-1708.
By Robert H. Kargon 797

GEOFFROY ATKINSON and ABRAHAM C. KELLER. Prelude to the Enlightenment: French Literature, 1690-1740. By Robert Isherwood 798

CHARLES COULSTON GILLISPIE. Lazare Carnot, Savant. By Harcourt Brown 799

GONZALO REDONDO. Las empresas políticas de José Ortega y Gasset: "El Sol," "Crisol," "Luz" (1917-1934), 2 vols. By Juan J. Linz 800

EDUARDO BRAZÃO. Présence du Portugal en Belgique (De Philippe d'Alsace à Léopold I.<sup>er</sup>).
By C. J. Kolinski 801

VALDEMAR ANDERSEN. Den jyske hedekolonisation. By Raymond E. Lindgren 802

JOSEF SEÜBERT. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der Reformation in der ehemaligen freien Reichsstadt Dinkelsbühl. By Gerald Strauss 802

CARLA KRAMER-SCHLETTE. Vier augsburger Chronisten der Reformationszeit: Die Behandlung und Deutung der Zeitgeschichte bei Clemens Sender, Wilhelm Rem, Georg Preu und Paul Hektor Mair.
By John M. Headley 803

GERHARD MASUR. Imperial Berlin. By Fritz Stern 803

GIUSEPPE TALAMO. La formazione politica di Agostino Depretis. By Benjamin E. Brown 804

LUCIO AVAGLIANO. Alessandro Rossi e le origini dell'Italia industriale. By Shepard B. Clough 806

C. DAICOVICIU et al., eds. Acta Musei Napocensis, vol. 7. By Keith Hitchens 806

DAVID JORAVSKY. The Lysenko Affair. By Peter A. Toma 807

NEAR EAST

G. E. VON GRUNEBaum, ed. Theology and Law in Islam. By F. E. Peters 808

GEORGES I. BRATIANU. La mer Noire: Des origines à la conquête ottomane.
By Archibald R. Lewis 809

MICHAEL CURTIS, ed. People and Politics in the Middle East. By C. Ernest Dawn 810

R. HRAIR DEKMEJIAN. Egypt under Nasir: A Study in Political Dynamics.
By John B. Christopher 811

AFRICA

J. DESMOND CLARK. The Prehistory of Africa. By Jan Vansina 812

ROBERT I. ROTBERG. Joseph Thomson and the Exploration of Africa; ROBERT I. ROTBERG, ed. Africa and Its Explorers: Motives, Methods, and Impact. By John P. Halstead 813

RUTH FIRST. Power in Africa; JON WORONOFF. Organizing African Unity; T. PETER OMARI. Kwame Nkrumah: The Anatomy of an African Dictatorship; PETER GEISMAR. Fanon.
By Van Mitchell Smith 814

VINCENT M. BATTLE and CHARLES H. LYONS, eds. Essays in the History of African Education; MICHAEL ANTHONY SAMUELS. Education in Angola, 1878-1914: A History of Culture Transfer and Administration. By Garland G. Parker 815

ALAN SCHAM. Lyautey in Morocco: Protectorate Administration, 1912-1925. By Leon B. Blair 816

E. A. AYANDELE. Holy Johnson: Pioneer of African Nationalism, 1836-1917. By Robert Heussler 817

RICHARD WEST. Back to Africa: A History of Sierra Leone and Liberia. By George E. Brooks 817

S. A. AKINTOYE. Revolution and Power Politics in Yorubaland 1840-1893: Ibadan Expansion and the Rise of Ekitiparapo. By Jean Herskovits 818

HARRY A. GALEY. The Road to Aba: A Study of British Administrative Policy in Eastern Nigeria. By Henry S. Wilson 818

J. S. LA FONTAINE. City Politics: A Study of Léopoldville, 1962-63. By Bruce Fetter 819

DOUGLAS L. WHEELER and RENÉ PÉLISSIER. Angola. By F. James Berg 820

ROBERT HEUSSLER. British Tanganyika: An Essay and Documents on District Administration. By Marcia Wright 820

GERALD L. CAPLAN. The Elites of Barotseland, 1878-1969: A Political History of Zambia's Western Province. By Alan R. Booth 821

LEONARD THOMPSON, ed. African Societies in Southern Africa: Historical Studies. By Jeffrey Butler 822

R. RAVEN-HART, II. Cape Good Hope, 1652-1702: The First Fifty Years of Dutch Colonisation as Seen by Callers, 2 vols. By C. R. Boxer 823

- RAYMOND K. KENT. Early Kingdoms in Madagascar, 1500-1700. By N. R. Bennett 823

ASIA AND THE EAST

- PAMELA NIGHTINGALE. Trade and Empire in Western India, 1784-1806; OLE FELDBÆK. India Trade under the Danish Flag, 1772-1808: European Enterprise and Anglo-Indian Remittance and Trade. By Ann Bos Radwan 824

- H. I. LONDON. Non-White Immigration and the "White Australia" Policy; EGON F. KUNZ. Blood and Gold: Hungarians in Australia; ALBERT A. HAYDEN. New South Wales Immigration Policy, 1856-1900. By Charles S. Blackton 825

AMERICAS

- CARL ORTWIN SAUER. Sixteenth Century North America: The Land and the People as Seen by the Europeans. By K. R. Andrews 826

- C. HARVEY GARDINER. William Hickling Prescott: A Biography; JOHN HEMMING. The Conquest of the Incas. By Lewis Hanke 827

- EUGENIA MEYER. Conciencia histórica norteamericana sobre la Revolución de 1910. By Paul J. Vanderwood 828

- BERTA ULLOA. La Revolución intervenida: Relaciones diplomáticas entre México y Estados Unidos (1910-1914). By Charles D. Ameringer 829

- GEORGE WILLIAM PILCHER. Samuel Davies: Apostle of Dissent in Colonial Virginia. By Sidney E. Mead 830

- WILLIAM JAMES MORGAN, ed. Naval Documents of the American Revolution. Vol. 5, American Theatre: May 9, 1776-July 31, 1776. By George Athan Billias 831

- JOSEPH L. GRABILL. Protestant Diplomacy and the Near East: Missionary Influence on American Policy, 1810-1927. By James B. Gidney 831

- ALLAN NEVINS. The War for the Union. Vol. 3, The Organized War, 1863-1864; vol. 4, The Organized War to Victory, 1864-1865. By Don E. Fehrenbacher 832

- WILLIAM N. STILL JR. Iron Afloat: The Story of the Confederate Armorclads. By Hal Bridges 834

- DAVID M. JORDAN. Roscoe Conkling of New York: Voice in the Senate. By Thomas C. Reeves 835

- HOWARD MUMFORD JONES. The Age of Energy: Varieties of American Experience, 1865-1915. By John L. Thomas 836

- LAWRENCE D. RICE. The Negro in Texas, 1874-1900; ARLEN L. FOWLER. The Black Infantry in the West, 1869-1891. By Kenneth Wiggins Porter 837

- KENNETH S. LYNN. William Dean Howells: An American Life. By David W. Noble 837

- RICHARD W. SCHWARZ. John Harvey Kellogg, M.D.. By David L. Cowen 838

- RICHARD D. WALTER. S. Weir Mitchell, M.D.—Neurologist: A Medical Biography. By Peter F. Walker 839

- THOMAS PARKE HUGHES. Elmer Sperry: Inventor and Engineer. By Robin Higham 840

- GLENDON SCHUBERT. The Constitutional Polity. By Arnold M. Paul 841

- R. ALAN LAWSON. The Failure of Independent Liberalism, 1930-1941. By Otis L. Graham, Jr. 842

- CHARLES F. O'BRIEN. Sir William Dawson: A Life in Science and Religion. By Walter L. Berg 843

- DARCY RIBEIRO. The Americas and Civilization. Tr. by LINTON LOMAS BARRETT and MARIE MCDAVID BARRETT. By Mark J. Van Aken 844

- NORMAN NEWTON. Thomas Gage in Spanish America. By Max L. Moorhead 845

- CELSE FURTADO. Economic Development of Latin America: A Survey from Colonial Times to the Cuban Revolution. Tr. by SUZETTE MACEDO. By John P. Harrison 845

- FREDERICK C. TURNER. Catholicism and Political Development in Latin America. By Carl Solberg 846

- HUGH THOMAS. Cuba: The Pursuit of Freedom. By Russell H. Fitzgibbon 847

- FRANKLIN W. KNIGHT. Slave Society in Cuba during the Nineteenth Century. By Richard B. Sheridan 848

- D. A. BRADING. Miners and Merchants in Bourbon Mexico, 1763-1810. By Mario Rodríguez 848

- JAN BAZANT. Los bienes de la Iglesia en México (1856-1875): Aspectos económicos y sociales de la Revolución liberal; JAN BAZANT. Alienation of Church Wealth in Mexico: Social and Economic Aspects of the Liberal Revolution, 1856-1875. Ed. and tr. by MICHAEL P. COSTELOE. By Karl M. Schmitt 849

- PAUL FRIEDRICH. Agrarian Revolt in a Mexican Village; ROGER D. HANSEN. The Politics of Mexican Development; CLARK W. REYNOLDS. The Mexican Economy: Twentieth-Century Structure and Growth. By William P. McGreevey 850

- ISAAC S. and SUZANNE A. EMMANUEL. History of the Jews of the Netherlands Antilles. Vol. 1, History; vol. 2, Appendices. By Bernard D. Ansel 851

- GERMÁN COLMENARES. La provincia de Tunja en el Nuevo Reino de Granada: Ensayo de historia social (1539-1800). By Frank R. Safford 852

- E. BRADFORD BURNS. A History of Brazil. By James R. Scobie 853

- GEORGE WOODCOCK. Henry Walter Bates: Naturalist of the Amazons. By Arthur R. Steele 854

- JOSEPH L. LOVE. Rio Grande do Sul and Brazilian Regionalism, 1882-1930. By Lewis A. Tambs 854

- RONALD M. SCHNEIDER. The Political System of Brazil: Emergence of a "Modernizing" Authoritarian Regime, 1964-1970. By John W. F. Dulles 855

- J. R. FISHER. Government and Society in Colonial Peru: The Intendant System, 1784-1814. By J. P. Moore 855

Contents, Continued

JAMES M. MALLOY, Bolivia: The Uncompleted Revolution; JAMES M. MALLOY and RICHARD S. THORN, eds. Beyond the Revolution: Bolivia since 1952. By Jerry Knudson 856

|                      |     |                             |       |
|----------------------|-----|-----------------------------|-------|
| Communications       | 858 | Recently Published Articles | 879   |
| Recent Deaths        | 866 | Index to Advertisers        | 52(a) |
| Other Books Received | 873 |                             |       |

VOLUME 77 • NUMBER 4 • OCTOBER 1972

---

The American Historical Review

---

THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

Cover illustration. Elite Argentine family's summer house, built ca. late nineteenth century. (Detail from fig. 13, p. 1063.) Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, AG, Colección Witcomb.

The American Historical Review appears in February, April, June, October, and December of each year. It is published by the American Historical Association, 400 A Street, S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003, and is printed and mailed by the William Byrd Press, 2901 Byrdhill Road, Richmond, Virginia 23228.

The AHR is sent to members of the American Historical Association and to institutions holding subscriptions. Membership dues: $20.00 annually; student (faculty signature required), emeritus, and spouse $10.00; life $400. Subscription rates: Class I, American Historical Review only, United States, Canada, and Mexico $25.00, foreign $27.00. Further information concerning membership and subscriptions is contained in the two pages immediately preceding the advertisements. Information concerning the ordering of back issues and the submission of manuscripts will be found on the page immediately preceding the advertisements.

Notice of nonreceipt of an issue must be sent to the Business Office of the Association within three months of the date of publication of the issue. Changes of address should be sent to the Business Office by the tenth of the month preceding the month of publication. The Association is not responsible for copies lost because of failure to report a change of address in time for mailing. Postmaster: Please send notification (Form 3579) regarding undelivered journals to: American Historical Association, 400 A Street, S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003.

The AHR disclaims responsibility for statements, either of fact or opinion, made by contributors.

© THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION 1972

All rights reserved

Second-class postage paid at Richmond, Virginia

Editorial

|                            |     |
|----------------------------|-----|
| The AHR and the AHA | 967 |
|----------------------------|-----|

Articles

|   |      |
|---|------|
| The Florentine Palace as Domestic Architecture,BY RICHARD A. GOLDTHWAITE  | 977  |
| The American Civil War Considered as a Crisis in Law and Order,BY PHILLIP S. PALUDAN                                  | 1013 |
| Buenos Aires as a Commercial-Bureaucratic City, 1880-1910:Characteristics of a City's Orientation, BY JAMES R. SCOBIE | 1035 |

Review Article

|  |      |
|--|------|
| New Perspectives on the Republican Party, 1877-1913,BY LEWIS L. GOULD                | 1074 |
| JOHN BRAEMAN. Albert J. Beveridge: American Nationalist                                  |      |
| RICHARD JENSEN. The Winning of the Midwest: Socialand Political Conflict, 1888-1896  |      |
| HORACE SAMUEL MERRILL and MARION GALBRAITH MERRILL.The Republican Command, 1897-1913 |      |
| RICHARD E. WELCH, JR. George Frisbie Hoar and theHalf-Breed Republicans              |      |

Reviews of Books

GENERAL

MATTHEW MELKO. The Nature of Civilizations; BERNARD NORLING. Timeless Problems in History. By John Lukacs 1083

MORTON A. KAPLAN. On Historical and Political Knowing: An Inquiry into Some Problems of Universal Law & Human Freedom. By Whitaker T. Deiningner 1084

MARTIN BALLARD, ed. New Movements in the Study and Teaching of History; HAROLD PERKIN, ed. History: An Introduction for the Intending Student. By Richard H. Brown 1084

PAUL F. KRESS. Social Science and the Idea of Process: The Ambiguous Legacy of Arthur F. Bentley. By William H. Issel 1085

EDWARD WHITING FOX. History in Geographic Perspective: The Other France. By Robert S. Lopez 1086

JOHN HICKS. A Theory of Economic History; JONATHAN HUGHES. Industrialization and Economic History: Theses and Conjectures. By William N. Parker 1087

JACQUELINE MURRAY. The First European Agriculture: A Study of the Osteological and Botanical Evidence until 2000 B.C. By Paul C. Mangelsdorf 1088

G. J. CUMING and DEREK BAKER, eds. Councils and Assemblies: Papers Read at the Eighth Summer Meeting and the Ninth Winter Meeting of the Ecclesiastical History Society. By Henry G. J. Beck 1089

MONTE D. WRIGHT and LAWRENCE J. PASZEK, eds. Science, Technology, and Warfare: The Proceedings of the Third Military History Symposium, United States Air Force Academy, 8-9 May 1969. By Peter Paret 1090

CAMILLE LIMOGES. La sélection naturelle: Étude sur la première constitution d'un concept (1837-1859). By Sandra Herbert 1091

KARL MARX. Critique of Hegel's 'Philosophy of Right'. Tr. by ANNETTE JOLIN and JOSEPH O'MALLEY. Ed. by JOSEPH O'MALLEY. By Alfred G. Meyer 1092

HEINZ K. MEIER. Friendship under Stress: U.S.-Swiss Relations 1900-1950. By William M. Franklin 1092

BRITON COOPER BUSCH. Britain, India, and the Arabs, 1914-1921. By Linda C. Rose 1093

NICHOLAS BALABKINS. West German Reparations to Israel. By George L. Mosse 1094

ANCIENT

SINCLAIR HOOD. The Minoans: The Story of Bronze Age Crete. By Joseph W. Shaw 1095

A. W. H. ADKINS. From the Many to the One: A Study of Personality and Views of Human Nature

in the Context of Ancient Greek Society, Values, and Beliefs. By Eleanor G. Huzar 1095

CHARLES W. FORNARA. Herodotus: An Interpretative Essay. By Malcolm F. McGregor 1096

JOHN TRAVLOS. Pictorial Dictionary of Ancient Athens. By Richard Brilliant 1097

W. ROBERT CONNOR. The New Politicians of Fifth-Century Athens. By Alan L. Boegehold 1097

F. E. PETERS. The Harvest of Hellenism: A History of the Near East from Alexander the Great to the Triumph of Christianity. By Zeph Stewart 1098

GEORGES DUMÉZIL. Archaic Roman Religion. Tr. by PHILIP KRAPP. By O. W. Reinmuth 1099

JOACHIM SZIDAT. Caesars diplomatische Tätigkeit im Gallischen Krieg. By E. M. Wightman 1100

A. H. M. JONES. Augustus. By James E. Seaver 1101

SIR RONALD SYME. Emperors and Biography: Studies in the Historia Augusta. By Peter White 1101

JOHN FERGUSON. The Religions of the Roman Empire. By John E. Rexine 1102

JAROSLAV PELIKAN. The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine. Vol. 1, The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100-600). By Glanville Downey 1102

FRANK M. CLOVER. Flavius Merobaudes: A Translation and Historical Commentary. By William G. Sinnigen 1103

MEDIEVAL

JOLE MAZZOLENI. Paleografia e diplomatica e scienze ausiliarie. By James J. John 1103

JAMES A. BRUNDAGE. Medieval Canon Law and the Crusader. By James Muldoon 1104

CHARLES T. WOOD. The Age of Chivalry: Manners and Morals, 1000-1450; RICHARD BARBER. The Knight & Chivalry. By Michael R. Powicke 1105

HILARY L. TURNER. Town Defences in England and Wales: An Architectural and Documentary Study, AD 900-1500. By A. Z. Freeman 1105

ELISABETH G. KIMBALL, ed. Records of Some Sessions of the Peace in the City of Lincoln, 1351-1354, and the Borough of Stamford, 1351. By William Huse Dunham, Jr. 1106

YVES RENOARD. The Avignon Papacy, 1305-1403. Tr. by DENIS BETHELL. By Howard Kaminsky 1106

MICHAEL JONES. Ducal Brittany, 1364-1399: Relations with England and France during the Reign of Duke John IV. By Franklin J. Pegues 1107

SALVATORE TRAMONTANA. I Normanni in Italia: Linee di ricerca sui primi insediamenti. Vol. 1, Aspetti politici e militari. By Archibald R. Lewis 1107

GIOACCHINO VOLPE. Studi sulle istituzioni comunali a Pisa: Città e contado, consoli e podestà, secoli XII-XIII. By Anthony Molho 1108

ARMANDO SAPORI, ed. Libro Giallo della Compagnia dei Covoni. By David Herlihy 1109

Dumbarton Oaks Papers. Numbers 23 and 24. By Anthony Bryer 1109

Travaux et mémoires. Vol. 4. By Nina G. Garsoïan 1110

ROBERT BROWNING. Justinian and Theodora. By Dorothy de F. Abrahamse 1112

MODERN EUROPE

FRANK D. PRAGER and GUSTINA SCAGLIA. Brunelleschi: Studies of His Technology and Inventions; PAOLO ROSSI. Philosophy, Technology, and the Arts in the Early Modern Era. Tr. by SALVATOR ATTANASIO. Ed. by BENJAMIN NELSON. By Larry D. Hybertson 1112

NICOLE PEREMANS. Érasme et Bucer d'après leur correspondance. By James D. Tracy 1113

KARL JOSEF SEIDEL. Frankreich und die deutschen Protestanten: Die Bemühungen um eine religiöse Konkordie und die französische Bündnispolitik in den Jahren 1534/35. By Davis Bitton 1114

JACOB KATZ. Jews and Freemasons in Europe, 1723-1939. Tr. by LEONARD OSCHRY. By Leon Apt 1114

FEDERICO CURATO, ed. Gran Bretagna e Italia nei documenti della missione Minto. 2d ser.: 1830-1848. Vol. 1 (21 agosto 1847-4 febbraio 1848); vol. 2 (5 febbraio-12 maggio 1848). By Lynn M. Case 1115

KARL KAUTSKY, JR. August Bebel's Briefwechsel mit Karl Kautsky; ROSA LUXEMBURG. Lettres à Karl et Luise Kautsky. Tr. by NADINE STCHOUPAK and A. M. BRACKE-DESROUSSEAUX. By Vernon L. Lidtke 1116

GÉRARD CHOLVY. Géographie religieuse de l'Hérault contemporain. By James Obelkevich 1117

DAVID MITCHELL. 1919: Red Mirage. By Warren Lerner 1117

JAMES BARROS. The League of Nations and the Great Powers: The Greek-Bulgarian Incident, 1925. By George J. Marcopoulos 1118

RICHARD GLEN EAVES. Henry VIII's Scottish Diplomacy, 1513-1524: England's Relations with the Regency Government of James V. By J. Wilson Ferguson 1118

ROY STRONG. Tudor & Jacobean Portraits. Vol. 1, Text; vol. 2, Plates; KATHERINE S. VAN EERDE. Wenceslaus Hollar: Delineator of His Time. By Walter L. Woodfill 1119

DAVID UNDERDOWN. Pride's Purge: Politics in the Puritan Revolution. By Corinne Comstock Weston 1120

SHEILA LAMBERT. Bills and Acts: Legislative Procedure in Eighteenth-Century England. By J. M. Beattie 1121

J. P. P. HIGGINS and SIDNEY POLLARD, eds. Aspects of

Capital Investment in Great Britain, 1750-1850: A Preliminary Survey. By Gordon Rimmer 1121

W. S. LEWIS et al., eds. Horace Walpole's Correspondence with Sir Horace Mann and Sir Horace Mann the Younger. Vols. 9-11. By Dora Mae Clark 1122

RICHARD W. DAVIS. Dissent in Politics, 1780-1830: The Political Life of William Smith, MP. By R. W. Greaves 1123

A. S. WOHL et al. The History of Working-Class Housing: A Symposium. Ed. by STANLEY D. CHAPMAN. By Bentley B. Gilbert 1123

JOHN HURT. Education in Evolution: Church, State, Society and Popular Education, 1800-1870. By Francis H. Herrick 1124

NICHOLAS C. EDSALL. The Anti-Poor Law Movement, 1834-44. By J. R. Poynter 1125

ROBERT STEWART. The Politics of Protection: Lord Derby and the Protectionist Party, 1841-1852. By David Spring 1125

ROY DOUGLAS. The History of the Liberal Party, 1895-1970. By Stephen E. Koss 1126

NEVILLE THOMPSON. The Anti-Appeasers: Conservative Opposition to Appeasement in the 1930s. By Stephen R. Graubard 1127

F. S. L. LYONS. Ireland since the Famine. By Helen F. Mulvey 1127

C. THELLIEZ. Marie de Luxembourg, duchesse douairière de Vendôme, comtesse douairière de St.-Pol, comtesse douairière d'Enghien, dame de La Fère, et son temps. By John C. Moore 1128

MYRIAM YARDENI. La conscience nationale en France pendant les guerres de religion (1559-1598). By Nancy L. Roelker 1129

MICHAEL PRAWDIN. Marie de Rohan, Duchesse de Chevreuse. By J. Michael Hayden 1130

ROGER HAHN. The Anatomy of a Scientific Institution: The Paris Academy of Sciences, 1666-1803. By Charles C. Gillispie 1130

HENRY J. MERRY. Montesquieu's System of Natural Government. By Judith N. Shklar 1131

THOMAS F. SHEPPARD. Lourmarin in the Eighteenth Century: A Study of a French Village. By Thadd E. Hall 1132

THADD E. HALL. France and the Eighteenth-Century Corsican Question. By A. Lloyd Moote 1132

WALTER MARKOV. Exkurse zu Jacques Roux. By Steven T. Ross 1133

MAURICE AGULHON. La vie sociale en Provence intérieure au lendemain de la Révolution. By Leo A. Loubère 1134

THEODORE ZELDIN, ed. Conflicts in French Society: Anticlericalism, Education and Morals in the Nineteenth Century. Essays. By Edward T. Gargan 1134

ALISTAIR HORNE. The Terrible Year: The Paris Commune, 1871; ÉDITH THOMAS. Louise Michael:

- Ou la Velléda de l'anarchie.*
By Louis M. Greenberg 1135
- GUY ROSSI-LANDI. La drôle de guerre: La vie politique en France, 2 septembre 1939-10 mai 1940.
By W. E. Adams 1136
- ANTHONY HARTLEY. Gaullism: The Rise and Fall of a Political Movement; FRANK L. WILSON. The French Democratic Left, 1963-1969: Toward a Modern Party System. By John C. Cairns 1137
- C. G. AMINOFF. Nyuppsatta truppförband i Finland 1770-1808: Administrativ historia och personal.
By Pekka Kalevi Hamalainen 1138
- VOLKER PRESS. Calvinismus und Territorialstaat: Regierung und Zentralbehörden der Kurpfalz 1559-1619. By Karl H. Dannenfeldt 1138
- FRITZ WOLFF, ed. Acta Pacis Westphalicae. Ser. III-A, Protokolle. Vol. 4, Die Beratungen der katholischen Stände. Pt. 1, 1645-1647.
By Claus-Peter Clasen 1139
- DIETRICH GERHARD, ed. Ständische Vertretungen in Europa im 17. und 18. Jahrhundert.
By Hubert C. Johnson 1140
- INGRID BÁTORI. Die Reichsstadt Augsburg im 18. Jahrhundert: Verfassung, Finanzen und Reformversuche. By Edith M. Link 1142
- HEDWIG BEHRENS. Mechanikus Franz Dinnendahl (1775-1826), Erbauer der ersten Dampfmaschinen an der Ruhr: Leben und Wirken aus zeitgenössischen Quellen. By Helen P. Liebel 1142
- SIEGFRIED SCHMIDT. Robert Blum: Vom Leipziger Liberalen zum Märtyrer der deutschen Demokratie.
By Charles E. McClelland 1143
- WALTER WAGNER. Geschichte des K. K. Kriegsministeriums. Vol. 2, 1866-1888.
By Andreas Dorpalen 1143
- HANSGEORG LOEBEL, ed. 100 Jahre deutsche Geschichte. By Theodore S. Hamerow 1144
- BRADLEY F. SMITH. Heinrich Himmler: A Nazi in the Making, 1900-1926. By Robert Koehl 1144
- WILHELM DEIST, ed. Militär und Innenpolitik im Weltkrieg 1914-1918. 2 vols.
By Ulrich Trumpener 1145
- CLAUS GUSKE. Das politische Denken des Generals von Seeckt: Ein Beitrag zur Diskussion des Verhältnisses Seeckt-Reichswehr-Republik.
By Harold J. Gordon, Jr. 1146
- DAVID FELIX. Walther Rathenau and the Weimar Republic: The Politics of Reparations.
By Eric C. Kollman 1147
- MARTIN VOGT, ed. Die Entstehung der Youngplans, dargestellt vom Reichsarchiv 1931-1933.
By David Felix 1148
- HANS GÜNTHER HOCKERTS. Die Sittlichkeitsprozesse gegen katholische Ordensangehörige und Priester, 1936/1937: Eine Studie zur nationalsozialistischen Herrschaftstechnik und zum Kirchenkampf.
By Thomas A. Knapp 1148
- JAMES DOUGLAS-HAMILTON. Motive for a Mission: The Story behind Hess's Flight to Britain; J. BERNARD HUTTON. Hess: The Man and His Mission.
By R. G. L. Waite 1149
- H. G. KOENIGSBERGER. The Habsburgs and Europe, 1516-1660; PHILIPPE ERLANGER. L'empereur insolite: Rodolphe II de Habsbourg (1552-1612).
By Roger Wines 1150
- GRETE KLINGENSTEIN. Staatsverwaltung und kirchliche Autorität im 18. Jahrhundert: Das Problem der Zensur in der thesesianischen Reform.
By William J. McGill 1150
- FRIEDRICH PRINZ. Prag und Wien 1848: Probleme der nationalen und sozialen Revolution im Spiegel der Wiener Ministerratsprotokolle.
By Istvan Deak 1151
- RONALD FLORENCE. Fritz: The Story of a Political Assassin. By Gerald R. Kleinfeld 1152
- ERWIN BUCHER. Die Geschichte des Sonderbundskrieges. By Heinz K. Meier 1152
- ERICH GRUNER. Die schweizerische Bundesversammlung 1920-1968: L'Assemblée fédérale suisse 1920-1968; ERICH GRUNER, ed. Die Schweiz seit 1945: Beiträge zur Zeitgeschichte.
By Sabine Jessner 1153
- BEAT CLAUS. Die Nationale Front: Eine schweizer faschistische Bewegung, 1930-1940.
By Gerard Braunthal 1154
- GIUSEPPE LO GIUDICE. Comunità rurali della Sicilia moderna: Bronte (1747-1853).
By Duane Koenig 1154
- HOWARD R. MARRARO, ed. L'unificazione italiana vista dai diplomatici statunitensi. Vol. 4 (1861-1866).
By Joseph Rossi 1155
- SERGIO I. MINERBI. L'Italie et la Palestine, 1914-1920.
By Alan Cassels 1156
- La Toscana nel regime fascista (1922-1939): Convegno di studi promosso dall'Unione Regionale delle Province Toscane, dalla Provincia di Firenze e dall'Istituto Storico per la Resistenza in Toscana, Firenze, Palazzo Riccardi, 23-24 maggio 1969. 2 vols.* By Emiliana P. Noether 1156
- HARRY FORNARI. Mussolini's Gadfly: Roberto Farinacci. By Salvatore Saladino 1157
- LEO VALIANI et al. Azionisti, cattolici e comunisti nella Resistenza. By Charles F. Deltzell 1158
- F. ROY WILLIS. Italy Chooses Europe.
By William R. Feeney 1159
- CONSTANTINE CAVARNOS. Modern Greek Thought: Three Essays Dealing with Philosophy, Critique of Science, and Views of Man's Nature and Destiny.
By William Peter Kaldis 1159
- VLADIMIR DEDIJER. The Battle Stalin Lost: Memoirs of Yugoslavia, 1948-1953.
By Gerald Gilbert Govorchin 1160
- VLADIMÍR V. KUŠÍN. The Intellectual Origins of the Prague Spring: The Development of Reformist Ideas in Czechoslovakia 1956-1967; IVAN SVITÁK. The

Contents, Continued

ix

Czechoslovak Experiment: 1968-1969.

By Roman Szporluk 1161

RICHARD PIPES. Struwe: Liberal on the Left, 1870-1905. By Theodore H. von Laue 1162

NEAR EAST

GEORGE M. HADDAD. Revolutions and Military Rule in the Middle East. Vol. 2, The Arab States. Pt. 1, Iraq, Syria, Lebanon and Jordan. By Gordon H. Torrey 1163

AFRICA

Colonialism in Africa, 1870-1960. Vol. 2, The History and Politics of Colonialism, 1914-1960. Ed. by L. H. GANN and PETER DUIGNAN; vol. 3, Profiles of Change: African Society and Colonial Rule. Ed. by VICTOR TURNER. By Marcia Wright 1164

ASIA AND THE EAST

A. I. CHEREPANOV. Severnii pokhod Natsional'norevoliutsionnoi armii Kitata (Zapiski voennogo sovetnika). By Eric Widmer 1167

JAMES CHIEH HSIUNG. Ideology and Practice: The Evolution of Chinese Communism; JOHN WILSON LEWIS, ed. Party Leadership and Revolutionary Power in China; FRANK H. TRAGER and WILLIAM HENDERSON, eds. Communist China, 1949-1969: A Twenty-Year Appraisal. By C. T. Hu 1167

DAVID BERGAMINI. Japan's Imperial Conspiracy. By Alvin D. Cook 1169

J. P. SHARMA. Republics in Ancient India: C. 1500 B.C.-500 B.C. By N. K. Wagle 1170

STEPHEN P. COHEN. The Indian Army: Its Contribution to the Development of a Nation. By Walter Hauser 1171

AMERICAS

PAUL A. ROSSI and DAVID C. HUNT. The Art of the Old West: From the Collection of the Gilcrease Institute. By Howard R. Lamar 1172

BEN B. SELIGMAN. The Potentates: Business and Businessmen in American History. By Edward C. Kirkland 1173

VIRGINIUS DABNEY. Virginia: The New Dominion. By Noble E. Cunningham, Jr. 1174

T. H. BREEN. The Character of the Good Ruler: A Study of Puritan Political Ideas in New England, 1630-1730. By Darrett B. Rutman 1175

ROBERT J. TAYLOR, ed. The Susquehanna Company Papers. Vol. 10, 1789-1800; vol. 11, 1801-1808. By S. K. Stevens 1176

FREDERICK MERK. Fruits of Propaganda in the Tyler Administration. By Robert Seager II 1177

ZANE ALLEN MASON. Frontiersmen of the Faith: A History of Baptist Pioneer Work in Texas 1865-1885. By Francis Phelps Weisenburger 1178

BEVERLEY BOWEN MOELLER. Phil Swing and Boulder Dam. By Gerald D. Nash 1178

NATHAN IRVIN HUGGINS. Harlem Renaissance. By August Meier 1179

ROSS RUSSELL. Jazz Style in Kansas City and the Southwest. By George A. Boeck 1179

R. SERGE DENISOFF. Great Day Coming: Folk Music and the American Left. By Staughton Lynd 1180

WILLIAM C. BERMAN. The Politics of Civil Rights in the Truman Administration. By Elliott Rudwick 1181

JOSEPH BRUCE GORMAN. Kefauver: A Political Biography. By J. Joseph Huthmacher 1181

ROBERT L. BRANYAN and LAWRENCE H. LARSEN. The Eisenhower Administration, 1953-1961: A Documentary History. 2 vols. By Alonzo L. Hamby 1182

WILLIAM L. O'NEILL. Coming Apart: An Informal History of America in the 1960's. By Barton J. Bernstein 1183

MIGUEL JORRIN and JOHN D. MARTZ. Latin-American Political Thought and Ideology. By Harold Eugene Davis 1184

ERIC WILLIAMS. From Columbus to Castro: The History of the Caribbean, 1492-1969. By Robert E. McNicoll 1185

ROBERT I. ROTBERG. Haiti: The Politics of Squalor. By Murdo J. Macleod 1186

HARRY LEONARD SAWATZKY. They Sought a Country: Mennonite Colonization in Mexico. By Eugene K. Chamberlin 1187

ANDRÉ SAINT-LU. Condition coloniale et conscience créole au Guatemala (1524-1821). By Troy S. Floyd 1187

RICHARD NEWBOLD ADAMS. Crucifixion by Power: Essays on Guatemalan National Social Structure, 1944-1966. By J. C. M. Ogelsby 1188

G. A. MELLANDER. The United States in Panamanian Politics: The Intriguing Formative Years. By Maury Baker 1188

ROBERT W. SHIRLEY. The End of a Tradition: Culture Change and Development in the Municipio of Cunha, São Paulo, Brazil. By Joseph L. Love 1189

FREDERICK M. NUNN. Chilean Politics, 1920-1931: The Honorable Mission of the Armed Forces. By Philip J. Houseman 1190

Communications 1191

Recent Deaths 1198

Association Notes 1206

Festschriften and Miscellanies 1207

Other Books Received 1209

Recently Published Articles 1221

Index of Advertisers 102(a)

VOLUME 77 • NUMBER 5 • DECEMBER 1972

---

The American Historical Review

---

THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

Cover Illustration. Trade-union demonstration at the Embankment. London, ca. 1902.
(Detail from photograph, p. 1349.) Courtesy of Gernsheim Collection, University of Texas.

The American Historical Review appears in February, April, June, October, and December of each year. It is published by the American Historical Association, 400 A Street, S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003, and is printed and mailed by the William Byrd Press, 2901 Byrdhill Road, Richmond, Virginia 23228.

The AHR is sent to members of the American Historical Association and to institutions holding subscriptions. Membership dues: $26.00 annually; student (faculty signature required), emeritus, and spouse $10.00; life $400. Subscription rates: Class I, American Historical Review only, United States, Canada, and Mexico $25.00, foreign $27.00. Further information concerning membership and subscriptions is contained in the two pages immediately preceding the advertisements. Information concerning the ordering of back issues and the submission of manuscripts will be found on the page immediately preceding the advertisements.

Notice of nonreceipt of an issue must be sent to the Business Office of the Association within three months of the date of publication of the issue. Changes of address should be sent to the Business Office by the tenth of the month preceding the month of publication. The Association is not responsible for copies lost because of failure to report a change of address in time for mailing. Postmaster: Please send notification (Form 3579) regarding undelivered journals to: American Historical Association, 400 A Street, S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003.

The AHR disclaims responsibility for statements, either of fact or opinion, made by contributors.

© THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION 1972

All rights reserved

Second-class postage paid at Richmond, Virginia

---

Contents

VOLUME 77 • NUMBER 5 • DECEMBER 1972

---

Articles

- Martyrs, Myths, and the Massacre: The Background of
St. Bartholomew, BY DONALD R. KELLEY 1323
- "The Sense of an Impending Clash": English Working-Class
Unrest before the First World War,
BY STANDISH MEACHAM 1343
- Stalin and the Prospects of a Separate Peace in World War II, BY VOJTECH MASTNY 1365

Review Article

- A Soviet Historian Evaluates Stalin's Role in History,
BY ROBERT M. SLUSSER 1389
- ROY A. MEDVEDEV. K sudu istorii (genezis i posledstviia Stalinizma)
- . Let History Judge: The Origins and Consequences of Stalinism. Tr. COLLEEN TAYLOR. Ed. DAVID JORAVSKY and GEORGES HAUPT

Reviews of Books

GENERAL

- ISAAC DEUTSCHER. Marxism in Our Time. Ed. by TAMARA DEUTSCHER; GEORGE LICHTHEIM. George Lukács; ROBERT C. TUCKER. The Marxian Revolutionary Idea. By Robert V. Daniels 1399
- KENNETH E. BOULDING. A Primer on Social Dynamics: History as Dialectics and Development; LESLIE SKLAIR. The Sociology of Progress. By Theodore H. Von Laue 1400
- BENJAMIN B. WOLMAN, ed. The Psychoanalytic Interpretation of History. By Richard Bonine 1401
- PAUL K. CONKIN and ROLAND N. STROMBERG. The Heritage and Challenge of History. By John R. Palmer 1402
- GEORGES LEFEBVRE. La naissance de l'historiographie moderne; NORMAN F. CANTOR. Perspectives on the European Past: Conversations with Historians; L. P. CURTIS, JR., ed. The Historian's Workshop: Original Essays by Sixteen Historians. By Peter Gay 1403
- HELMUT HIRSCH. Lehrer machen Geschichte: Das Institut für Erziehungswissenschaften und das Internationale Schulbuchinstitut. Ein Beitrag zur Kontinuitätsforschung. By George Bereday 1405
- LOUIS GOTTSCHALK et al. The Foundations of the Modern World. By Franklin L. Ford 1406
- Third International Conference of Economic History, Munich, 1965, vol. 2*. By Robert Forster 1407
- ROBERT SCHWOBEL, ed. Renaissance Men and Ideas. By Anne Jacobson Schutte 1409
- J. C. ROWE and W. H. STOCKDALE, eds. Florilegium Historiale: Essays Presented to Wallace K. Ferguson. By Rosalie L. Coliet 1410
- ERNEST F. DIBBLE and EARLE W. NEWTON, eds. Spain and Her Rivals on the Gulf Coast. By Verne E. Chatelain 1411
- ERNEST S. DODGE. Beyond the Capes: Pacific Exploration from Captain Cook to the Challenger, 1776-1877. By Harold L. Burstyn 1411
- JACQUES FREYMOND. La Première Internationale: Recueil de documents. Vol. 3, Les conflits au sein de l'Internationale, 1872-1873; vol. 4, Les congrès et les conférences de l'Internationale 1873-1877. By Samuel Bernstein 1412
- LOUISE H. HUNTER. Buddhism in Hawaii: Its Impact on a Yankee Community. By Merze Tate 1413
- BERNARD FERGUSON. The Trumpet in the Hall, 1930-1958. By Raymond Callahan 1414
- V. L. ISRAELIAN and L. N. KUTAKOV. Diplomatiia agresorov: Germano-italo-iaponskii fashistkii blok. Istoriia ego vozniknoveniia i krakha. By David D. Finley 1414
- MARK W. ZACHER. Dag Hammarskjöld's United Nations; DAVID A. KAY. The New Nations in the United Nations, 1960-1967. By James N. Rosenau 1415

ANCIENT

- RONALD JESSUP. South East England. By Ralph V. Turner 1416
- I. E. S. EDWARDS et al., eds. The Cambridge Ancient History. Vol. 1, pt. 2, Early History of the Middle East. By Tom B. Jones 1416
- MORTON SMITH. Palestinian Parties and Politics That Shaped the Old Testament. By A. Thomas Kraabel 1418
- A. M. SNODGRASS. The Dark Age of Greece: An Archaeological Survey of the Eleventh to the Eighth Centuries BC. By Thomas Kelly 1419
- HUGH LLOYD-JONES. The Justice of Zeus. By John F. Oates 1420
- G. E. R. LLOYD. Early Greek Science: Thales to Aristotle; JACK LINDSAY. Origins of Astrology. By Michael H. Jameson 1421
- CHESTER G. STARR. Athenian Coinage, 480-449 B.C. By Charles D. Hamilton 1421
- THOMAS FISCHER. Untersuchungen zum Partherkrieg Antiochos' VII. im Rahmen der Seleukidengeschichte. By Richard N. Frye 1422
- DAVID STOCKTON. Cicero: A Political Biography. By Thomas W. Africa 1423

MEDIEVAL

- R. W. SOUTHERN. Medieval Humanism. By Francis Oakley 1423
- JOHN BEELER. Warfare in Feudal Europe, 730-1200. By Michael R. Powicke 1424
- Il monachesimo e la riforma ecclesiastica (1049-1122): Atti della quarta Settimana internazionale di studio, Mendola, 23-29 agosto 1968*. By W. David Knowles 1425
- HENRY MARSH. Dark Age Britain: Some Sources of History. By Ronald D. Ware 1427
- PETER CLEMOES and KATHLEEN HUGHES, eds. England before the Conquest: Studies in Primary Sources Presented to Dorothy Whitelock. By C. Warren Hollister 1428
- T. B. PUGH, ed. Glamorgan County History. Vol. 3, The Middle Ages: The Marcher Lordships of Glamorgan and Morgannwg and Gower and Kilvey from the Norman Conquest to the Act of Union of England and Wales. By B. Wilkinson 1429
- F. R. H. DU BOULAY and CAROLINE M. BARRON, eds. The Reign of Richard II: Essays in Honour of May McKisack; ANTHONY GOODMAN. The Loyal Conspiracy: The Lords Appellant under Richard II. By J. M. W. Bean 1430
- VEIKKO LITZEN. A War of Roses and Lilies: The Theme of Succession in Sir John Fortescue's Works. By Josiah Bunting 1431

MICHEL ROBLIN. Le terroir de Paris aux époques gallo-romaine et franque: Peuplement et défrichement dans la Civitas des Parisii (Seine, Seine-et-Oise). By Bryce Lyon 1432

JOSEPH R. STRAYER. The Albigenian Crusades. By Jeffrey B. Russell 1433

DIMITRI OBOLENSKY. The Byzantine Commonwealth: Eastern Europe, 500-1453. By Paul J. Alexander 1433

MODERN EUROPE

J. H. ELLIOTT. The Old World and the New, 1492-1650. By De Lamar Jensen 1435

STILLMAN DRAKE. Galileo Studies: Personality, Tradition, and Revolution. By Harry Woolf 1436

CARSTEN HOLBRAAD. The Concert of Europe: A Study in German and British International Theory, 1815-1914. By Patricia K. Grimsted 1437

M. I. MIKHAILOV. Istoriia Soiuza Kommunistov. By Olga V. Vuchich 1438

JOHANNES WENZEL. Jakob Burckhardt in der Krise seiner Zeit; E. M. JANSSEN. Jacob Burckhardt und die Renaissance. By Charles H. O'Brien 1438

ARNO J. MAYER. Dynamics of Counterrevolution in Europe, 1870-1956: An Analytic Framework. By F. H. Hinsley 1440

HARALD VON RIEKHOFF. German-Polish Relations, 1918-1933. By Norman Rich 1440

STANISŁAW NAWROCKI. Policja hitlerowska w tzw. Kraju Warty w latach 1939-1945; JAN SZILING. Polityka okupanta hitlerowskiego wobec Kościoła Katolickiego, 1939-1945; Tzw. Okregi Rzeszy: Gdańsk-Prusy Zachodnie, Kraj Warty i Regencja Katowicka. By Andrzej Korbonski 1441

ERIC ASHBY and MARY ANDERSON. The Rise of the Student Estate in Britain. By John F. Naylor 1442

A. R. B. HALDANE. Three Centuries of Scottish Posts: An Historical Survey to 1836. By Howard Robinson 1443

LACEY BALDWIN SMITH. Henry VIII: The Mask of Royalty. By Helen Miller 1443

THOMAS ROGERS FORBES. Chronicle from Aldgate: Life and Death in Shakespeare's London. By Robert G. Lang 1444

S. G. CHECKLAND. The Gladstones: A Family Biography, 1764-1851. By John Clive 1445

JULIA NAMIER. Lewis Namier: A Biography. By Stephen R. Graubard 1446

HAROLD MACMILLAN. Riding the Storm, 1956-1959; HAROLD WILSON. A Personal Record: The Labour Government, 1964-1970. By Trevor Lloyd 1446

MAURICE MANNING. The Blueshirts; MARTIN WALLACE. Northern Ireland: 50 Years of Self-Government; J. BOWYER BELL. The Secret Army: The IRA 1916-1970. By Galen Broeker 1448

J. H. WHYTE. Church and State in Modern Ireland, 1923-1970. By David W. Miller 1449

JEAN-PIERRE BARDET et al. Le bâtiment: Enquete d'histoire économique, XIV<sup>e</sup>-XIX<sup>e</sup> siècles. Vol. 1, Maisons rurales et urbaines dans la France traditionnelle. By Thomas F. Sheppard 1450

J. SHIMIZU. Conflict of Loyalties: Politics and Religion in the Career of Gaspard de Coligny, Admiral of France, 1519-1572. By Charmarie Jenkins Blaisdell 1451

EDMUND H. DICKERMAN. Bellèvere and Villeroy: Power in France under Henry III and Henry IV. By Alfred Soman 1452

MOHAMED EL KORDI. Bayeux au XVII<sup>e</sup> et XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècles: Contribution à l'histoire urbaine de la France. By Charles Tilly 1453

A. LLOYD MOOTE. The Revolt of the Judges: The Parlement of Paris and the Fronde, 1643-1652. By John C. Rule 1454

MICHEL MORINEAU. Les faux-semblants d'un denarage économique: Agriculture et démographie en France au XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. By Franklin Mendels 1454

PATRICE L.-R. HIGONNET. Pont-de-Montvert: Social Structure and Politics in a French Village, 1700-1914. By A. Lloyd Moote 1455

IRA O. WADE. The Intellectual Origins of the French Enlightenment. By K. M. Baker 1456

VINCENT W. BEACH. Charles X of France: His Life and Times. By Daniel P. Resnick 1457

ROGER PRICE. The French Second Republic: A Social History. By Peter H. Amann 1457

HELMUT RUMPLER. Ministerrat und Ministerratsprotokolle 1848-1867: Behordengeschichtliche und aktenskapliche Analyse; HORST BRETTNER-MESSLER, ed. Die Protokolle des österreichischen Ministerrates 1848-1867. Pt. 6, Das Ministerium Belcredi, vol. 1, 29. Juli 1865-26 März 1866. By Richard B. Elrod 1459

SAMUEL BERNSTEIN. Auguste Blanqui and the Art of Insurrection. By Peter N. Stearns 1460

DAVID STAFFORD. From Anarchism to Reformism: A Study of the Political Activities of Paul Brousse within the First International and the French Socialist Movement, 1870-90. By Aaron Noland 1461

JAMES HARDING. The Astonishing Adventure of General Boulanger. By Jean T. Joughin 1461

H. L. WESSELING. Soldaat en krijger: Franse opvattingen over leger en oorlog, 1905-1914. By I. Schöffer 1462

ERIKA SPIVAKOVSKY. Son of the Alhambra: Don Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, 1504-1575. By De Lamar Jensen 1463

ORLANDO RIBEIRO. A evolução agrária no Portugal mediterrâneo: Notícia e comentário de uma obra de Albert Silbert. By C. R. Boxer 1464

J. GERARD-LIBOIS and JOSÉ COTOVITCH. L'an 40: La Belgique occupée. By Shepard B. Clough 1465

- FINN GAD. The History of Greenland. Vol. 1, Earliest Times to 1700. Tr. by ERNST DUPONT.
By Archibald R. Lewis 1465
- GUNNAR QVIST. Fredrika Bremer och kvinnans emancipation: Opinionshistoriska studier.
By W. Glyn Jones 1466
- JOHANNES SZIBORSKY. Die Germanisierung der Mark Brandenburg in der märkischen Geschichtsschreibung des 16. Jahrhunderts unter dem Einfluss von Humanismus und Reformation.
By R. N. Crossley 1467
- URBAN PIERIUS. Geschichte der kursächsischen Kirchen- und Schulreformation. Ed. by THOMAS KLEIN.
By Claus-Peter Clasen 1467
- EDA SAGARRA. Tradition and Revolution: German Literature and Society, 1830-1890.
By Robert Anchor 1468
- JOHN R. GILLIS. The Prussian Bureaucracy in Crisis, 1840-1860: Origins of an Administrative Ethos.
By Robert M. Berdahl 1469
- WILHELM KLUTENTRETER. Die Rheinische Zeitung von 1842/43 in der politischen und geistigen Bewegung des Vormärz. Vols. 1, 2.
By Oscar J. Hammen 1469
- EBERHARD KOLB. Die Kriegausbruch 1870: Politische Entscheidungsprozesse und Verantwortlichkeiten in der Julikrise 1870. By Andreas Dorpalen 1470
- WINFRIED SCHÜLER. Der Bayreuther Kreis von seiner Entstehung bis zum Ausgang der Wilhelminischen Ära: Wagnerkult und Kulturreform im Geiste völkischer Weltanschauung.
By Donald E. Thomas, Jr. 1471
- HANS GEORG LEHMANN. Die Agrarfrage in der Theorie und Praxis der deutschen und internationalen Sozialdemokratie: Vom Marxismus zum Revisionismus und Bolschewismus.
By Richard N. Hunt 1471
- URSULA FEIST and GÜNTER FEIST, eds. Kunst und Künstler: Aus 32 Jahrgängen einer deutschen Kunstzeitschrift; BETH IRWIN LEWIS. George Grosz: Art and Politics in the Weimar Republic.
By Peter Paret 1472
- Year Book XV*. By Raul Hilberg 1473
- GEORGE W. F. HALLGARTEN. Als die Schatten fielen: Erinnerungen vom Jahrhundertbeginn zur Jahrtausendwende. By Vernon L. Lidtke 1474
- Probleme deutscher Zeitgeschichte*.
By Richard M. Bernstein 1475
- SHLOMO ARONSON. Reinhard Heydrich und die Frühgeschichte von Gestapo und SD.
By George C. Browder 1476
- JOHN H. BACKER. Prining the German Economy: American Occupational Policies, 1945-1948.
By Earl F. Ziemke 1476
- JOSEPH FREDERICK ZACEK. Palacký: The Historian as Scholar and Nationalist.
By Stanley B. Winters 1477
- ANTON VANTUCH and L'UDOVÍK HOLOTIK, eds. Der österreichisch-ungarische Ausgleich 1867: Materialien (Referate und Diskussion) der internationalen Konferenz in Bratislava 28.8.-1.9. 1967.
By Solomon Wank 1478
- YVES COLLART. Le parti socialiste suisse et l'Internationale, 1914-1915: De l'Union nationale à Zimmerwald. By E. Gruner 1480
- BRIAN PULLAN. Rich and Poor in Renaissance Venice: The Social Institutions of a Catholic State, to 1620.
By Donald Weinstein 1481
- VITTOR IVO COMPARATO. Giuseppe Valletta: Un intellettuale napoletano della fine del Seicento.
By Paul F. Grendler 1482
- DENIS MACK SMITH. Victor Emanuel, Cavour, and the Risorgimento.
By A. William Salomone 1482
- GIORGIO SPINI. L'Evangelo e il berretto frigio: Storia della Chiesa Cristiana Libera in Italia, 1870-1904.
By Frank J. Coppa 1484
- Atti del XLIV Congresso di storia del Risorgimento italiano (Trieste, 31 ottobre-4 novembre 1968) (La fine della prima guerra mondiale e i problemi relativi)*. By Benjamin F. Brown 1485
- STANISŁAW GRODZISKI. Historia ustroju społeczno politycznego Galicji, 1772-1848.
By Waclaw W. Soroka 1486
- LOUIS FITZGIBBON. Katyn.
By Zygmunt J. Gasiorowski 1486
- FERENC A. VÁLI. Bridge across the Bosphorus: The Foreign Policy of Turkey.
By Edward C. Clark 1487
- V. A. PETROV. Ocherki po istorii revoliutsionnogo dvizheniia v russkoi armii v 1905 g.
By Peter Kenez 1488
- NEAR EAST
- RICHARD G. HOVANNISIAN. The Republic of Armenia. Vol. 1, The First Year, 1918-1919.
By Thomas A. Bryson 1488
- MEHDI HERAVI. Iranian-American Diplomacy; MICHAEL KAHL SHEEHAN. Iran: The Impact of United States Interests and Policies 1941-1954.
By Nikki R. Keddie 1489
- AFRICA
- HUBERT DESCHAMPS, ed. Histoire générale de l'Afrique noire, de Madagascar et des archipels. Vol. 2, De 1800 à nos jours. By P. D. Curtin 1490
- ROBERT O. COLLINS. Land beyond the Rivers: The Southern Sudan, 1898-1918.
By Irene L. Gendzier 1491
- D. A. LOW. Buganda in Modern History; D. A. LOW. The Mind of Buganda: Documents of the Modern History of an African Kingdom.
By Prosser Gifford 1492
- NORMAN ROBERT BENNETT. Mirambo of Tanzania, 1840?-1884. By Margaret L. Bates 1493

ASIA AND THE EAST

- CHANG KUO-T'AO. The Rise of the Chinese Communist Party, 1921-1927.
By John Israel 1493

- ARTHUR N. YOUNG. China's Nation-Building Effort, 1927-1937: The Financial and Economic Record.
By Albert Feuerwerker 1494

AMERICAS

- GEORGE ATHAN BILLIAS and GERALD N. GROB, eds. American History: Retrospect and Prospect.
By H. G. Nichols 1495

- HERMAN E. KROOSS and MARTIN R. BLYN. A History of Financial Intermediaries.
By Ralph W. Hidy 1497

- CONVERSE D. CLOWSE. Economic Beginnings in Colonial South Carolina, 1670-1730; PAUL S. TAYLOR. Georgia Plan: 1732-1752. By Jack P. Greene 1498

- SARAH MCCULLOH LEMMON, ed. The Pettigrew Papers. Vol. 1, 1685-1818. By J. Edwin Hendricks 1499

- DOUGLAS SLOAN. The Scottish Enlightenment and the American College Ideal. By James Axtell 1500

- ROBERT ZEMSKY. Merchants, Farmers, and River Gods: An Essay on Eighteenth-Century American Politics. By Edward M. Cook, Jr. 1501

- RICHARD HOFSTADTER. America at 1750: A Social Portrait. By Robert Middlekauff 1502

- RICHARD BAUMAN. For the Reputation of Truth: Politics, Religion, and Conflict among the Pennsylvania Quakers, 1750-1800.
By Gary B. Nash 1502

- THOMAS FLEMING. The Man Who Dared the Lightning: A New Look at Benjamin Franklin.
By Cecil B. Currey 1503

- WILLIAM S. POWELL et al., eds. The Regulators in North Carolina: A Documentary History, 1759-1776. By Richard Maxwell Brown 1504

- LOUIS DE VORSEY, JR., ed. De Brahm's Report of the General Survey in the Southern District of North America. By Wilcomb E. Washburn 1504

- DAVID JOHN JEREMY, ed. Henry Wansey and His American Journal, 1794.
By John Borden Armstrong 1505

- PETER P. HILL. William Vans Murray, Federalist Diplomat: The Shaping of Peace with France, 1797-1801. By Arthur A. Richmond III 1506

- HASKELL M. MONROE, JR. and JAMES T. MCINTOSH, eds. The Papers of Jefferson Davis. Vol. 1, 1808-1840. By David Herbert Donald 1506

- MICHAEL P. CONZEN. Frontier Farming in an Urban Shadow: The Influence of Madison's Proximity on the Agricultural Development of Blooming Grove, Wisconsin. By Walter Rundell, Jr. 1508

- ERLING A. ERICKSON. Banking in Frontier Iowa, 1836-1865. By Harry R. Stevens 1508

- DONALD JACKSON and MARY LEE SPENCE, eds. The Expeditions of John Charles Frémont. Vol. 1, Travels from 1838 to 1844.
By W. Eugene Hollon 1509

- NANCY NICHOLS BARKER, tr. and ed. The French Legation in Texas. Vol. 1, Recognition, Rupture, and Reconciliation. By Seymour V. Connor 1510

- HENRY B. COMSTOCK. The Iron Horse.
By John F. Stover 1510

- MORRIS F. TAYLOR. First Mail West: Stagecoach Lines on the Santa Fe Trail.
By Harvey L. Carter 1511

- H. CRAIG MINER. The St. Louis-San Francisco Transcontinental Railroad: The Thirty-fifth Parallel Project, 1853-1890. By John H. Krenkel 1511

- NORMAN E. TUTOROW. Leland Stanford: Man of Many Careers. By Robert C. Athearn 1512

- History of the Supreme Court of the United States.* CHARLES FAIRMAN. Vol. 6, Reconstruction and Reunion, 1864-88, pt. 1.
By Harold M. Hyman 1512

- ROBERT HIGGS. The Transformation of the American Economy, 1865-1914. By Louis Galambos 1514

- SHERRY H. OLSON. The Depletion Myth: A History of Railroad Use of Timber.
By Fred W. Kohlmeyer 1515

- ALBRO MARTIN. Enterprise Denied: Origins of the Decline of American Railroads, 1897-1917.
By James P. Baughman 1516

- JOHN B. RAE. The Road and the Car in American Life. By Peter d'A. Jones 1516

- BARBARA W. TUCHMAN. Stilwell and the American Experience in China, 1911-45.
By Jerry Israel 1517

- HAROLD SEYMOUR. Baseball: The Golden Age.
By Robert L. Beisner 1518

- CHARLES LARSEN. The Good Fight: The Life and Times of Ben B. Lindsey.
By Peter Gregg Slater 1519

- RICHARD B. HENDERSON. Maury Maverick: A Political Biography. By Robert W. Larson 1520

- RICHARD M. FREELAND. The Truman Doctrine and the Origins of McCarthyism: Foreign Policy, Domestic Politics, and Internal Security, 1946-1948.
By Thomas C. Reeves 1520

- GRAHAM T. ALLISON. Essence of Decision: Explaining the Cuban Missile Crisis; LOUISE FITZSIMONS. The Kennedy Doctrine; JAMES E. MCSHERRY. Khrushchev and Kennedy in Retrospect.
By Joan Hoff Wilson 1521

- LYNDON BAINES JOHNSON. The Vantage Point: Perspectives of the Presidency, 1963-1969; LADY BIRD JOHNSON. A White House Diary.
By Kenneth McNaught 1524

- HERBERT L. MATTHEWS. A World in Revolution: A Newspaperman's Memoir.
By Warren F. Kimball 1526

|   |      |  |       |
|---|------|--|-------|
| ROBIN W. WINKS. The Blacks in Canada: A History.By E. David Cronon   | 1527 | BRIAN R. HAMNETT. Politics and Trade in Southern Mexico, 1750-1821. By Charles R. Berry           | 1529  |
| FREDRICK B. PIKE. Hispanismo, 1898-1936: Spanish Conservatives and Liberals and Their Relations with Spanish America.By Mark J. Van Aken | 1528 | MOISÉS GONZÁLEZ NAVARRO. Raza y tierra: La guerra de castas y el henequen.By Arthur F. Corwin | 1530  |
| DAVID GREEN. The Containment of Latin America: A History of the Myths and Realities of the Good Neighbor Policy. By Paul S. Holbo            | 1529 | RALPH DELLA CAVA. Miracle at Joazeiro.By Thomas E. Skidmore                                   | 1531  |
|   |      | ADLAI F. ARNOLD. Foundations of an Agricultural Policy in Paraguay.By Harris Gaylord Warren   | 1531  |
| Communications  | 1533 | Index to Volume 77,compiled by John T. Appleby   | 1543  |
| Other Books Received  | 1535 | Index to Advertisers   | 82(a) |

---

The Devotional Revolution in Ireland, 1850-75

---

EMMET LARKIN

"IF YOU KNEW," a Waterford priest wrote Tobias Kirby, the new rector of the Irish College in Rome, on January 3, 1850, "all there is to remedy, all the evil there is to check!"<sup>1</sup> "We have not had," he further explained to Kirby, referring to the decline in clerical discipline after the famine, "a Conference here since the beginning of the distress, four years now probably—& but one retreat all that time & everyone doing & thinking & speaking as it listeth him, & no one to prevent it." The occasion for this lament was the recent and encouraging news from Rome that Paul Cullen, Kirby's predecessor as rector of the Irish College, had just been appointed archbishop of Armagh and the accompanying rumor that the new primate had also been armed with the power of apostolic delegate by Pius IX and instructed to summon a national synod for the better government and regulation of the Irish Church. More than a quarter of a century after Cullen's arrival in Ireland, his cousin and protégé, Patrick Francis Moran, the bishop of Ossory, was able to report to Kirby in a matter-of-fact way from Kilkenny during the course of a letter that "we ended two small Missions in two of our city Churches on Sunday last, preparatory for Christmas."<sup>2</sup> "Nothing," he further explained, "could be more consoling than the great piety of our poor people. All without exception approached the Holy Sacraments." "At my Mass on Sunday in the Cathedral," Moran emphasized in conclusion, "there were about 1000 men at Holy Communion." In the nearly thirty years that he faithfully served Rome in Ireland, Paul Cardinal Cullen not only reformed the Irish Church but, what was perhaps even more important, in the process of reforming that Church he spearheaded the consolidation of a devotional revolution. The great mass of the Irish people became practicing Catholics, which they have uniquely and essentially remained both at home and abroad down to the present day.

THE MEASURE OF CULLEN'S ACHIEVEMENT naturally depends on how much had been done to make practicing Catholics of the Irish people before his arrival in Ireland in early 1850. What resources, in terms of plant and personnel, had been available to the Church for the encouragement and sustaining of devotional practices? And what was the character of as well as the example given by the Irish clergy to their flocks in promoting such practices? Corporately characterizing some 2,500 priests or even only some thirty bishops over a period of fifty years is obviously as hazardous as it is difficult.<sup>3</sup> And given the still raw state of the available evidence any systematic analysis of the resources of the Irish Church before the famine is as yet virtually impossible.<sup>4</sup> While the evidence is admittedly not in a condition, either quantitatively or qualitatively, to yield a consensus satisfactory to historians, it may be useful to attempt to structure a frame in which that developing body of evidence may be more intelligently researched and analyzed.

<sup>1</sup> J. P. Cooke to Kirby, Kirby Papers (hereafter K.), Archives of the Irish College, Rome.

<sup>2</sup> Dec. 19, 1877, K.

Since the quantitative problem of the number of clergy is relatively the easiest to come to terms with, perhaps it would be best to deal with it first. In 1800 there were about 1,850 priests, including some 26 bishops, in Ireland for a Catholic population estimated at 3,900,000, or roughly a ratio of one priest to 2,100 faithful. There were also in 1800 only 122 nuns in Ireland, which if reduced to a ratio divides out at the meaningless proportion of one nun to 32,000.<sup>5</sup> By 1850 the ratio between priests and people was still about one to 2,100, with over 2,500 priests available for something more than 5,000,000 Catholics. The nun population, however, had by 1850 increased thirteenfold, from 122 to over 1,500 in fifty years, and instead of one nun for 32,000 people, there was one nun for every 3,400 Catholics.<sup>6</sup> These figures, of course, in themselves are actually misleading because they mask the effects of the outstanding social tragedy in modern Irish history—the Great Famine. Between 1800 and 1840 the Catholic population had risen to 6,500,000, an increase of about 2,600,000, and probably increased another 250,000 by 1846.<sup>7</sup> By 1850, as a result of

<sup>3</sup> Emmet Larkin, "Church and State in Ireland in the Nineteenth Century," Church History, 31 (1962): 295-306.

<sup>4</sup> Emmet Larkin, "Economic Growth, Capital Investment, and the Roman Catholic Church in Nineteenth Century Ireland," AHR, 72 (1966-67): 852-84.

<sup>5</sup> Charles Vane, marquess of Londonderry, ed., Memoirs and Correspondence of Viscount Castlereagh, 4: 99, 172.

<sup>6</sup> Census of Ireland, 1851 (Dublin, 1856).

<sup>7</sup> "First Report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction, Ireland," Parliamentary Papers, 1835, vol. 33, no. 45. The estimate of the Catholic population is based on the percentages of the various denominations given in this first religious census taken in Ireland in 1834: Population (total) 7,943,940; Catholic 6,427,712; Church of Ireland 852,064; Presbyterian 642,356; Other 21,808. According to these figures the Catholics made up nearly 81 per cent of the total population, while the combined Protestant total was about 19 per cent. If, therefore, the Catholic population in 1841 is estimated at 80 per cent of the census figure of 8,175,000 for the total population, the round number of Catholics is about 6,500,000. The Catholic populations of 3,900,000 in 1800 and 5,250,000 in 1850 are also based on taking 80 per cent of an estimated total in 1800 and a census total in 1851 respectively of 4,900,000 and 6,554,074, though both in 1800 and 1850 the percentage of Protestants to Catholics was more likely to have been somewhat higher than in 1834, the probable peak year of the Catholic population bulge in the first half of the nineteenth century. In 1861, for example, when for the first time the decennial census included figures for religious denominations, the Catholics accounted for some 78 per cent of the total population.

the famine and its aftermath, this population of nearly seven million in 1846 was reduced by some two million in four years.<sup>8</sup>

When it is realized that in 1840 there were only about 2,150 priests for a Catholic population of 6,500,000, or merely one priest for every 3,000 people, and that there were, furthermore, only about 1,000 nuns, or one for every 6,500 faithful, it becomes rather obvious that in the decade of the forties, and especially in the years before 1846, the Church in the face of incredibly adverse economic circumstances responded impressively, even if tardily, to the challenge of growing numbers by increasing the clerical population by some 400 priests and over 500 nuns—a twenty and fifty per cent increase respectively in ten years.<sup>9</sup> After 1840 and before the famine, therefore, the priests were gaining slowly and the nuns rapidly in relation to a population that was still increasing, though at a progressively declining rate. Patently, this relative increase in the clerical population meant little in practical terms before the famine, but when the population was suddenly reduced by nearly two million between 1846 and 1850 the whole clerical-lay numerical relationship was dramatically transformed, and what may have been only a short-term tendency rooted in a heroic institutional effort to increase the clerical population between 1840 and 1846, became in the next one hundred years a basic secular trend in Ireland. What emerges, then, even from this cursory analysis, is simply that before the famine any effective service on the part of the clergy was severely limited by the sheer weight of lay numbers, and that up to 1840, at least, the situation had been getting progressively worse.

But if the shortage of priests was so serious, perhaps the numerical deficiency was compensated for in some measure by the quality of their performance. Without more detailed biographical information about the nearly five thousand priests who served the Irish Church between 1800 and 1845, however, any estimate of their corporate character and conduct must remain largely impressionistic. There is, in fact, a strong bias in the available evidence in favor of extreme presentations. If, for example, one confined oneself only to reading the correspondence between Ireland and Rome in the archives of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith (Propaganda Fide), where nearly all the dirty Irish clerical linen was washed, the clergy might easily be characterized as drunken, disorderly, and immoral, or worse. While it is obviously impossible to present in any meaningful way more than fifty years of evidence from the Propaganda archives, perhaps a few examples will not only suffice to show what the nature of the evidence is, but also what the problems are in evaluating it. "I expect to leave this town tomorrow," Edward Dillon, the archbishop of Tuam, explained from Tuam in County Galway, on January 7, 1805, to John Collins, one of his priests, "and do not intend to return till Lent."

<sup>8</sup> Census of Ireland, 1851.

<sup>9</sup> Census of Ireland, 1841 (Dublin, 1843).

"Previous to my departure," he warned Collins, "I cannot help reminding you of the advice I gave you when you were last at this house."

I am positively determined not to tolerate any whiskey drinking or other publick irregularities amongst my clergy. . . . Let me observe to you finally that if you wish to continue in Dunmore or to be employed in the ministry in this Diocese you must learn to sett a higher value on the sacred character with which you are invested than you have hitherto done. Particularly you must not be known to associate with such persons as Math<sup>w</sup>. Martin's or Martin's Strumpet's; much less should you church such persons. I often advised Frank Burke and his Co-ajutor he vainly tought that I would confine myself to unavailing advice, beware of meeting the fate of the former the later is tolerated merely thro necessity for a few months.<sup>10</sup>

"A Rev<sup>d</sup>. M<sup>r</sup>. Corbett, a priest of my Diocese," James O'Shaughnessy, bishop of Killaloe, reported to his agent in Rome from Ennis in County Clare, on November 27, 1815, "has been charged with adultery, and with having occasioned the separation of man and wife." "The case seemed so clear against him," O'Shaughnessy explained, "that he ought to have submitted and retired, but in place of doing so, he loudly called for a public trial."

During this trial more perjury and wickedness was practiced than in any Civil Court in the world. Some turbulent and disorderly priests made common cause with M<sup>r</sup>. Corbett, and I am informed they joined in a remonstrance to the Holy See, alledging that the sentence passed by the pious and learned D<sup>r</sup>. Wright was not founded in justice. My own humble opinion is that there was already too much of this shocking business, and that our Holy Religion would be less-wounded, and less scandal given, by not stiring the embers further.

The unfortunate woman seems within one month of her accouchment tho her husband left the country 15 months ago. If with your usual attention you would make known the circumstances to the Sacred Congregation, and put a stop to any further proceedings, it would be rendering an essential service to the Catholic Religion of this poor persecuted country.

"When anything final," O'Shaughnessy suggested, "comes to your knowledge I request to hear from you." "I am sure," he concluded encouragingly, "you will give it every necessary attention, of which I will be mindful."<sup>11</sup>

The third and final example of the nature of the evidence in the Propaganda archives concerning the conduct of the clergy is a long letter from James Murphy, bishop of Clogher, to Lorenzo Litta, cardinal prefect of Propaganda, dated Monaghan, April 2, 1818, thanking His Eminence for the news of the appointment of a coadjutor with the right to succeed him in Clogher, but also taking exception to the cardinal's suggestion that he should be less severe regarding several of his priests with whom he was in serious litigation at Rome. "And now permit, My Lord,"

<sup>10</sup> Scritture riferite nei congressi, Irlanda, 18, fol. 316.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., 20, fol. 69.

Murphy began his peroration politely, "with the most profound deference, however, for your Eminence and the Sacred Congregation, to say a few words on the treatment I conceive myself to have received from the Sacred Congregation,

Your Eminence may recollect, that in the year 1814, when heavy charges were preferred against me to His Holiness, and two appeals lodged against me, one of them by Priest Maginn, since deceased, on account of having suspended him for Turpia in Tribunali; the other by Priest Goodwin having published to the world, and preferred and inscribed to me a Libellum Accusatorium, in which he charged a highly respectable and zealous priest with having revealed the confession of his penitant, and in which he also charged two other pastors, the most respectable in the Diocese, with having cooperated in said wicked act. At that time your Eminence sent two commissions to my then metropolitan, the most Rev<sup>d</sup> Richard O'Reilly, the one to examine narrowly into the said charges and report the result to his Holiness; the other to try the appeals and pass a definitive sentence on them—Both these commissions my metropolitan executed, and after a strict scrutiny into the charges against me, he told me, he reported them unfounded and calumnious—relative to the two appeals, he pronounced definitively, as empowered, that my suspensions were just and necessary in both cases—Now what I feel for and consider severe, is, that I, or, indeed, any other bishop should be exposed, dragged publicly and shamefully from tribunal to tribunal and tried a second time on matters that were already definitively disposed of: for though my metropolitan erred in not depriving Priest Maginn of his parish, yet, his sentence, which bound that unfortunate man on oath never to hear the confession of a female, not only justified but even proved the necessity of my suspension—to these matters I beg leave to add, that your Eminence sent a commission to my metropolitan in the year 1816, in consequence of an appeal lodged by a Priest Duffy, a curate, and, of course, without any ordinary jurisdiction, against me, for my having interdicted him from exercising certain pastoral functions in despite of his parish priest, and for having suspended him afterwards for his contumacy, in not attending citations I sent him to appear before me, and account for his exercising all and every pastoral function in defiance of my interdict, and for his, besides, raising the people in open rebellion against their lawful pastor—Your Eminence, I say, sent such commission to my metropolitan with orders to cite the parties, and after hearing us, to report the result, together with his own opinion, to your Eminence—I, of course, obeyed the citation though labouring under infirmities and having upwards of sixty Italian miles to make, and having besides to bring necessary witnesses with me at heavy expenses, some thirty, some eighty and some an hundred miles. My metropolitan, after examining me and my witnesses in the presence of the appellant, called on him to rebut what I had proved, when he was answered by the appellant in a highly disrespectful and taunting tone, that he would not, nor would he, he said, answer a single question that he put him—my metropolitan made, of course, his report on this obvious and self evident case, and the Sacred Congregation, notwithstanding, gave it in charge a second time to the Visitor Apostolic—This I confess, I consider also severe.<sup>12</sup>

"It has exposed me," Murphy maintained, "to additional heavy expenses, for the appellant, Priest Duffy, nor indeed any one of the other appellants, though they brought on the suits never paid a single sou of the expenses attendant on the different commissions." "It has, besides," he declared further, "by putting off and prolonging the decision, given them the assurance to expose and villify me and my administration frequently, in one of the most publickly circulating journals in this kingdom, and of threatening me openly and repeatedly with civil suits; so that I may justly say with the Apostle, Spectaculum Facti Sumus &c—" "All this publick abuse," Murphy concluded dryly, "I bore without an answer in the hope that God will give me an account for it [in] a better world."

<sup>12</sup> Ibid., 21, fols. 158-59.

If, on the other hand, one turns from the Propaganda archives to a perusal of the various pious lives of the Irish clergy for the same period, the result is simply a hagiographical headache, or worse.<sup>13</sup> The truth, alas, is not even found by invoking that favorite and prudent device in such circumstances—the via media. What happened between 1800 and 1845 is that the character and conduct of the clergy, which certainly left a great deal to be desired at the beginning of the period, was gradually and uniformly improved. By 1830 the worst was over, since the Irish bishops with the help of Rome finally secured the upper hand over their priests.<sup>14</sup> From 1830 the improvement, though still uneven, depending as it did on the character and strength of will of each individual bishop, was at all events steady. The improvement, however, does not appear to have been simply a function of the bishops' authority in time; it seems to have been a reflection of geographical circumstances as well. The improvement was most rapid and sustained in the ecclesiastical province of Dublin, while the deportment of the clergy in Cashel, Armagh, and Tuam was less and less satisfactory from one to the next.

- On the occasion of the funeral of the archbishop of Dublin, Daniel Murray, at the end of February 1852, William Meagher delivered an oration in which he reflected on the practical improvement of the Catholic population of Dublin. He graphically described the conditions prevailing in Dublin some forty-two years earlier when Murray had been raised to the episcopal dignity.

<sup>13</sup> A critical bibliography of the numerous pious lives of Irish bishops, priests, monks, and nuns is also beyond the scope of this article. An honorable exception to this general charge of hagiography, however, must be noted in W. J. Fitz-Patrick's very fine Victorian, two-volume biography, The Life, Times and Correspondence of the Right Rev. Dr. Doyle, Bishop of Kildare and Leighlin (Dublin, 1880). In setting a lower limit in this biographical spectrum, the best example is perhaps Peadar MacSuibhne's more recent three-volume effort, Paul Cullen and His Contemporaries (Naas, 1961–65). For a partial list, at least of those biographies that range between the upper and lower limits set above, see the bibliography in T. J. Walsh, Nano Nagle and the Presentation Sisters (Dublin, 1959).

<sup>14</sup> The milestone in effecting the better conduct of the clergy by increasing the authority of the bishops was the simultaneous holding of diocesan synods in the four dioceses that made up the province of Dublin in the third week of July 1831. For an account of the background to the meetings, see William Meagher, Notices of the Life and Character of His Grace, Most Rev. Daniel Murray, Late Archbishop of Dublin (Dublin, 1853), 128–31; for the legislation of synods, see R. T. McGhee, Diocesan Statutes of the Roman Catholic Bishops of the Province of Leinster (London, 1837); for an excellent account of a reforming bishop, James Doyle (1819–34), see Fitz-Patrick, Life, Times, 1: 101–32.

The morals of the people of Dublin, Catholics among the rest, were hideously corrupted. The riches daily scattered through her streets in handfuls, to purchase the luxuries of an opulent, and profuse, and dissolute aristocracy; the easy and plentiful earnings of flourishing manufacture, and of extensive and successful commerce, were seized every hour, through a series of years, for indulgence of vilest libertinism, and wildest extravagance. Vices, too gross to be more than alluded to, stalked through the streets shamelessly—the drunkard raved without obstruction, and the blasphemer shouted his impiety, and the gambler squandered in nights of dissipation what his days of toil had accumulated. And, strange to say, and suggestive of many a sad and solemn reflection, there was in our city as large an amount of physical wretchedness, particularly among the lower ranks, then as now—as much squalid poverty—as much shivering nakedness—as much famine-stricken emaciation—as many ruined families—as many houseless orphans! Vice did more to fill the town with the agonies of human suffering than famine, and plague, and abject poverty have wrought in these latter days of woe. Flatter not yourselves, My Brethren, that these excesses and their direful effects were confined to sectarians; they were as rife, if not more so, amongst ourselves. Nor, unless by some standing social and religious miracle, could it be otherwise. Amid opportunities so numerous—examples so seductive—temptations so violent—with but a handful of clergy and a dozen small, mean, and incommodious chapels to second the proverbial faith and innate pious tendencies of the people, what wonder that the multitude was hurried away in this torrent of iniquity? And the mortifying truth is, that in Dublin, at the period alluded to, amid many Catholics there were but few practical Christians; very few whose lives supplied that substantial and only unerring proof of profitable attachment to the faith—the constant and regular frequentation of the holy sacraments. As the climax of her griefs religion had to weep for the first time, perhaps, in this land, over the faltering fidelity and submission of many a son, led astray by the phrenzy of recent revolution, and the false liberality of the day, and the desolating philosophism of France.<sup>15</sup>

There appears to be, moreover, a correlation between the conduct of the clergy in these ecclesiastical provinces of Dublin, Cashel, Armagh, and Tuam and their relative wealth as well as the extent to which each was urban and rural in terms of Catholic population. Furthermore, though the evidence is still very sketchy, the clergy appointed to the town parishes appear to have been better educated than those assigned to the country parishes.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>15</sup> Meagher, Notices, 11-12.

<sup>16</sup> "Report from the Lords Committees appointed a secret committee to enquire into the State of Ireland," 1825, PP, vol. 7, no. 521, pt. 2, Minutes of Evidence, p. 569. Mortimer O'Sullivan, a Church of Ireland clergyman, was asked, "Are you acquainted with the early habits of life, of persons who afterwards become Roman Catholic priests?—Yes. / From what class of life are they generally taken?—I think generally speaking from the lower orders. My connection with an endowed school, gave me an opportunity of knowing more particularly. / Of course you have been acquainted with some who have afterwards gone to Maynooth?—Yes. / Have you had any occasion to observe what have been the effects of a collegiate education upon those persons?—It appeared to me to leave them, with respect to their moral qualities and their political prejudices, just what they were before they had gone there. When I speak of the lower orders, I mean the poorer classes; there are some of a higher order; and that church shows great judgement in disposing of her clergy; those of better manners and better information are generally placed in the towns: and those persons who are from their habits and from their education less fitted to appear in public, are left in the country parts."

But the application of episcopal authority, the relative wealth of the Catholic communities, the extent of urbanization, and the educational level of the clergy were not the only determinants of social behavior. The moral and social values of the community and the pressure the community applied in terms of what it considered to be right or wrong also affected clerical conduct. The principal vices among the clergy were drunkenness, women, and avarice. Interestingly enough, while this seems to be the order of their importance among the bishops in their efforts to impose discipline, it does not appear to be the order of their importance either before or after the famine as far as the laity who cared were concerned. Among a land-hungry and poverty-stricken peasantry avarice was the deadliest of the deadly sins, while lust and drunkenness were viewed with a more understanding, even if disapproving, eye.<sup>17</sup> The seriousness of the problem of clerical avarice vis-à-vis the faithful, for example, was certainly reflected in early nineteenth-century Ireland in the need of the bishops of the province of Dublin to set up by statute a uniform tariff for clerical dues at their diocesan synods in the summer of 1831. The tariff, however, not only gives a comprehensive glimpse of what was thought to be a fair and proper remuneration for the various services rendered by the clergy but also details an interesting summary of the clergy's sources of income.

|   |   |    |   |
|---|---|----|---|
| 1. Baptism—shopkeepers and farmers .....  | 0 | 5  | 0 |
| Do. poor labourers .....  | 0 | 2  | 6 |
| 2. Marriages—shopkeepers and farmers .....  | 2 | 0  | 0 |
| 3. Licenses for do .....  | 0 | 10 | 0 |
| Marriages for poor labourers .....  | 1 | 0  | 0 |
| Licenses for do .....   | 0 | 5  | 0 |
| 4. Masses for dead sung, to shopkeepers and farmers—parish priest .....   | 0 | 15 | 0 |
| Every other priest .....  | 0 | 10 | 0 |
| Any other priest who does not officiate .....   | 0 | 5  | 0 |
| 5. Masses, not sung .....   | 0 | 10 | 0 |
| Masses for dead, to poor labourers .....  | 0 | 5  | 0 |
| 6. Private masses .....   | 0 | 2  | 0 |
| 7. Collections after marriages—these must be voluntary according to the stations of the parties, they may vary from £1 to £100, or more.  |   |    |   |
| 8. Dues at stations—these Dr. Murray informs us are the chief support of the priests; they cannot be called voluntary, for custom makes them compulsory; they are contributed by every person who can give anything, and vary from one shilling to five, as the Editor is informed, say the lowest average from the population of Ireland who attend stations and confessions ..... | 0 | 1  | 6 |

<sup>17</sup> The problem of exorbitant clerical dues and the resistance of the laity to them had been an issue in Ireland from at least the latter part of the eighteenth century. See Robert E. Burns, "Parson, Priests and the People: The Rise of Irish Anti-Clericalism, 1785-89," Church History, 31 (1962): 151-63.

9. Fortuitous emoluments—of these, at least one great source of revenue, is masses for delivering the souls from purgatory of those who are dead and buried, left either by will or given by relations of deceased, or, what is very common, given by the poor creatures themselves, for masses before they die, and to benefit their souls when they are gone,—of these it is impossible to calculate the amount.
10. The collecting of corn from the people. This is sometimes commuted for money, and is valued at 1s. 6d. per house, or more.<sup>18</sup>

More particularly, the parishioners from Kilcommen Erris, near Belmullet in County Mayo, in the diocese of Kilalla, petitioned the pope in early 1840 about the abuses to which they were subject from the local clergy. Their petition comprised some fifteen heads of complaint, and like so many other documents in the Propaganda archives it was the product of a fierce local struggle for power, with the contending parties prepared to say and to write the worst about their opponents. The crucial aspect of this document, therefore, is not indeed whether the charges made in it were necessarily true, but rather that the charges made in it are a serious comment on what the mores and values of the person or persons who wrote it actually were.

To Our Most Holy Father in God Pope Gregory the XVI Successor of Saint Peter and Vicar of Jesus Christ upon Earth. . . .

6thly that the poor uneducated peasantry of the parish generally feel not only scandalised but actually horrified at the not merely tyrannical, but unchristian like conduct of the Rev<sup>d</sup> Mr. Conway towards them during the Confessions. When a poor, but pious, humble, contrite penitant presents himself before the altar of reconciliation bemoaning his offences, and with devout compunction soliciting to be admitted to the Paschal or Christmas distribution of the Bread of Life—if he has not money to propitiate the avaricious ire of the Rev<sup>d</sup> Mr Conway, he is not quietly dismissed as being too poor and contemptible for enjoying the Celestial benefits; but he is scolded, villified and threatened “D’air Cunnial De Mur Sagart”. “By the obligation of God as a Priest,” he will have revenge, if it were to run for seven, ten, fifteen, or 21 years. . . .

10thly that old Anthony Burke who lives with his daughter and son in law in Muinnaba, and whose aged wife lived with another daughter in Claggeh—did upon the death of his wife offer 2<sup>s</sup>/6<sup>d</sup> to the Rev<sup>d</sup> Mr. Conway to have mass said for the soul of his departed wife;—but that Mr. Conway not only refused the money but in a paroxysm of violence proclaimed Burke from the Altar, did ring the bell with rage—and invoke a horrible imprecation upon him and his worldly substance, for offering him 2<sup>s</sup>/6<sup>d</sup> to say Mass for the poor woman though no priest before Mr. Conway charged more than one shilling. The result was, that the Congregation would have slaughtered him [“him” crossed out] each other were it not for some peaceable characters who mollified the rage of the exasperated people. . . .

<sup>18</sup> McGhee, Diocesan Statutes, xli-xlii.

12thly we have had, through the pious zeal of Rev<sup>d</sup> Neal McNulty, the walls of a good chapel 80 feet in length and 30 in breadth built for the last sixteen years, and not withstanding the number of clergymen that passed through this parish during that period, and collected great sums of money from us, for the ostensible purpose of roofing the Chapel, yet they have taken away our money and left us these sixteen years without a temple of worship to put our heads into or to screen us from the inclemency of the weather and although Dr Feeny has been appealed to against these clerical plunders, he has not ordered the money to be refunded to James O'Donel Esq<sup>r</sup> the Treasurer of our Chapel Committee.<sup>19</sup>

In order to sum up here, however, on the subject of clerical avarice, which is yet another subject, a long account of the situation in Ireland by T. Chisholme Anstey, an English Catholic, apparently to the secretary of Propaganda, Giovanni Brunelli, from London on November 17, 1843, is certainly worth our attention. In his account Anstey, who appears to have been well acquainted with the clergy and conditions in the province of Connaught, maintained, it is well known in every part of Ireland with which he is acquainted, and to the best of his belief also in other parts thereof, that however well disposed a parish priest or curate may be to relieve his parishioners or some of them from grievous and oppressive payments of the kinds specified ["Tithes, church dues, oblates, stock fees, money for repairs of fabric"], the relatives, (often very numerous) of such ecclesiastics are certain to obstruct the concession by clamorous complaints and remonstrances against his unkindness to his own flesh and blood, who by his ill timed liberality he is defrauding of their hopes of succession to his property after his death and of occasional contributions out of the same during his lifetime, and to which succession and contributions they in the popular opinion as well as in their own have a kind of equitable claim, founded upon the consent, which his family is supposed to have given in the first instance to his being withdrawn from field labor and domestic service in order to go to the seminary; and, that the fear of such complaints, remonstrances and appeals to popular opinion hath the effect of making the priests to be watchful and austere in the exact and undeviating levy of their aforesaid dues, is apparent from the greatness of their incomes; that is to say in Connaught, which is the cheapest part of Ireland, and where money is twice as valuable as it is in London, there are very few parish priests, if any, whose incomes are less than 200 sterling per annum although not one farthing of such incomes is appropriated by either priest or proper to any other purpose than the mere support of the priest. But in most parishes the income is very much higher and ranging to £500 and upwards per annum; insomuch that it is a vulgar and proverbial saying throughout Ireland that the best or richest matches are to be had with the kindred of priests and that their farms are certain to be well stocked and furnished.<sup>20</sup>

<sup>19</sup> Scritture riferite nei congressi, Irlanda, 28, fols. 634-35. The petition is signed by James O'Donel as "Chairman of the Parochial Committee" and Hugh Joseph O'Donel as "Secretary." Three other petitioners signed their names, but nineteen others made their "X" mark and were signed for.

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., fols. 121-45.

Anstey then went on to explain that there was a fixed tariff on burials, masses for the dead, churching women, etc., below which an offering might not fall, but might exceed it. Baptisms, he reported, were 2s. 6d., while marriages were a pound or a guinea, in addition to the money collected for the priest at the marriage feast. One such collection, Anstey noted, was £25, though no one there was above the rank of farmer. If the people involved were poor, Anstey admitted, the clergy would perform the required service gratis, but in order to test the truth of their allegations of poverty, the priests were in the habit of announcing in the chapel, church, or meeting house the names of those who had gratuitously received their services. "And, however poor the Irish peasant may be," he added, "he is rarely disposed to accept the exemption upon such humiliating conditions." The result of all of this had been, Anstey continued, that secret societies had been formed, and "by means of such associations they have from time to time endeavoured, and still are endeavouring, to compel the priests to agree to a more moderate tariff of dues and to compel the people to abstain from paying them any dues except according to the tariff appointed or proposed." Anstey then turned to the bad Irish habit of "stations," where the priest would designate the houses of various parishioners who were relatively well off as the place where he would hear confessions and say mass that week for all those in the immediate area. He complained that mass was being offered in "cabins" rather than in "chapels" because the fees were greater. The "station," moreover, he pointed out, was obliged to offer hospitality and had to cater to the priest's choice of tradesmen and victuallers. The Irish priests, Anstey further complained, not only did not keep to the rubric and practice of Rome in the Mass, but their sermons were of poor quality, and "the ignorance of the people in matters of Religion is frightful, and, in particular, that the doctrine of the Trinity is rarely known or ever heard of among them, much less the doctrine of the Real Presence and other articles of Faith." After all this and a good deal more Anstey finally concluded by advising the Propaganda that the only hope for religion in Ireland was for the pope to send a legate with power to correct the many abuses. Clerical avarice, however, legate or no, whether in terms of the clergy farming or grazing large tracts of land in their brothers's or nephews's names or in squeezing the people for alms and dues was, after drunkenness, the most difficult of the deadly sins for either the bishops or the laity to check.

BUT HOW MANY of the laity really cared? The best way to begin to answer that question is to determine how many people actually attended church. While it is certainly true that all those who attended mass religiously were not necessarily active in the concerns of their church, knowledge of the numbers who attended is at least helpful for setting an upper limit on those who were concerned. The figures on church attendance in pre-famine Ireland indicate that only thirty-three per cent of the Catholic population went to mass.<sup>21</sup> This is all the more remarkable in that in something less than fifty years church attendance would increase to over ninety per cent, and so it has continued down to the present day.<sup>22</sup> Why attendance was relatively so low in pre-famine Ireland is obvious. There were not enough priests and there were not enough churches, or, more particularly, not enough seating space in the existing churches to accommodate those who might be inclined to attend to their religious duties. If, for example, all the priests in Ireland celebrated the two masses they were allowed on a given Sunday in 1840 there would have been 4,300 masses for 6,500,000 people, or one mass for every 1,500 people in attendance, and there were no chapels and very few churches in pre-famine Ireland that would accommodate a thousand worshippers.

This deficiency was offset to some degree before the famine by the widespread practice of "stations." Baptism and marriage were also frequently celebrated in private houses rather than in churches. These practices were generally frowned on by those who were attempting to reform both clergy and laity and increase devotional zeal. The complaints of the reformers, who were concerned about the abuses attendant on the system, had mainly to do with the exorbitant "offerings" extracted by the clergy for the administration of the sacraments and the undignified if not unholy celebration of sacred rites in profane places. James Maher, writing from Carlow to his nephew Paul Cullen in Rome in early January 1842, asked "Could not Rome do something to stimulate the zeal and watchfulness of the Bishops: the holding of Stations for Mass and Confession at private houses is the very worst system. Wretched filthy cabins have been lately honored with stations." "The people," he explained, cannot be instructed. The Priest no matter how zealous cannot do his duty. The young clergyman is brought into contact with his female penitents. The result is confessions are often invalid or sacrilegious. It is almost impossible that the poor country people in the circumstances could disclose their sins. Struggling with their natural reluctance to avow their guilt, and fearing at the same time to be overheard by those who are pressing around the Priest, who cannot utter a word of encouragement to the sinner, except in the lowest and therefore intelligible [sic] whisper that can be expected.

"Could not Rome," Maher suggested again, "induce the Bishops to change the system? Stations in the chapels have been recommended in the Statutes for this province. But the recommendation has proved a dead letter." "We owe much to Rome," he assured Cullen in conclusion, "and if she would help us to this reform, we would be more deeply her debtor."<sup>23</sup> Nearly all the synods, provincial and national, between 1830 and 1875 had statutes disapproving of "stations," and even though Rome eventually added her proscription as requested by Father Maher, the practice died very hard, especially in the south and west where it still survives in some places.<sup>24</sup>

<sup>21</sup> David W. Miller, "Religion and Social Change in Pre-Famine Ireland," unpublished paper, p. 3. Since the writing of his paper Professor Miller has revised his estimate of church attendance by Roman Catholics upward to about 40 per cent, but he is still "prepared to state flatly that the prevalence of extraordinary religious devotion evidenced by extremely regular church attendance is a post-Famine phenomenon."

<sup>22</sup> Jean Blanchard, The Church in Contemporary Ireland (Dublin, 1963), 29-31.

Before the famine, then, despite severe limitations in plant and personnel, there was a small but perceptible change and increase in devotional practices in Ireland. Why this was so had a great deal to do with the enthusiasm and hope generated by the moral and political reform movements of Father Mathew and Daniel O'Connell. Both the Total Abstinence Society and the Repeal Association grew up in a period heavy with gloomy forebodings of impending disaster as bad harvest succeeded bad harvest, prices for foodstuffs continued to fall rapidly, and emigration mounted. Literally millions took Father Mathew's temperance pledge as the production of Irish whisky fell from 12,296,000 gallons in 1839 to 5,546,283 gallons in 1844. As Daniel O'Connell enrolled the "nation" in his Repeal Association his "monster meetings" numbered in the hundreds of thousands of people.<sup>25</sup> Essentially these were both revival movements, which created not only an enormous enthusiasm but, because of the underlying anxieties created by population pressure and land hunger, also contributed greatly to an already heavily charged emotional atmosphere. In the early 1840s, therefore, there already were manifest signs of that devotional revolution, which Paul Cullen would proceed to help make and consolidate some ten years later when he would arrive in Ireland as archbishop of Armagh and apostolic delegate.

On the occasion of a papal jubilee in 1842, for example, when the penitents were offered special indulgences if they would but confess their sins and come to Christ, the bishop of Cork wrote to Cullen in Rome asking the rector of the Irish College to secure for him additional faculties to dispense in terms of sins especially reserved to the pope. "Sinners," John Murphy explained to Cullen in May 1842, "who have for years lived in fornication, adultery, incest & have recourse to the tribunal of penance" are coming in in droves. "I have a melancholy list of 64 couples," he added sadly, who in obedience to my commands have separated a thora; for where there is abject poverty, with a numerous brood we cannot insist on separation a mensa. The Jubilee is open in only one Parish, how numerous will be the blacklist before the conclusion of it in the whole diocese—it would be endless to enter into the minute details of every case.<sup>26</sup>

<sup>23</sup> Jan. 2, 1842, Cullen Papers (hereafter C.), Archives of the Irish College, Rome.

<sup>24</sup> Blanchard, Church in Contemporary Ireland, 32.

<sup>25</sup> Sir James O'Connor, History of Ireland, 1798-1924 (London, 1925), 1: 301; L. J. McCaffrey, Daniel O'Connell and the Repeal Year (Lexington, 1966).

<sup>26</sup> May 29, 1842, C.

Some nine months later James Maher again reported to his nephew in Rome from Carlow. "I forgot, tho I intended it to tell you of the wonderful success of the Missionaries in Athy." "A visit from Father Mathew," he explained, "would not have put a greater number in motion. Hundreds remained all night in the Chapel, and many remained in town away from their homes from 5 and six days waiting an opportunity of confessing." "This extraordinary movement," Maher further noted, "has confirmed an old opinion of mine that we do not always afford the people an opportunity of general confession when required. In fact we have not half Priests for the wants of the Mission, and a very considerable proportion of the Parrochi leave the confessional almost entirely to the curates." The following August Cullen's sister Margaret informed him that they had had the "Missioners" in Carlow town for the last five weeks, and that it "would be impossible for me to describe the enthusiasm of the people." If the missioners were angels from heaven, she added, they could not be more venerated. Work was at a standstill, while people followed them around all day and crowded "in hundreds to the Confessionals, many very many who had never before been there." The missioners preached three times a day in the chapel, which was "crowded to suffocation." "What a pity," she finally concluded, "we have not more Priests in the Parish. I fear a great deal of their labours will go for nothing. Where is the opportunity for the bulk of the parish to approach the Holy sacraments."<sup>27</sup>

Indeed, the "bulk" of the Irish people in the 1840s never did have the opportunity to approach the sacraments. In writing his customary annual letter in October 1851 to the cardinal prefect of Propaganda, for example, Michael Jones, a former student of the Propaganda's Urban College in Rome, complained about "an almost general neglect in giving the People the necessary knowledge of the Faith, the Commandments and the Sacraments." "The Irish People," Jones explained to Cardinal Frasoni, "are very good, but much neglected in every way by both the Civil and Ecclesiastical Government, more by the latter than the former." It was time "for the Ecclesiastical authority to put an end to the present state of things." The priests who received training at the National Seminary at Maynooth, did "not receive in the College any notion how things should be. The old system of the days of Persecution, the Catacombs, and the Caves is all that they know."<sup>28</sup> That the Irish people were receptive and might have made excellent evangelical material to work with is certainly given credence by the unusual success of the sporadic attempts made, but the resources available for a religious and moral revival on a national scale were too slender in the face of the number of people.

<sup>27</sup> Feb. 21, Aug. 30, 1843, C.

<sup>28</sup> Michele Jones to Giacomo Cardinale Frasoni, Oct. 9, 1851, Scritture riferite nei congressi, Irlanda, 30, fols. 720-21, Archives of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, Rome. The original letter is in Italian. See also K., Feb. 28, 1858, for a letter from John Kyne, chaplain at Alum Bagh, Lucknow, Oude, East India, to Thomas Grant, bishop of Southwark (London) and Catholic chaplain-general, regarding Kyne's work among the British troops, who were mainly Irish and presumably Catholic. "I am anxious first of all to communicate to your Lordship the pleasing fact that even here in India I can bear testimony from personal experience, to the good effect produced by the Mission given last year to the soldiers at Chatham. In fact the recruits, who arrived here last month from Chatham are the only persons of whom it can be

What achievement there was before the famine, then, was largely confined to that "respectable" class of Catholics, typified by the Cullens and the Mahers in Carlow, who were economically better off. Since this class generally survived the famine intact, while the "bulk" of the cottiers, laborers, and paupers were swept away by starvation, disease, and emigration, the Church actually had a stronger devotional nucleus relative to absolute numbers in 1850 than in 1840.<sup>29</sup> This nucleus, furthermore, would come to count for more with every succeeding year because the remaining subsistence population was gradually liquidated by a continuing emigration sparked periodically by the fear of starvation. When Paul Cullen arrived in Ireland he therefore had a potentially more favorable situation than has been generally supposed. He also patently derived very great advantage from the psychological impact the famine had on those who remained in Ireland. The growing awareness of a sense of sin already apparent in the 1840s was certainly deepened as God's wrath was made manifest in a great natural disaster that destroyed and scattered his people. Psychologically and socially, therefore, the Irish people were ready for a great evangelical revival, while economically and organizationally the Church was now correspondingly ready after the famine to meet their religious and emotional needs.

THE PROBLEM OF CHARACTERIZING the making and consolidating of this devotional revolution is somewhat simplified by the fact that the period begins with the first National Synod of Thurles in 1850 and ends with the second National Synod of Maynooth in 1875. The first Synod of Thurles was primarily concerned with the proper administration of the sacraments said, that they complied with the Easter obligation. With this exception, the rest of the poor soldiers were in a most pitiable state. The vast majority had never in their lives received the Holy Sacraments. And their ignorance of even the first principles of religion was truly astonishing with all my experience I was never in my life so taken by surprize. If I had heard it from others, I could not have believed it possible. Yet 'with all that they are not bad materials to work upon—I believe, notwithstanding the general impression to the contrary, that on the whole as much may be made of them as of any other class of Christians." By way of proof Kyne explained that in three months he had brought upward of a thousand to the sacraments and that every morning he had between thirty to fifty communicants, while every evening he recited the rosary and gave religious instruction.

---

<sup>29</sup> John Kepple to Kirby, Sept. 2, 1852, K. Writing from Ballyhea, Charleville, where he was parish priest, Kepple noted, "There is not in the County of Cork a finer country than this. The population of my parish is not very large, the poorer portion of it (as everywhere else through out Ireland) has been swept away by the Famine fever emigration &c &c. The farmers tho' not numerous are very respectable, and comfortable but in consequence of the failure of crops, and the thinness of the people our emoluments here are inconsiderable, however I don't complain."

and regulating more closely the lives of the parish clergy.<sup>30</sup> In the statutes the clergy were exhorted to administer the sacraments more often and only in church, except where it was impossible, and to encourage the laity to better lives by the clergy's own good example. The bishops were assigned the responsibility by the synod of seeing that these reforms were carried out in their respective dioceses. Twenty-five years later the Synod of Maynooth reiterated mainly what had already been decreed in 1850 and in enlarging upon the statutes further increased episcopal control and authority.<sup>31</sup> The making of the law, however, proved to be one thing, and the enforcing of it quite another. The first Synod of Thurles had made it quite clear that the Church was to be reformed from the top down and that the responsibility for enforcing that reform should fall to the bishops. As apostolic delegate, however, Cullen had very real difficulties in keeping the Irish bishops up to the mark. The problem was not only that a large number of bishops were set in their ways and naturally averse to reform, but that the bishops also had serious differences with regard to educational and political matters, and their quarrels in these areas seriously inhibited their efforts at pastoral reform.

Cullen, however, was not only a reformer but a very effective ecclesiastical politician, and with the support of Rome, especially in episcopal appointments, the Irish Church was reformed by him in his generation. His method was to deal with one principal issue at a time, while trying to contain the worst effects of the other issues. His fellow archbishops of Dublin, Tuam, and Cashel, for example, each respectively represented educational, political, and pastoral problems for Cullen. He mobilized Tuam and Cashel against the educational policies concerning the Queen's Colleges, advocated by the venerable archbishop of Dublin, Daniel Murray, who was strongly supported by a minority of the bishops. When Murray died in the winter of 1852 Cullen was translated by Rome from Armagh to Dublin and his nominee appointed to replace him in Armagh. The opposition among the bishops, without the effective leadership of Murray, was quickly isolated and eventually crushed. Cullen then turned to the problem posed by the archbishop of Tuam, John MacHale, and the involvement of the clergy in secular politics, particularly the Tenant League. Supported by Armagh and Cashel, and with Rome's aid, MacHale was also eventually isolated, and if not crushed, he was at least effectively contained. Finally Cullen tackled the problem of pastoral reform in the province of Cashel, which was most difficult because most of the bishops of that province strongly supported the custom of "stations." Cullen once again undermined the opposition to him by having only those who agreed

<sup>30</sup> Decreta, Synodi Nationalis Totius Hiberniae Thurlesiae Habitae Anno MDCCCL (Dublin, 1851).

<sup>31</sup> Decreta, Synodi Plenariae Episcoporum Hiberniae, Habitae Apud Maynutium, An. 1875 (Dublin, 1877).

Now ready, strongly bound, 426 pp. 18mo, with Imprimatur of the Lord Bishop of Kildare, 1s.,

THE
PEOPLE'S PRAYER BOOK,
WITH SHORT SIMPLE INSTRUCTIONS ON THE VARIOUS DUTIES OF RELIGION,
AND AN EASY CATECHISM

For the use of Adults whose religious instruction had been neglected.

BY REV. THOMAS MURPHY, P.P., MOUNTMELICK.

---

 In concurrence with the desire of the Rev. Mr. Murphy there will be a considerable reduction made to those who purchase for distribution amongst the poor and uninstructed.

A neat and beautiful Edition of the above "Invaluable Prayer Book," in superior binding, may be had from the Publisher.

---

DUBLIN :
JOHN MULLANY, 1 PARLIAMENT-STREET.
1873.

RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
FOR CATHOLIC CHURCHES, COMMUNITIES, CONVENTS, &c.

---

MAISON FRANCAISE

(French House).

OFFICES:

7 WELLINGTON QUAY,

DUBLIN,

Near Essex Bridge.

12 Rue Duguay Trouin,

PARIS,

Near St. Sulpice's Church.

---

MONSIEUR L. GUERET,

Publisher and Manufacturer in Paris.

RESPECTFULLY begs to inform the Roman Catholic Clergy, Heads of Religious Houses, Convents, &c., that he is able to offer them a large and selected stock of Religious Goods, such as Lace Pictures for Prayer-books; Beautiful Emblems, embroidered on rice paper, and others printed; Pictures in Sheets, New Chromos in Sheets, large plain, coloured and black ground Pictures of all kinds of subjects, with or without frames. Sheets of Hearts, red, blue, and purple; small and large Stations of the Cross in Oil Paintings, also in plain; coloured and black ground Engravings framed. Mortuary Cards in Sheets, or printed by hundred or half hundred. Scapulars; Standing Lamps of every colour; Branches for Benediction, with 3, 5, 7, 12 lights. The best Incense of Jerusalem, guaranteed to be of the same quality used in Rome and all the Churches on the Continent. Brass and Silver Beads and Medals; Pearl Crosses and Medals for School Distribution, Pictures, Medals, and Statues of Our Lady of Lourdes. Handsome Crucifixes, coppered, bronzed, and gilt, also in plastic and Ivory; Irish Locketts, and sets of Green Enamelled Shamrocks. Altar Lights; Cruets; Ornamental Chapels in carved wood for private Oratories; Holy-water Fonts; Glass Shades; Large Statues in plaster and terra-cotta; Small Statues in French plastic and biscuit; Vases for Natural and Artificial Flowers; Candlesticks in bronze and silvered glass; Cribs in plaster and plastic of every size and price. Infant Jesus in Wax; Hearts, Crowns, and Monograms; Articles of Paris for Bazaars.

N.B.—Orders by Post punctually executed, and forwarded to any part of Ireland carriage free, when amounting to £6. Large Statues and Heavy Bronzes excepted.

 Special prices for the Clergy and Religious Communities.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

7 WELLINGTON QUAY, 7

Near Essex Bridge.

From the Irish Catholic Directory, 1873 (Dublin, 1873).

THE APPARITION AT KNOCK CO MAYO.

AS SEEN ON AUGT 21ST 1879. [ EVE OF THE OCTAVE OF THE ASSUMPTION ]

MANY MIRACULOUS CURES HAVE BEEN EFFECTED THERE SINCE THE ABOVE OCCURRENCE.

THIS VIEW WAS TAKEN ON THE SPOT BY W. COLLINS.

AND SUBMITTED TO, AND APPROVED OF BY THE SEVERAL PERSONS WHO SAW THE ABOVE.

About 7:30 on the evening of the 21st of August, 1879, the vigil of the octave day of the Feast of the Assumption at the parish church of Knock, Co. Mayo, "an apparition of Our Blessed Lady, wearing a large brilliant crown and clothes in white garments was distinctly seen by some fifteen persons at the south gable wall of the church. Our Lady is described as having her hands raised as if in prayer and her eyes turned towards heaven. On her right hand was St. Joseph, his head inclined towards her, and on her left was St. John the Evangelist, attired as a bishop, his left hand holding a book and his right hand raised as if in preaching. To the left of St. John was an altar on which stood a cross and a Lamb, about 8 weeks old. . . . The gable wall where this manifestation was seen was covered with a cloud of light and the vision lasted for fully two hours." Liam Ua Cadain, Venerable Arch-Deacon Cavanagh, Pastor of Knock, 1867-1897 (Dublin, 1955), 69. Illustration courtesy of National Library of Ireland.

with his reform principles succeed to bishoprics in that province, and gradually but relentlessly those bishops who were reluctant to change their ways in the rest of Ireland were replaced by Cullen's more energetic and aggressive nominees. By 1875, therefore, there was hardly a bishop in Ireland, except MacHale, who did not zealously promote pastoral reform in his diocese, whatever his educational and political views were. Actually this resolution of the distribution of power in the Irish Church in favor of Cullen was not nearly as smooth or inevitable as it may appear from this oversimplified account, but what is most important to understand is that this resolution of power was absolutely necessary to the making and consolidation of the devotional revolution that took place.

In the twenty years following Cullen's arrival in Ireland the number of priests was increased by some seven hundred, or nearly twenty-five per cent, to a total of about 3,200, while the Catholic population declined from five to four million, or a ratio increase of one priest to 2,000 people to one priest to 1,250 people in 1870. The nun population increased even more rapidly over the same period. In 1850, for example, there were only some 1,500 nuns in Ireland, while in 1870 there were more than 3,700, or an absolute increase of 2,200, and a ratio increase of 1:3,300 in 1850 to 1:1,100 in 1870.<sup>32</sup> Not only were the numbers of clergy relative to the population rapidly appreciating, but it also appears that their quality was improving over the same period. The amount of dirty clerical linen washed in Rome appears to have decreased, as did the volume of litigation between the bishops and their priests. The improving quality of the clergy, moreover, is not only testified to by their really prodigious energy in building churches, schools, seminaries, convents, and parochial houses, but their conduct and learning was certainly improved by conferences, retreats, synods, and the erection of cathedral chapters, as well as by the annual or triennial visitations by their bishops depending on the size of their dioceses.

In extending their increasing zeal and piety to the laity the clergy centered their attention on the sacraments, and especially on the sacraments of penance and Holy Eucharist. Confession and communion, which usually had been associated with a practicing Catholic's Easter duty in pre-famine Ireland, now became much more frequent. To encourage the laity, missions were held in nearly every parish in Ireland in the decade of the fifties. Pastoral gains thus made were consolidated by the introduction of a whole series of devotional exercises designed not only to encourage more frequent participation in the sacraments but to instill veneration by an appreciation of their ritual beauty and intrinsic mystery. The spiritual rewards, of course, for these devotional exercises were the various indulgences, which shortened either the sinner's or the sinner's loved one's time of torment in purgatory. The new devotions were mainly of Roman origin and included the rosary, forty hours, perpetual adoration, novenas, blessed altars, Via Crucis, benediction, vespers, devotion to the Sacred Heart and to the Immaculate Conception, jubilees, tridiums, pilgrimages, shrines, processions, and retreats. These devotional exercises, moreover, were organized in order to communalize and regularize practice under a spiritual director and included sodalities, confraternities such as the various purgatorian societies, the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, and Peter's Pence as well as temperance and altar societies. These public exercises were also reinforced by the use of devotional tools and aids: beads, scapulars, medals, missals, prayer books, catechisms, holy pictures, and Agnus Dei, all blessed by priests who had recently acquired that privilege from Rome through the intercession of their bishops. Furthermore, this was the period when the whole world of the senses was explored in these devotional exercises, and especially in the Mass, through music, singing, candles, vestments, and incense.

<sup>32</sup> Census of Ireland, 1871 (Dublin, 1875).

THE EVIDENCE IN SUPPORT of this vast social change, of course, is too diversified and complicated to be presented coherently here. Still, in order to acquire perhaps at least the flavor of that phenomenon, if not its extent, it might be useful to follow selectively the career of the man who spearheaded that change in the initial years. "I was in Armagh," Cullen reported shortly after his arrival in Ireland to Tobias Kirby in Rome, "and saw nearly all the clergy." "The old Cathedral," he explained, obviously scandalized, "is awfully bad—the priests use only one tallow candle on the altars at mass in the Cathedral. Imagine what it must be elsewhere." Three months later Laurence Forde, Cullen's master of ceremonies at the Synod of Thurles, reported to Kirby that the opening day's solemnities were a grand Roman success with high mass being celebrated alla Palestrina, complete with assistant priest, deacon, and subdeacons. "I gave the seventh candlestick," Forde assured Kirby, to Dr. Cullen at the Mass. I was not quite certain if it should be so, but I acted on your advice. It is not without its effect—I think it useful to go in some things even a little beyond strict practice for the sake of letting the bishops and clergy see the full solemnities of the Church.<sup>33</sup>

Some two years later, when he had been translated to Dublin, the richest and most influential diocese in Ireland, Cullen still was concerned about setting the proper tone. "We commenced the Jubilee here yesterday," he reported to Kirby in October 1852, "I sang more meo high mass attended by all the Chapter and dignitaries of Dublin." Mr. Faber, the celebrated English priest, "preached a magnificent sermon by far the most eloquent I ever heard," giving "a new tone and a Catholic one to Dublin." "We have the 40 ore," he noted further, referring to his pro-Cathedral, "at Marlboro St. with great pomp and magnificence. The Church is ornamented with damask, a great machine erected and what is better crowds of people are attending. Deo Gratias. The devotion will be continued through the entire three months of the jubilee." He finally assured Kirby in Italian that he would soon see "the fruits of our preaching." Two months later, on December 8, in a letter headed "Evviva Maria," Cullen again reported to Kirby that the jubilee, the forty hours, and the novena in process were all very successful. "Here," he added even more significantly, "we are trying to enrol a large missionary body before next summer to wipe out the proselytizers everywhere." "It is necessary to see," Cullen concluded prudently in Italian, "if it will be successful, and then I will write to Propaganda. The Jesuits, Dominicans, Carmelites, Vincentians, Redemptorists, secular Priests will all join together—but."<sup>34</sup>

<sup>33</sup> May 21, Aug. 22, 1850, K.

G 1051

"The Jubilee," Cullen again assured Kirby less than two weeks later, on December 20, 1852, "has succeeded beyond all hope. All the churches are crowded with people trying to go to confession. Were the priests ten times as many as they are they could not hear them all." "I have done nothing lately," he added, breaking into Italian, but to cure invalid marriages<sup>3</sup> and remedy similar impediments. We must beg of the Pope to give a Jubilee of one month next May. It will put down all heresies—and set things right. . . . The priests are greatly fatigued with the Jubilee otherwise I wd apply at present to have it prolonged.

"Some of the people here," Cullen then noted, indicating that devotional practices were becoming contagious, "are anxious I should establish in the schools and convents the 'Child of Mary' such as they have in Waterford convent. Will you get me faculties to do this, and to establish every other sodality. I wd require to know what the indulgences are and what the rules."<sup>35</sup>

Early in the new year Cullen again wrote Kirby complaining that all was not well in the various parts of the Irish Church. "I wrote some days ago to Propaganda regarding the diocese of Ardagh," he explained in Italian in January 1853. "It seems to me," Cullen noted, "that it would be well to appoint a bishop quickly." "Father John Kilduff," he suggested, referring to a Vincentian on the Dublin mission, "a native of the diocese would be the saving of it." "He is a good preacher," Cullen continued, giving an interesting example of what he thought was important in a bishop, "a good theologian, full of zeal, and yet courageous enough. Such a man would be required to reform the diocese. He is about 33 years of age." "In the diocese of Cashel," Cullen then informed Kirby, turning to another trouble spot, "there is a parish called Doon, where I have heard there are seven or eight hundred apostates." "The Archbishop of Cashel, however," he reported, "does not want any noise made about it. Father Dowley, Superior of the Vincentians recently offered to give a mission but so far the offer has not been acknowledged." "The poor Archbishop," he added, "is very timid, and believes that he is always on the verge of death, even though he is in good health." "He is almost the only bishop," Cullen complained, "that has done nothing about what was prescribed in the Synod of Thurles." "Baptisms and confessions remain as they formerly were, and they also celebrate marriages in private houses. In almost all the other dioceses something at least has been done." "In this diocese of Dublin," he then explained, all marriages and baptisms are celebrated in the churches. In the city and in the towns all the confessions are heard in the churches. In all the mountainous places where there are no churches nearby, if the distance is not too great, I told the priest to find every means of transporting the people to those distant churches—but if that were not possible to hear the confessions in private houses (except in case of illness), if the church is not more than two miles away.<sup>36</sup>

<sup>34</sup> Oct. 9, Dec. 8, 1852, K.

<sup>35</sup> Dec. 20, 1852, K.

"Evviva S. Patrizio," Cullen greeted Kirby again some two months later on March 17, 1853, and continued in Italian, "I have already convened a provincial synod to be held in Dublin at Pentecost. The Bishops are not pleased." "Now it is necessary to see," Cullen explained, "quid agendum. There are things enough to be done—but it is difficult to put them in order and I must do all myself. There is no one who knows how to draw up a decree or write a line of Latin." "Monsignor Dixon," Cullen then reported, referring to the new archbishop of Armagh, "has already visited Ardagh and has promised to write in favor of Kilduff." It is Kilduff, Cullen added tenaciously in conclusion, who would be "the salvation of that unfortunate diocese."<sup>37</sup> Kilduff "will be consecrated here by me on S. Peters day." Dr. Dawson, the popular candidate among the Ardagh priests, "has written him a most foolishly impolite letter, which shows he was never fit to be a Bishop." Every attempt had been made "to get up some agitation against Kilduff by Dawsons friends—protests I believe have been sent to Rome—but the people are delighted, and the greatest part of the clergy—the appointment was absolutely necessary." "I have been told," Cullen added, referring to the archbishop of Tuam and the bishop of Clogher, "that Dr. McHale and Dr. McNally spoke against it—but this is only a report." "There is no doubt however," he assured Kirby again, "that K. [Kilduff] will be a blessing to the diocese—tho' he will have to carry his cross with the opp. of Dawson & Co." "I send you the acts and decrees of the Council in a day or two with a letter to the Pope," Cullen then noted, referring to his recently concluded provincial synod. "In Cashel," he then complained again of the archbishop, "I hear,

<sup>36</sup> Jan. 28, 1853, K.

<sup>37</sup> Mar. 17, 1853, K.

Dr. Slattery has not made a single change as yet. Marriages, baptisms, confessions still, as formerly in private houses. The same in several dioceses and I believe in Tuam." "It will be necessary," he advised darkly, "to do something in these matters." "But," he concluded characteristically, and appropriately breaking into Italian, "little by little all will be accomplished."<sup>38</sup>

This brief account of Cullen's early attempt at reforming the Irish Church in the interests of making and consolidating a devotional revolution is useful as a model, though a somewhat imperfect one, of his own continuing attempts, and those of his protégés, at reform over the next twenty-five years. In general Cullen preferred to promote men like Kilduff who were made in his own image and likeness. They were not only good preachers, adequate theologians, zealous, courageous enough, and young, but they were also generally strangers to the diocese and, therefore, they did not have any of the personal ties or loyalties that might inhibit them in their zeal for reform. If they were not recruited from the regular clergy, moreover, the new bishops were usually rectors or vice-rectors of seminaries—strict, stern, austere men who had both the experience of, and a proven talent for, efficient administration. They were also well aware that the new discipline they represented would not be popular among their priests, but if these bishops were ever to make their wills effective with their clergy, the bishops would have to depend on their patron's continued exertions on their behalf at Rome. They all tended, therefore, to be ultramontanes, because Rome was not only the theoretical but the actual source of their own and Cullen's real power in the Irish Church.

WHILE ALL OF THE FOREGOING may tell one something about what this devotional revolution consisted of and, at least partially, how it was made, the crucial question still remains—why did the Irish people respond so readily to the reform of their Church and become virtually practicing Catholics within a generation? The Great Famine was truly a gigantic psychological shock, and it certainly would be both neat and convenient to be able to assign so impressive a cause for so remarkable an effect. A guilt-ridden and frightened people turning more formally and fervently to their God in their hour of need makes more, indeed, than a good deal of superficial sense. The problem, of course, is that the devotional need appears to have been increasingly present before the famine, and only the adverse circumstances of population growth and the lack of money and personnel on the part of the Church prevented that need from being realized. The famine, therefore, was as much the occasion for as it was a cause of the devotional revolution being made and consolidated in Ireland, and one must probe more deeply if one is to understand why as well as how this remarkable historical phenomenon took place.

<sup>38</sup> [June 1853], K.

What I would like to suggest is that the devotional revolution which took place after the famine satisfied more than the negative factors of guilt and fear induced by that great catastrophe. There may indeed be something worse than the simple fear of being destroyed—the mounting terror in the growing awareness that one is being destroyed. The Irish, after all, had been gradually losing their language, their culture, and their way of life for nearly a hundred years before the famine. Education, business, politics, and communication in the written word, even more than in the spoken word, were all increasingly geared to English as the Irish were being effectively Anglicized, or, perhaps more appropriately, West Britonized. There has been so much concern, for example, in the study of Irish history in the nineteenth century with the geography of emigration that it has hardly been noticed that the Irish before the famine had nearly all become cultural emigrants, that they had in fact moved in their minds before a good many of them had actually to move in space.<sup>39</sup> In a word, then, Irishmen who were aware of being Irish were losing their identity, and this accounts in large part for their becoming practicing Catholics. The devotional revolution, I would argue further, provided the Irish with a substitute symbolic language and offered them a new cultural heritage with which they could identify and be identified and through which they could identify with one another. This is why, for example, Irish and Catholic have become almost interchangeable terms in Ireland, despite the attempts of Nationalists to make Irish rather than Catholic the inclusive term. "Take an average Irishman," the celebrated Irish Dominican preacher, Father Tom Burke, said in 1872, "—I don't care where you find him—and you will find that the very first principle in his mind is, 'I am not an Englishman, because I am a Catholic! Take an Irishman wherever he is found, all over the earth, and any casual observer will at once come to the conclusion, 'Oh; he is an Irishman, he is a Catholic!' The two go together.'"<sup>40</sup>

<sup>39</sup> Francis O'Neill to Kirby, Plymouth, July 13, 1853. K. O'Neill was a native of Waterford, but when he was ordained after his studies in the Irish College in Rome he had to go on the English mission, because there was no place available for him in the diocese of Waterford. Though the following passage is both interesting and illustrative in many ways, the important point is that the Irish speakers in Plymouth wanted to remain psychologically whole in revealing the secrets of their hearts. "Please God I hope to have a place in Waterford next year; as one can effect more where there are good hearts. Here the English Catholics never look at an Irish priest, but we have the poor Paddies who are the support of this mission and without whom the Bishop, would have to leave this place. The Irish here are about three or four hundred. Some of them cannot be got to make their confessions in English, at this the Bishop is most indignant. He says that it is pride, and also because they make more of the priest than the Sacrament. He has to keep a priest who can speak Irish. I cannot put two words of it together so in that point I am no help. Were I sure of having this good Bishop always I would not think of returning to Ireland but as this is not at all likely especially as he is an old man I shall get my Exeat. He finds many faults with the Irish but they are the ones that we cannot deny. He speaks frequently about the way the priests in Ireland demand money for the Sacraments. This is no false charge against them for all whoever had any experience of the system even in our own Diocese and also of it even since the Thurles Synod will acknowledge that too much cannot be said against it."

<sup>40</sup> Thomas H. Burke, O.P., "The Supernatural Life of the Irish People," in Lectures on Faith and Fatherland (London, n.d.), 117. Father Burke lectured extensively in the United States in 1872.

Finally it is necessary to observe that the making and consolidating of this devotional revolution had a wider and deeper significance than even making practicing Catholics of the Irish people in a generation. One can argue that the cause and effect relationship between what may be popularly called in the best current sociological jargon a group "identity crisis," and the resolution of it in what was fundamentally a religious revival has some very serious implications for, as well as allowing for some very interesting insights into, the history of the Irish people both at home and abroad in the nineteenth century. Daniel O'Connell, for example, if viewed as the bridge between the old and the new Ireland rather than as the divide between Old and Young Ireland, becomes not only more important but more understandable as the great transitional figure in modern Irish history.<sup>41</sup> Further, the devotional revolution and its general and particular causes are crucial to understanding the development of Irish nationalism and the cultural importance of Irish Catholicism in that development.<sup>42</sup> Moreover, the cultural revivals of Young Ireland in the middle of the century and the Gaelic movement at the end appear less ludicrous in the light of the identity crisis that had been taking place since the turn of the century, and Daniel Corkery and the other archpriests of the language movement in more recent times may indeed yet come into their own.<sup>43</sup>

<sup>41</sup> Sean O'Faolain, King of the Beggars (London, 1938), 367-68. In summing up the significance of O'Connell, O'Faolain wrote, "In whatever way one might try to define the ideal life of the Irish people, his image is likely to rise before the mind—always remembering that he came at the beginning and was only following his instinct in a groping use of the material to his hand. Lecky said that he studied men, not books; in studying men he found himself, and in finding himself he presented to his people a mirror of their reality. He is interesting in a hundred ways, but in no way more interesting than in this—that he was the greatest of all Irish realists who knew that if he could but once define, he would thereby create. He did define, and he did create. He thought a democracy and it rose. He defined himself, and his people became him. He imagined a future and the road appeared. He left his successors nothing to do but to follow him. They have added precision to his definition, but his definition is not altered; they have added to his methods, but his methods remain. You may break gold but it is gold still, fashion wood but it is wood still. The content of Irish life is the content of the Irish character, the dregs and the lees and the pure wine of this one man's recipe—to be purified indeed, to grow more rich in the wood with time, but never to lose the flavour of his reality, the composition of his mind."

<sup>42</sup> The author is at present engaged in writing the third volume—"The Devotional Revolution in Ireland, 1850-1878"—of his projected History of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland in the Nineteenth Century, 1780-1918, in which he hopes to deal in extenso with this crucial relationship between nationalism and Catholicism as well as with many of the other themes only touched upon in this article.

<sup>43</sup> "The truth is, the Gaelic people of that century were not a mob, as every picture given of them, whether by historian or novelist, would lead one to think. They were mob-like in externals; and one forgives the historians if those externals threw them out, but how forgive the novelists? If not a mob what then were they? They were the residuary legatees of a civilisation that was more than a thousand years old. And this they knew; it was indeed the very pivot of all they did know, and the insult that followed on their poverty wounded them not only as human beings but as 'Children of Kings, Sons of Milesius!' ('Clanna ríghthe maca Míleadh'). With that civilisation they were still in living contact, acquainted with its history; and such of its forms as had not become quite impossible in their way of life, they still piously practised, gradually changing the old moulds into new shapes, and, whether new or old, filling them with a content that was all of the passing day and their own fields. What of art they did create in their cabins is poor and meagre if compared with what their fathers had created in the Duns of Kings and Grianans of Queens; yet the hem matches the garment and the clasp the book. Here hinted, then, what these historians scanted; and scanting the soul and the spirit of a people, what of that people have they profitably to speak? But history has belied the historians,

Last but not least in this necessarily less than complete catalog of what was significant in the devotional revolution is its importance for understanding the great Diaspora of the Irish people in the nineteenth century, as more than four million of them found new homes in a new world. Most of the two million Irish who emigrated between 1847 and 1860 were part of the pre-famine generation of nonpracticing Catholics, if indeed they were Catholics at all. They congregated in the ghettos of English, American, and Canadian cities where they acquired a fearful reputation for ignorance, drunkenness, vice, and violence. What the famine Irish actually represented, therefore, was a culture of poverty that had been in the making in Ireland since the late eighteenth century because of the pressure of population on the means of subsistence. That culture produced all the circumstances and most of the values that the British and the Americans were to find most repugnant in the Irish. The crucial point here, however, is that after the famine that culture of poverty was broken up in Ireland by emigration, and the new circumstances created by that breakup allowed for the emergence of other values.

Of the four million Irish, for example, who immigrated to the United States between 1845 and 1900, some 2,300,000 came after 1860. By 1860 there already were in Ireland 3,000 priests and 2,600 nuns for a Catholic population of 4,500,000, or one priest for every 1,500 people and one nun for every 1,700. In 1900 there were 3,700 priests and 8,000 nuns for a further reduced Catholic population of 3,300,000, or a ratio of one priest for every 900 and one nun for about every 400 people.<sup>44</sup> Besides this remarkable improvement in the clerical population vis-à-vis the Catholic population in Ireland, the Irish Church during this period exported a very large number of priests and nuns to help staff churches in the United States and the rest of the English-speaking world.<sup>45</sup> What these crude figures suggest is that the Irish were transformed as a people—men and women alike—into practicing Catholics. The succeeding waves of these recently created for that people, if they were but a mob, had died, and their nationality died with them: instead of which that nationality is vigorous today, not only at home, but in many lands abroad—'translated, passed from the grave.'" Daniel Corkery, The Hidden Ireland: A Study of Gaelic Munster in the Eighteenth Century (Dublin, 1925), 28-29.

---

<sup>44</sup> Census of Ireland, 1861 (Dublin, 1863); Census of Ireland, 1901 (Dublin, 1903).

<sup>45</sup> "Ireland has not only done a great deal during the past century for the Propagation of the Faith so that her missionaries and nuns and faithful people are now to be found foremost in everything good going on in the various missions of the old and new world but at present the whole country may be regarded as a vast recruiting field for sustaining these distant missions. We have in Kilkenny at present (to mention one instance) an American Christian Brother seeking for young men to join that order in the United States. They have at present 500 Irishmen among the Xtian Brothers of the United States and only 200 of all other nationalities. They have seven Colleges in the United States and the Superiors of them all are Irish. Nevertheless they are called the 'French Xtian Brothers.' At present they desire at least 50 more Irish postulants, as they find that none labour so zealously and efficiently in the American schools, as the Irish Brothers. The Brother has been only a few days in Ireland still he has already got twenty postulants. We have also Nuns of the Holy Cross who is seeking postulants in like manner. She told me that when she was over here two years ago she succeeded in getting twenty-five young ladies for her order in the United States, and that they all persevered. She now desires 25 more and has come over to search for them." Patrick Francis Moran to Kirby, Apr. 28, 1876, K.

devotional Catholics brought their cultural and religious needs and corresponding values with them when they emigrated, and in doing so they helped to reclaim those lapsed and nonpracticing "shanty" Irish. The newer, "lace-curtain" Irish found it progressively easier to assimilate to their new environment, because they were objectively less objectionable.

In a word, then, the Irish immigrants in this country in 1900 were a vast improvement over the generation of famine Irish who had arrived before 1860, and that improvement was not evident simply in terms of social behavior. Not only were later immigrants less drunken and less prone to violence, they also had acquired basic educational skills and were actually less poor. Average daily attendance in the Irish National System of Education increased from 100,000 in 1840 to nearly 500,000 in 1900, and this in spite of the fact that the population had been reduced by one-half over that period of time.<sup>46</sup> The literacy figures reveal that in 1861 45.8 per cent of Roman Catholics were unable to read and write, but by 1901 the figure had dropped to 16.4 per cent, a decline that was reflected in comparative literacy figures for various immigrant groups in the United States after the turn of the century.<sup>47</sup> Economic conditions in Ireland, furthermore, improved between 1840 and 1900, though the economy was certainly a very sick one, and the culture of poverty that was broken at the famine was liquidated partly by that improvement and partly by the continuing emigration, leaving the remaining population relatively less poor. No factor, then, was more important in the moral and social improvement of the Irish people either at home or abroad in the nineteenth century than the devotional revolution between 1850 and 1875; yet no aspect of recent Irish history has received less attention.

<sup>46</sup> Donald H. Akenson, The Irish Education Experiment: The National System of Education in the Nineteenth Century (London, 1970), 140, 346. There are no average daily attendance figures before 1852. In 1852 the number of children on the rolls was 544,604, and average daily attendance was 282,575; the number of children on the rolls in 1840 had been 232,560. I have, therefore, assuming there was improvement, calculated average daily attendance at something less than half of 232,560.

<sup>47</sup> Ibid., 377. These percentages, of course, are for that portion of the population over five years of age. See also William D. P. Bliss, ed., The New Encyclopedia of Social Reform (New York, 1908), 598. "The total illiteracy of immigrants [to the United States] over fourteen years of age, in 1905, was 26.2 per cent. The females are, in general, more illiterate than the males." The study then cites figures for "the illiteracy of the races contributing more than 2,000 immigrants . . . for the same year." The statistics, presented under the heading "Northern and Western Europe (Chiefly Teutonic and Celtic)," are as follows: Scandinavian 0.6; Scotch 0.7; English 1.3; Bohemian and Moravian 1.7; Finnish 1.8; French 2.7; Irish 3.8; German 4.2; Dutch and Flemish 5.3; Italian (North) 14.0; Average 3.7.

---

The Vital Center, the Fair Deal, and the Quest for a Liberal Political Economy

---

ALONZO L. HAMBY

"EVERY SEGMENT of our population and every individual has a right to expect from our Government a fair deal," declared Harry S. Truman in early 1949. In 1945 and 1946 the Truman administration had almost crumbled under the stresses of postwar reconversion; in 1947 and 1948 it had fought a frustrating, if politically rewarding, battle with the Republican Eightieth Congress. Buoyed by his remarkable victory of 1948 and given Democratic majorities in both houses of Congress, Truman hoped to achieve an impressive record of domestic reform.<sup>1</sup> The president systematized his past proposals, added some new ones, and gave his program a name that would both connect his administration with the legacy of the New Deal and give it a distinct identity. The Fair Deal, while based solidly upon the New Deal tradition, differed from its predecessor in significant aspects of mood and detail. It reflected not only Truman's own aspirations but also a style of liberalism that had begun to move beyond the New Deal during World War II and had come to maturity during the early years of the cold war—"the vital center."

THROUGHOUT THE HISTORY of the United States the main stream of reform has been within the broad Lockean-capitalist consensus to which most Americans subscribe. The Great Depression, however, had caused liberal reformers to question capitalism as never before; mass unemployment at home and the rise of an aggressive fascism out of the ruins of capitalism abroad seemed to provide proof that the old system had failed beyond repair. One logical response with appeal to many reform thinkers and leaders

A briefer version of this paper was read at the annual meeting of the American Historical Association, Dec. 28, 1971. I gratefully acknowledge valuable assistance from the John C. Baker Fund of Ohio University and from the Harry S. Truman Library Institute. I am especially indebted to Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. for helpful critical suggestions.

<sup>1</sup> Public Papers of the Presidents: Harry S. Truman, 1949 (hereafter Public Papers, 1949) (Washington, 1964), 7. The best guide to the political history of the Truman era is Richard E. Neustadt, "Congress and the Fair Deal: A Legislative Balance Sheet," Public Policy, 5 (1954): 349-81.

was the movement for a popular front of all reform and radical forces, most strongly united by a determination to stop the spread of fascism but also seeking newer and better socioeconomic arrangements, even "revolutionary" ones. The New Deal itself, faced with the actual responsibility of governing, took a far more moderate course, searching for a viable middle way that would preserve capitalism; yet even the New Dealers, unable to overcome the depression, were increasingly driven to the conclusion that capitalism had become incapable of the growth needed to provide reasonably full employment.

The thirties did not exactly constitute the fabled "Red Decade" of right-wing mythologists. Most liberals who worked within the government sought American solutions to American problems and appear to have been only marginally influenced by foreign examples. Those outside the government were more likely to look toward European patterns. The most enduring appeal they found was in Scandinavian welfarism, but many were at least provisionally drawn to Soviet communism. A liberal of the thirties, quite in line with the popular-front mood, was more likely to think of himself as part of an undifferentiated Left and more prone to consider substitutes for capitalism than were earlier progressives. The failure of capitalism at home and abroad did not throw the liberals en masse into the Communist party, but it shook old assumptions to an extent that left few unaffected.<sup>2</sup>

Temporarily shattered by the Nazi-Soviet Pact of 1939, popular-front foreign policy staged a resurgence during World War II and received an aura of legitimacy from President Roosevelt's effort to forge a lasting alliance with the Soviet Union. During the war and the years immediately following, advocates of Soviet-American friendship could use the Roosevelt name and symbolism as a potent appeal. Yet at the same time World War II eroded the domestic side of popular frontism. The war eliminated the depression—as the New Deal had not—and demonstrated the potential of American industry. To a large extent, moreover, businessmen managed the economic war effort, and, while the liberals frequently criticized them on matters of detail, it was hard to refute the statistics of success. One result was a widespread repudiation of the psychology of scarcity, which had grown out of the long years of the depression. Leading progressives popularized the vision of an ever-expanding capitalist economy balanced by Keynesian fiscal methods and buffered by extensive social welfare programs. Their intellectual leader was the eminent economist Alvin H. Hansen and their political leader was Vice-President Henry A. Wallace, who demonstrated that it had become possible, even natural, to be a popular fronter in foreign policy and an advocate of "progressive capitalism" at home. The liberal mission was no longer to achieve a new socioeconomic system or even to prop up a "mature," worn-out economy; it was to realize capitalism's capacity for endless growth.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Frank A. Warren, III, Liberals and Communism: The "Red Decade" Revisited (Bloomington, 1966), is a sober and intelligent analysis of popular frontism in the 1930s. William E. Leuchtenburg mentions the appeal of Scandinavia in Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal (New York, 1963), 345.

The cold war completed the demise of the popular-front mood. Groups and individuals that thought of themselves as liberal came increasingly to perceive the Soviet Union as an expansionist, totalitarian force and the American Communist party as the slavish, antiliberal representative of Soviet despotism. In 1947 an influential group of liberals established Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) with the express purpose of isolating Communists and pro-Communists from the main stream of liberal politics. Key foreign policy events that followed—the Russian rejection of the Marshall Plan, the Czech coup, and the Berlin Blockade—inclined most progressives toward the ADA position. In 1948 the New Republic, probably the most sensitive barometer of progressive opinion, rejected the popular-front style of Henry Wallace's presidential candidacy and endorsed Truman. Wallace's weak showing on election day demonstrated a massive liberal repudiation of the Soviet Union and the Communist party.<sup>4</sup>

By 1949 the ADA was the dominant progressive organization, and signs of a transformation were appearing throughout the liberal community. The editor of the New York Post, T. O. Thackrey, had endorsed Wallace for president. In April 1949 the paper's owner and publisher—his wife, Dorothy Schiff Thackrey—fired him. It is significant that Mrs. Thackrey defined the break in terms of attitudes toward communism, arguing that the Communists posed "new threats to democracy" and asserting that henceforth the paper would fight with equal vigor "all totalitarianism, whether Fascist or Communist." Her new editor, James A. Wechsler, was an ADA leader and a militant anti-Communist, who quickly dismissed popular-front columnists.<sup>5</sup>

The New Republic continued the shift it had begun in 1948. Its publisher, Michael Straight, who had once regarded Henry Wallace as a personal hero, undertook a speaking tour on behalf of the ADA and delighted its leaders by bringing his magazine into nearly total agreement with the organization's viewpoint. The Italian-American intellectual, Max Ascoli, established the Reporter as a new outlet for moderate, tough-minded, anti-Communist liberalism. The Congress of Industrial Organizations expelled

<sup>3</sup> I have discussed these themes in "Sixty Million Jobs and the People's Revolution: The Liberals, the New Deal, and World War II," Historian, 30 (1968): 578-98; and in "The Liberals, Truman, and FDR as Symbol and Myth," Journal of American History, 56 (1970): 859-67. Ironically the Communist party itself contributed to the decline of domestic popular frontism by pursuing a wartime national unity line. See Irving Howe and Lewis Coser, The American Communist Party: A Critical History (2d ed.; New York, 1962), ch. 9.

<sup>4</sup> Alonzo L. Hamby, "Henry A. Wallace, the Liberals, and Soviet-American Relations," Review of Politics, 30 (1968): 153-69; "1948: The New Beginning," New Republic, Sept. 27, 1948, p. 32.

<sup>5</sup> New York Post, Apr. 6, 1949; James A. Wechsler, The Age of Suspicion (New York, 1953), 238-41.

popular-front unions. "We in American labor will fight totalitarianism from the right or the left," declared Philip Murray, the president of the CIO, "We regard the human welfare state as America's middle way."<sup>6</sup>

Murray's remark epitomized a new mood that conceived of liberalism as a center doctrine midway between the totalitarian poles of fascism and communism. Implicit in the new self-image was a slight moderation, a decline of utopian hopes and aspirations, a somewhat stronger suspicion of big government, and increasing doubts about the goodness of human nature. It was no coincidence that four significant books expressing this viewpoint in one manner or another appeared in 1949.

In Target: You, Leland Stowe, a widely read foreign correspondent, addressed himself to "Mr. American Middle Man"—the target of fascist and Communist totalitarianism, of monopolistic "Big Capitalism" and Communist Marxism—and argued that the future of American democracy depended upon the maintenance of a "strong political Center" that would counter both domestic communism and right-wing extremism by providing economic security and securing civil liberty under a rule of law.<sup>7</sup>

Max Ascoli in The Power of Freedom depicted the earth as caught up in a worldwide civil war with one side struggling to maintain freedom by finding the middle way between unrestrained capitalism and total socialization, the other attempting to achieve "the total subjection of men on a world-wide scale." Stressing the limitations of human nature and the unattainability of utopias, Ascoli unabashedly admitted that he was a disciple of such thinkers as Edmund Burke, Alexander Hamilton, and Alexis de Tocqueville. Yet he found no inconsistency in declaring: "I am a liberal, and I don't want to add any qualifying adjectives."<sup>8</sup>

In Strategy for Liberals the political journalist Irwin Ross used militant rhetoric and projected an ambitious reform program. Yet he carefully typed his ideal polity as the "Mixed Economy" and distinguished it not simply from fascism and communism but also from socialism, which, with its complete control of industry, detailed planning, massive bureaucracy, and control of communications, contained within itself "if not the seeds of decay, certainly the seeds of totalitarianism."<sup>9</sup>

Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. gave the new liberalism a name with the publication of The Vital Center. An exercise in political philosophy and an exhortation to American progressives, the volume won an impressive reception. "It seemed to me one of those books which may suddenly and

<sup>6</sup> James Loeb, Jr. to Edith Fountain, Feb. 2, 1949, Americans for Democratic Action Papers (hereafter: ADA Papers), State Historical Society of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis.; M. A. [Max Ascoli], "What We Stand For," Reporter, Dec. 20, 1949, p. 2; "Our Liberalism," ibid., Mar. 28, 1950, p. 1; Max M. Kampelman, The Communist Party vs. the C.I.O. (New York, 1957), 256, and chs. 11-13; David J. Saposs, Communism in American Unions (New York, 1959), chs. 17-20.

<sup>7</sup> Leland Stowe, Target: You (New York, 1949), 164, passim.

<sup>8</sup> Max Ascoli, The Power of Freedom (New York, 1949), xiii, 8, 70-71, passim.

<sup>9</sup> Irwin Ross, Strategy for Liberals (New York, 1949), 45, passim.

clearly announce the spirit of an age to itself," wrote Jonathan Daniels. Deeply influenced personally and intellectually by Reinhold Niebuhr, Schlesinger castigated the popular-front liberals as sentimental believers in progress and human perfectionism who, yearning for utopias, had been seduced by the surface idealism of communism and the Soviet experiment. Awake only to the evils of fascism, they had sympathized with at least some aspects of the Soviet experience and had accepted the Communists as allies in a common struggle, not understanding that such a tactic could lead only to self-destruction. The "restoration of radical nerve" had come with the rise of a non-Communist Left in Europe and the United States, largely through the efforts of younger liberals whose impressions of the Soviet Union stemmed from the Stalinist purges of the 1930s rather than the idealism of the Russian Revolution. The new liberalism—or "radicalism" as Schlesinger preferred to call it—unconditionally rejected all varieties of totalitarianism. Applied to foreign affairs it stood for a dual policy of vigilantly containing communism and encouraging the democratic Left abroad. Believing "in the integrity of the individual, in the limited state, in due process of law, in empiricism and gradualism," it was acutely aware of the weaknesses of human nature and of the dangers of excessive concentration of power. Devoted to the furtherance of individual liberty, it stood for a mixed economy, featuring partial government planning and ownership, antitrust action to discipline private big business, and welfare programs to provide a minimum of security and subsistence to all. The conception of liberalism as a sort of centrism had its liabilities. Schlesinger found it natural to identify with "responsible conservatives" such as Charles Evans Hughes and Henry L. Stimson; liberals, he suggested, might find common cause with this group, especially on matters of civil rights and civil liberties. Doubtless he was correct, and it was tempting, after militantly rejecting the revolutionary totalitarian ideology of communism, to conceive of the liberal effort to preserve humane, democratic values as akin to an intelligent conservatism; yet even the creed of a Hughes or a Stimson provided few answers for the problems that preoccupied the liberals. Unfortunately it was but a short step from the vital center to the superficialities of the "New Conservatism" of the 1950s.<sup>10</sup>

Whatever its inner weaknesses, the vital-center approach gave the liberal movement a moral integrity and consistency that had been absent during the popular-front era. Its implications, moreover, went beyond the affairs of diplomacy or the tactical wisdom of a liberal-Communist alliance: its approach to political economy rejected what remained of domestic popular frontism and idealized the New Deal as an effort to establish a mixed economy that would preserve the essentials of capitalism while mitigating its abuses. Even the business community was recognized as a potentially constructive, if frequently wrongheaded, force in American life. The vital-center liberals looked to Niebuhr for a sociopolitical theory and to Keynes for an approach to economics, convinced that this combination provided the best possible foundation for human freedom. In 1948 a group of Keynesians published the major liberal economic manifesto of the Truman era, Saving American Capitalism.<sup>11</sup> The title accurately represented the way in which vital-center liberalism was a return to the traditional American progressive impulse.

<sup>10</sup> Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., The Vital Center (Boston, 1949), 208–09, 223–24, passim; Jonathan Daniels, "Ready to Be Radical," Saturday Review of Literature, Sept. 10, 1949, pp. 11–12.

The legislative goals Truman announced for his administration, while not devised to meet the needs of an abstract theory, were well in tune with the vital-center approach: anti-inflation measures, a more progressive tax structure, repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, a higher minimum wage, a farm program based on the concepts of abundant production and parity income, resource development and public power programs, expansion of social security, national medical insurance, federal aid to education, extensive housing legislation, and civil rights bills. The president's most controversial request was for authority to increase plant facilities in such basic industries as steel, preferably through federal financing of private enterprise but through outright government construction if necessary. Roundly condemned by right-wing opponents as "socialistic" and soon dropped by the administration, the proposal was actually intended to meet the demands of a prosperous, growing capitalist economy and emerged from the Fair Deal's search for the proper degree of government intervention to preserve the established American economic structure. "Between the reactionaries of the extreme left with their talk about revolution and class warfare, and the reactionaries of the extreme right with their hysterical cries of bankruptcy and despair, lies the way of progress," Truman declared in November 1949.<sup>12</sup>

The Fair Deal was a conscious effort to continue the purpose of the New Deal but not necessarily its methods. Not forced to meet the emergencies of economic depression, given a solid point of departure by their predecessors, and led by a president more prone than FDR to demand programmatic coherence, the Fair Dealers made a systematic effort to discover techniques that would be at once more equitable and more practical in alleviating the problems of unequal wealth and opportunity. Thinking in terms of abundance rather than scarcity, they attempted to adapt the New Deal tradition to postwar prosperity. Seeking to go beyond the New Deal while preserving its objectives, the Truman administration advocated a more sweeping and better-ordered reform agenda. Yet in the quest for political means, Truman and the vital-center liberals could only fall back upon one of the oldest dreams of American reform—the Jacksonian-Populist vision of a union of producing classes, an invincible farmer-labor coalition. While superficially plausible, the Fair Deal's political strategy proved too weak to handle the burden thrust upon it.

<sup>11</sup> Seymour Harris, ed., Saving American Capitalism (New York, 1948).

<sup>12</sup> Public Papers, 1949, 1-7, 552.

The Fair Deal seemed to oscillate between militancy and moderation. New Dealers had frequently gloried in accusations of "liberalism" or "radicalism"; Fair Dealers tended to shrink from such labels. The New Dealers had often lusted for political combat; the Fair Dealers were generally more low keyed. Election campaigns demanded an aggressiveness that would arouse the Democratic presidential party, but the continued strength of the conservative coalition in Congress dictated accommodation in the post-election efforts to secure passage of legislative proposals. Such tactics reflected Truman's personal political experience and instincts, but they also developed naturally out of the climate of postwar America. The crisis of economic depression had produced one style of political rhetoric; the problems of prosperity and inflation brought forth another.

The Fair Deal mirrored Truman's policy preferences and approach to politics; it was no more the president's personal creation, however, than the New Deal had been Roosevelt's. Just as FDR's advisers had formulated much of the New Deal, a group of liberals developed much of the content and tactics of the Fair Deal. For the most part these were the men who had formed a liberal caucus within the administration in early 1947 shortly after the Republican triumph in the congressional elections of 1946, had worked to sway the president toward the left in his policy recommendations and campaign tactics, and had played a significant, if not an all-embracing, role in Truman's victory in 1948. Truman's special counsel, Clark M. Clifford, was perhaps the most prominent member of the group, but Clifford, although a shrewd political analyst, a persuasive advocate, and an extremely valuable administrative chief of staff, was neither the caucus's organizer nor a creative liberal thinker. Others gave the Fair Deal its substance as a program descending from the New Deal yet distinct from it.<sup>13</sup>

The founder of the liberal caucus, Oscar R. Ewing, exemplified better than any other prominent member of the Truman administration the linkage between the New Deal and the Fair Deal. Even as a young man in turn-of-the-century Indiana he had possessed a consuming interest in Democratic politics and social welfare problems. At the age of sixteen he was secretary to the state Democratic committee, and for a time he planned to become a social worker. Instead, after graduating from the Harvard Law School, he settled in New York and pursued a highly successful practice as a partner of first the elder, then the younger, Charles Evans Hughes. By the 1940s he had also become one of the most prominent Democrats in the state and was frequently mentioned as a possible candidate for high office. During Robert E. Hannegan's tenure as chairman of the Democratic National Committee (1944-47), Ewing was vice-chairman and, after Hannegan's health collapsed, acting chairman. Appointed administrator of the Federal Security Agency<sup>14</sup> in 1947, he began a drive to revitalize the agency and secure cabinet status for it. It was he who took the initiative in mobilizing the liberals within the Truman administration for the crucial struggles of 1947 and 1948.

<sup>13</sup> Cabell Phillips, The Truman Presidency: The History of a Triumphant Succession (New York, 1966), 162-65; and Irwin Ross, The Loneliest Campaign: The Truman Victory of 1948 (Signet ed.; New York, 1969), 27-29, discuss the liberal caucus; both probably overemphasize the importance of Clifford.

Ewing's advocacy of comprehensive social welfare legislation—a popular magazine described him as “Mr. Welfare State himself”—was the end result of a tradition that had begun with the social workers of the Progressive era, had found partial realization during the New Deal, and was now struggling for complete fulfillment. Ewing also represented a type of Democrat who had developed during the New Deal—the staunch, partisan regular who was nevertheless committed to social welfare liberalism and identified his party with it. The strongest fighter within the administration for expanded welfare programs, he did not shrink from debate with the opposition. “It is the fate of the American liberal to be a scrapper,” he remarked. Accepting the Sidney Hillman Award from the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union in March 1950, he defined the key to America's future as “the protection and extension of equal opportunity for all our people—opportunity to live, to advance, to think, to achieve.” Especially in 1949 and 1950 he engaged in lusty verbal combat with his conservative opponents—“the League of Frightened Men,” he called them. Ewing demonstrated the way in which the New Deal, and indeed the whole progressive social welfare tradition, provided a solid basis for the Fair Deal, but his ideas, although they went beyond New Deal welfare programs, did not give the administration its claim to a separate identity. His style, as it turned out, was not especially productive; someone doubtless had to speak out against the bitter-end opponents of social welfare reforms, but Ewing only exposed himself to defeat by doing so. His militant advocacy of national health insurance not only failed to put the proposal over; it led to a backlash and caused Congress to reject an administration reorganization plan that would have created a cabinet-level Department of Welfare with Ewing as its first secretary. His personal defeat on this issue exemplified many of the difficulties the Fair Deal encountered when it adopted the militant tones of years past.<sup>15</sup>

WHILE EWING REPRESENTED CONTINUITY, Leon H. Keyserling and Charles F. Brannan gave the Fair Deal much of its distinctive approach. Both men served their political apprenticeships during the New Deal, but both formulated important criticisms of it and sought new techniques to achieve the objectives of liberal reform.

<sup>14</sup> Established during the New Deal, the Federal Security Agency became one of the major components of the present-day Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

<sup>15</sup> New York Times, June 2, Sept. 14, 1945; Feb. 3, Mar. 17, Apr. 13, 1946; Dec. 3, 1947; Jan. 28, 1948; Jan. 10, Feb. 19, May 20, Aug. 17, 1949; Ewing, speeches in the Congressional Record, 81st Cong., 2d sess., 1950, app., pp. A1844-45, A4071-73; Current Biography, 1948, 193-96; Monte M. Poen, “The Truman Administration and National Health Insurance” (Ph.D. dissertation, University of Missouri, 1967), 140-42, 145-50, 155-56, 176, 188-89; Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., The Coming of the New Deal (Boston, 1958), 554.

Keyserling, educated at Columbia University—where he was influenced by Rexford G. Tugwell—and the Harvard Law School, had gone to Washington in the early days of the Roosevelt administration to work for Jerome Frank in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. He attracted the attention of Senator Robert F. Wagner, who made him an administrative assistant; during the next several years he was a central figure in the drafting of some of the most important legislation of the 1930s, including the National Labor Relations Act. Subsequently he was general counsel of the U.S. Housing Authority, later the National Housing Agency. In 1944 he took second prize in a widely publicized contest on the achievement of postwar prosperity with an essay urging an expansion of the economy to provide jobs for all. In 1945 he was active in the struggle for full-employment legislation. With Senator Wagner's backing he was a natural choice for the new Council of Economic Advisers, established by the Employment Act of 1946.<sup>16</sup>

During 1947 and 1948 Keyserling was a valuable member of the administration liberal caucus. At the same time he was gaining a public reputation as the most imaginative and articulate economist in the government. When the bland and moderate Edwin Nourse resigned as chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers in October 1949, Keyserling was automatically the liberals' candidate for the post, and the ADA spearheaded an intensive lobbying campaign in his behalf. After a long delay, in the spring of 1950 the president gave Keyserling the appointment.<sup>17</sup>

Although he had won formal appointment as the chief economic spokesman of the administration and had long been valued by the most able members of the president's staff, Keyserling appeared rather insecure. Academic economists were cool toward him because he lacked the appropriate pedigree of university degrees, though in mobilizing support for his promotion, the ADA found most liberal economists willing to support him, not as the best man for the job, but simply as the best possible alternative. Within the administration he had to live down his reputation as an Ivy League liberal ideologue; he seized opportunities to remind listeners that he had been born in South Carolina and could produce a letter of commendation from Robert A. Taft. Perhaps such difficulties were responsible for his enormous vanity and stuffy manner. Yet his brilliant mind transformed Truman's style and aspirations into an economic program.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>16</sup> Current Biography, 1948, 352-55; author's interview with Keyserling, Sept. 20, 1967; J. Joseph Huthmacher, Senator Robert F. Wagner and the Rise of Urban Liberalism (New York, 1968), 147, 163-64, 190, 192, 211, 224-25, 296-97.

<sup>17</sup> Charles La Follette to Harry S. Truman, Oct. 20, 1949, and La Follette to William Green, Oct. 27, 1949, both in ADA Papers; "Toward Full Employment," New Republic, May 22, 1950, p. 8.

<sup>18</sup> Robert S. Allen and William V. Shannon, The Truman Merry-Go-Round (New York, 1950), 79-81.

In line with the mood of the Fair Deal, Keyserling assiduously avoided labels more specific than "forward-looking" or "the middle way" for his ideas. He noted on the first page of his essay in Saving American Capitalism that he rejected "classification within any 'school of thought' or endorsement of any 'general theme' or 'purpose' which this collection may be deemed by some to represent." Adamantly refusing to be typed as a Keynesian, he frequently criticized New Deal economics: "Neither those 'liberals' who betray nostalgia for the New Deal of the thirties which accomplished much but not nearly enough, nor those 'conservatives' who would incarnate the brutal and reckless economic philosophy of the twenties should be allowed to say the last word."<sup>19</sup>

On the surface his ideas and advice seemed an odd mixture of liberalism and conservatism. Writing to Clark Clifford in December 1948 with suggestions for the State of the Union message, he sounded like a conservative: "I am particularly concerned about the discussion of the economic program, which seems to imply that the Government is going to do the whole job. . . . The first responsibility for employment and production rests with business." Yet a few days later he was advocating more ambitious public-housing schedules than those proposed by the National Housing Authority. He sounded like a conservative when he emphatically disclaimed responsibility for the controversial proposal to expand basic industrial plants. He sounded like a New Dealer when he urged delegates to the convention of the Meat Cutters Union to push for higher wages and when he declared that "accruals of fat earnings" justified such demands. Shortly thereafter, however, he was reassuring business that "nobody in Washington has ever taken the position that the American economy could expand without profits."<sup>20</sup>

Keyserling's critique of New Deal economics had several themes. First of all, the New Deal had failed to grasp the virtual impossibility of the task it had undertaken: the lifting of the nation out of the depression. Those who argued that the New Deal would have been successful with a more massive spending effort were probably wrong. Government alone simply could not solve great economic crises, and if the New Deal could not be blamed for its failure, the New Dealers could be blamed for not learning the lessons of that failure.

The New Dealers also had become too dogmatic in their adoption of the antitrust persuasion. "Today some industries which are organized on a large, integrated basis are charging prices under the limit of what the traffic will bear," Keyserling wrote in 1948. By contrast, home building, the most fragmented industry in the country, "has been notoriously inefficient, highly resistant to technological change, and periodically prices its product out of the market." The antitrust laws should be used to prosecute monopolistic wrongdoing, but "we cannot re-create the pre-Civil War pattern." The liberals needed instead to ask if there were not instances in which monopolistic concentration might be "used to stabilize rather than to exploit the economy." Conversely, they needed to undertake a more searching analysis of the problems that competition presented to economic stability. Some degree of economic coordination, as voluntary as possible, would always be desirable and, during times of economic difficulty, essential.

<sup>19</sup> Keyserling, "Deficiencies of Past Programs and Nature of New Needs," in Harris, Saving American Capitalism, 81-94.

<sup>20</sup> Leon H. Keyserling to Clifford, Dec. 20, 1948, Jan. 3, 1949, both in Clark M. Clifford Papers, Harry S. Truman Library, Independence, Mo.; New York Times, Jan. 19, Feb. 28, Apr. 21, 1949.

The adoption of Keynesianism by the New Dealers had not provided American liberalism with an economic panacea, Keyserling argued. Keynesianism might be useful during a depression, but it raised more problems than it solved by its remedies for inflation. Higher taxes and interest rates bore most heavily upon the lower and lower-middle classes. Cutbacks in government spending meant the sacrifice of "national objectives which we should not forgo merely because we are prosperous."

Finally, he charged, the New Dealers had lost faith in the potential of capitalism. Considering the system pathologically unstable, even if for some reason worth saving, they awaited the inevitable onset of a major depression armed with vast government programs, which probably would be no more successful than the New Deal itself. They had failed to address themselves to the potential of the American economy; they had not formulated theories for the maintenance of prosperity. "The people of America need to be electrified by our limitless possibilities, not frightened into action by prophets of disaster."

American capitalism, as Keyserling envisioned it, had virtually unlimited opportunities for growth; an ever-expanding economy could produce undreamed-of abundance and material gain for all classes. The liberals should concentrate not on reslicing the economic pie but rather on enlarging it. Business could expect higher profits, labor better wages, farmers larger incomes, and, above all, those at the bottom of the economic scale could experience a truly decent life. The federal government should publicize these possibilities; it should provide education and guidance to the private forces whose responsible cooperation would be imperative. Keyserling recommended the initiation of a "National Prosperity Budget" in which the government would lay down targets for employment and production, indicate priority needs, and sketch out price and wage recommendations. It would be purely advisory, depending upon the cooperation of the private sectors for implementation.

The government would not be passive. It would continue to police the economy against monopolistic abuses, dictate minimum wages, use Keynesian fiscal and monetary techniques, and even impose selective controls if conditions demanded. It would provide important programs and services —such as low-cost housing, social insurance, education, and resource development—that fell outside the realm of private enterprise. Washington, however, could not keep the economy growing by itself. Expansion demanded voluntary cooperation: “The widening of this area of voluntary cooperation, through common study of common problems, is the only way that our highly industrialized and integrated economy can steer between the danger of periodic collapse and the danger of excessive governmental centralization of power.”

To those who feared that expansion meant boom-and-bust inflation, Keyserling replied that the growth years 1927–29 had constituted an era of remarkable price stability. Economic policy should concentrate less on prices as such and more on the relationship between wages, prices, and profits; it should work for the optimum balance between consumer purchasing power and corporate income in order to maintain full employment and expansion. The New Dealers, he believed, had turned too frequently toward controls to fight inflation after World War II. Selective controls might be necessary at times, but the way to deal with inflation was to enlarge productive capacity to meet demand. Keyserling did not shrink from stimulative government spending in times of prosperity, and although he would not admit it, he was willing to trade a mild inflation for growth. Such an alternative was greatly preferable to the achievement of price stability via a “downward ‘correction’” or recession. Higher unemployment and lower production might keep prices stable but hardly contributed to the overall health of the economy. “The idea that we can protect production and employment by reducing them ‘a little bit,’” he warned, “is about as safe as the ancient remedy of blood-letting.”<sup>21</sup>

During the first half of 1949 Keyserling transformed his vision of abundance to solid figures. Assuming an annual growth rate of three per cent and constant dollar values, the gross national product could rise from $262 billion in 1948 to $350 billion in 1958, national income from $226 billion to $300 billion. In 1948 almost two-thirds of all American families had lived on incomes of less than $4,000 a year; by 1958, $4,000 could be the minimum for all families. It would require only about half of the GNP increase to attain this goal, leaving a substantial sum for government programs and the enhancement of private incomes at other levels. Poverty thus could be eliminated without a redistribution of wealth. Progressive reform did not necessarily mean social conflict; rather it required intelligent cooperation.<sup>22</sup>

<sup>21</sup> Keyserling, “Deficiencies of Past Programs,” 81–94; Keyserling, “For a National Prosperity Budget,” New York Times Magazine, Jan. 9, 1949, pp. 42–43, 45; Keyserling, “The Middle Way for America,” Progressive, May 1949, pp. 5–9; Keyserling, “A Policy for Full Employment,” New Republic, Oct. 24, 1949, pp. 13–15.

<sup>22</sup> Keyserling, address in San Francisco, Sept. 18, 1949, Clifford Papers; [Keyserling] “Memorandum Relating to $4000 Minimum Standard of Living,” Sept. 30, 1949, George Elsey Papers, Truman Library; Keyserling, “Planning for a $300 Billion Economy,” New York Times Magazine, June 18, 1950, pp. 9, 24–27.

Truman adopted Keyserling's figures and rhetoric. Speaking to a Kansas City audience in the fall of 1949, he acclaimed the nation's history of economic growth and increasingly higher standards of living and declared his determination to continue the process. He talked of the $300 billion national income and the $4,000 family minimum. "That is not a pipe dream," he asserted. "It can be done."<sup>23</sup>

Keyserling had not discovered the idea of economic growth, although his ego seemed at times to tempt him to imply that he had. The growth levels of World War II had awakened many economic thinkers—Alvin Hansen and Henry Wallace, for example. Nor was Keyserling fair in his assertions that the New Deal Keynesians really accepted the business cycle and that their remedies could not be put into effect until a depression had already hit the economy. The Keynesians sought at the least to smooth out the business cycle so that depressions would be eliminated altogether, at best to maintain a constant growth without even periodic recessions.

If some of Keyserling's polemics rested on artificial assertions, his broad conception of economic expansion was nevertheless inspiring and enormously constructive. The major difficulty in the program he advocated was his reliance on voluntarism, his faith in education, his belief that group conflict could be mitigated by alluring vistas that promised gains for all. In accord with the general approach of the Fair Deal, Keyserling sought to base his economics on a politics of consensus, which neither he nor other Fair Dealers were ever able to achieve. His dream of an ever-prosperous society based on voluntary cooperation was almost as utopian as the scheme of a nineteenth-century anarchist.<sup>24</sup> Fortunately there were surer, if less perfect, ways of promoting economic growth. Keyserling defined important goals for the administration and captured the ear of a president who respected his intellectual ability and liked him as an individual.

CHARLES F. BRANNAN, who was as much a product of the New Deal as Keyserling, had begun his career in Colorado politics as a disciple of the old progressive, Edward Costigan, and an associate of Oscar L. Chapman, a dedicated liberal whom Truman appointed secretary of the interior in 1949. During the Roosevelt era Brannan had worked as an attorney for the Resettlement Administration and had been a regional director of the Farm Security Administration. Long close to the neo-populist National Farmers Union, he was a personal friend of its president, James G. Patton. Moving to Washington as assistant secretary of agriculture in 1944, Brannan quickly established himself as a loyal and capable lieutenant. In 1948 he took command of the department with the blessings of the outgoing secretary, the moderate Clinton Anderson, and the enthusiastic endorsement of the Farmers Union, which had bitterly fought Anderson. No man, not even the elder or the younger Henry Wallace, had entered the office of secretary of agriculture with clearer credentials as an aggressive liberal. Like Keyserling, Brannan used the concept of abundance as an intellectual foundation. The politicoeconomic strategy that he formulated constituted the Fair Deal's clearest break with the New Deal.

<sup>23</sup> Public Papers, 1949, 494.

<sup>24</sup> Richard Lester, "Truman Economics—1950 Model," New Republic, Jan. 28, 1950, pp. 11-13.

In the fall of 1948 Brannan's astute advice on political strategy and his vigorous campaigning won the attention of Truman and brought him into the White House inner circle. Almost alone Brannan grasped that Midwestern farmers were apprehensive about the future of price supports and that the Republican Eightieth Congress, by failing to enlarge government storage facilities, had practically guaranteed that grain prices would decline during the presidential campaign. Truman and his liberal advisers quickly adopted Brannan's counsel of attacking the GOP as the party of opposition to price supports, and the secretary himself carried the message into farm areas with a tirelessness that shamed other cabinet members. Truman's unexpected success in the rural Midwest made Brannan one of the major figures of the administration. It also suggested new political strategies to liberals both inside and outside the government.<sup>25</sup>

Many progressives believed that the farm results represented a new trend in liberal politics. To the influential columnist Samuel Grafton, 1948 had been "a year of deep and quiet decision" for farmers; the election indicated that they had overcome their conservative biases in favor of their practical need for government support and would turn increasingly to the Democratic party.<sup>26</sup> If such were the case, then the task of the liberals was to encourage and consolidate this trend. The ultimate result would be a new Democratic party with a more solidly liberal base than ever before, a liberalism that would fuse the outlook and voting power of labor with an apparently reborn Midwestern agrarian insurgency. The liberal cause would be greatly strengthened and the conservative forces proportionately weakened. Within the Republican party the number of Midwestern reactionaries would decline; within the Democratic party the Southern conservatives would have less leverage.

The first imperative was to establish lines of communication between the farmers and the liberal-labor forces. The ADA began the process by calling a conference of about thirty farm and labor leaders, which met in Chicago at the end of February 1949. The farm leaders included James Patton from the Farmers Union, Murray Lincoln and some other progressive dissenters from the Farm Bureau, Jerry Voorhis and others from the cooperative movement, and several local Grange officials. Among the labor delegates were representatives of the Railway Trainmen, the Textile

<sup>25</sup> Allen J. Matusow, Farm Policies and Politics in the Truman Years (Cambridge, Mass., 1967), 170-85; Allen and Shannon, Truman Merry-Go-Round, 114-16.

<sup>26</sup> Samuel Grafton in the Chicago Sun-Times, Jan. 26, 1949.

Workers, the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, and the United Auto Workers. The meetings amounted simply to an exchange of views; the conference made no effort to hammer out a legislative program or draft a call to action. Yet James Loeb, the ADA's executive secretary, found the sessions "an exciting experience." The discussions were friendly despite some disagreements, and many of the participants favored more conferences at the state and local levels. "The farm and labor groups are moving, slowly but definitely, in the direction of mutual understanding," declared Loeb. "The encouragement of this process can have a lasting effect on the future history of America."<sup>27</sup>

The administration took the next step in April with the introduction in Congress of a new farm program, which had been drawn up under Brannan's direction. The Brannan Plan was difficult and complex in detail, but essentially it was an effort to maintain farm income at the record high level of the war and immediate postwar periods while letting market prices fall to a natural supply-demand level. Brannan thus proposed to continue the New Deal policy of subsidizing the farmers, but he broke dramatically with the New Deal technique of restricting production and marketing in order to achieve artificially high prices.

Many agrarian progressives, including Henry A. Wallace himself, had long been troubled by the price-support mechanisms and had sought methods of unleashing the productive capacity of the farms. Brannan seemed to show the way. He proposed the maintenance of farm income through direct payments to farmers rather than through crop restriction. In order to encourage and protect the family farm, moreover, he recommended supporting a maximum of about $26,100 worth of production per farm. To the consumer he promised milk at fifteen cents a quart, to the dairy farmer a sustained high income. To the Democratic party he offered an apparently ingenious device that would unite the interests of farmers and workers.<sup>28</sup>

Liberals generally were enthusiastic over both the principles and the politics of the Brannan proposals. "The new plan lets growers grow and eaters eat, and that is good," commented Samuel Grafton. "If Brannan is right, the political miracle of 1948 will become a habit as farmers, labor and consumers find common political goals," wrote agricultural columnist Angus MacDonald. James Patton called the Brannan Plan "a milestone in the history of American agriculture," and the Nation asserted that the average consumer should devote all his spare time to support of the program.<sup>29</sup>

<sup>27</sup> James Loeb to George Jacobson, Feb. 5, 1949; Loeb to James Patton, Feb. 7, 1949; Loeb to Hubert Humphrey, Feb. 17, 1949; Loeb to Joseph P. Lash, Apr. 15, 1949; Loeb, radio speech, Mar. 8, 1949, all in ADA Papers.

<sup>28</sup> Matusow, Farm Policies and Politics, 115-19, 194-200.

<sup>29</sup> Grafton in the Chicago Sun-Times, Apr. 20, 1949; St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Apr. 8, 1949; Angus McDonald, "The Fair Deal's Farm Program," New Republic, May 2, 1949, pp. 11-13; editorial paragraph, Nation, Apr. 16, 1949, pp. 429-30; "Patton Praises Principles of Brannan Plan," National Union Farmer, Apr. 1949, p. 8.

The plan immediately ran into the opposition of the conservatives who dominated Congress. Republicans feared that the political coalition Brannan was trying to build would entrench the Democrats in power. Large producers, most effectively represented by the powerful Farm Bureau Federation, regarded the plan as discriminatory, and many Democrats with ties to the Farm Bureau refused to support it, among them Senate majority leader Scott Lucas and Clinton Anderson, now the freshman senator from New Mexico. By June it was obvious to most political analysts that the Brannan Plan had no chance of passage in 1949. The administration and most liberals nevertheless remained optimistic. The issue seemed good, the alignment of interests logical and compelling: enough political education and campaigning could revive the scheme and revolutionize American politics.<sup>30</sup>

Both the CIO and the Farmers Union undertook campaigns to spread the message of farmer-labor unity. An article in the National Union Farmer typified the effort:

Workers today are in a tough spot, just like farmers. Production has been steadily declining, and that means fewer jobs and lower wages. And that means smaller markets for farm products. This worries everybody but Big Business, but these advocates of scarcity still rule the roost. Monopoly wants less production, less employment, lower wages, fewer family farmers, less collective bargaining, lower farm prices and less competition except for jobs. . . . There is little basic difference between the labor fight against the Taft-Hartley law, and our fight against attempts to tax cooperatives out of existence. . . . Labor's strong objections to 40¢ an hour as a minimum is no different than our equally strong objections to 60% of parity.<sup>31</sup>

Brannan campaigned extensively for his program. "Farm income equals jobs for millions of American workers," he told a labor gathering in a typical effort. "Together, let workers and farmers unite in achieving a full employment, full production economy." The administration sponsored regional farmer-labor conferences around the country. The one attracting the most attention was held in June at Des Moines, Iowa, and featured prominent labor leaders, important Democratic congressmen, and Vice-President Alben Barkley. Other such grass-roots meetings were organized as far east as upstate New York, and the Democratic National Committee prepared a pamphlet on the Brannan Plan for mass distribution. On Labor Day the president devoted two major appearances, one in Pittsburgh and the other in Des Moines, to the Brannan Plan and to farmer-labor unity. "Those who are trying to set these two great groups against each other just have axes of their own to grind," he warned his Pittsburgh audience. "Price supports must . . . give consumers the benefit of our abundant farm production," he told his Des Moines listeners.<sup>32</sup>

<sup>30</sup> Matusow, Farm Policies and Politics, 199-201, 204-19; Public Papers, 1949, 292-93.

<sup>31</sup> "Workers Back Brannan Plan," National Union Farmer, June 1949, p. 3; "Labor Needs Taft-Hartley Repeal, 75¢ Minimum Wage," ibid., 7; "Hear Labor's View of Brannan Plan. ABC Network, 20th," ibid.; "Urge Closer Farm Labor Cooperation," ibid., Aug. 1949, p. 3.

Many liberals and Democratic politicians remained convinced that they had an overwhelming political strategy. "In 1950 and '52, the Brannan Plan will be the great issue in the doubtful states," wrote journalist A. G. Mezerik. "After that, Congress will enact a new farm bill—one which is based on low prices for consumers and a high standard of living for family farmers." In early 1950 the Brannan Plan seemed to be gaining popular support. Liberals inside and outside the administration continued to hope for vindication at the polls in November. They could not, of course, foresee the Korean War and the ways in which it would change the shape of American politics.<sup>33</sup>

Even without the Korean War, however, even without the disruptive impact of McCarthyism, it is doubtful that the Brannan Plan would have worked the miracles expected of it. The liberals inside and outside the administration who had created or worked for it assumed that urban and rural groups could be united simply on grounds of mutual self-interest. They failed to understand that these groups were not deeply concerned with mutual self-interest; both sides had practiced with some success methods that had taken care of their own self-interest. The rhetoric about urban-rural interdependence was extremely superficial, talked but not deeply felt. Most farm and labor leaders, even those progressive in their outlook, hardly had a basis for communication. The ADA conference of February 1949 included some of the best-informed figures from the unions and the farms. Yet one of the labor leaders had to ask for an explanation "in simple language" of the concept of parity. One of the farm leaders then admitted that he had no idea what the dues check-off was or how it worked. The farm leaders also frankly commented that their constituents were strongly against such things as a minimum wage applied to farm workers, the extension of social security to cover farm labor and farmers in general, and especially the re-establishment of any sort of price controls. The situation at Des Moines seems to have been much the same. Even some of the Farmers Union officials at the conference were annoyed by the presence of the labor people. "Some farmers wondered if they weren't being sucked in to help the forces of labor fight the Taft-Hartley Act," reported journalist Lauren Soth. Such ideas, of course, were not entirely fanciful. Most of the observers at Des Moines sensed the artificiality of the whole affair, but they continued to hope that further contacts would consummate the union of city and country.<sup>34</sup>

<sup>32</sup> Brannan, "The Challenge of Our Era," address delivered to Labor's League for Political Education, in Chicago, Sept. 5, 1949, Clifford Papers; Paul E. Fitzpatrick to Maurice Tobin, May 3, 1950, and Fitzpatrick to Brannan, May 8, 1950, Harry S. Truman Papers, OF 300, Truman Library; Matusow, Farm Policies and Politics, 199-200; Public Papers, 1949, 460, 467-68.

<sup>33</sup> A. G. Mezerik, "The Brannan Plan," New Republic, Nov. 28, 1949, pp. 11-13; Matusow, Farm Policies and Politics, 218-21.

The farm leaders harbored a provincial suspicion of labor, while the reverse was true in the cities. "While labor has given general support to the Brannan plan, I have had the suggestion made, almost ironically, that labor might be given a guaranteed income if such were to be granted to farmers," remarked Jim Loeb in November 1949. Many liberals felt that, as proposed by the administration, the Brannan Plan was too generous. The Chicago Sun-Times and the Nation agreed that the principles and machinery of the Brannan system were excellent, but both dissented from Brannan's proposal to support farm income at record heights. "The country as a whole should not undertake to support farm income at a higher level than is fair and just," warned the Sun-Times, adding that it would always be easier to raise supports than to lower them. Chester Bowles went a step further when he proposed that the whole matter of agricultural subsidies should be tied to urban employment with no supports at all during periods of full employment. Such ideas were hardly the cement of a new urban-rural coalition.<sup>35</sup>

Many urban liberals found the plan itself difficult to grasp and could not work up much enthusiasm about it. "Most of us do not understand it completely," admitted Jim Loeb a month and a half after its introduction. A group of ADA leaders had a cordial meeting with Brannan in June 1949 and pledged their support. Actually, however, the ADA did little to promote the program. In the spring of 1950 a Philadelphia liberal wrote to the organization asking for information on the issue, but Violet Gunther, the legislative director, replied that the ADA had published nothing other than an endorsement in the platform, nor could she think of any group other than the Farmers Union that might have something available. The Nation and the New Republic gave only occasional mention to the plan. Most liberals could heartily endorse and even get excited about Brannan's political objectives, but understanding and identifying with the scheme itself was quite a different matter.<sup>36</sup>

For a time in early 1950 declining farm prices seemed to generate a surge of support for the Brannan Plan. At the beginning of June, Albert Loveland, the undersecretary of agriculture, won the Iowa Democratic senatorial primary on a pro-Brannan platform and thereby encouraged the administration to believe that the Midwest was moving in its direction. Just a few weeks later, however, the Korean War began, creating situations and pressures that doomed most of the Fair Deal.<sup>37</sup>

<sup>34</sup> Loeb, radio speech, Mar. 8, 1949, ADA Papers; Milburn P. Akers in the Chicago Sun-Times, June 15, 1949; Lauren Soth, "Democrats in Des Moines," Reporter, July 19, 1949, pp. 4-7.

<sup>35</sup> Loeb to J. M. Kaplan, Nov. 1, 1949, ADA Papers; Chicago Sun-Times, July 12, 1949; "New Farm Plan Needed," Nation, June 11, 1949, pp. 649-50; New York Times, Apr. 4, 1950.

<sup>36</sup> Loeb to David Williams, May 20, 1949; Loeb to Brannan, June 15, 1949; Violet Gunther to Wilbur Hitchcock, May 10, 1950, all in ADA Papers.

<sup>37</sup> Matusow, Farm Policies and Politics, 220-21.

Even if the Brannan Plan had become law, it is far from certain that it would have created the dream farmer-labor-liberal coalition. Most leading agricultural economists, including those of a progressive outlook, were convinced that the proposal would be unworkable and prohibitively expensive. Some liberal economists condemned its failure to give the rural poor at least as much aid as the middle-class family farm.<sup>38</sup> Even assuming that the economists were wrong, there is no guarantee that a smoothly functioning Brannan program could have performed the neat trick of uniting the very different cultures of urban liberalism and rural insurgency; such a feat probably would have required more than mutual economic benefits. The down-to-earth, church-social ethos of the Farmers Union would not automatically homogenize with the sophisticated, intellectual progressivism of the city liberals or the wage-and-hour, union-shop, reformism of labor.

DURING 1949 AND EARLY 1950 the Truman administration managed a record of substantial legislative accomplishment, but it consisted almost entirely of additions to such New Deal programs as the minimum wage, social security, and public power. The Housing Act of 1949, with its provisions for large-scale public housing, appeared to be a breakthrough, but weak administration, local opposition, and inadequate financing subsequently vitiated hopes that it would help the poor. Acting on his executive authority, Truman took an important step by forcing the army to agree to a policy of desegregation. The heart of the Fair Deal, however—repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, civil rights legislation, aid to education, national medical insurance, and the Brannan Plan—failed in Congress. Given the power of the well-entrenched conservative coalition and a widespread mood of public apathy about big new reforms, Truman could only enlarge upon the record of his predecessor.<sup>39</sup>

Democratic strategists hoped for a mandate in the congressional elections of 1950. In the spring Truman made a successful whistle-stop tour of the West and Midwest, rousing party enthusiasm and apparently demonstrating a solid personal popularity. Loveland's victory provided further encouragement, and in California the aggressive Fair Dealer Helen Gahagan Douglas won the Democratic nomination for the Senate by a thumping margin. Two incumbent Fair Deal supporters—Frank Graham of North Carolina and Claude Pepper of Florida—lost their senatorial primaries, but, as Southerners who had run afoul of the race issue, they did not seem to be indicators of national trends.<sup>40</sup> Nevertheless, the hope of cutting into the strength of the conservative opposition ran counter to the historical pattern of mid-term elections. The beginning of the Korean War at the end of June destroyed any chances of success.

<sup>38</sup> Ibid., 202-04.

<sup>39</sup> Neustadt, "Congress and the Fair Deal"; Richard O. Davies, Housing Reform during the Truman Administration (Columbia, Mo., 1966), 101-42; Richard M. Dalfiume, Desegregation of the U.S. Armed Forces: Fighting on Two Fronts, 1939-1953 (Columbia, Mo., 1969), ch. 9. On the public apathy toward reform, see Mildred Strunk, ed., "The Quarter's Polls," Public Opinion Quarterly, 13 (1949): 154-76, 346-71, 537-61, 709-32.

The most immediate impact of Korea was to refuel an anti-Communist extremism that might otherwise have sputtered out. Senator Joseph R. McCarthy had begun his rise to prominence in February 1950, but he had failed to prove any of his multiple allegations and seemed definitively discredited by the investigations of a special Senate committee headed by Millard Tydings. McCarthy, it is true, was a talented demagogue who should have been taken more seriously by the liberals and the Truman administration in early 1950, but it seems probable that his appeal would have waned more quickly if the cold war with communism had not suddenly become hot. As it was, many of his Senate colleagues rushed to emulate him. In September 1950 Congress passed the McCarran Internal Security Act; only a handful of congressional liberals dared dissent from the overwhelming vote in favor. Truman's subsequent veto was intelligent and courageous, but was issued more for the history books than with any real hope of success. In the subsequent campaign, liberal Democrats, whether they had voted for the McCarran Act or not, found themselves facing charges of softness toward communism.<sup>41</sup>

The war hurt the administration in other ways. It touched off a brief but serious inflation, which caused widespread consumer irritation. By stimulating demand for agricultural products it brought most farm prices up to parity levels and thereby undercut whatever attractiveness the Brannan Plan had developed in rural areas. Finally it removed the Democratic party's most effective spokesman—the president—from active participation in the campaign. Forced to play the role of war leader, Truman allowed himself only one major partisan speech, delivered in St. Louis on the eve of the balloting.

The Fair Deal might have been a winning issue in a nation oriented toward domestic concerns and recovering from an economic recession; it had much less appeal in a country obsessed with Communist aggression and experiencing an inflationary war boom. The reaction against the administration was especially strong in the Midwest. Indiana's Democratic aspirant for the Senate asked Oscar Ewing to stay out of the state. In Iowa, Loveland desperately attempted to reverse his identification with the Brannan Plan. In Missouri the managers of senatorial candidate Thomas

<sup>40</sup> "Exit Senator Pepper," Nation, May 13, 1950, pp. 436-37; Carleton Kent, "Harry Goes A-Hunting," ibid., 466-67; "Election Overture," ibid., 514-15; Chicago Sun-Times, May 15, 1950; St. Louis Post-Dispatch, May 3, June 26, 27, 1950; ADA press release, June 18, 1950, Stephen J. Spingarn Papers, Truman Library.

<sup>41</sup> On the rise of McCarthyism, see Phillips, Truman Presidency, 372-93; Alan D. Harper, The Politics of Loyalty: The White House and the Communist Issue, 1946-1952 (Westport, Conn., 1969), chs. 6-7, apps. 3-4; Robert Griffith, The Politics of Fear: Joseph R. McCarthy and the Senate (Lexington, Ky., 1970), chs. 3-5.

C. Hennings, Jr. privately asked White House aides to make Truman's St. Louis speech a foreign policy address that would skip lightly over Fair Deal issues. A few days before the election the columnist Stewart Alsop returned from a Midwestern trip convinced that the region had never been more conservative. Nevertheless, Truman's political advisers, and probably Truman himself, felt that the Fair Deal still had appeal. Given the basic strength of the economy and the victories in Korea that followed the Inchon landing, the White House believed that the Democrats could easily rebut generalized charges of fumbling or softness toward communism. In mid-October the Democratic National Committee and many local leaders were so confident of success that their main concern was simply to get out the vote.<sup>42</sup>

The November results, however, showed a Democratic loss of twenty-eight seats in the House of Representatives and five seats in the Senate. Truman seized every opportunity to remind all who would listen that the numbers were small by traditional mid-term standards. Liberal political analysts, including Kenneth Hechler, a White House staffer, and Gus Tyler of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, subjected the returns to close scrutiny and all but pronounced a Democratic victory. All the same, most of the Democrats who went under had been staunch Fair Dealers. Republican candidates, including John Marshall Butler in Maryland, Richard M. Nixon in California, Everett McKinley Dirksen in Illinois, and Robert A. Taft in Ohio, scored some of the most spectacular GOP victories by blending right-wing conservatism with McCarthyism. The Midwestern losses were especially disappointing. Hechler argued that the corn-belt vote primarily reflected urban defections and that the Democrats had done comparatively well among farmers. Perhaps so, but for all practical purposes the results put an end to the Brannan strategy of constructing a farmer-labor coalition. Truman was probably more accurate than Hechler when, with characteristic overstatement, he privately expressed his disappointment: "The main trouble with the farmers is that they hate labor so badly that they will not vote for their own interests."<sup>43</sup>

Thereafter, with the Chinese intervention transforming the Korean

<sup>42</sup> Matusow, Farm Policies and Politics, 220-21; Stewart Alsop in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Nov. 4, 1950; George Elsey, memorandum to Charles Murphy, Oct. 30, 1950, Elsey Papers; Kenneth Hechler, memorandums, Aug. 30, Oct. 24, 27, 1950, ibid.; David Lloyd, memorandum to Charles Murphy, Sept. 28, 1950, David Lloyd Papers, Truman Library; Public Papers of the Presidents: Harry S. Truman, 1950 (Washington, 1965), 697-703.

<sup>43</sup> Hechler, memorandum on the 1950 elections, Nov. 15, 1950, Charles Murphy Papers, Truman Library; Matusow, Farm Policies and Politics, 220-21; Public Papers, 1950, 713; T. R. B., "Washington Wire," New Republic, Nov. 20, 1950, pp. 3-4; Harold Ickes, "Fear Rides Herd," ibid., 17; Gus Tyler, "The Mid-Term Paradox," ibid., Nov. 27, 1950, pp. 14-15; Thomas L. Stokes in the Washington Evening Star, Nov. 13, 1950; W. McNeil Lowry, "Frustration in the Corn Belt," Progressive, Dec. 1950, pp. 14-16; James Patton, "'The People Have Spoken,'" National Union Farmer, Nov. 1950, pp. 1, 2; Elmer Davis, news commentary, Nov. 8, 1950, Elmer Davis Papers, Library of Congress; Truman to Aubrey Williams, Nov. 18, 1950, Aubrey Williams Papers, Franklin D. Roosevelt Library, Hyde Park, N.Y.

War into a more serious conflict and with the dismissal of General Douglas MacArthur in April 1951, Truman faced a tough attack from a Republican opposition determined to capitalize upon the frustrations of Korea. Finding it necessary to place party unity above all else, he quietly shelved most of his domestic legislative program and sought to bring the conservative wing of his party behind his military and defense policies. He secretly asked Richard B. Russell of Georgia, the kingpin of the Southern conservatives, to assume the Democratic leadership in the Senate. Russell, content with the substance of power, declined and gave his nod to Ernest W. McFarland of Arizona, an amiable tool of the Southern bloc; Truman made no effort to prevent McFarland's selection as Senate majority leader. The president's State of the Union message was devoted almost entirely to foreign policy and defense mobilization and mentioned social welfare programs only as an afterthought. Subsequently Truman told a press conference that while he supported the Fair Deal as much as ever, "first things come first, and our defense programs must have top priority."<sup>44</sup>

Truman's success in achieving a minimum degree of party unity became apparent in the weeks of investigation and accusation that followed General MacArthur's return to America. Russell, playing the role of parliamentarian-statesman to the hilt and cashing in on his great prestige with senators of both parties, chaired the Senate committee that looked into the MacArthur incident, and he saw to it that the administration was able to deliver a thorough rebuttal to the general. The Northern liberal, Brien McMahon of Connecticut, relentlessly grilled hostile witnesses. The Western representative of oil and gas interests, Robert S. Kerr of Oklahoma, lashed out at MacArthur himself with a vehemence and effectiveness that no other Democrat could match. The tandem efforts of Russell, McMahon, and Kerr demonstrated the new party solidarity, but in terms of the Fair Deal the price was high.

In July 1951 the Federal Power Commission renounced the authority to regulate "independent" (non-pipeline-owning) natural gas producers. The ruling amounted to an administrative enactment of a bill, sponsored by Kerr, which Truman had vetoed a year earlier; Truman's close friend and most recent appointee to the Federal Power Commission, Mon Wallgren, cast the deciding vote. Although he talked like a militant liberal in a private conversation with ADA leaders, the president stalled throughout 1951 on repeated demands for the establishment of a Korean War Fair Employment Practices Committee. In December the administration established an ineffective Committee on Government Contract Compliance. Other domestic programs were soft-pedaled to near-invisibility.<sup>45</sup>

Yet even the Korean War was not entirely inimical to reform. Its exi-

<sup>44</sup> Rowland Evans and Robert Novak, Lyndon B. Johnson: The Exercise of Power (New York, 1966), 41-43; Public Papers of the Presidents: Harry S. Truman, 1951 (Washington, 1965), 6-13, 18, 22; Poen, "The Truman Administration and National Health Insurance," 214-19; memorandums in "Taft-Hartley-1952" file, David Stowe Papers, Truman Library.

<sup>45</sup> Douglass Cater, "A Parliamentarian, A Hatchet Man, an Inquisitor," Reporter, June 12,

gencies forced the army to transform its policy of integration into practice.<sup>46</sup> Korea also provided a test for one of the basic underpinnings of the Fair Deal—Leon Keyserling's philosophy of economic expansion. Truman did not in the end fully embrace Keyserling's policies, but in the main he followed the guidance of his chief economic adviser. The Korean War years demonstrated the extent to which Keyserling's economics diverged from conventional New Deal–World War II Keynesianism and revealed both the strengths and weaknesses of his approach.

From the outbreak of the fighting, most liberals favored either immediate strong economic controls akin to those that had held down inflation in World War II or at least the establishment of stand-by machinery that could impose them rapidly. Truman disliked such measures on the basis of both principle and politics. He and his diplomatic advisers also wanted to signal the Soviet Union that the United States regarded the North Korean attack as a limited challenge meriting a limited response. Keyserling's expansionary economics provided an attractive alternative to the liberal clamor for controls. Convinced that extensive controls would put the economy in a strait jacket and retard the expansion necessary to meet both consumer and defense needs and assuming a North Korean defeat in a few months, the administration decided to accept a short-term, war-scared inflation (probably unavoidable in any case) and concentrate on economic growth, which would be underwritten in large measure by tax incentives for business. An expanding economy would be the best long-term answer to inflation: growth policies could fit a small war into the economy, avoid the social and political strains accompanying wartime controls, and reduce inflationary pressures to a level at which fiscal and monetary policies could contain them. Liberals outside the administration watched with alarm as prices went up, but Truman and Keyserling continued to gamble on a quick end to the war and the development of an economy capable of producing both guns and butter.<sup>47</sup>

Their plan might have worked fairly well had the United States not

1951, pp. 31–32; Willard Shelton, "Presidential Appointments," Nation, Feb. 16, 1952, p. 149; "Costly Alliance," Progressive, Dec. 1951, p. 3; St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 20, 22, 1951; Francis Biddle to Truman, May 22, 1951, ADA Papers; Biddle to Emil Rieve, June 14, 1951, ibid.; John Tucker to Biddle, Aug. 16, 1951, ibid.; Violet Gunther, memorandum to Reginald Zalles [early Nov. 1951], ibid.; Herbert Garfinkle, When Negroes March (New York, 1969), 176–77. Although there can be no doubt that the administration stalled on the civil rights order for political reasons, it is also true that the twilight nature of the Korean War placed formidable legal difficulties in the way of a strong Fair Employment Practices Committee. See Fred Lawton, memorandum for the record, Feb. 1, 1951, Fred Lawton Papers, Truman Library; Charles Murphy, memorandum to Truman, Dec. 1, 1951, Truman Papers, OF 40; "FEPC for Defense," New Republic, Dec. 17, 1951, p. 6.

<sup>46</sup> Dalhume, Desegregation of the U.S. Armed Forces, ch. 10.

<sup>47</sup> For the administration position on controls, see Edward S. Flash, Jr., Economic Advice and Presidential Leadership: The Council of Economic Advisers (New York, 1965), 43–44; Public Papers, 1950, 561–64, 568–69, 589–90; Richard Neustadt, memorandum to Kenneth Hechler, Apr. 28, 1952, Elsey Papers; and author's interview with Keyserling. For liberal criticism, see, e.g., Chester Bowles to Burnet R. Maybank in the Congressional Record, 81st Cong., 2d sess., Aug. 4, 1950, pp. 11825–26; ADA mobilization program, ibid., 11826–27; Hubert Humphrey in ibid., app., pp. A5647–49; St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 28, 1950; "Washington Fiddles," Nation, Aug. 26, 1950, pp. 178–79; "Galloping Inflation," New Republic, Oct. 2, 1950, pp. 5–6.

overreached itself militarily in Korea. The Chinese intervention of November 1950 wrecked hopes of a quick recovery, set off another round of scare buying, and intensified war demands upon the economy. The administration quickly threw up a price-wage control structure, but by the end of February 1951, eight months after the beginning of the Korean conflict, the consumer price index had risen eight per cent (an annual rate of twelve per cent). Keyserling agreed that the new situation necessitated controls, but he accepted them with reluctance and sought to keep them as simple as possible, even at the risk of benefiting profiteers. "We'll never be able to out-control the Russians," he told a Senate committee, "but we can out-produce them." Speaking to an ADA economic conference, he asserted that many liberals, in their opposition to tax breaks for large business and in their demands for stronger controls, were confusing the Korean War with World War II and "engaging merely in hackneyed slogans out of the past."<sup>48</sup>

Most liberals disagreed with Keyserling's emphases. As production was his first imperative, an end to the wage-price spiral was theirs. "Unless we are willing seriously to endanger the basis of existence of the American middle class, we must stop prices from rising," wrote Hans Landsberg in the Reporter. The liberals assumed that economic expansion was possible within a framework of rigid, tightly administered controls. Chester Bowles observed that the controlled economy of World War II had turned out a twofold increase in industrial production. John Kenneth Galbraith rejected the idea that Keyserling's expansionary policies could outrun the inflationary pressures they themselves created. The bulk of liberals regarded the administration approach as dangerous, the product of political expediency rather than sound economic analysis.<sup>49</sup>

Neither Keyserling nor the more conventional liberals won a complete victory. Truman, who understood all too well the political dangers of a prolonged inflation, made substantial concessions to the controllers, led by Michael V. DiSalle, head of the Office of Price Stabilization. In the interest of fairness Truman approved a more complex system of price controls than Keyserling thought desirable, giving DiSalle considerable leeway to roll back some prices while approving advances in other areas. By March 1951 inflation was under control; during the final ten months of the year the cost-of-living index increased by less than two and one-half per cent. The waves of scare buying that followed the North Korean attack and the Chinese intervention had subsided. Higher taxes and restraints on credit were beginning to affect consumer buying. The Federal Reserve System, despite opposition from the administration, initiated a stringent monetary policy. Tax breaks for businesses expanding plant facilities presaged increased productive capacity. All these factors, along with the government's stabilization program, discouraged an inflationary psychology.<sup>50</sup>

<sup>48</sup> Flash, Economic Advice and Presidential Leadership, 69-76; New York Times, Nov. 30, Dec. 11, 12, 1950, May 10, 1951; Keyserling, speech to ADA conference, Washington, D.C., May 18, 1951, ADA Papers; Harold Enarson, memorandum to David Stowe, Apr. 11, 1951, Harold Enarson Papers, Truman Library.

<sup>49</sup> Landsberg, "Who Pays for Mobilization?" Reporter, Mar. 20, 1951, pp. 6-8; Galbraith, "The Taxonomy of Inflation Control," ibid., July 10, 1951, pp. 9-11; Bowles, public letter to Paul H. Douglas, May 31, 1951, copy attached to Bowles to Charles Murphy, June 6, 1951, Murphy Files, Truman Papers.

At the time, however, it appeared to most economic observers that the lull was only temporary. Many of the administration's liberal critics refused even to admit the existence of a lull and called for tougher controls as if prices were still skyrocketing. More moderate analysts feared that the impact of large government defense orders would set off another inflationary spiral in the fall. Influenced by such expectations, Truman ostentatiously mounted an anti-inflation crusade, demanding that Congress not only extend his control authority, due to expire on June 30, but actually strengthen it. In fact the Defense Production Act of 1951 weakened the president's powers considerably. Truman signed it reluctantly, comparing it to "a bulldozer, crashing aimlessly through existing pricing formulas, leaving havoc in its wake." A subsequent tax bill failed to meet administration revenue requests and increased the danger of serious inflation.<sup>51</sup>

Yet price stability persisted through 1952, in large measure because defense production, hampered by multiple shortages and bottlenecks, lagged far behind its timetable. In late 1951 these problems and the fear of renewed inflation led Truman to decide in favor of a "stretch-out" of defense production schedules; in doing so he overrode Keyserling's urgings for an all-out effort to break the bottlenecks and concentrate relentlessly upon expansion. Given the serious problems in defense industry, the stretch-out decision may have seemed necessary to Truman, but it also carried the dividend of economic stability.

The president had steered a course between the orthodox liberal obsession with inflation and Keyserling's easy disregard of its perils; perhaps as a result the economy failed to expand at the rate Keyserling had hoped. On balance, however, Truman's approach to the political economy of the Korean War was closer to Keyserling's, and the conflict produced a dramatic economic growth. Before the war the peak gross national product had been $285 billion in 1948; by the end of 1952 the GNP (measured in constant dollar values) had reached a rate of $350 billion. The production index of durable manufactured goods had averaged 237 in 1950; by the last quarter of 1952 it had reached 313. The expansion, even if less than

<sup>50</sup> Arthur Viner, "What Happened to Inflation?" Reporter, Apr. 15, 1952, pp. 32-34; Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1953 (Washington, 1953), 307.

<sup>51</sup> Examples of continued liberal concern about inflation are Thomas L. Stokes in the Washington Evening Star, Apr. 4, 1951; ADA press release, Apr. 16, 1951, ADA Papers; "Are We Licking Inflation?" New Republic, Apr. 30, 1951, p. 6; and St. Louis Post-Dispatch, June 12, 1951. For Truman's course, see Public Papers, 1951, 244-53, 320-21, 333-38, 364, 369, 435-37, 478-83, 590.

Keyserling had wanted, was breathtaking. Moreover, aside from the probably unavoidable inflation that accompanied the early months of the war, this remarkable growth had occurred in a climate of economic stability. Using a somewhat more orthodox approach than Keyserling preferred, the administration had achieved one of the central goals of the Fair Deal.<sup>52</sup>

In its effort to carry on with the reforming impulse of the New Deal the Truman administration faced nearly insuperable obstacles. A loosely knit but nonetheless effective conservative coalition had controlled Congress since 1939, successfully defying Franklin Roosevelt long before it had to deal with Truman. Postwar prosperity muted economic liberalism and encouraged a mood of apathy toward new reform breakthroughs, although Truman's victory in 1948 indicated that most of the elements of the old Roosevelt coalition were determined to preserve the gains of the New Deal.<sup>53</sup> The cold war probably made it more difficult to focus public attention upon reform and dealt severe blows to civil liberties. It did, however, give impetus to the movement for Negro equality.

The Fair Deal attempted to adapt liberalism to the new conditions. Under the intellectual leadership of Leon Keyserling it formulated policies that sought to transcend the conflicts of the New Deal era by encouraging an economic growth that could provide abundance for all Americans. With Charles Brannan pointing the way, the Truman administration tried to translate abundance into a political coalition that could provide the votes for its social welfare policies. The political strategy, ambitious but unrealistic, collapsed under the weight of the Korean War. Keyserling's economics, on the other hand, received a lift from Korea; in a period of adversity the Fair Deal was able to achieve at least one of its objectives.

<sup>52</sup> Statistical Abstract, 1953, 786; Flash, Economic Advice and Presidential Leadership, 85-99; Public Papers of the Presidents: Harry S. Truman, 1952-53 (Washington, 1966), 1179.

<sup>53</sup> Samuel Lubell, The Future of American Politics (3d ed. rev.; New York, 1965), remains the most influential analysis of the deadlock of the Roosevelt coalition.

---

Marx and the Agrarian Question

---

OSCAR J. HAMMEN

THE FIRST SUCCESSFUL REVOLUTION avowedly inspired and guided by the ideology and historical interpretation of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels took place in Russia in 1917. Since this event occurred in a mainly agricultural state with a relatively small industrial establishment, it is often listed as one of the ironies of history. This has led some scholars to the conclusion that Lenin, the director of the Bolshevik forces, gave an un-Marxian twist to Marx, deviating from the theories of the master in the process.

The theories of Marx and Engels certainly stressed the primary revolutionary role of an industrial proletariat in the more advanced capitalistic states. Marx and Engels in their critiques also depended heavily on the historical experience and the contemporary condition of England in demonstrating the inherent contradictions and class conflicts that resulted from changing modes of production.<sup>1</sup> With the expansion of industry and the application of capital, associated as they were with the presence of an ever-growing and more numerous proletariat, the capitalist system produced its own hangmen. The above line of thought also reflected an application of Marxian dialectics, with an emphasis on the clash of opposites, class conflict, and the advance of civilization proceeding from this logic.

It must be noted, though, that Marx and Engels were so certain that the course of history pointed toward the ultimate triumph of communism that they were ready to support any revolutionary movement that promised to eliminate a variety of roadblocks (political, economic, and social institutions, and even "reactionary nations") that needed to be removed to clear the way for the last climactic confrontation between proletariat and bourgeoisie. A pattern that such upheavals were likely to follow was always sought by Marx in the great French Revolution—a revolution that had followed an "ascending line," as the "more progressive parties" pushed their predecessors aside and sent them to the guillotine.<sup>2</sup> A personal factor also entered the picture, because Marx and Engels were anything but mere theorists content to watch history follow its own fumbling but destined path in the ripeness of time. They expected to witness the predicted revolutions and to participate directly in them.<sup>3</sup> This helps to account for their unmatched display of "tactical shuffling," as Joseph A. Schumpeter once called it,<sup>4</sup> their readiness to identify themselves with the grievances of diverse groups—worker, agrarian, national, political, economic, and even religious—that promised to advance the "movement" (Bewegung, a favorite expression of Marx and Engels).

This article represents an expanded version of a paper that was read on December 30, 1970, at the annual meeting of the American Historical Association in Boston.

<sup>1</sup> Beginning with Engels's "Umrisse zu einer Kritik der Nationalökonomie," in the Deutsch-Französische Jahrbücher (Paris, 1844), followed by Die Lage der Arbeitenden Klasse in England (Leipzig, 1845), and culminating in Marx's Kapital (Hamburg, 1867).

Scholars who are interested primarily in the theoretical side of Marx and Engels are apt to frown on any undue, or perhaps merely proportionate, emphasis on Marx as an active promoter of revolutions, with all the tactical adjustments to diverse national settings and local circumstances that this entailed. Such a stress on tactics appears to be a derogation from the role that theory occupied in the thoughts of Marx and Engels. Actually it underlines the importance of the theoretical assumptions. Marx and Engels could recommend and practice all manner of deviations to promote the destruction of an existing system precisely because they were completely confident that their theoretical conclusions were infallible, that they moved with the stream of history. The communists who comprehended the "movement" remained in a position to guide events in the destined historical direction. This confidence persisted even though Marx ultimately shed some of the "comfortable delusions and the almost childish enthusiasm" with which Marx and Engels had greeted the 1848 revolutions. Marx, moreover, had come to recognize the "role that stupidity plays in revolutions and how the rascals [Lumpen] exploit it."<sup>5</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Marx, "Der achtzehnte Brumaire des Louis Bonaparte," Karl Marx/Friedrich Engels: Werke (hereafter Werke) (Berlin, 1956-68), 8: 135.

<sup>3</sup> Their commitment to revolutionary involvement in the "movement" is illustrated by the expectations expressed in section 4 of the Communist Manifesto and in their participation in the revolutions of 1848-49, notably in Germany. In the last "red" number of the NRZ (Neue Rheinische Zeitung. Organ der Demokratie), May 19, 1849, they promised their followers that they would return when the action started again. Their hopes for an early return to the continent following another eruption of the "revolutionary volcano" persisted into 1850 and are well documented. The Marx-Engels correspondence (Briefwechsel) in the years that followed demonstrates the same expectations. See the following representative letters: Engels to Marx, Nov. 27, 1851; Marx to Engels, Mar. 5, 1856; Marx to Engels, Sept. 26, 1856; Engels to Marx, Feb. 11, 1858; Marx to Engels, Feb. 14, 1858; Engels to Marx, Apr. 11, 1859; Engels to Marx, Apr. 10, 1866; Engels to Marx, Nov. 29, 1868. The Briefwechsel, aside from special editions, appears in the four volumes in part 3 of MEGA, Karl Marx/Friedrich Engels. Historisch-Kritische Gesamtausgabe. Werke/Schriften/Briefe (Frankfurt, Berlin, Moscow, 1927-35). References in this article will be to the MEGA publication as follows: Briefwechsel, 1, 2, 3, or 4. The Briefwechsel also appears in volumes 27-35 of the Werke. Engels's testimonial at the graveside of Marx in 1883 stresses the fact that the "scientist and theorist in Marx represented only half of the man." See Engels, "Das Begräbnis von Karl Marx," in Werke, 19: 335-37.

<sup>4</sup> Joseph A. Schumpeter, Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy (3d ed.; New York, 1950), 319.

<sup>5</sup> Marx to Engels, Feb. 13, 1863, in Briefwechsel, 3: 126-27.

Scholars by and large have neglected the systematic study of the direct participation of Marx and Engels in an actual revolution<sup>6</sup> together with their capacity for tactical adjustments—a capacity that was demonstrated repeatedly and that would give the two men a rôle in a great variety of revolutionary movements without ever causing them to lose sight of their ultimate goals. Yet any appraisal of Marx and Engels and what they represented would appear to be unrealistic and lopsided in the absence of the above considerations. Marxism represents an amalgam of theory and practice.

Marx and Engels, in any event, did not consistently abide by their own apparent theoretical conclusions that pointed to the proletariat in the most advanced industrial lands for the initiative in the communist movement. They occasionally indicated that the virgin soil of a belatedly emerging proletariat constituted a richer seed bed. In the Communist Manifesto of 1848 they predicted the early success of a bourgeois revolution in Germany as the “immediate prelude” to a succeeding proletarian revolution. They justified this prediction by asserting that the German upheaval would occur under “generally more advanced conditions of European civilization and a far more developed proletariat” than had existed during comparable English and French revolutions in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.<sup>7</sup> With the added maturity of twenty years Marx in 1868 again reflected on the advantages of a late start. Beyond that he then gave the Germans credit for a special national trait: They “had on their shoulders heads that could generalize.”<sup>8</sup> The Germans were the “most theoretical people in Europe and had preserved a theoretical frame of mind [Sinn],” Engels wrote concurringly. The lack of similar “frame of mind” among the English and French accounted for their relative insensitivity to Marxian views.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>6</sup> This neglect is most apparent in connection with the role of Marx and Engels in the revolutions of 1848–49, the only revolutions in which they were involved directly and to which they continued to refer as a cardinal event in their lives. Among the more comprehensive but also belated studies, the centenary account by Auguste Cornu, Karl Marx et la Révolution de 1848 (Paris, 1948), is relatively elemental and thin (merely seventy-four pages). Gerhard Becker's Karl Marx und Friedrich Engels in Köln 1848–1849 (Berlin, 1963) is scholarly, reasonably comprehensive and commendable, though colored by an obvious communist bias. The only relatively thorough study in the English language is by the author: Oscar J. Hammen, The Red '48ers: Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels (New York, 1969).

<sup>7</sup> “Manifest der Kommunistischen Partei,” pt. 4, in Werke, 4: 493.

<sup>8</sup> Marx to Engels, Sept. 26, 1868, in Briefwechsel, 4: 102.

<sup>9</sup> Engels, “Vorbemerkung zu ‘Der deutsche Bauernkrieg’ (Ausgabe 1870 und 1875),” in Werke, 7: 541. Engels spoke later of “two essential advantages” the German workers enjoyed in contrast to other workers. First, as members of the “most theoretical people in Europe,” they had preserved a “theoretical frame of mind.” Without it “scientific socialism” would never have become so much a part of their “flesh and blood.” The absence of this “inestimable advantage” was a major cause of the “indifference toward theory” that accounted for the fact that the English workers “moved so slowly from the spot” as it also accounted for the confusion and mischief that resulted from the French and Belgian dedication to “Proudhonism” and the “caricatured form” of the latter that had been transmitted to the Spaniards and Italians by Bakunin. See Engels to Bebel, Dec. 11, 1884, in Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, Correspondence, (hereafter Correspondence) (New York, 1934), 431–32. August Bebel was a noted German Social Democratic leader.

Marx and Engels also declared that the misery of the workingman in the industrially backward countries and regions was more pronounced than in the advanced states, thereby suggesting a perhaps added responsiveness to radical promptings. Engels informed a German audience that the Germans experienced in a more acute form the same economic crises that struck the English.<sup>10</sup> Workers in backward areas also were drawn into the "movement" by the real industrial proletariat elsewhere, Marx asserted. The industrially advanced states produced the same internal "contradictions" (conflict of classes) in the less industrialized countries because of the competition resulting from the expansion of international trade—"the latent proletariat in Germany," for example, was "created by the competition of English industry."<sup>11</sup> By 1847, therefore, Germany had already experienced to a degree the "modern conflict between the bourgeoisie and the working class, and the battle resulting from it, because of her industrial development and German dependence on the world market."<sup>12</sup> The great economic crises, or depressions, likewise affected the backward countries with an equal if not greater force. "It is known," Marx stated in 1850, "that no European land is struck so directly, with the same scope and intensity, as Germany by the effects of an English crisis."<sup>13</sup> It must be noted here that Marx and Engels counted much on the revolutionary impulse resulting from an economic crisis, especially after the experiences of 1848-49. Such crises revealed the contradictions in a capitalist society in a most glaring manner, while simultaneously sharpening the misery of the proletariat and increasing its alleged readiness to revolt against the prevailing system.

It should be evident from the preceding that Marx and Engels were not unduly hemmed in by the apparent implications of their theories that seemed to suggest that the communist, the proletarian, victory was destined to be won first in the most advanced industrialized states. In actual practice Marx and Engels saw certain possibilities in the rela-

<sup>10</sup> Engels, "Zwei Reden in Elberfeld II," in Werke, 2: 551-52.

<sup>11</sup> Marx and Engels, "Die deutsche Ideologie," in ibid., 3: 61, 73.

<sup>12</sup> Marx, "Die moralisierende Kritik und die kritisierende Moral," Deutsche-Brüsseler-Zeitung (DBZ), Nov. 18, 1847, in ibid., 4: 351.

<sup>13</sup> Marx and Engels, Neue Rheinische Zeitung. Politisch-ökonomische Revue (hereafter Revue) (Hamburg, 1850), in Werke, 7: 293-94. After many additional years of practical observation Engels noted some added Marxian gains that resulted from a belated industrial development. A great advantage of the Germans could be ascribed to the fact that the "industrial revolution is only just in full swing, while in France and England, so far as the main point is concerned, it is closed." In the latter countries population shifts took place only very slowly; the great mass of the people grew up "in the conditions in which they have later to live, are accustomed to them; even the fluctuations and crises have become something they take practically for granted." Moreover, they were burdened with the memory of past "unsuccessful attempts." Germany, in contrast, lagged behind, and consequently the social upheaval was all the more fundamental. Germany had a "perfectly fresh and intact proletariat, undemoralized by defeats and finally—thanks to Marx—with an insight into the causes of economic and political development such as none of our predecessors possessed." Letter to Bebel, Dec. 11, 1884, in Correspondence, 431-32.

tively backward states. The Germans, as noted above, showed a greater philosophical capacity, the ability to "generalize," plus a more retarded development that added to their miseries. The French, on the other hand, possessed a marked revolutionary tradition.

The less industrialized states lacked the vast and numerous industrial proletariat that could be organized to serve as the shock troops of revolution all the more readily because of their concentration in the large cities, often the capital cities. But this deficiency could be offset through tactical alliances with other potentially revolutionary elements. In the large agricultural states (most of the European states) it might be possible to turn to the agrarian question covering a host of grievances and expectations experienced by the rural people, in the hope that agrarian discontent, guided by the ideologically more sophisticated proletariat, could be mobilized for revolution. Marx and Engels always believed that the proletariat, as the class that would ultimately triumph, would play the leading role in such combinations—if not at once, then later.

In writing on Marx and the agrarian question here the greater stress will be on the earlier period extending into the 1850s. This was the time when tactical considerations were more pronounced because of the presence of actual revolutions, which were followed by reflections on the miscarriage of those revolutions and the anticipation of early revolutions to follow. When immediate revolutionary prospects were dim Marx concentrated more strongly on historical and theoretical investigations, so as to make them available as guidelines for the "deluge" to come. In any event, it is impossible within the scope of an article to provide the same coverage for the later and longer period. Enough will be added, however, to suggest that Marx and Engels adhered to the same tactical pattern in the times that followed—despite repeated disappointments resulting from the peasant's tendency to act in a conservative and even "reactionary" manner.

From a theoretical point of view Marx and Engels always felt that the peasant, farm tenant, and agricultural worker were subjected to the same nightmare of exploitation by the bourgeois, capitalist society as were the proletariat, even if in a less apparent, direct, and massive manner. Engels, who devoted a chapter in his first major work, The Condition of the Working Class in England, to "The Agricultural Proletariat," explained that as the machine had given birth to an industrial proletariat, so it had also produced an agricultural proletariat, which was employed on big land units owned or rented by large-scale farmers who utilized the latest machines. The lot of day laborers on the land appeared especially miserable; they would become "Chartists and socialists, that is, conscious proletarians." As for the tenant farmer who cultivated a few acres of leased land (in Wales and Ireland), he faced the same ruin that hounded the petty bourgeoisie in the cities. The resulting agrarian discontent manifested itself initially in the form of violence and incendiarism.<sup>14</sup> "The abolition of capital . . . is the property question in the sense of the English agricultural day laborer just as it is of the factory worker," Marx asserted.<sup>15</sup> There was little need of speaking of the once proud English "yeomanry"—as a nearly extinct species.

But the small peasant, wherever he existed, was likewise the victim of an inescapable capitalist exploitation and of the forces of competition. France, where two-thirds of the population belonged to the ranks of the peasantry, furnished the classical model to illustrate the situation. But peasants in the Prussian Rhine Province and certain other areas in Germany, as well as in other countries, faced the same problem. Speaking of France, Marx in 1848 insisted that the "rule of the feudal lords has been supplanted by that of the capitalist; the feudal obligations of the peasant have been converted into the burden of the bourgeois mortgage." Agriculture could not flourish under existing civilized conditions in which the peasant was sinking into an increased poverty.<sup>16</sup>

The continued "parceling" or subdivision of peasant holdings, accompanied by the rising price of land, brought a proportionate increase in debt in the form of the mortgage. At the same time the productivity of the land declined; it was impossible to use machinery and other modern devices to improve the yield of such small farms. Each generation started with the burden of a greater debt. One mortgage followed the other until the peasants had to turn to the usurer with his exorbitant interest rates, all in the name of private property. "Only the fall of the capitalist can help the peasant," Marx claimed. "Only an anti-capitalist, a proletarian government can end his economic misery, his social degradation."<sup>17</sup> Marx also expected to cover some aspects of the agrarian question in a series of articles on "Wage Labor and Capital" that began appearing in the Neue Rheinische Zeitung (NRZ) in 1849. There he promised to examine the subject under three subdivisions, item two being the "inescapable fall of the middle bourgeois classes and the peasant class under the present system."<sup>18</sup> But Marx typically never got beyond the first item in the projected series. Since the small peasant proprietor, theoretically considered, could never prosper or even survive indefinitely under the capitalist system, it was evident that he might be persuaded to support a proletarian revolution, once the communists succeeded in clarifying his thoughts on the subject and in making him conscious of his

<sup>14</sup> See Engels, "Das Ackerbauproletariat," Die Lage der arbeitenden Klasse in England. Nach eigener Anschauung und authentischen Quellen, chap. 4 (Leipzig, 1845), in Werke, 2: 473-85.

<sup>15</sup> Marx, "Moralisierende Kritik," in ibid., 4: 341.

<sup>16</sup> Marx, "Thiers' Rede über eine allgemeine Hypothekenbank mit Zwangkurs," NRZ, Oct. 14, 1848, in ibid., 5: 424-25.

<sup>17</sup> Marx, "Die Klassenkämpfe in Frankreich 1848 bis 1850," Revue, in Werke, 7: 83-84.

<sup>18</sup> Marx, "Lohnarbeit und Kapital," NRZ, Apr. 5, 1849, in ibid., 6: 398.

hopeless position. But this appeared a hopeless task, because the peasant clung to his parcel of land and hoped for better times and perhaps more land. The more practical approach to the creation of an alliance for revolutionary purposes demanded that the communists see the world through the eyes of the peasants. The communists had to win the peasants by tactically identifying themselves with the various agrarian demands, hopes, and grievances. Marx and Engels early recognized the value of going to the land.

The first illustration of this fact spelled out in a formal manner appeared in the "Circular against Kriege," drafted in 1846 by a forerunner of the Communist League, the Communist Correspondence Committee, with its headquarters in Brussels. Hermann Kriege, whom Engels originally sent to Marx as a promising recruit,<sup>19</sup> displayed inadmissible deviations from the correct views after he settled in New York and published a newspaper. The "Circular," after citing many other errors in Kriege's views, attacked his "economics" for supporting a program advocated by "Young America" and favoring the distribution of 160 acres of land and no more to all farmers.

Had Kriege supported the free-soil movement under specific conditions, had he presented it as a movement . . . that necessarily had to lead to communism, had he shown how the communist tendencies in America originally had to present themselves in this agrarian manner that seemingly contradicted communism as such, there would be no cause for complaint, the "Circular" explained.<sup>20</sup> The talent for tactical elasticity displayed here—a reflection of confidence in the dialectical process—remained a pronounced characteristic of Marx and Engels. They advised another German follower thus: "In a party one must support everything that helps, without having any boring scruples there."<sup>21</sup> In 1848 Marx declared that in the struggle against the existing government (in this case Prussia) they "allied themselves even with [their] enemies." They had accepted the miserable make-up of the opposition for what it was and had allowed their own views to recede into the background in an election that had just been held.<sup>22</sup> In a slightly lighter vein Marx in 1852 wrote that it was permissible to ally oneself with the devil in order to achieve a specific goal in politics—but one had to be sure that one was getting the best of the devil and not the reverse.<sup>23</sup> That Marx and Engels continued to show the same readiness to make tactical adjust-

<sup>19</sup> Engels to Marx, Feb. 22–Mar. 7, 1845, in Briefwechsel, 1: 13–14. Engels described Kriege as a "stupendous agitator."

<sup>20</sup> Marx, Engels, et al., "Zirkular gegen Kriege," May 11, 1846, in Werke, 4: 8–10.

<sup>21</sup> Marx, Engels, et al., "Brief des Brüsseler kommunistischen Korrespondenz-Komitees an G. A. Köttingen," June 15, 1846, in ibid., 22.

<sup>22</sup> Marx, "Stein," NRZ, Feb. 18, 1849, in ibid., 6: 298.

<sup>23</sup> Marx, "Kossuth, Mazzini und Louis-Napoleon," in ibid., 8: 392. The original appeared in the form of a letter to the editor of the New York Daily Tribune, Dec. 1, 1852.

ments to existing circumstances is borne out in their correspondence (Briefwechsel).

In preparation for the expected revolutions that came in 1848 Marx and Engels posed as democrats. The "democratic party" of which they spoke included the broad masses: workers, the petty bourgeoisie, and the most numerous class, the peasantry. Marx, in addressing the Germans, presented himself also as the champion of the people (Volk), though he once suggested that the word "proletariat" be used in place of that "broad, indefinite expression."<sup>24</sup> Engels expressed it more bluntly: "Democracy, that today means communism. Any other democracy can exist only in the heads of theoretical visionaries." The party of the "Terror" of 1793 in France had found its support in the "rebellious proletariat."<sup>25</sup> "The industrial proletariat of the cities has become the crown of all modern democracy," Engels stated elsewhere; "the petty bourgeoisie and even more the peasants depend completely on its initiative." The small peasants were the least capable of taking the "revolutionary initiative."<sup>26</sup> Marx and Engels apparently felt sure that the communists would fill the gap.

The "Principles of Communism," Engels's draft of a communist "catechism" or "confession of faith" whose basic points thereafter reappeared in the Manifesto of 1848, touched up or toned down and supplemented by Marx, stated that the revolution would result in a "democratic constitution." That meant the "direct or indirect political rule of the proletariat." The rule would be indirect in France and Germany, where the proletariat was still the minority and where the majority was made up of small peasants and petty bourgeoisie. But the last two, who were "just in the process of a transition into the proletariat" and whose "political interests depended more and more on the proletariat," soon would have to yield to the demands of the workers. "Democracy would be wholly useless for the proletariat unless it immediately serves as a means for the implementation of measures attacking private property and securing the position of the proletariat."<sup>27</sup> The Manifesto later was less explicit.

In the last part of the Communist Manifesto Marx outlined the tactics of the party in the coming revolutions. The tactics varied greatly because they were attuned to the actual conditions and possibilities, as Marx and Engels saw them, in each land. In Poland they supported the party that insisted on an "agrarian revolution" as a prerequisite for national liberation. In the United States they endorsed the position of the existing worker party toward the "agrarian reformers." In Germany they expected the triumph of a liberal bourgeois revolution that was merely "the im-

<sup>24</sup> Marx, "Der Kommunismus des 'Rheinischen Beobachters,'" DBZ, Sept. 12, 1847, in Werke, 4: 193.

<sup>25</sup> Engels, "Das Fest der Nationen in London," in ibid., 2: 612-13.

<sup>26</sup> Engels, "Die Kommunisten und Karl Heinzen," DBZ, Oct. 3, 1847, in ibid., 4: 313.

<sup>27</sup> Engels, "Grundsätze des Kommunismus," in ibid., 372-73.

mediate prelude to a proletarian revolution." In general communists everywhere backed every "revolutionary movement against the existing social and political conditions."<sup>28</sup>

In the revolutions of 1848, the only revolutions in which Marx and Engels ever participated directly (they felt that their "time" had come), they avowedly were interested mainly in Germany. They therefore composed and printed in short form for easy distribution a special set of "Demands of the Communist Party in Germany." The "Demands," drafted in Paris on the eve of the return of the two men to Germany in 1848, illustrate the fact that they hoped to mobilize agrarian support for their revolutionary purposes. Four of the seventeen brief demands were distinctly agrarian. All feudal obligations that hitherto had oppressed the country population were to be abolished without compensation. All princely and feudal property in land, mines, and the like were to become state property. The state would introduce large-scale farming along scientific lines on such lands, for the benefit of everyone (Gemeinheit). All peasant mortgages were to be transferred to the state, to which the peasants would pay interest in the form of a tax. In areas where tenant farming prevailed, rent and other obligations were to be paid to the state, again in the guise of taxes. "Consumption" on the part of landowners who did not till the land themselves was denounced as a "pure abuse." The above measures, according to the "Demands," were aimed at reducing the "public and other burdens of the peasants and tenant farmers without hurting production and without reducing the sums needed by the state." If the "Demands" as a whole were realized, "the millions who previously had been exploited by a small number would gain their rights and the power that rightfully was theirs as the producers of all wealth."<sup>29</sup> It must be pointed out that there were no similar demands for the confiscation by the state of rental properties, mortgages, and business establishments in the cities—aside from the banks.

When Marx and Engels returned to Germany in 1848 to operate out of Cologne in their native Prussian Rhineland they were supremely confident. Yet they initially had only a few followers already in Germany. They were able to bring with them several hundred additional Germans who were living in exile. These more or less informed and enthusiastic followers were dispatched to different areas in Germany to get something started. Since the proletariat was to provide the correct initiative for the peasants and the broad democratic masses in general, Marx and Engels first tried to get control of the countless worker societies that sprang up everywhere. The attempt failed. Even in Cologne Andreas Gottschalk, supposedly a communist but one who soon showed undesirable deviations in tactics, initially became the adored leader of the Worker Society that soon counted over five thousand members. But Marx and Engels were not discouraged. Judging from the precedents set by the great French Revolution Marx and Engels assumed that the high revolutionary tide of March 1848 would be followed by a succession of waves toward the left. Events would open the field for those who acted with decision and comprehended the forces of history.

<sup>28</sup> "Manifest der Kommunistischen Partei," in ibid., 491-92.

<sup>29</sup> Marx and Engels, "Forderungen der Kommunistischen Partei in Deutschland," in ibid., 5: 3-5.

The key necessity was a daily newspaper. Throughout Marx's and Engels's lives the control over a party "organ" remained a paramount consideration—as a vehicle through which they could reach the wider public, denounce existing governments and the halfheartedness or errors of other parties, and offer daily tactical guidelines for their followers in shifting situations. Their Neue Rheinische Zeitung began appearing on June 1, 1848, under the editorial "dictatorship" of Marx and with a staff composed mainly of communists. As the subtitle of the paper, "Organ der Demokratie," suggested, the NRZ was professedly democratic. The communist direction of the "Organ" was never specifically avowed, nor was it allowed to surface clearly in the columns.<sup>30</sup>

Beyond that, Marx was personally active in the Cologne Democratic Society. The horizons became broader when Gottschalk was arrested early in July. The Marxian influence then became pronounced in the Cologne Worker Society and in its newspaper, the ZAV, which appeared twice a week and on one occasion was rated an "essential power" because it circulated between 1,400 and 1,800 copies.<sup>31</sup> Two communist associates of Marx and Engels, Joseph Moll, who replaced Gottschalk as president, and Karl Schapper, whose abilities as popular leaders had been demonstrated earlier in London, thereafter dominated the proceedings of the Worker Society.

The two societies, together with another related group, sponsored a Democratic Congress in Cologne on August 13 and 14. They invited all similar societies in the Rhine Province and Westphalia to send delegates in order to coordinate policy and create the framework of a wider party. The influence of Marx was certainly in the picture when the Congress recommended a direct, oral propaganda campaign in the rural areas. Emissaries were to go to the peasants, and popular meetings were to be held. The countryside, it was argued, was more open to "democracy" than were the cities. The peasants, reacting against taxes, feudal burdens, and bureaucratic supervision, had become essentially radical.

<sup>30</sup> Engels stated in retrospect that the NRZ could not inscribe its "proletarian character . . . on [its] banner." Had they done so, their paper would have been a mere "small, obscure local newspaper," preaching to a "small sect" instead of to a "large active party." Since they were dealing with "despicable" opponents the tone of the paper was anything but "solemn, earnest or inspired." See Engels, "Marx und die 'Neue Rheinische Zeitung' 1848-1849," in ibid., 21: 18-20.

<sup>31</sup> Zeitung des Arbeiter-Vereines zu Köln. Freiheit, Brüderlichkeit, Arbeit (Cologne, 1848-49).

They could be won completely for "democracy" if they saw that the "democrats" took up their cause.<sup>32</sup>

In a subsequent committee meeting of the Worker Society the subject "How is the proletariat on the land to be helped?" appeared as the first item on the agenda. The greatest evil existed among them, and it multiplied in geometric proportions.<sup>33</sup> The following session then offered solutions to the problem in terms that resembled the "Demands of the Communist Party." The ZAV of September 7 reported that members of the Worker Society had assumed the duty of going into the country to make contact with peasants and factory workers there and to create and maintain regular ties with societies in rural villages. The paper thereafter urged city workers to establish similar links "everywhere with their brothers on the land."<sup>34</sup> The ZAV then announced the first brilliant results of the new tactic. Several members had gone to Worringen, a short distance north of Cologne, to discuss political and social conditions with the rural population. They discovered that the "peasants understood very well where the shoe pinched them"; they had the "courage and power" to improve their oppressed lot. The "revolutionary strength of Germany" lay in the peasant and worker classes. If they united they would soon be freed of feudal burdens and the pressures of the usurer and capital. A society of forty members was formed in Worringen on the same day. During this period the ZAV, apparently in concert with the NRZ, also gave much space in its limited columns to reports of agrarian unrest and protest in scattered areas of Germany.

The success at Worringen was exploited to the utmost. A big popular meeting held there on September 17, 1848, allegedly attended by about ten thousand people, was often referred to as the first communist rally in Germany. Every effort had been made to get a big peasant and worker turnout. It was reported, erroneously, that even Marx appeared on the scene to promote the movement. The local officials charged that a handbill (Zettel) with the seventeen communist "Demands" was being distributed. Karl Schapper presided at the rally of September 17, and Friedrich Engels acted as secretary. The "blood-red flag" stood unfurled on one side; the popular German national colors of 1848-49, the black, red, and gold, on the other. The crowd unanimously acclaimed the "democratic-social red republic," and speakers from every locality were recognized, including "Henri [sic] Brisbane," the "recognized editor of the democratic-socialist New-York Tribune." The "greatest calm, order and harmony" characterized the affair,<sup>35</sup> a statement that was included in

<sup>32</sup> NRZ, Sept. 13, 1848. Curiously, the report was brief and a month late. It was printed only after questions were raised regarding this silence on the part of the "Organ of Democracy."

<sup>33</sup> "Comité-Sitzung vom 21. August 1848," ZAV, Aug. 27, 1848.

<sup>34</sup> Ibid., Aug. 31, Sept. 21, 1848.

<sup>35</sup> Ibid., Sept. 21, Oct. 5, 1848.

many reports of popular meetings. But several police spies were detected and unceremoniously pitched into the Rhine, then mercifully pulled out before they drowned.

At the time of the Worringen triumph the committee of the Worker Society in Cologne proposed a second great worker-peasant rally to be held at "Wesslingen" on September 30. The selection of Wesslingen offered a special fillip because the worker emissaries had organized a society there in the face of well-publicized, hostile interference from local officials. Many people, especially in the countryside, wanted to hear the "human doctrine of democracy and socialism," Moll observed. Even if the army opposed them the soldiers (mostly peasant lads) had a "human heart and a social mind." The workers should appeal to them also. Moll, however, warned the committee that the war still had to be restricted to the "mouth and pen."<sup>36</sup> Notices in the NRZ and the ZAV in the first weeks of September also advertised the appearance of a new radical newspaper in Cologne, the New Cologne Journal for Townsmen, Peasants and Soldiers, edited by Fritz Beust and Fritz Anneke. The paper reproduced the tone set by the NRZ, though on a more plebian scale.<sup>37</sup>

Moll's warning regarding premature action reflected fully the tactics of Marx himself. An uprising in Cologne and in the Rhineland, unless preceded or accompanied by major upheavals elsewhere, was suicidal and would deprive the movement of its base of operations on the Rhine. Yet, in anticipation of decisive news from Berlin, where a major ministerial and revolutionary crisis was expected, Cologne constructed barricades during the night of September 25-26. They were left standing without defenders when the wires from Berlin did not carry encouraging news.<sup>38</sup> The Prussian authorities nevertheless imposed martial law on Cologne for several days—the "rule of the saber." This involved a temporary suspension of the NRZ, ZAV, and several other newspapers. A second Democratic Congress in Cologne, scheduled to meet when the crisis came, never held any formal sessions. The popular rally that was to have taken place in Wesslingen about a week later was also canceled. The program in the countryside was interrupted.

During the same weeks of September Marx likewise had expected a revolutionary involvement of the peasantry when the populace in Frankfurt a.M. turned to rioting and the barricades. This had occurred when

<sup>36</sup> "Comité-Sitzung vom 21. September 1848," ZAV, Oct. 5, 1848. See also ZAV, Sept. 19; NRZ, Sept. 12. Even with the help of German scholars in the Rhineland I have been unable to locate "Wesslingen," which apparently lies to the south of Cologne. It has been suggested that "Wesseling" was meant, though the spelling "error," repeated several times, appears a little gross and unusual for the ZAV. Marx's NRZ (Sept. 12) called the locality "Wesselingen" instead of "Wesslingen."

<sup>37</sup> The German title was Neue Kölnische Zeitung. Für Bürger, Bauern und Soldaten. In the last number of the NRZ, May 19, 1849, Marx in a sense designated the NKZ as the heir of the NRZ. The former, accordingly, soon adopted the subtitle of the NRZ, "Organ der Demokratie."

<sup>38</sup> See Marx's account, "Die 'Kölnische Revolution,'" NRZ, Oct. 13, 1848.

the Frankfurt Parliament reluctantly sanctioned the Armistice of Malmö, which seemed to represent a Prussian betrayal of ardent German national claims to Schleswig-Holstein in favor of Denmark. When the conservative Prussian delegate, Prince Felix von Licknowsky, was torn to pieces by the "enraged mass" in Frankfurt, the NRZ gave credit to the peasants who had hurried to the city to do their part for this Lynch-justiz, as a "respectable expression of the popular will."<sup>39</sup>

The NRZ undoubtedly lapsed into some wishful reporting regarding the actual or destined role of the peasantry. News of peasant revolts (as had occurred early in 1848), in any event, might provide the signal for action among peasants who were already restive. The "honor of Germany" has been defended by workers and peasants from the area, the paper reported. Peasants from countless localities were hurrying to the aid of the barricade fighters in Frankfurt. The revolutionary mood in the Odenwald, Nassau, and Electoral Hesse would block the arrival of additional troops. If the revolt held its own for only a day, the entire surrounding countryside would be in arms; the soldiers would be too weak to suppress the movement. And who would swear by the peasants in the Rhineland, the NRZ asked rhetorically; the peasants easily could block the movement of troops (probably Prussian) on the Rhine.<sup>40</sup>

After reports from Frankfurt confirmed the failure of the insurrection the NRZ predicted that the revolt was not crushed. The "raging peasants" would not simply put down their arms. The storm that had gathered could be diverted against six to eight princely residences and hundreds of manors. The peasant war that had flared briefly earlier in 1848 was far from being finished.<sup>41</sup> There were only scattered and elusive reports to confirm this expectation.

The revolutionary insurrection in Vienna shortly thereafter produced similar "specters" of peasant involvement. The NRZ apparently assumed that the Austrian peasants, freed from Robot earlier in the revolution, would rush to defend their gains, lest they be rescinded if Vienna fell. So the paper reported that the country people were streaming in from all directions, even from distant Styria and Tyrol. Peasants from Upper Austria gave assurances that the countryside was ready to respond to a call from Vienna. At a late point in the game 156 Tyrolese sharpshooters, all "intrepid mountaineers," reportedly fought their way into the city to aid the besieged.<sup>42</sup> But whatever peasants arrived, or failed to appear because they did not get the "call," the Croat army of General Jellačić and the mixed units of Prince Windischgrätz successfully invested and stormed Vienna.

<sup>39</sup> "Beilage," ibid., Sept. 13, 1848. In subsequent days the paper offered a somewhat different account of the event.

<sup>40</sup> Ibid., Sept. 21, 1848.

<sup>41</sup> NRZ, Sept. 21, 1848.

<sup>42</sup> Ibid., Oct. 12, 14; "Zweite Ausgabe," ibid., Oct. 29, 1848.

During 1848 Marx also repeatedly turned to the question of the liberation of Prussian peasants from feudal burdens and prerogatives. This took the form of denunciations of the machinations of reactionary forces as well as of the liberal elements in the Prussian constituent assembly for failing to act decisively in dealing with agrarian questions.<sup>43</sup> When the Prussian king finally dissolved the assembly and granted his own constitution on December 5, 1848, Marx announced that the action of the king did not free the peasant without compensation. It was the duty of democratic and "rustic" societies to make this clear to the peasants in the Rhineland and Westphalia. If that were done soon, the counterrevolution would face a "phalanx."<sup>44</sup>

AS THE REACTION gained ground in 1848-49 without provoking a corresponding intensification of the revolutionary spirit, Marx repeatedly looked to Paris for another "crowing of the Gallic cock" to herald the dawn of a new and more radical round of revolutions. In this connection Marx expected the peasants in France, that vast majority which had rejected the revolution in the April elections of 1848 and again in the selection of Louis Napoleon as president of the Second Republic, to enter the picture in a positive sense. Marx's imagination was engaged by the revolutionary possibilities of the "billion" (the Milliarde, somewhat less than a billion francs) that had been paid in 1825 to the émigrés of the great French Revolution to compensate them for their lost properties. Since a billion was an almost astronomical figure in that age, a demand for the "return of the billion" was sufficiently lofty to become the rallying cry of a new revolution.

After first noting that the Parisian masses had demanded the repayment of the billion (plus three per cent interest since 1825) in the spring months of 1848, the NRZ commented favorably on the "precious tactic" adopted by the "Mountain," the leftist opposition to Louis Napoleon, when it sought to gain a peasant following by taking up the same cry. The call for the "repayment of the billion" represented a step on the tail of the "reactionary snake."<sup>45</sup>

On March 11 Marx wrote a leading article on "Die Milliarde" and its revolutionary impact on the peasants. Petitions demanding a repayment of the "billion," plus the interest, were drafted nearly everywhere in France and would soon adorn the walls in all communes, according to Marx. The subject had become the "flesh and blood" of the peasants, as they realized now that their formal ownership of land made them vassals of the capitalist. The "billion" was the first revolutionary measure that "hurled the peasants into the revolution." With this "dowry" the "democrats" would win the coming elections.<sup>46</sup>

<sup>43</sup> NRZ, June 25, July 30, Sept. 14, 1848, in Werke, 5: 106-07, 309-14, 402.

<sup>44</sup> NRZ, Dec. 17, 1848.

<sup>45</sup> Ibid., Feb. 14, 23, Mar. 6, 1849.

After recognizing the supposed revolutionary effect of the "billion" on the French peasants, Marx began the search for a "Prussian billion." To keep the figures within reasonably credible limits he always converted the Prussian Thaler (worth about four francs) into francs. Prussia also had her "robber barons" who now put on a "bourgeois" coat and were joining the "Society to Protect the Property of All Classes." Even the free landowning peasants in the Rhine Province were being threatened with a new scheme of taxation under which they would pay four or five times as much as would be collected in the eastern provinces.<sup>47</sup>

This was followed by another article, "Also a Billion," that concentrated on the Prussian province of Silesia, where the feudal nobility were then requesting compensation for the rights and benefits they had enjoyed hitherto at the expense of the agrarian population. The "little man" was to be robbed again! But the mood of the peasants had changed, as was evident in thousands of rural villages where peasants were starting to figure up how much they had been robbed during the preceding thirty years when the abolition of serfdom during the Prussian reform era had not been carried out conclusively. The NRZ, not surprisingly, asserted that a "billion" (francs, not Thaler) was in the picture. The next revolution would bring the "practical realization" of this sum.<sup>48</sup> Compensation to rectify the inequitable tax burden of many years was also involved. The peasants knew enough about "natural history" to know how to "bleed the bloodsuckers."<sup>49</sup>

A series of articles on the "Silesian Billion" (Die schlesische Milliarde), by Wilhelm Wolff (Lupus), apparently with some editorial emendations by Marx, appeared in the following issues. Wolff, the son of a Silesian serf, was in a position to add a few vivid details from his own personal recollections.<sup>50</sup> He gave a detailed account of the various forms of "robbery" perpetrated against the agrarian population, together with an estimate of the sums involved. The total exceeded a "billion." Other "billions" apparently could be certified also, because the situation in Silesia was typical of conditions everywhere in Prussia (except in the Rhine Province) and in Germany at large. The peasants had the right to demand a return of the "billions." But this would not happen under the existing governments. Only complete destruction of the established system would help. Mean-

<sup>46</sup> Marx, "Die Milliarde," NRZ, Mar. 16, 1849, in Werke, 6: 353-56.

<sup>47</sup> "Die Preussische Milliarde," NRZ, Mar. 17, 1849.

<sup>48</sup> "Auch eine Milliarde," ibid., Mar. 22, 1849.

<sup>49</sup> NRZ, Mar. 24, 1849.

<sup>50</sup> Wolff, a member of the recently dissolved Communist League, was on the editorial staff of the NRZ. Energetic and fearless, Wolff was an excellent disciple with enough intelligence to grasp the essential views and tactics of Marx without confusing the issue with mental reservations. Marx ultimately dedicated the first volume of Kapital to this resolute follower.

while the NRZ did not lose sight of the French "billion" and its expected revolutionary implications.<sup>51</sup>

The agitation involving the "billions" ultimately did not lead to marked revolutionary revival, either in France or in the German world. Reprints of the "Silesian Billion" apparently were distributed among the peasants, and the NRZ had the satisfaction of reporting that a Count Renard (who had been mentioned as one of the beneficiaries of the "robbery") indignantly informed the lower house of the Prussian Parliament that the "tale of the Silesian billion has affected the rural population of Silesia in an unhealthy manner."<sup>52</sup>

Simultaneously the NRZ noted that a petition (which would amass seventy thousand signatures) circulated by the agricultural proletariat in Mecklenburg was asking for a "safe and free existence." Hunger and bitterness were intense; guns and scythes were available in no small numbers. Although Prussian troops had entered the country the Junkers were in danger. A report from Silesia spoke of the formation of a society of farm workers. The report advised the "social-democrats" to intercede "in an active and inciting manner."<sup>53</sup>

The next, and last, revolutionary storm in 1849, however, did not open with an agrarian overture. The storm resulted from an outburst of German national frustration produced by Frederick William IV's rejection of the imperial crown of a liberal, united Germany offered by the popular Frankfurt Parliament. If agrarian distress and the lure of the "billion" played a role, it remained subsidiary. The May 1849 crisis led to the expulsion of Marx from Prussian soil. He left Germany behind within the next weeks and went to Paris, still hoping that an expected eruption in France would reverse the triumph of reaction and the return to order. As late as August 1849, just before he went to London, Marx still wrote hopefully of the anger that prevailed among French peasants.<sup>54</sup>

If Marx and Engels frequently groaned over the "stupidity" of the French as well as other peasants (the "barbarian race"), they never dismissed the peasants and the agrarian question as a significant factor in any revolutionary equation wherever the "barbarians" represented the majority. After the failures and disappointments of 1848-49, Engels wrote about the "Peasant War in Germany" in 1852, which reminded the Germans that they also had a revolutionary tradition.<sup>55</sup> Marx published "The Class Struggles in France," generally regarded as a classic example of the application of his theory of history to recent revolutionary events. Such critical examinations also served as guidelines for the future. Marx

<sup>51</sup> NRZ, Mar. 27, 29, Apr. 5, 12, 13, 14, 17, 22, 24, 25, 1849.

<sup>52</sup> "From Berlin, April 19," ibid., Apr. 22, 1849.

<sup>53</sup> "Aus Mecklenburg," "Aus Schlesien," ibid., Mar. 28, 1849.

<sup>54</sup> Marx to Engels, Aug. 17, 1849, in Briefwechsel, 1: 111-13.

<sup>55</sup> Engels, "Der deutsche Bauernkrieg," Revue, in Werke, 7: 329.

asserted that the French proletariat could not have moved forward until the mass of the nation, "the peasants and the petty bourgeoisie," rebelled against the "rule of capital," and, out of necessity, turned to the proletariat as their "advance guard," or leaders (Vorkämpfer).<sup>56</sup> France had approached that point in 1849 when a "significant part of the peasants and the provinces was revolutionized" in response to the promise of the "red party" ("the coalesced democratic party") that offered them the repayment of the "billion," the regulation of mortgages, and the abolition of usury. Only the fall of capitalism and the creation of an anticapitalist, a proletarian, government—"the social-democratic, the red republic, that is the dictatorship of [the peasant's] ally"—could end the "peasant's misery and social degradation."<sup>57</sup> Engels followed a similar line whenever he touched on the revolutionary potential of the German peasant and the agrarian question generally in his "German Imperial Constitutional Campaign" and the series of journalistic articles on the German revolution that appeared under Marx's name in an American newspaper.<sup>58</sup>

The tactical guidelines issued by the revived and again secret Communist League spoke of the nearness of another revolution and restated the need for ties with the agrarian population. The "Address of the Central Authority to the League, March, 1850" stressed the tactical exploitation of the supposed hopes and grievances of the agrarian proletariat, the farm workers. The communists would join forces with the petty-bourgeois democratic party that was destined to make the next revolution. That party was very powerful because it included most of the bourgeois city dwellers and counted on the help of the peasants as well as the "land proletariat, so long as the latter has not yet found a support among the independent proletariat of the cities." The revolution would lead to the creation of a democratic republic in which the democrats would exercise power "for a moment." They would try to call a halt to <sup>56</sup> Marx, "Die Klassenkämpfe in Frankreich 1848 bis 1850," in ibid., 21. In a later appraisal of French developments Marx again asserted that peasant and proletarian had one thing in common: both were dehumanized and exploited by the same capitalists. Because of their peculiar circumstances, however, the peasants represented no more than the "simple addition of equal quantities," like a "sack of potatoes." They were mere "troglodytes." "They therefore find their natural allies and leaders in the city proletariat, whose aim is the overthrow of the bourgeois order." "Der achtzehnte Brumaire des Louis Bonaparte," in ibid., 8: 198-202.

<sup>57</sup> Marx, "Klassenkämpfe," in ibid., 7: 83-84. Late in life Engels reaffirmed the correctness of Marx's theoretical and tactical position. If history proved they were wrong their miscalculation lay in their failure to see that the economic developments in 1848-49 were not yet ripe for the elimination of capitalist production. The latter had still possessed a capacity for vast expansion. Quite in line with their earlier views, Engels expressed the conviction that the German Social Democrats (the big "Marxian" party) would soon win the support of the greater part of the "middle stratum of society"—"the petty bourgeoisie as well as the peasants." See Engels, "Einleitung zu 'Die Klassenkämpfe in Frankreich 1848 bis 1850' (Ausgabe 1895)," in ibid., 516-17, 526.

<sup>58</sup> Engels, "Die deutsche Reichsverfassungskampagne," Revue, in ibid., 111-97. The newspaper articles appeared in the New York Herald Tribune between October 25, 1851, and October 23, 1852, and were published separately later under the title Germany: Revolution and Counter Revolution, originally under Marx's name.

the revolution, but the communists had to insist on making the "revolution permanent"; the communists had to promote added turmoils designed to force the democrats to carry out their "present terroristic phrases." The communists were to take a direct hand in perpetrating "excesses"—such as a "popular revenge against hated individuals and public buildings."

The first direct clash between workers and bourgeois democrats would involve the question of the abolition of feudalism.

As in the first French Revolution, the petty bourgeoisie will want to give the feudal lands to the peasants in the form of free property; that means preserving the land proletariat and the creation of a petty-bourgeois peasant class that will travel the same road toward impoverishment and indebtedness to which the French peasant is still committed.

This the workers had to prevent, in line with their own interests and with those of the land proletariat. Feudal lands were to become state property, to be converted into "agricultural colonies" cultivated by the "associated land proletariat."<sup>59</sup> If the emphasis in this case was on the land proletariat, the ensuing directive focused more on the peasant.

In a report on the situation in Germany, "The Address of the Central Authority to the League of June, 1850" noted the fact that league members had gained a direct influence over some peasant and farm worker societies, in some cases getting them completely in their hands. Similar societies elsewhere ("Saxon, Franconian, Hessian and in Nassau") were also mainly under the guidance of the league. The "Address" then stressed the value of gaining influence everywhere over worker, gymnastic (Turnverein), peasant, farm worker, and other organizations. The report directed league members to organize persons who were useful and reliable in a revolutionary sense but who had not yet grasped the "communist consequences of the present movement" as "second class" league members, to be led by the real Bund members. In this way they could exert a strong influence, especially over peasant and gymnastic societies.<sup>60</sup> In speculating on the chances of revolution following another economic crisis Marx wrote in 1856 that the "whole thing in Germany" depended on the possibility of backing the proletarian revolution "by some second edition of the Peasant's war." Then the matter would be superb.<sup>61</sup>

Marx and Engels thereafter never lost sight of the fact that the plight of the agrarian population might serve as the basis of an alliance between the proletariat and the peasant. If less was written on the subject it was because times were relatively unpropitious in an immediate revolutionary sense. During such periods Marx and Engels concentrated more on theory and the preparation of "thick books" as their only "resource."<sup>62</sup>

<sup>59</sup> Marx and Engels, "Ansprache der Zentralbehörde an den Bund vom März 1850," in Werke, 7: 244-54.

<sup>60</sup> Marx and Engels, "Ansprache der Zentralbehörde an den Bund vom Juni 1850," in ibid., 306-12.

<sup>61</sup> Marx to Engels, Apr. 16, 1856, in Briefwechsel, 2: 131-32. The quoted phrases were written thus in English. After he learned English Marx frequently used English words, phrases, and occasionally sentences in letters otherwise written in his native German.

Interest in tactical ties between the proletariat and the agrarian population nevertheless persisted to the end. Engels, with Marx's encouragement, published new editions of his "German Peasant War" that appeared in 1870 and 1875. In a new introduction Engels stated that the workers in Germany still fell far short of a majority and therefore needed allies. He dismissed the petty bourgeoisie as highly unreliable and denounced the Lumpenproletariat as being utterly impossible. The peasant, agrarian masses, in contrast, offered the best hope. Tenant farmers (Pächter) could expect salvation only from workers in the form of lower rents. As for the small peasant, he could find relief from the burden of the mortgage and the usurer solely from the proletariat. The most numerous and natural ally of the proletariat was the agricultural day laborer who existed in vast numbers in all of north and east Germany where large estates prevailed. The most urgent task of German workers was to pull these agrarian classes into the "movement." Engels then called attention to the decisions of the Basel Congress of the International Workingmen's Association (IWA) in 1869. It had decreed that the soil was to become "collective national property." So as not to alarm the small peasants, perhaps, Engels explained that this formula was designed primarily for areas where large landownership predominated, as it did in much of Germany and England.<sup>63</sup>

Marx privately informed Engels that the decision of the Basel Congress had been inspired by the General Council of the IWA in London, a body in which Marx's influence was pronounced. The council had suggested the creation of a "Land and Labor League," whereby the "worker party" would sever all ties with the bourgeoisie. Engels replied that the decision had "worked wonders."

<sup>62</sup> The expressions were used by Engels. See Engels to Marx, Feb. 13, 1851, in ibid., 1: 150. Marx's concentration on the "thick books" of Kapital in the 1850s and 1860s illustrates the point. Since such "critiques" emphasized theory and historical analysis Kapital said little on current tactics, or even tactics in general. It speaks of modern industry annihilating the independent peasant and replacing him with wage labor, thereby engendering the same class antagonisms and desires for social change found in the cities. The farm laborer was similarly enslaved, exploited, and impoverished but possessed a lesser capacity for resistance because of his dispersed situation. Capitalism thereby prepared the way for the "higher synthesis of the future," a union of "agriculture and industry." (Capital. A Critique of Political Economy [Modern Library ed.; New York, n.d.] 554-55, 654.) Marx noted that rural violence in England, with its "swing riots," came to the surface almost concurrently with the widely noted uprising in Lyons early in the 1830s (pp. 653-54, 742). Kapital touches on such diverse items as the operations of the corvée in the Danubian principalities (p. 260), the thirteen-to-fourteen-hour day among Scotland's agricultural workers (p. 278), the status of agricultural "gangs" (pp. 435-36), the degradation of the peasant into a "serf" (p. 745), and the "swamp of pauperism" in which one foot of the farm worker was stuck (p. 705).

<sup>63</sup> Engels, "Vorbemerkung zu 'Der deutsche Bauernkrieg' (Ausg. 1870 u. 1875)," in Werke, 7: 535-37, 542.

People forget that, aside from the large estates, there are various types of peasants: (1) the tenant farmer who does not care whether the soil belongs to the state or to the large property owner; (2) the private owner—first, the large peasant against whose reactionary existence it is possible to incite the day laborers and hired hands; second, the medium peasant who will also be reactionary and who is not very numerous; and third, the debt-ridden small peasant who can be reached through the mortgage. Moreover, one can say that the proletariat for the time being is not interested in questioning the right of small landownership.<sup>64</sup>

With this approach Marx and Engels apparently felt that the support of the majority of the rural population could be enlisted even in relatively normal times. They always believed that most could be accomplished within the context of an economic crisis or when the nation was subjected to extraordinary strains, as in time of war.

Late in Engels's life, when many socialist or social-democratic parties with a "Marxian tendency" suddenly and everywhere turned to the countryside, Engels again stated his conviction that "in order to conquer political power, the party first must go from the city to the land [that the party] has to become a power in rural areas."<sup>65</sup> In line with the Marxian view Engels declared that the "development of capitalism irredeemably destroys the landownership of the small peasant."<sup>66</sup> It was the duty of the party to persuade the peasant of this fact. To reassure the peasants Engels stated, "We can only promise that we will not forcibly interfere with the property relationship against their will." Everything "permissible" would be done to make the transition to an "association" (Genossenschaft) easier for the peasant. It would not be desirable to wait until "capitalist developments everywhere arrived at their final consequences, until the last craftsman and the last small peasant became the victim of capitalistic exploitation on a large scale."<sup>67</sup> In contrast to the outlook for the small peasants it was possible to offer the land proletariat prospects as bright as those that "beckoned to the industrial worker." Opportunities along this line were excellent in the eastern Prussian areas (ostelbische). That was the "decisive field of battle"; a victory there would mean the end of Junker rule. Looking at Europe as a whole Engels declared, "From Ireland to Sicily, from Andalusia to Russia and Bulgaria the peasant is a very substantial factor of the population, of production and of political power."<sup>68</sup>

<sup>64</sup> Marx to Engels, Oct. 30, Engels to Marx, Nov. 1, 1869, in Briefwechsel, 4: 232, 233.

<sup>65</sup> Engels, "Die Bauernfrage in Frankreich und Deutschland," in Werke, 22: 485-86. This article, originally published in two numbers of Die Neue Zeit, 1 (1894-95), was translated into Russian in 1903 by Lenin.

<sup>66</sup> "Brief an die Redaktion des 'Vorwärts,'" Nov. 12, 1894, in Werke, 22: 480.

<sup>67</sup> "Bauernfrage," 501. See also Engels, "Zur Kritik des sozialdemokratischen Programmentwurfs, 1891," in ibid., 24, where Engels stated that the petty bourgeoisie and the small peasants had no choice but to stand by their "exploiters" or to join the ranks of the workers.

<sup>68</sup> "Bauernfrage," 501.

With reference to Italy Marx early pointed to the agrarian population as a significant force to be enrolled in the battle of national liberation from Austrian rule—an important consideration because Austria, as a bastion of the old order, opposed the course of revolution everywhere. He denounced Mazzini's policy as being fundamentally wrong because it neglected the peasants, for many centuries the "oppressed portion of Italy." The country population there was as "systematically enervated and stupified" as that of Ireland.<sup>69</sup> It took courage to declare that the first step toward Italian independence demanded the "complete emancipation of the peasants and the conversion of their métayer system [Halbpachtssysteme] into free bourgeois property."<sup>70</sup> Years later, after Italy was independent and already had a Marxian party, Engels advised the Italian Marxist Filippo Turati that the "Socialist party" in Italy was too young and weak to gain an "immediate victory." It had to turn to the petty bourgeoisie, a class that faced ruin and that would supply the fighters and leaders for a revolutionary movement. The peasantry would follow them, as "strong and indispensable allies." It was the duty of the Socialists to regard "every revolutionary or progressive movement as a step further in the attainment of their own end." "The victory of the revolutionary movement . . . cannot but strengthen us and place us under more favorable conditions."<sup>71</sup>

<sup>69</sup> The Marx-Engels position in the Irish question requires a special treatise. In general, Marx, through the IWA and otherwise, supported the cause of Irish emancipation as a vital step toward the proletarian triumph of the English worker himself. The English "agricultural oligarchy" as long as it held its "entrenched outpost" in Ireland remained unassailable in England proper. It was easier to attack in Ireland because the issue there was not merely economic but also "national." (Marx to Ludwig Kugelmann, Mar. 28, 1870, in Letters to Kugelmann [New York, 1934], 107.) Since the competition of cheap Irish labor in England also depressed the status of the English worker and created divisions in the ranks of labor, the liberation of Ireland would help to unite the English workers against their real foes. (Marx to Meyer and Vogt, Apr. 9, 1870, in Correspondence, 288-90.) Engels, after a trip to Ireland, however, found that the Irish became corruptible as soon as they ceased to be peasants and joined the bourgeoisie—this was the case with most peasant nations, but it was especially true of the Irish. The literary representatives of the Irish peasants were thoroughly bourgeois. As a result the Irish regarded the worker movement as "sheer heresy." The Irish peasant was not permitted to know that the "socialist worker" was his "only ally in Europe." (Engels to Marx, Sept. 27, Dec. 4, 1869, in Briefwechsel, 4: 228, 254.)

<sup>70</sup> Marx to Engels, Sept. 13, 1851, in Briefwechsel, 1: 259-60; Marx to Joseph Weydemeyer, Sept. 11, 1851, in Correspondence, 45. The editorial note in the latter (p. 46) incorrectly speaks of "Georg" Weydemeyer.

<sup>71</sup> Engels to Turati, Jan. 26, 1894, in Correspondence, 520-22. Marx in the IWA similarly pointed out that workers in different lands had not reached the same degree of development. Hence the "real movement" also expressed itself in differing "theoretical forms" until it ultimately arrived at a "common theoretical program." (Marx to Engels, Mar. 5, 1869, in Briefwechsel, 4: 164.) In speaking of different "theoretical forms" here, did Marx set a precedent for later followers who presented temporary tactical programs as theoretically binding? Engels, with reference to party tactics in America, stated that it was "far more important that the movement should spread" than to "start and proceed from the beginning on theoretically correct lines." Their theory was not a "dogma but the exposition of a process of evolution, and the process involves successive phases." (Engels to Florence Kelley Wischniewsky, Dec. 28, 1886, in Correspondence, 453.)

THE ATTITUDE OF Marx and Engels toward the Eastern, largely agrarian areas of Europe demands brief but special consideration. Since revolutions in general acted as the "locomotives of history" Marx and Engels also early identified themselves with the cause of agrarian discontent in the overwhelmingly agricultural lands, notably in Poland but gradually in Russia, too. When a struggle for national liberation at the cost of "reactionary" states seemed to call for tapping the revolutionary potential in agrarian discontent, Marx and Engels advocated the cause of agrarian democracy. The liberation of Poland, aside from its direct and local revolutionary benefits, was a necessity also for Germany and the West. The creation of a free Poland would push the frontiers of Russia eastward, eliminating her reactionary pressure on Germany and her capacity to intervene against revolutions everywhere. In 1848-49 and on other occasions Marx and Engels regarded a war against Russia to liberate Poland a revolutionary necessity for Germany. Such a gigantic undertaking would increase domestic strains and would reveal the incompetence and treachery of existing governments and dynasties, thereby hastening a revolutionary drift to the left. A war of such colossal proportions, as Marx and Engels repeatedly stated, could only be conducted and won along revolutionary lines.

The big agricultural lands between the Baltic and the Black Seas, according to Engels, could achieve independence and escape "patriarchal-feudal barbarism" only through an agrarian revolution that transformed the peasants into free landowners. The fight for the national liberation of Poland coincided with the "struggle for agrarian democracy." "The merit of the Poles lay in the fact that they first recognized and announced that the liberation of all Slavic nations could be achieved only through agrarian democracy."<sup>72</sup> Aside from identifying themselves with the cause of Polish agrarian democracy Marx and Engels never indicated what specific role the communists, if any were present, would play in the liberation of such nations via "agrarian democracy." But one can assume that they would not have remained mere spectators. Marx and Engels always insisted that the peasants lacked the ability to assume the revolutionary initiative and would have to look to the proletariat, or possibly the petty bourgeoisie, once Polish peasants gained the freedom French peasants enjoyed, a freedom that subjected them to exploitation by the usurer and by capital in general. In any event, revolutions were likely to progress on an "ascending scale," as the great French Revolution had demonstrated.

Engels developed some doubts regarding the revolutionary utility of the cause of Poland during the next years. The more he studied history, the more it became clear to him that the Poles were a "finished nation," to be used as a "means" only so long as Russia was not projected into an "agrarian revolution." From that moment on, Poland had "absolutely no reasons to exist any longer." Marx, however, displayed a wider perspective. The study of history caused him to come out "decisively direct" in favor of Poland. It was a historic fact, Marx wrote, that the "intensity and the capacity to survive of all revolutions" could be measured quite accurately by their attitude toward Poland. Poland was their "external thermometer."<sup>73</sup> He and Engels, accordingly, greeted the Polish uprising of 1863 with subdued optimism, as an event that might have repercussions in Russia proper.<sup>74</sup>

<sup>72</sup> "Die Polendebatte in Frankfurt," NRZ, Aug. 31, Sept. 3, 1848, in Werke, 5: 333, 357.

Marx and Engels, according to the Briefwechsel and other sources, did not neglect the revolutionary possibilities, agrarian and otherwise, in Russia. In expectation of a new revolution in Germany in 1851 Engels stated that the overall European picture would remain bleak unless a peasant revolution occurred in Russia.<sup>75</sup> By 1858 Marx found comfort in the assumption that in Russia "the revolution has started"; the Crimean War had hastened this turn of events.<sup>76</sup> In the next year the "movement" continued to progress more in Russia than in all of Europe. The nobility was turning against the tsar; peasants were opposed to the nobility; the Poles refused to be Russian. In the next revolution Russia would "obligingly revolutionize" in concert with the rest of Europe. Alexander II had "spoiled" his chances with the peasants, with the result that the "social" movement was being inaugurated both in the East and the West.<sup>77</sup>

Marx thereafter experienced a somewhat ironic pleasure in knowing that the early Russian translation of his Kapital enjoyed a wider sale than the original German edition had. A variety of considerations in the 1870s caused Marx to concentrate increasingly on studies of the Russian language and Russian affairs, to the point where he professed a familiarity with many of the native sources. So in 1876 when Marx, as he so often did, asked his partner to assume a major burden, Engels complained somewhat whimsically, "You can lie in a warm bed, study Russian agrarian questions in particular and ground-rent in general and nothing interrupts you."<sup>78</sup> Russia's experience with temporary military reverses at the hands of the Turks in 1877 was seen by Marx as a "new turning point" in <sup>73</sup> Engels to Marx, May 23, 1851; Marx to Engels, Dec. 2, 1856, in Briefwechsel, 1: 157, 204-08. Marx and Engels made a point of participating in most Polish happenings—such as anniversaries of the 1830 and 1846 (Cracow) revolts as well as Polish rallies in general. This served as a common ground on which various democratic, radical, liberal, and even conservative elements could meet.

<sup>74</sup> Marx to Engels, Feb. 13, Engels to Marx, Feb. 17, 1863, in ibid., 3: 126-27, 128-29.

<sup>75</sup> Engels to Marx, May 23, 1851, in ibid., 2: 204-05.

<sup>76</sup> Marx to Engels, Oct. 8, 1858, in ibid., 2: 341-43. Marx, with perhaps the French Revolutionary parallel in mind, stated that he regarded the assembling of the "Notables" in St. Petersburg as signaling the start. On the Continent revolution was "imminent" and would assume at once a socialist character.

<sup>77</sup> Marx to Engels, Dec. 13, 1859, Jan. 11, 1860, in ibid., 2: 448-49, 452-53.

<sup>78</sup> Engels to Marx, May 28, 1876, in ibid., 4: 436-38.

European history. Russia was on the eve of an "upheaval." "All sections of Russian society are in complete disintegration economically, morally and intellectually," Marx asserted. "This time the revolution will begin in the East, hitherto the unbroken bulwark and reserve army of counter-revolution."<sup>79</sup>

In view of the revolutionary prospects in Russia Marx appeared reluctant to discourage certain otherwise sympathetic Russian ideologists who hoped that the Russians might find a different "path of development," growing out of a transformation of the "village commune" into a more advanced form and thereby escaping the tortures of the customary capitalist developments. Marx here declared "straight to the point" that his "historical sketch of the genesis of capitalism in Western Europe" need not have universal application. He cited an example from Roman history to illustrate the point. But he then concluded that, if Russia proceeded along existing capitalist lines, she would "experience its pitiless laws like other profane peoples."<sup>80</sup> As in parts of the Manifesto, which also was professedly outspoken, Marx appears to evade the essential question. In a preface to the Russian edition of the Communist Manifesto of 1882 he added, "If the Russian revolution becomes the signal for the workers' revolution in the West, so that the one supplements the other, then the present form of land-ownership in Russia may be the starting point of a historical development."<sup>81</sup> The statement is guarded with an "if" and a "may."

After Marx's death Engels was a little more explicit. He was pleased to find that there was a "party among the youth of Russia that frankly and without ambiguity accepts the great economic and historic theories of Marx." While professing a limited knowledge of Russian affairs Engels stated that the revolution "may break out there any day." The "historic theory of Marx" was the "fundamental condition of all reasoned and consistent revolutionary tactics; to discover these tactics one has only to apply the theory to the economic and political conditions of the country in question." Russia was a "charged mine" that needed only a "fuse to be laid to it." It did not matter how the revolution started or who lit the fuse. In a country "where all these contradictions are violently held together by an unexampled despotism . . . there, when 1789 has once been launched, 1793 will not be long in following."<sup>82</sup> The agrarian question was one of the sources of such contradictions.

<sup>79</sup> Marx to Sorge, Sept. 27, 1877, in Correspondence, 348-49.

<sup>80</sup> Marx to the editor of the Otycestvenniye Zapiski, end of 1877, in ibid., 552-55.

<sup>81</sup> Quoted in Correspondence, 355n.; see also Werke, 4: 576. A few years later, in taking note of other special developments in Russia, Marx wrote that the introduction of railroads in countries with limited capitalist developments "accelerated the social and political disintegration," by the creation of a "capitalistic superstructure in dimensions altogether disproportionate to the bulk of the social body, carrying on the great work of production in traditional modes." Marx to Danielson, Apr. 10, 1879, in Correspondence, 359. As noted earlier in other connections, Marx here again asserts that the pangs of the Industrial Revolution were experienced more acutely in the less advanced states.

In 1893 Engels returned to the question of whether the "Russian commune might not be the starting point of a new social development." Had the West been able to upset the "capitalistic régime some ten or twenty years ago," he asserted, "there might have been time yet for Russia to cut short the tendency of her own evolution toward capitalism." As it was, Russia, "being the last country seized upon by the capitalist grande industrie, and at the same time the country with by far the largest peasant population," she experienced the acute "bouleversement caused by this economic change." Meanwhile the commune was fading away. In a later letter to Danielson, Engels added,

No more in Russia than anywhere else would it have been possible to develop a higher social form out of primitive agrarian communism unless—that higher form was already in existence in another country, so as to serve as a model. That higher form being, wherever it is historically possible, the necessary consequence of the capitalistic form of production and of the social dualistic antagonism created by it, it could not be developed directly out of the agrarian commune, unless in imitation of an example already in existence somewhere else.<sup>83</sup>

That may have been the more explicit expression of Marx's own position.

THE LIVES AND DEEDS of Marx and Engels indicate that they were not unduly hobbled by the apparent implications of their own theories that stressed the revolutionary role of the advanced industrial states. Marx and Engels were generally ready to side with any groups against an existing government. In predominantly agricultural countries this meant an appeal to the rural masses. As champions of democracy, that broad, popular aspiration that sought salvation in the rule of the people, Marx and Engels were confident that the communists who represented the proletariat and comprehended the laws of historical development would capture the initiative in any such democratic front. That possibly was enhanced by the characteristics with which Marx and Engels endowed their followers—energy, decisiveness, a readiness to make tactical adjustments to the requirements of the hour, and a certain "communist pride of infallibility" (Kommunistenstolz der Unfehlbarkeit) that Marx once ascribed to the communists.<sup>84</sup>

The question of whether Lenin operated along truly Marxian lines in 1917 cannot be answered solely on the basis of an appeal to theory.

<sup>82</sup> Engels to Vera Zasulich, Apr. 23, 1885, in Correspondence, 436-38.

<sup>83</sup> Engels to Danielson, Feb. 24, Oct. 17, 1893, in ibid., 508-10, 515.

<sup>84</sup> See Marx to Engels, Aug. 25, 1851, in Briefwechsel, 1: 244-51.

One must take into account the actions, tactics, and expectations of Marx and Engels in reasonably comparable circumstances. If Lenin appealed to the broad rural masses he certainly did not noticeably deviate from the tactics repeatedly advocated by the master.

As for the position of Russia in 1917, Was the latter so much more retarded industrially than the Germany of 1848 where Marx and Engels had expected an early communist triumph? Was Russia not also affected by the special miseries that afflicted a backward country because of the competition of the industrially advanced states and the belated arrival of capitalist developments? Did the Russians not experience the suffering, confusion, demoralization, and decline of confidence in the ruling classes that accompany a protracted, disappointing war—all major considerations that Marx and Engels counted on, as when they advocated war in 1848–49 or when they speculated on the revolutionary consequences of war on other occasions? Did the revolution in Russia not occur in a “more advanced stage of civilization” than was the case with earlier revolutions? The Russians perhaps also possessed “minds” with a greater capacity for “generalizing.”

It appears, then, that if he had neglected to see the opportunity to act and if he had not acted as he had—with energy, decision, and a total disregard of “boring scruples”—Lenin would have failed Marx. Perhaps the same can be said for communist leaders in other lands (like China) where the purely “theoretical” circumstances favoring a communist seizure of power were even less auspicious. Marx and Engels, of course, at no point exactly advocated the distribution of land to the peasants, as Lenin did in 1917. But in certain revolutionary situations, as when they supported national liberation movements against undesirable governments (notably in Poland but also in Ireland and to a certain extent in Italy), they advocated an “agrarian democracy” that apparently was based on the acquisition of the land by the peasants. In Germany Marx and Engels were ready to give assurances to the small peasants that the revolution would not lead to the liquidation of small private ownership. The gap that separated them from Lenin’s tactics in 1917 was not too formidable. Since Marx and Engels continually stressed the importance of getting a revolution started and the need to consolidate a revolutionary position, it might even be presumptuous to assume that, given the same historical circumstances, they would have hesitated to take the step that Lenin took. They certainly always paid tribute to the virtue of “audacity.”

---

Parliament and Society in Early Stuart England: The Legacy of Wallace Notestein

---

. A Review Article by THEODORE K. RABB

WALLACE NOTESTEIN. The House of Commons 1604-1610. New Haven: Yale University Press. 1971. Pp. xiii, 598. $18.50.

ROBERT ZALLER. The Parliament of 1621: A Study in Constitutional Conflict. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1971. Pp. xi, 242. $9.00.

ROBERT E. RUIGH. The Parliament of 1624: Politics and Foreign Policy. (Harvard Historical Studies, vol. 87.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1971. Pp. x, 434. $15.00.

ALMOST FIFTY YEARS have passed since the publication of The Winning of the Initiative by the House of Commons, the famous essay by Wallace Notestein that opened a new era in studies of parliament before the Civil War.<sup>1</sup> More than twenty years elapsed before much further progress was made, but in the last two decades the monographs have begun to appear that have made the century from 1560 to 1660 the most thoroughly studied in the history of any representative assembly. This outburst of scholarship has, of course, been fueled by interest in the English Civil War, one of whose sides coalesced around parliament. But the immediate inspiration has clearly come from the two pioneers in the field, Notestein and Sir John Neale. They and their students have ransacked archives public and private to extract the last ounce of information about nearly two dozen sessions of the Commons (thirteen under Elizabeth I and nine under James I), and their followers have delved equally deeply into the further assemblies of Charles I and the Interregnum. Both Notestein and Neale, blessed with long life, have lived to see their efforts bear manifold fruit, and now the appearance of Notestein's last work, published posthumously, suggests that it may be time to review the accomplishments of at least the Stuart half of this mountain of scholarship.<sup>2</sup>

From one perspective the importance and uniqueness of developments in the House of Commons during the early seventeenth century have never been so widely appreciated. The studies sponsored by the International Commission for the History of Representative and Parliamentary Institutions in the last few years have only served to underline the pathbreaking achievements of the few hundred parliamentarians who created the first effective government centered around an elected assembly. And yet within recent Tudor-Stuart historiography this all seems to be taken for granted and attention is focused elsewhere. A century ago S. R. Gardiner, writing the ten-volume work that has remained the standard political history of the years 1603-42, saw the conflict between king and Commons as the essential encounter that gave shape to the period.<sup>3</sup> Gardiner built his narrative around parliamentary sessions and presented the Civil War as the result of the irreconcilable claims of an arrogant monarch and his ambitious subjects. It was within this framework that Notestein wrote his essay on the winning of the initiative. But in the last twenty years or so the gentry controversy has upstaged Parliament, which now appears as no more than the instrument of much more powerful forces.

<sup>1</sup> Wallace Notestein, The Winning of the Initiative by the House of Commons (London, 1924).

<sup>2</sup> The chief works of the two pioneers are J. E. Neale's The Elizabethan House of Commons (London, 1949) and Elizabeth and Her Parliaments (London, 1953, 1957), and the edition by Notestein, Frances Relf, and Hartley Simpson of Common Debates 1621 (New Haven, 1935).

When Lawrence Stone recently summed up the causes of the English Revolution he placed his emphasis on three elements—the Crown's failure to gain an army or a bureaucracy; the relative rise of the gentry in wealth, status, education, administrative experience, group identity, "and also [in terms] of political self-confidence in the House of Commons"; and the spread of Puritanism.<sup>4</sup> Although Parliament appears low in these rankings, few contemporary Stuart historians would argue with Stone's assessment. Yet perhaps this shift only signifies that we are unable to link ostensible and underlying causes. The appearance of these three books provides a good opportunity to re-examine some of the issues and to place Notestein's legacy in the context of current studies of Stuart England.

THE CENTRAL PROBLEM is the extent to which the stated objectives of historical actors are regarded as sufficient indicators of their motives. Bernard Bailyn has recently stimulated a major re-examination of the American Revolution by suggesting that Locke really did matter to the colonists, that ideological disagreements did impel sober citizens to take up arms. Is a similar reassessment due for seventeenth-century England?

The differences between the two cases are vast, especially since the English of Stuart times had neither theory nor philosophy to guide them. There was no Locke, no Bill of Rights, not even (and this was a major problem) an accepted definition of royal prerogative or the privileges of subjects. In that sense, therefore, one can hardly speak of ideological origins of the English Civil War. Nonetheless there was undeniably constant recourse to abstract notions of justice, equity, and right. Above all there was a very powerful consciousness of the supremacy of law; and in the revival of Magna Carta—however distorted and misapplied—there was an attempt to set a standard against which political acts could be measured. The question is: how much weight can one give such arguments? Were they genuinely believed, or were they merely cloaks, possibly unconscious, for the assertion of more material aims?

<sup>3</sup> S. R. Gardiner, History of England from the Accession of James I to the Outbreak of Civil War, 1603-1642 (London, 1883-84).

<sup>4</sup> Lawrence Stone, "The English Revolution," in Robert Forster and Jack P. Greene, eds., Preconditions of Revolution in Early Modern Europe (Baltimore, 1970), 55-108, especially 96.

The three books under consideration come down quite decisively on the side of the parliamentarians' sincerity. "A moderate given neither to overstatement nor to enthusiasm," who "had a knack for drawing men along with him in a common pursuit of reason and of English liberty" is the way Notestein sums up the personality and aims of Sir Edwin Sandys, the most prominent exponent of opposition to the Crown from 1604 to 1621. Neither Zaller nor Ruigh would seem to disagree—in Zaller's eyes Sandys exercised "good sense and moderation," and to Ruigh he was one of the moderates.<sup>5</sup> Even Coke, bitter, vengeful, and belligerent though he was, emerges as a devoted adherent of "the reign of the common law," a pursuit that "redeemed an often sordid career." It is perhaps an exaggeration to regard him in 1621 as setting out "to rectify what he considered a dangerous imbalance in the constitution"—hardly a concept Coke would have understood—but it would be difficult to deny that he "always sought . . . to create a bulwark that could protect the subject and his precious legal rights from the inroads of government."<sup>6</sup>

Moderation and legalism are scarcely the terms by which one expects the forerunners of revolutionaries to be described. Rousseau, the social critics of the nineteenth century, even Locke never evoke such restrained epithets. True, the moderation was sometimes abandoned, but only over narrow issues—the punishment of Edward Floyd, who had libeled the king's daughter, occasioned by far the most angry and hysterical outburst in the Commons during James I's reign. And as one reads the debates one becomes convinced that the arguments and proposals that were aired represented exactly the concerns of these serious and determined country gentlemen. Their hearts were on their sleeves, their worries were laid bare, and yet one finds no hint of revolutionary rhetoric.

What was it, then, that stirred the M.P.'s? In the 1604–11 sessions, according to Notestein, there were three basic issues. In descending order of importance they were: those royal prerogatives, such as wardship and purveyance, which were sources of revenue for the king; the union with Scotland; and the regulation of foreign trade. In 1621, as Zaller points out, the problems shifted: to the conduct of foreign policy and of royal ministers, to religion, and to the trade depression. Finally, in 1624, Ruigh sees foreign policy and, once again, ministerial behavior as the only matters of major concern, though it could be argued that this is to miss the considerable significance of the Monopolies Act, which, remarkably enough, is not once mentioned in the book.

<sup>5</sup> Notestein, Commons 1604–1610, 7; Zaller, Parliament of 1621, 48; Ruigh, Parliament of 1624, 244.

<sup>6</sup> Zaller, Parliament of 1621, 53, 52.

The problems that the Jacobean Parliaments struggled with thus centered on the royal government's activities—its financial devices, its foreign policy, the actions of its servants. Religion and trade were recurrent and important, but clearly subsidiary issues. And the standards used for judgment were always custom and law. As Notestein observes, "those who would maintain the rights of Parliament found it prudent to go back and recall the fourteenth century."<sup>7</sup> Although it is true that a conscientious interpretation of the precedents would only have reinforced the king's rights, in one vital regard these gentry were right. For what they wanted was a return to that system of centrifugal authority which, in previous ages, had sustained their power and kept them immune from the interference of a distant central government. That invulnerability was fast crumbling in the face of exactions like wardship and purveyance, of Privy Council interventionism, and of the spreading tentacles of royal courts. Behind the attacks on specific grievances always lay the fundamental worry that the government was becoming too powerful, that it was moving into areas outside its proper sphere, that individual rights and property were threatened, and that the servants of the Crown were acting in haughty indifference to tradition.

The only defense, so it seemed, was an independent parliament, and thus the M.P.'s fought for their privileges with unyielding determination. It was only because they got their way on perhaps the most fundamental right of all, freedom of speech, that the 1624 session became, in the phrase Ruigh quotes, a "Parlementum Foelix." This is why the battles over seeming trivia were in fact so crucial to the Commons. If they failed, who would protect the ordinary property owner? Certainly not the courts—they had proved all too fragile. The privileges and independence of Parliament thus came to be synonymous with the independence of all Englishmen in their localities against the encroachments of royal power. Of the three authors, Notestein, the master, perceives this connection best, and he emphasizes the development of new procedures such as the Committee of the Whole House and the changing role of the Speaker as the means whereby the M.P.'s fortified themselves against the Crown. Yet it was in 1621 that the decisive breakthrough came, with the revival of the power of impeachment. Zaller rightly stresses the importance of the proceedings against Francis Bacon, but he does not seem to appreciate fully that now the Commons grasped a weapon more dangerous than the one used hitherto, the withholding of taxes. This doubling of their armory changed the parliamentarians' relationship with the Crown decisively, and both Cranfield and Charles I were later to regret bitterly their encouragement of the Commons in 1621 and 1624 for immediate ends.<sup>8</sup> Ruigh sees that the winning of the right to discuss foreign policy was a vital advance for the subject, but he, too, fails to set the events of the Parliament of 1624 into their long-term context.

<sup>7</sup> Notestein, Commons 1604-1610, 391.

It is at this point that one must return to the basic question: what did these lengthy and often tedious debates have to do with revolution? Few historians study the first half of the seventeenth century without looking ahead to the 1640s; and yet here, in the institution that became the arena for civil war, the future is played down almost into nonexistence. Only when the Puritans come on the scene—usually in support of ambitious but abortive schemes for reform—does one get a sense of a real threat to the established order. Nobody but a Puritan could have made so ominous and enthusiastic a demand as that contained in a manuscript quoted by Notestein, in which M. P.'s were asked to be ready "in behalf of the freedom of the gospel to hazard their estates rather than leave their posterity to perpetual thralldom."<sup>9</sup> This is the stuff of which revolutionaries are made, but somehow the Puritans remain in uncomfortable relationship with the other members of the Commons. What emerges are two distinct sets of aims, held by different members of Parliament. Both groups resisted the king, but the more numerous and visible of the two was essentially conservative, thus creating the paradox that lies at the heart of the problem of linking parliamentary history with the Civil War.

On the one hand stand the gentry, wedded to legalism and moderation, anxious to hold back the incursions of central authority. Alongside them, and mixed in with them, are the Puritans, determined to refashion society. In all three of these books—indeed in all three of the Parliaments—the chief actors are the gentry, and the Puritans are little more than peripheral. Is this, perhaps, why so little hint of the 1640s appears? Partly, but the problem goes much deeper. For after all, a huge amount of research has been devoted in recent years to the gentry, primarily with the object of explaining why this conservative class, at the head of a deferential society, launched a revolution. Social, economic, and intellectual analysis has been devoted to just this end, and yet somehow these studies and the studies of Parliament seem to pass each other like ships in a fog—beyond an occasional booming echo, there is no attempt to offer mutual assistance. Since the social history is currently far more common it is not difficult to see how the impression arises these days that

<sup>8</sup> Zaller, Parliament of 1621, 24; Ruigh, Parliament of 1624, 343–44.

<sup>9</sup> Notestein, Commons 1604–1610, 41.

English historians are slighting events in Parliament when they try to explain the Civil War.<sup>10</sup>

This difficulty partakes of a much larger problem, and one that faces historians in all fields—how to connect the growing body of research into social history with the extensive long-standing findings of political history. One body of pioneers in social history, the Sixth Section of the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes in Paris, evades the issue by ignoring political history. But in studies of seventeenth-century England the dilemma is nakedly before us. One set of historians clings to the view of the revolution as a political struggle of independent-minded or Puritan gentry versus an arbitrary or overambitious king; the other group stresses the rise of the gentry as a class that had come to terms with changing conditions in the economy, the social structure, land use, and so on, and now made its lunge for political power. The two views are not incompatible, but they have never really merged. As one surveys the field, though, and sees the superb works on both sides of this divide, one must conclude that, if political and social forces are ever to be blended, here is where historians have a golden—perhaps their best—opportunity. The research has been so saturating, the intelligence applied to the many problems so acute, and the striving for synthesis so manifest, especially in recent years, that surely the links must soon begin to appear. Moreover, as the last few paragraphs indicate, some of the links are already implicit in the literature.

ON THE SIDE of parliamentary studies the materials are now almost too abundant—a testimony to the breadth of Notestein's inspiration. The publication of these three books means that there is a volume devoted to every single Parliament of James I's reign.<sup>11</sup> The work of J. N. Ball, Conrad Russell, and Christopher Thompson will be adding to our knowledge of the 1620s in the next few years;<sup>12</sup> and the Long Parliament, already amply investigated, is enjoying a new spate of research. When the Yale Parliamentary Diary project is complete most of the primary sources for the 1620s will be published, too. Few major areas of historical research have been laid so bare, with biographies of most of the leading actors also available. The one grievous lacuna is a biography of the duke of Buckingham, an unpleasant and lifelong project that thus far nobody has been willing to undertake. Its absence, though, hardly undermines the thorough understanding of the politics of the 1610s and 1620s that has been achieved.

<sup>10</sup> An example can be taken from the most important study of English society under the Tudors and Stuarts published in the last decade, Lawrence Stone's The Crisis of the Aristocracy 1558-1641 (Oxford, 1965). Stone disarmingly sidesteps the problem by saying that his book is a prolegomenon to, and explanation of, political history, but that Parliament is "deliberately excluded" from consideration (p. 8).

<sup>11</sup> The only Jacobean session not covered by these books is that of 1614, which is treated in T. L. Moir, The Addled Parliament (Oxford, 1958). Mention should also be made of one other most important study of the early Stuart Commons: D. H. Willson, Privy Councillors in the House of Commons 1604-1629 (Minneapolis, 1940).

<sup>12</sup> These three scholars are working on Sir John Eliot, John Pym, and the earl of Warwick and his circle; respectively.

What these three works have done is to add further concrete detail to the picture of gradual estrangement between king and Commons that has been familiar since Gardiner and especially since Notestein's classic essay of 1924. But they are rather different in approach and aim. Notestein proceeds at a leisurely pace, with the sure tread of one who is thoroughly familiar with every inch of territory that he passes. The judgments ring true again and again, the chronology is lucidly laid before us, and in two analytic sections the committee system and the role of the speaker are given definitive treatment. The one subject that is missing is the election of the House, and one could have wished for more detailed treatment of the relations between Commons and Lords. But there can be no doubt that this is a worthy opus ultimum—where The Winning of the Initiative laid the foundations, this book has constructed an imposing edifice of scholarship.

As a contrast in styles, Ruigh and Zaller could hardly be more dissimilar. Zaller leans heavily on Notestein's seven-volume edition of the 1621 diaries and has sought out few other primary sources. His book is short, spare, and sparkling. He has a fine ear for a phrase, and his assessments of men and situations are quick and shrewd. It is a pleasure to read the book, though one often wonders whether a great deal more does not still need to be discovered. Naturally, too, one has occasional misgivings about the flashes of interpretation—Coke, for example, is perhaps overstressed, and the broader implications of Bacon's fall receive inadequate attention. Yet certainly in style, in the willingness to make general comments about Stuart politics, Zaller upholds Notestein's tradition.

Ruigh's is a much more weighty tome, and sometimes rather heavy going. But there can be little need for further work here. He has examined an enormous range of papers, and in his best section—on elections and the patronage of various groups—he has brought some extremely difficult and scattered research to a most successful conclusion. These three chapters are models of painstaking historical work, and there is nothing like them in the literature on Parliament. In the very close study of day-to-day diplomatic history and its reflections in the Commons, though, one sometimes loses the wood for the trees. This book will be a mine for future scholars, and Notestein would doubtless have been proud of it, but he, too, would probably have wished that the sights could have been raised higher than the spring of 1624 more often.

Nobody can dare to say that research is ever complete, but it seems safe to predict that studies of particular sessions of the House of Commons during James I's reign are unlikely to appear again for at least a generation. Related subjects need further work, to be sure—notably the House of Lords, which has received adequate attention only from Zaller. But surely now the task is to begin integrating the huge accumulation of political history with the multiplying studies of English society. Did the issues raised in Parliament reflect profound social divisions? Was there a fundamental change in direction between James I's and Charles I's reign or merely an intensification of problems already apparent by the 1620s? Were the non-Puritans revolutionary or reactionary? Were economic issues of any significance? Did England really experience a revolution at mid-century? If we can begin to answer these and similar questions, Notestein's legacy will gain new dimensions and a new importance for all historical research.

HAVING PAID HOMAGE to a distinguished historian whose work is now complete, and whose bequest to the future requires serious attention, I feel I cannot end this essay without responding, in Notestein's name as far as I can, to a questioning of his contribution that appeared in print not many months after he died, too late for him to defend himself. In the course of a discussion of the purposes of parliamentary history from the Middle Ages to the present, Geoffrey Elton has expressed a series of doubts about Notestein's scholarship and interests,<sup>13</sup> and conscience drives me to respond.

Elton's first stricture is an unsubstantiated charge that the edition of the 1621 diaries lacks scholarly rigor and is not easy to use. Yet these volumes, meant for the scholar doing detailed work, not for the casual reader, have proved their usefulness for over thirty years. One cannot dismiss the standards or the comprehensibility of the edition, its cross-references, explanations, and superb index, without extensive documentation.

The second stricture is more general. According to Elton the title (and presumably the contents) of Notestein's famous essay "urge us to seek nothing but the 'growth' of the Commons' independence," a "whiggish" view that has been discredited by the Commons' lack of initiative since the mid-nineteenth century. In fact the essay discusses much besides growing independence; furthermore, whether Whiggish or not, Notestein's interpretation of Stuart times is hardly vitiated by developments since Victoria's reign. And what better organizing principle is there for a history of the Commons under James I and Charles I?

Elton broadens his criticism by asking whether "all that matters" is the ambition of "representatives" to limit the "executive," an emphasis he attributes to "American scholars, who perhaps cannot be expected to know better." But Notestein had no such exclusivist view; he did not <sup>13</sup> "Studying the History of Parliament," The British Studies Monitor, 2 (1971): 4-14. Since it is such a short article I have not given references for each quotation. The arguments I discuss can be found on pages 7-11. I might note that the remaining eight paragraphs of my article were added after the rest had been accepted for publication.

treat the struggle between king and Commons in such anachronistic terms; and his analysis of parliamentary history does not demonstrably owe more to American birth than to bicycle riding.<sup>14</sup>

Elton's third stricture is the obverse of the second. To correct the balance, he says, one must ask "the administrative historian's questions." Harmony, not conflict, was the normal political situation; therefore the main emphasis should be placed on procedural stability. Studies of the early Stuarts err in their conflict-inspired "conviction that only opposition entitles a man to respect," and Notestein is specifically reproved for his "almost perverse" emphasis on 1621, when no legislation was passed except for two subsidy bills. Elton is looking for "more original scholars," such as his students, to investigate procedure and give us "real hopes of finding out the truth."<sup>15</sup> After all, he complains, "we do not even know for sure how committees were appointed—by whom, at whose nomination" in the seventeenth century.

Despite his admission that "administrative" and "political" should not be separate categories, Elton fails to recognize that Notestein's work is notable precisely because he interwove administration and politics. Indeed he regarded changes in procedure (for instance, the new use of committees) as the essential mechanism whereby political initiative was won. Pace Elton, specialists do know how committees were appointed, and the best discussion of the subject is included in the forty-page chapter on committees in Notestein's last book. As for one-sidedness, that same work accords nobody more respect than Cecil or Bacon.

Although Notestein's particular blend of procedure and politics might not satisfy Elton, it is misguided to deny that the blend is there. Notestein perceived that procedures, continuity, and harmony are the necessary backdrop—but only the backdrop—against which change should be discerned. Elton's contrasting opinion, implicit in his belief that a Parliament's significance is related to the number of bills it passed, rests on a remarkable view of history. Most historians would surely say, with good reason, that the importance of a session derives not from the quantity of its formal bills but from the content of its bills or proceedings. In 1621 the great business was the revival of impeachment and the ruination of Bacon, neither of which produced a bill. But impeachment and the lack of bills dealt grievous blows to the harmony of government. Elton might argue that there was still much harmony—so there was, and Notestein remarks upon its persistence into 1640 and 1641—<sup>16</sup> but to concentrate on that to the exclusion (or minimization) of conflict and change is to miss the dynamism that gives history its appeal and distinguishes it from other studies. To alter that situation Elton must first alter human nature.

<sup>14</sup> Elton himself pays tribute to the work of an American, Stanford Lehmberg, and one wonders how Elton can seriously believe that just because he lives in England he is likely to have a better understanding of distant parliaments than a Notestein or a McIlwain.

<sup>15</sup> True to his views, Elton regards the discussion of procedure "the most remarkable part of" Neale's work, and Elton heralds Elizabeth Foster's study of the clerk Henry Elsyng as part of the beginnings of great illumination. I am not sure Professor Foster would regard her admirable biography in quite that light, but in any case Elton does not appreciate that she is a student of Notestein, or that the inspiration of her teacher is apparent throughout her research.

In sum, Notestein's aims and achievements have served as straw men for an ill-founded polemic. He may be open to criticism, but certainly not to these criticisms. Elton could claim that the book on 1604-10 was printed too late to affect his article. Yet most of my comments could be derived from The Winning of the Initiative, and in any case the book not only was published more than three months before Elton's article appeared, but was announced the previous year. The least a scholar should be able to expect is that his colleagues not attack his life's work with unseemly haste once he is no longer alive to respond. In this particular case the critic might also have given the reader some inkling as to why most historians of the period would place Notestein among the five or six scholars who have done most during the last half century to shape our understanding of early Stuart political history.

<sup>16</sup> Initiative, 25. Paradoxically Elton published an essay in 1970 in which he suggested that the Civil War was perhaps not so "exceptional," because conflict was a part of English life. See "The Unexplained Revolution," Encounter, July 1970, pp. 77-81, especially 81.

---

The Transition from Feudalism to Capitalism in Russia: A Major Soviet Historical Controversy

---

A Review Article by SAMUEL H. BARON

Perekhod ot feodalizma k kapitalizmu v Rossii: Materialy usesoiuznoi diskussii [The Transition from Feudalism to Capitalism in Russia: Materials from the All-Union Discussion]. Akademiia Nauk SSSR, Nauchnyi soviet "zakonomernosti istoricheskogo razvitiia obshchestva i perekhoda ot odnoi sotsial'no-ekonomicheskoi formatsii k drugoi." Edited by V. I. SHUNKOV et al. Moscow: Izdatel'stvo "Nauka." 1969. Pp. 412.

A RANDOM SAMPLING of the views on Soviet historiography of America's Russian specialists would almost surely yield something along the following lines. Soviet historians have zealously mined masses of previously unexploited sources and have made available a wealth of factual data, but their interpretations are often so bizarre that they hardly inspire confidence. This is so partly because these writers frequently have preconceived answers to the problems they investigate, and accordingly their research is one-sided. They seek support for what they wish to prove, exaggerate the significance of such evidence as they find, and ignore or minimize the importance of evidence of a contrary kind. Such failings derive in good part from the heavily ideological character of Soviet historiography. The "classics of Marxism-Leninism" are considered as a kind of scripture in which may be found either the answers tout court or strong guidelines to the answers to most questions: hence the extraordinary role of quotations from the "classics" in Soviet historiography and their employment not as hypotheses to be tested but as axioms to be illustrated. The situation is made worse by the imposition of political controls, which bar from many areas the free competition of ideas that might make for self-correction and which tend instead to produce a leaden conformity.<sup>1</sup> For such reasons Soviet historiography represents an alien "continent" whose exploration hardly repays the effort, and dialogue between Soviet and Western students of Russian history is well-nigh impossible.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> An examination of reviews of Soviet works in the American Historical Review and the Slavic Review will generally bear out this characterization—but certain important qualifications must be added. American and other Western students recognize that a number of Soviet historians produced significant contributions even in the depths of the Stalin era. In the post-Stalin period, thanks to a somewhat improved climate for historical work, the share of historical production worthy of attention has increased. Works that offer dubious interpretations, moreover, are often partly redeemed by the inclusion of important new material

The book under review is of quite extraordinary interest, for it compels a reconsideration of this appraisal, at least in respect to one broad area of historical investigation. In question is the recently published record of a conference held in 1965 to discuss a problem that has bedeviled Soviet historiography for decades—the transition from feudalism to capitalism in Russia.<sup>3</sup> Soviet students of their country's history have long taken it for granted that Russia passed through a feudal epoch, which began as early as the ninth or tenth century and persisted until 1861, when serfdom was abolished and the capitalist era ushered in. Understandably they have considered the investigation of the genesis of capitalism "within the womb of the old order" one of their major tasks.<sup>4</sup> If something like leaden con-from the archives. On these matters and on other developments in post-Stalin historiography, see John Keep and Lilianna Brisby, eds., Contemporary History in the Soviet Mirror (New York, 1964); Kurt Marko, Sowjethistoriker zwischen Ideologie und Wissenschaft (Cologne, 1964); Hans Rogger, "Politics, Ideology, and History in the USSR: The Search for Coexistence," Soviet Studies, 16 (1965): 253-75; and Arthur P. Mendel, "Current Soviet Theory of History: New Trends or Old?" AHR, 72 (1966-67): 50-73. See also the journal Kritika (published three times a year at Cambridge, Mass.), which performs a valuable service by printing long and often penetrating reviews of Soviet historical works.

---

<sup>2</sup> In contrast to the prevailing view, Fernand Braudel some years ago laid on Western historians the obligation to "follow and follow closely the work of [Soviet] historians" unless they would risk ignoring "an entire 'continent' of history." See the editorial note in Annales: Économies, Sociétés, Civilisations, 12 (1957): 127.

<sup>3</sup> The conference, sponsored by the Academy of Sciences' Scientific Council on "the lawfulness [zakonomernost'] of the historical development of society and the transition from one socio-economic stage to another," took place in Moscow on June 2-4, 1965. It was attended by some three hundred historians from all over the USSR. Before the conference began, each received a copy of a report composed by a committee whose members were I. F. Gindin, L. V. Danilova, I. D. Koval'chenko, L. V. Milov, A. P. Novosel'tsev, N. I. Pavlenko, M. K. Rozhkova, and P. G. Ryndziunskii. Pavlenko was the committee's leading spirit and spokesman. The printed record (hereafter Perekhod) includes the report, the comments on it offered by thirty-eight of the conferees, a digest of written remarks submitted by persons who, for lack of time, had no opportunity to speak, and a brief set of recommendations developed out of the conference materials. The first published information about the conference was a brief report: Iu. Bromlei, "Izuchenie problemy perekhoda ot feodalizma k kapitalizmu v Rossii" (The Study of the Problem of the Transition from Feudalism to Capitalism in Russia), Vestnik Akademii Nauk SSSR, 35 (1965): 114-16. The following year more of the substance of the controversy was publicized through articles by representatives of the contending groups: I. A. Bulygin, E. I. Indova, A. A. Preobrazhenskii, Iu. A. Tikhonov, and S. M. Troitskii, "Nachal'nyi etap genezisa kapitalizma v Rossii" (The Opening Phase of the Genesis of Capitalism in Russia), Voprosy Istorii, no. 10 (1966): 65-90; N. I. Pavlenko, "Spornye voprosy genezisa kapitalizma v Rossii" (Controversial Questions on the Genesis of Capitalism in Russia), ibid., no. 11 (1966): 81-102. The Soviet controversy may be compared with the debate among non-Soviet Marxists on the same problem in the history of Western Europe. See Paul Sweezy, ed., The Transition from Feudalism to Capitalism (London, 1959).

<sup>4</sup> Students of Russian historical writing are familiar with M. N. Pokrovskii's ill-starred attempt to prove the dominance of commercial capitalism in seventeenth-century Russia. After he and his work were denounced in the early 1930s something of a vacuum existed on the matter of the genesis of capitalism in Russia. The question figured prominently again in the protracted discussions of periodization that occurred in the years following the Second World War. The vacuum was soon filled by the conception shortly to be described. See Konstantin Shteppa, Russian Historians and the Soviet State (New Brunswick, 1962), 114-15, 246-75; and Leo Yaresh, "The Problem of Periodization," in C. E. Black, ed., Rewriting Russian History (2d ed.; New York, 1962), 42-77.

formity was ever a fair characterization of Soviet work on this theme, it certainly is no longer, for the conference proceedings spotlight a lively controversy of absorbing interest.

The conference centered on a committee report, which sets out the broad range of questions in dispute, including such basic matters as the time the process began and the manner in which it unfolded. On the first point, a few Soviet historians—for example, D. P. Makovskii and Academician S. G. Strumilin—had opted for the sixteenth century, and a large majority for the seventeenth.<sup>5</sup> The committee report rejects both these views and fixes the beginning of the genesis of capitalism in Russia in the 1760s. To the proponents of the seventeenth century the transitional period in Russia, though exhibiting some variations, appeared fundamentally similar to that in Western Europe. In the committee report similarities of a very general kind are acknowledged, but they are definitely overshadowed by profound differences that impart to the Russian historical process its distinctive character. The report canvasses not only substantive but theoretical and methodological issues as well, and indicts modes of investigation and interpretation that brought to predominance what it takes to be a lamentably erroneous conception of a highly significant slice of Russian history. The treatment of these matters makes plain that many of our misgivings about much of Soviet historiography are shared by numerous members of the Soviet historical guild.<sup>6</sup>

It will be readily appreciated that the conference report could not have been a bolt out of the blue. Over a period of time a paradigm for the transition from feudalism to capitalism in Russia had taken shape and served as the framework for research.<sup>7</sup> Beginning in the mid-1950s, however, the findings and reflections of a number of investigators brought one facet of the paradigm after another into question. The doubts voiced, sometimes implicitly and sometimes explicitly, by such historians as N. M. Druzhinin, N. L. Rubinshtein, V. K. Iatsunskii, S. D. Skazkin, and N. I. Pavlenko, apparently went unheeded.<sup>8</sup> But as additional contrary evidence

<sup>5</sup> For a generally positive review of D. P. Makovskii's book (see note 20 below), which included an approving introduction by S. G. Strumilin, see Richard Hellie "The Foundations of Russian Capitalism," Slavic Review, 26 (1967): 148-54.

<sup>6</sup> For example, the first pages of the committee report make many of the very same critical points on methodology and interpretation as I did in my review essay of N. M. Druzhinin et al., eds., Goroda feodal'noi Rossii (The Towns of Feudal Russia) (Moscow, 1966); see Baron, "The Town in 'Feudal' Russia," Slavic Review, 28 (1969): 116-22.

<sup>7</sup> I use here T. H. Kuhn's terminology, for what has occurred in Soviet historiography on the transition from feudalism to capitalism is reminiscent of, though not identical with, the pattern Kuhn described in his book The Structure of Scientific Revolutions (2d ed.; Chicago, 1970).

<sup>8</sup> A very important publication implicitly critical of the paradigm was Druzhinin's report to the International Congress of Historians in Rome in 1955, entitled Genezis kapitalizma v Rossii (The Genesis of Capitalism in Russia) (Moscow, 1955). V. K. Iatsunskii, a more combative historian, polemicized against the prevailing view in his review of N. V. Ustiugov's highly touted work on the salt industry at Solikamsk (see note 12 below) in Istoriia SSSR, no. 1 (1958): 193-96; and in his article, "Osnovnye etapy genezisa kapitalizma v Rossii" (Fundamental Stages of the Genesis of Capitalism in Russia), ibid., no. 5 (1958): 59-91. In a symposium in 1959 Iatsunskii, Academician S. D. Skazkin, and A. L. Shapiro constituted a panel that broadened the attack. Their papers are published in Ezhegodnik po agrarnoi istorii vostochnoi Evropy 1959 g. (An-accumulated, the doubters evidently coalesced into a group prepared to do battle for their convictions. The conference in 1965 was a confrontation between opposing schools, and the initiative lay with the insurgents. The committee report they produced summarized and synthesized the evidence developed over a period of at least a decade for an alternative view of the Russian historical process. A trenchant critique of the paradigm, it not surprisingly called forth counterattacks and strenuous objections to what was dubbed its "historiographical nihilism." Although a few points were scored against them, the committee and its adherents nevertheless plainly carried the day, and subsequent developments appear to confirm their victory.<sup>9</sup> Is it fanciful to see in all this something of a revolution in Soviet historiography?

In the years just after the Second World War Soviet historians found in a statement Lenin made in 1894 a principal guideline for their research.

Only the new period of Russian history (approximately from the seventeenth century) is characterized by the actual amalgamation of all . . . the regions, lands, and principalities into one whole. This amalgamation . . . was brought about by the increasing exchange among regions, the gradually growing circulation of commodities, and the concentration of small local markets into a single, all-Russian market. Since the leaders and masters of the process were merchant capitalists, the creation of these national ties were nothing else than the creation of bourgeois ties.<sup>10</sup>

The extraordinary significance attached to the statement may be gauged by the words of two principals in the controversy, A. A. Preobrazhenskii and Iu. Tikhonov, who have claimed that it "provides the key to the nual on the Agrarian History of Eastern Europe: 1959) (Moscow, 1961), 21-68. N. L. Rubinshtein was the first Soviet historian, to my knowledge, to call into question the interpretation put upon one of Lenin's statements, which, as will shortly appear, plays a central role in the controversy. See his "Territorial'noe razdelenie truda i razvitie vserossiiskogo rynka" (The Territorial Division of Labor and the Development of the All-Russian Market), in V. V. Al'tman, ed., Iz istorii rabocheho klassa i revoliutsionnogo dvizheniia: Sbornik statei pamiati Akademika Anny Mikhailovny Pankratovoi (On the History of the Working Class and the Revolutionary Movement: A Collection of Articles in Memory of Academician Anna Mikhailovna Pankratova) (Moscow, 1958), 87-100. Pavlenko's studies of the metallurgical industry in the eighteenth century turned up irrefutable evidence of the very special character of Russia's socioeconomic development; see especially his Istoriia metallurgii v Rossii XVIII veka (History of Metallurgy in Eighteenth-Century Russia) (Moscow, 1962).

<sup>9</sup> The recommendations that grew out of the conference materials and are a part of the printed record clearly aimed to strike a compromise, but this in no way conceals the fact that the insurgents routed their adversaries. This conclusion is confirmed by examination of the follow-up statements of the contending groups (see the two articles cited in note 3, above). The turpidity of the first and the brilliance of the second correspond roughly to the merit of the arguments advanced by each side. E. I. Zaozerskaia's recent study of Russian industry in early modern times, U istokov krupnogo proizvodstva v russkoi promyshlennosti XVI-XVII vekov (The Sources of Large-Scale Production in Russian Industry of the Sixteenth through Seventeenth Centuries) (Moscow, 1970), adds further support to the case advanced in the 1965 committee report. The proponents of the disenthroned outlook have not surrendered, but it seems true that something like the views advanced by the committee report now have the support of the greater number of Soviet historians concerned with this problem.

<sup>10</sup> The statement occurred in a polemic against the Populist writer N. K. Mikhailovskii in the pamphlet "Who Are the 'Friends of the People' and How They Fight against the Social Democrats?" See V. I. Lenin, Collected Works (Moscow, 1963-68), 1: 154-55.

understanding of a whole epoch in the history of our motherland."<sup>11</sup> Its critical importance evidently rested on three counts: first, the phrase "the new period" demarcated a major division of Russia's history; second, the lines following that phrase sketched the content of the "new period," perceived as nothing other than the genesis of capitalism; and third, the beginning of the process was fixed in the seventeenth century.

If Lenin supplied the basis of periodization, Soviet investigators derived from Marx the stages and criteria, the categories of thought, and the modes of analysis wherewith to trace the evolution from feudalism to capitalism. Armed with these concepts, students of Russia's socioeconomic history in the centuries preceding the abolition of serfdom have worked through vast masses of archival material in search of evidence to underpin them. The countless articles, hundreds of dissertations, and scores of book-length monographs that resulted invariably recited Lenin's statement of 1894 and professed to have corroborated it. For the seventeenth century, evidence was adduced for the separation of agriculture from nonagricultural production in a developing social division of labor; the gradual replacement of a natural, self-sufficient economy by a national market based on commodity production, territorial division of labor, and greatly increased significance of towns and merchants; the rise of large-scale industrial enterprises (manufactories) employing hired labor; and social differentiation in town and countryside, which bespoke the primary accumulation of capital in the hands of a nascent bourgeoisie and the divorce of significant numbers of producers from the means of production.<sup>12</sup>

<sup>11</sup> See A. A. Preobrazhenskii and Iu. A. Tikhonov, "Itogi izucheniia nachal'nogo etapa skladyvaniia vserossiiskogo rynka (XVII v.)" (The Results of Study of the First Step in the Formation of the All-Russian Market [Seventeenth Century]), Voprosy Istorii, no. 4 (1961): 80. This article summarizes the evidence accumulated up to that time in support of what I have called the paradigm. Judgments similar to the one quoted are frequently encountered in the literature.

<sup>12</sup> Among representative works one finds such instructive titles as: Voprosy genezisa kapitalizma v Rossii (Problems of the Genesis of Capitalism in Russia) (Leningrad, 1960); L. Beskrovnyi et al., eds., K voprosu o pervonachal'nom nakoplenii v Rossii (XVII-XVIII vv.) (On the Problem of Primary Accumulation in Russia [Seventeenth through Eighteenth Centuries]) (Moscow, 1958); A. Ts. Merzon and Iu. A. Tikhonov, Rynok Ustiuga Velikogo v period skladyvaniia vserossiiskogo rynka (XVII vek) (The Market at Ustiug the Great in the Period of the All-Russian Market in Formation [Seventeenth Century]) (Moscow, 1960); N. V. Ustiugov, Solevarenniaia promyshlennost' Soli Kamskoi v XVII veke (The Saltworks Industry in Solikamsk in the Seventeenth Century) (Moscow, 1957); N. A. Baklanova, Torgovo-promyshlennaia deiatel'nost' Kalmykovykh vo vtoroi polovine XVII v. K istorii formirovaniia russkoi burzhuzii (The Commercial-Industrial Activity of the Kalmykovo in the Last Half of the Seventeenth Century: On the History of the Formation of the Russian Bourgeoisie) (Moscow, 1959); A. M. Pankratova, Formirovanie proletariata v Rossii (XVII-XVIII vv.) (The Formation of the Proletariat in Russia [Seventeenth through Eighteenth Centuries]) (Moscow, 1963); and Druzhinin, Goroda feodal'noi Rossii. These titles suggest the great efforts invested in demonstrating that the seventeenth century was indeed the seedbed of Russian capitalism. All the works named, however, cannot fairly be assigned to one neat category. If some were consciously designed to illustrate particular formulas, others exhibit a decided independence of spirit. For example, in spite of the title given her book, Pankratova forthrightly declares her disagreement with those who discern capitalistic relations in seventeenth-century Russia: "There can be no talk of capitalism or a proletariat in the Marxian sense in the seventeenth or even the eighteenth centuries, except for the last two or three decades of the latter." Formirovanie proletariata, 9. The views she develops on Russian towns (pp. 82-85) are also markedly contrary to the ebullient portrayal of seventeenth- and eighteenth-century towns given by most contributors to Druzhinin, Goroda feodal'noi Rossii.

The prevailing interpretation of the seventeenth century deeply colored the treatment of what followed. If the genesis of capitalism was already well begun, then it was only logical, indeed "lawful" (zakonomernyi), that it should continue to develop in extent and depth.<sup>13</sup> The dominant Soviet historiography discerned the more or less smooth build-up of the indexes cited earlier, the passage of quantitative increases into qualitative changes, and the maturing of the crisis of the feudal regime. Contradictions generated between modes of production increasingly capitalistic in nature and relations of production colored by feudalism found expression in class struggle. In the first half of the nineteenth century the contradictions became ever more acute, created a revolutionary situation in the later 1850s, and ultimately made inescapable the abolition of serfdom. Works rooted in the paradigm not infrequently included qualifications that appear to cast doubt on its validity, but in the final analysis they were generally minimized or completely left out of account.<sup>14</sup> As a consequence, even though it brought masses of facts into play, the dominant rendering of this period of Russian history tended to be both highly schematic and misleading.

The committee found especially telling weapons for its assault upon the paradigm in the writings of Druzhinin and A. G. Man'kov. Man'kov, author of virtually the only postwar, book-length Soviet work on the seventeenth century that ran against the current, had called attention to "the peculiar situation that [had come] to prevail in [Soviet] historiography." Most authors, he observed, are concerned with "the search for 'new phenomena' in the economy of seventeenth-century Russia, by which they understand the rudiments of capitalist relations in the spheres of both commodity production and exchange. Meanwhile [they] take into account only to a very feeble extent the dominant feudal-serf relations, which continued to grow in strength." Such investigators paid only lip service to what was dominant while concentrating their attention on tendencies of a relatively minor order. The greater part of Soviet research on the entire transitional <sup>13</sup> The lawfulness (zakonomernost') of the historical process has of course been a central concept of Soviet historiography. I agree with the observations of Arthur P. Mendel ("Current Soviet Theory of History," 57) and Hans Rogger ("Politics, Ideology, and History in the USSR," 266-68) on the ambiguity of the concept in recent Soviet historical writing.

<sup>14</sup> To illustrate, Tikhonov wrote of the Ustiuga area: "The deepening social division of labor was conditioned by the growth of commercialization of agriculture in the seventeenth century." After this unequivocal assertion we read: "It was not possible to establish quantitatively the relationship between the value of agricultural production and the share marketed." A bit further along he adds: "However, there is no need to exaggerate the extent of development of commodity production in the feudal village. By no means all the peasant economies were closely linked to the market. Even part of the richest of the peasants [and] some townsmen were still only going over to regular sale of their products. Many middlemen did not carry on market operations systematically." Merzon and Tikhonov, Rynok Ustiuga Velikogo, 657-58. Despite the qualifications, the initial quotation is taken to define the situation. At the conference Iatsunskii destroyed its last shred of credibility. He had calculated the ratio of marketed to harvested grain for the individual peasant household of the region and found it to average two per cent. Perekhod, 267.

period, Man'kov plainly implied, represented Russian historical reality as in a distorting mirror.<sup>15</sup>

The committee underscored the need to attend not only to the old as well as the new but also to the relative weight of the one as against the other and to the effects each produced upon the other. It deplored the narrowly economic focus of much of Soviet research and the failure to give due consideration to a whole range of other forces and factors—such as the merchants and gentry, the reverse actions of the political superstructure on the economic base, and the role of foreign relations and influences—whose neglect made it impossible to perceive the Russian historical process rightly, and in its wholeness. The committee endorsed the use of the comparative-historical method as an effective way to achieve understanding of “the general and the unique in their unity . . . to reveal the different forms of the historical process.”<sup>16</sup>

Following some such principles Druzhinin had ten years earlier produced an interpretation of the genesis of capitalism in Russia that, with some qualification and considerable supplementation, the committee embraced. Druzhinin had emphasized not the similarity but the contrast between the Russian and West European transition from feudalism to capitalism. Capitalistic elements began to appear in Russia not after the liquidation of serfdom as in the West but while feudal-serf relations were still developing vigorously. Russia did not participate in the overseas expansion that spurred the commercial revolution in the West. Instead it long remained essentially a country of natural economy with a weakly developed commercial-industrial sector and an inconsequential bourgeoisie. In Russia primary accumulation of capital and the formation of a free labor force proceeded very slowly, and, until the second half of the eighteenth century, much of the industrial base stemmed from state initiative and relied heavily on compulsory labor. Capitalistic development in Russia proceeded simultaneously with the further development of a powerfully entrenched feudalism, which displayed a notable ability to adapt to changing needs and circumstances. Its success in assimilating elements of the new was nowhere better expressed than in the conduct of the nascent <sup>15</sup> A. G. Man'kov, Razvitie krepostnogo prava v Rossii vo vtoroi polovine XVII veka (The Development of Serfdom in Russia in the Second Half of the Seventeenth Century) (Moscow, 1962), 5–6. Man'kov's book focused on the extension and strengthening of the so-called feudal-serf order in the last half of the seventeenth century. Among other things he emphasized that the town populations were reduced to a condition analogous to that of peasant-serfs (see ch. 4).

<sup>16</sup> Perekhod, 6; italics mine. The report located in the era of the “cult of personality” a drive to assimilate the national histories of all countries [read: Russia and the West European lands] to a single [read: Western] pattern, which had as its complement the discontinuation of comparative-historical studies. Soviet historians, the committee maintained, unfortunately tended to see Russia's transition from feudalism to capitalism as similar to the “classical” English model (p. 6). This criticism is directed against a too mechanical transposition of Marx's formulas, derived from his extended study of English history, to a radically different context.

bourgeoisie, which essentially accommodated itself to, rather than struggled against, the existing order.<sup>17</sup>

Druzhinin included the seventeenth century in the transitional period, although the general contours of his interpretation would seem to allow for only the most feeble beginnings there. Others directly contradicted the claims for the seventeenth century made above all by N. V. Ustiugov and his followers. In a much-cited article published in 1950 Ustiugov had discovered a significant movement in the seventeenth century from handicraft production for use or local order to commodity production—i.e., a strong drive toward market relations. He wrote a painstaking study of the salt industry at Solikamsk, the greatest center of seventeenth-century Russia's most important industry, and found distinctly capitalistic tendencies there.<sup>18</sup> Under his influence, many other researchers undertook to demonstrate the existence of the same commercial and industrial phenomena in different localities or lines of production. Ustiugov also edited several important volumes designed to flesh out the conception he championed, which is well rendered by the title of one of them: The Russian State in the Seventeenth Century: New Phenomena in Socioeconomic, Political, and Cultural Life.<sup>19</sup>

Attacks upon the claims for the seventeenth century, both earlier and in the committee report, were two-pronged. On one hand, they denied the interpretation put upon the evidence adduced; on the other, they contested the prevailing interpretation of Lenin's 1894 statement, which the evidence was supposed to corroborate. The search for the new, the critics asserted, had misled overzealous investigators to antedate the appearance of capitalistic elements or to exaggerate the significance of such as actually did arise.<sup>20</sup> The larger industrial enterprises of the seventeenth century were few in number and frequently financed by foreign capital. In any case they could not be characterized as capitalistic manufactories because they involved no significant change in technology or in the organization of production. Market relations in the seventeenth century were no more capitalistic. To be sure, commodity production increased, but production for sale occurred to a limited extent everywhere while feudalism prevailed. The same was true of economic inequality among the peasants and the employment of hired labor, evidence of which was erroneously cited as proof of the advent of capitalistic features in the seventeenth century. Least of all was anything resembling early capitalist relationships to be found in agriculture, the most important branch of the economy.

<sup>17</sup> Druzhinin, Genezis kapitalizma v Rossii, 7–12, 18, 34, 37.

<sup>18</sup> N. V. Ustiugov, "Remeslo i melkoe tovarnoe proizvodstvo v Russkom gosudarstve XVII v." (Handicrafts and Small-Scale Commodity Production in the Seventeenth-Century Russian State), Istoricheskie Zapiski, 34 (1950): 166–97; Ustiugov, Solevarennaia promyshlennost' Soli Kamskoi v XVII veke.

<sup>19</sup> Ustiugov, ed., Russkoe gosudarstvo v XVII veke. Novye iavleniia v sotsial'no-ekonomicheskoi, politicheskoi, i kul'turnoi zhizni (The Russian State in the Seventeenth Century: New Phenomena in Socioeconomic, Political, and Cultural Life) (Moscow, 1961). Ustiugov also edited the volume by Merzon and Tikhonov (see note 12 above), which purportedly confirmed beyond a doubt the case for capitalistic market relations in the seventeenth century, even as Ustiugov's study of the salt industry was to have demonstrated the capitalistic character of production. One of the two editors of Ocherki istorii SSSR. Period feodalizma: XVII v. (Essays in the History of the USSR. The Feudal Period: The Seventeenth Century) (Moscow, 1955), the volume on the seventeenth century in the most important multivolume general work of the last decades, Ustiugov also contributed more heavily to the volume's sections on the economy than any other writer. He plainly exerted a wider influence, but his two most conspicuous disciples were and are Preobrazhenskii and Tikhonov. In 1961 the two produced an article (see note 11 above) summarizing the evidence thus far discovered in favor of the seventeenth century as the period when capitalism began to develop in Russia. Preobrazhenskii contributed an appreciation of his master to the posthumous Festschrift to Ustiugov, fittingly entitled The Towns of Feudal Russia. Oddly enough Ustiugov was scarcely mentioned, much less directly attacked, in the 1965 committee report, although it is plain that he was one, if not the, major architect of the conception under fire. Perhaps this is to be explained by reluctance to assail a recently deceased (1963) and personally respected and well-liked comrade. Contributors to the discussion frequently cited Ustiugov's interpretations, however—sometimes approvingly, sometimes skeptically.

For the critics, the Solikamsk salt industry and the trade activity of the White Sea region (Pomor'e), so important to their opponents' case, actually possessed only a local and transitory rather than a national and transforming significance. Special local circumstances accounted for the development of the salt industry and trade activity, and in the eighteenth century the one and the other were eclipsed.<sup>21</sup> Similarly almost none of the great merchant families that arose in the seventeenth century survived into the eighteenth.<sup>22</sup> If some rudiments of capitalistic relations appeared in seventeenth-century Russia, the committee report concluded, they were sporadic in nature, unstable, and either could not survive in or were deformed by the feudal-serf milieu, whose evolution was then the decisive factor in the country's development.

<sup>20</sup> The predating of the advent of capitalistic relations in Russia was a principal object of criticism in the papers by Skazkin, Iatsunskii, and Shapiro delivered to the conference on East European agrarian history in 1959. The extreme to which this tendency might be pushed is illustrated in the work of Makovskii, who proposed in all seriousness that in the sixteenth century "the trade turnover in the markets of [no] country in Europe could have been greater than Russia's." One of the participants in the 1965 conference, M. T. Beliauskii, remarked ironically that someone might take it into his head to fix the beginning of Russian capitalism's genesis in the Bronze Age. See Exhegodnik po agrarnoi istorii vostochnoi Evropy 1959 g., 21, 26-28, 32-33, 48-49, 52-54; D. P. Makovskii, Razvitie tovarno-denezhnykh otnoshenii v sel'skom khoziaistve russkogo gosudarstva v XVI veke (The Development of Commodity-Money Relations in the Agriculture of the Seventeenth-Century Russian State) (Smolensk, 1963), 77; Perekhod, 308.

<sup>21</sup> A good many of these arguments had already been adduced in the critical writings referred to in note 8 above. The committee report stresses the multifariousness of the historical process in Russia, the large regional variations, which made it hazardous to draw generalizations from the developments disclosed in one area. Perekhod, 5, 112. Zaozerskaia's recent book further spikes the claims made for the salt industry and shows that other industries in seventeenth-century Russia were more backward. Not only did technology in the salt industry remain stagnant for centuries, but in the seventeenth century the industry's entrepreneurs persistently strove to convert the workers they hired into a compulsory labor force. See Zaozerskaia, U istokov krupnogo proizvodstva v russkoi promyshlennosti XVI-XVII vekov, 64-66, 98, 446-50; she directly contradicts Ustiugov's claims for the salt industry on pp. 49, 151, 175-78, 185.

<sup>22</sup> This very important point emerged initially in S. V. Bakhrushin's work and was confirmed by the researches of K. V. Bazilevich, N. A. Baklanova, and V. A. Aleksandrov. See Bakhrushin's articles, "Promyshlennye predpriiatiia russkikh torgovykh liudei v XVII v." (The Industrial Enterprises of the Seventeenth-Century Merchants) and "Torgi gostia Nikitina v Sibiri i Kitae" (The Commercial Enterprises of Gost' Nikitin in Siberia and China), in his Nauchnye trudy (Moscow, 1952-59): vols. 2, 3; pt. 1; K. V. Bazilevich, "Krupnoe torgovoe predpriatie (Bosovykh) v Moskovskom gosudarstve v pervoi polovine XVII veka" (A Great Trading Enterprise [the Bosovs'] in the Moscow State in the First Half of the Seventeenth Century), Izvestiia Akademii Nauk SSSR, Otdelenie obshchestvennykh nauk, ser. 7, no. 4 (1932): 783-811; and V. A. Aleksandrov, "Sibirskie torgovye liudi Ushakovy" (The Siberian Merchants—the Ushakovs), in Ustiugov, Russkoe gosudarstvo v XVII veke, 131-50. Baklanova's study of the Kalmykovs (see note 12 above) reveals that they suffered a like fate. No Soviet writer has attempted to deter-

In 1958 and 1959 Rubinshtein, Academician Skazkin, and others had taken issue with the prevalent interpretation of Lenin's 1894 statement. Skazkin gently hinted at the imprudence of treating as holy writ a brief remark Lenin had made in the heat of a polemic against the populist N. K. Mikhailovskii. Less persuasively, he suggested that when Lenin referred to "the creation of bourgeois ties" he had in mind something quite different from what his interpreters supposed. Neither he nor anyone else pointed out that in 1894 Lenin was a mere twenty-four years of age, and no matter how great his genius he could have possessed little knowledge of seventeenth-century socioeconomic history, if only because the study of the subject had scarcely begun.<sup>23</sup> Rubinshtein and the authors of the report took a different but effective line: they used the authority of the more mature Lenin, the author of The Development of Capitalism in Russia and subsequent works, to refute the interpretation widely imputed to Lenin's 1894 statement. Lenin had been intensely aware of the powerful influence of feudal-serf relations on the course of Russian history, and he knew the great difficulties capitalism had in making its way even as late as the first half of the nineteenth century. His more fully elaborated views were hardly consistent with the exaggerated claims Soviet historians made for the seventeenth century, and they also stressed the very special qualities that sharply distinguished Russia's evolution from that of Western Europe.<sup>24</sup>

Among the peculiarities of the Russian historical process the committee stressed uneven development and what others have called combined development. Unevenness refers both to Russia's lag behind the West and the differential rates and modes of socioeconomic change in different parts of the vast Russian realm; combined development to the blending of old forms with new in distinctive arrangements, particularly as a result of borrowing that was calculated to overcome the lag. Thus in the first half of the eighteenth century military exigency impelled the state to import Western technology as a means of promoting large-scale industrial development—but that development was essentially noncapitalistic in type. Large mine systematically the survival rate of the big commercial operators. An investigation I have made, which is to be published in California Slavic Studies, reveals that in the seventeenth century only one great merchant family in four managed to perpetuate its status longer than one generation and almost none longer than two.

---

<sup>23</sup> The committee report and Pavlenko's follow-up article in 1966 both embraced Skazkin's view of Lenin's statement, but A. M. Sakharov, one of the conferees, justifiably cast doubt on this tortured interpretation. Pavlenko remarked in his article that little was known of seventeenth-century socioeconomic history when Lenin made his pronouncement. See Perekhod, 25, 190; Pavlenko, "Spornye voprosy genezisa kapitalizma v Rossii," 82, 88.

<sup>24</sup> Rubinshtein, "Territorial'noe razdelenie truda i razvitie vs Rossiiskogo rynka," 89-90; Perekhod, 38-40, 52, passim.

enterprises most untypical of a feudal economy arose, but they were bent to the norms of the feudal-serf order. The working force consisted in the main of compulsory-serf rather than free-hired labor. A goodly share of the enterprises came under the control of the landowning gentry, and merchant-industrialists, the nearest thing Russia had to a bourgeoisie, wanted nothing more than the right to exploit serf labor and to attain gentry status. The feudal-serf order demonstrated its resiliency, its ability to promote the development of productive forces without changing the basic social arrangements.<sup>25</sup>

The committee report presents persuasive evidence for a beginning of genuinely capitalistic relationships in a sector of Russian industry in the 1760s. The characterization of the next hundred years, which culminated in the emancipation of the serfs, however, is equivocal and less compelling. To its credit the committee scotches some dubious claims advanced by certain Soviet historians: that the peasant revolt led by Pugachev "objectively" aimed at the establishment of a bourgeois order and that Russia went through an industrial revolution in the decades preceding the abolition of serfdom.<sup>26</sup> While rejecting viewpoints that plainly derive from ideology rather than evidence, the committee report itself is not entirely free from the same fault. It characterizes the century in question as the period in which the march of capitalism became an irreversible process, when its advance progressively eroded and undermined the feudal-serf order until that system entered upon its final crisis. Evidence for such an interpretation is not wanting, but this view ultimately fails, for the "contradictions" were of course resolved through a reform from above rather than a revolution from below. Though not articulated into a whole, the elements of an alternative—and more convincing—interpretation are to be found in the report. More than once it suggests that even in the first half of the nineteenth century the feudal-serf order still gave some indications of vitality; it still had not exhausted its potentialities. The "crisis" might have been protracted indefinitely, we may infer, and all the more so because, as the committee acknowledges (following Lenin), the revolutionary forces in the mid-nineteenth century were insignificant.<sup>27</sup> Seen from this angle Russia's defeat in the Crimean War rather than the specter of revolution becomes the critical factor in the decision to abolish serfdom.

<sup>25</sup> The image of eighteenth-century socioeconomic development depicted in the committee report derives in considerable part from Pavlenko's studies. G. V. Plekhanov applied conceptions approximating to the theory of uneven and combined development to Russia to a limited extent, but it was particularly Trotsky who in 1906 developed this approach in an arresting manner. Soviet historians consider Lenin as the progenitor of the theory, but irrespective of its source the impulse of Soviet historians to utilize this illuminating approach is not the least interesting recent development in Soviet historiography. In the West, Alexander Gerschenkron has most fruitfully analyzed Russia's economic development in some such terms. The paradoxical view advanced at the 1965 conference that Peter the Great's consolidation of "feudal-serf" relations gave momentum to Russian economic development was anticipated by Gerschenkron. See S. H. Baron, Plekhanov, the Father of Russian Marxism (Stanford, 1963), 113-14, 355-57; Isaac Deutscher, The Prophet Armed: Trotsky, 1879-1921 (New York, 1954), 148-54; and Alexander Gerschenkron, Economic Backwardness in Historical Perspective (New York, 1962); for the point on Peter the Great, see pp. 18, 135, 153-54.

<sup>26</sup> The committee report also argued that the Cossacks were the key element in the "peasant wars" (Perekhod, 32-33)—a position hotly disputed by a number of conferees. Earlier writers who had espoused the position the committee now affirmed had been sharply criticized in Ocherki istorii SSSR. Period feodalizma: XVII v., 9-13. The argument advanced for a pre-emancipation industrial revolution, notably by Academician Strumilin, was, in the opinion of the committee, informed by a tendency in the 1940s "to exaggerate the technical-economic attainments of tsarist Russia." Perekhod, 72.

The comments on the report, though uneven in quality, offer fascinating insights into the workings of the Soviet historical guild. The most penetrating and impressive remarks came from the report's supporters (notably Pavlenko, A. L. Shapiro, L. V. Danilova, M. T. Beliauskii, M. Ia. Gefter, and Iatsunskii), from A. M. Sakharov, who shared the committee's critical spirit but disagreed with some of its findings, and from Iu. Iu. Kakhk, who displays notable analytical gifts. The upholders of the paradigm came off rather badly, and none worse than Preobrazhenskii. After Pavlenko and Sakharov, among others, had castigated the substitution of "citationism" for profound study of theory and method, Preobrazhenskii proceeded to defend the construction under attack with a long string of quotations from Marx-Engels and Lenin. Insisting once again that Lenin's characterization of the "new period" remained the correct basis for grasping the essence of seventeenth-century Russia, Preobrazhenskii strikingly confirmed the charges made against his group: in listing the "elements of the new" in the seventeenth century, he neglected to mention what was surely the most important of all—the definitive establishment of serfdom in the law code of 1649. Shaken by the attack, most of the defenders seemed to fall back on a more modest position: weak though the rudiments of capitalism earlier were, nevertheless they existed, accumulated, and laid the basis for the breakthrough of the 1760s, so that the preceding century or so should be included in the transitional period.<sup>28</sup>

<sup>27</sup> The net effect of the report here is to undercut the dubious claims of Academician M. V. Nechkina and others that a revolutionary situation existed in Russia in 1859–61. Contributors to the conference discussion spoke of the exaggerated emphasis given peasant disturbances in explanations of the decision to abolish serfdom, and there was evident a sense of the incongruity of speaking of a revolutionary situation in the absence of a revolutionary class. Perekhod, 200, 271–72, 316–17. For a recent appraisal by an American scholar of Nechkina's position, see Charles Adler, Jr., "The 'Revolutionary Situation 1859–1861': The Uses of an Historical Conception," Canadian Slavic Studies, 3 (1969): 383–99. The existence in the report of elements of two different explanations of the abolition of serfdom reflects some difference of opinion among members of the committee. Among these differences, according to Pavlenko, was the representation of the "crisis of the feudal-serf system"; another was "the role of the state and the influence of its policy on the socioeconomic processes of the transitional period." Perekhod, 109. Ryndziunskii and others also referred to differences within the committee (p. 204). In addition disagreements existed among those who generally supported the paradigm. For example, the views of Troitskii and M. Ia. Volkov on the character of the state in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were sharply at variance (pp. 139–40, 151–55).

<sup>28</sup> For Preobrazhenskii's remarks, see Perekhod, 213–22. The critics of "citationism" pointed out that great questions could not be settled by a quotation and that in any case one could find support in the "classics" for conflicting points of view (pp. 223–24, 113, 188–89). For the stance the upholders of the paradigm assumed after the conference, see Bulygin, Indova, Preobrazhenskii, Tikhonov, and Troitskii, "Nachal'nyi etap genezisa kapitalizma v Rossii." The group inadvertently made a most damning admission when it argued that Lenin had based his statement on

Like the report, the discussion was remarkable for its demonstration of self-criticism and a mutual criticism expressed without fear or favor. Reference was made to the deplorable effects of the "cult of personality" on historical work, among them efforts to prove Russian priority in all things—"including even the transformation of free people into serfs." E. M. Zhukov identified the often dogmatic rather than dialectical use made of theoretical propositions as the source of "the increased skepticism of our academic youth." Shapiro reminded his colleagues of the historian's obligation "to reconstruct an objective picture [rather than] to write what is congenial to the spirit." Historians of lesser rank rebuked several academicians—the most exalted members of the guild: Strumilin, whose imperfect understanding of the "classics" and faulty reasoning had led him to posit seriously mistaken views on major questions; M. V. Nechkina, whose brief for a revolutionary situation in the late 1850s was quietly shelved and whose objections to the report were termed "mechanistic"; and L. V. Cherepnin, for, among other things, having unjustly charged the committee with expounding Man'kov's views incorrectly.<sup>29</sup>

Certain of the substantive and methodological views expressed exhibited a refreshing openness, a readiness to entertain ideas once considered taboo. The committee acknowledged the tentativeness of some of the positions it took and pointed to many questions that demanded further investigation. Both its members and various contributors to the discussion offered helpful suggestions for attaining greater precision (quantitative studies) and called for the careful formulation of criteria for demarcating the stages of development in the transition from feudalism to capitalism. Sakharov asked his colleagues to compare Russia's historical evolution not just with that of Western Europe but with the countries of the East as well. Some of those who attacked the report implied that its authors regarded the feudal-serf order in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries not only as progressing but—horribile dictu!—also as progressive. Sakharov, P. G. Ryndziunskii, and others openly declared that the feudal-serf order was indeed progressive and, moreover, essential to the nation's very existence at a certain stage of its development, and that it should be judged historically and not by twentieth-century standards. Two conferees challenged the prevailing view, evidently maintained with some differences in detail by both sides, of the character of the Russian state in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In M. Ia. Volkov's opinion, it should not be likened to the European absolute monarchies for it was closer to what Marx had called "the Asiatic mode of rule."<sup>30</sup>

the seventeenth century not on Russian historical works but on pronouncements of Marx and Engels (p. 82). It follows that a statement with no historical basis whatever was uncritically accepted as the authoritative guide to the understanding of a whole epoch by almost an entire generation of Soviet historians.

<sup>29</sup> Perekhod, 192, 106, 185, 10, 73-74, 13, 333, 304, 381-85.

<sup>30</sup> For the remarks of Sakharov, Volkov, and also V. I. Koretskii on Russia and the Oriental countries, see ibid., 192, 149-50, 399. These comments recall Plekhanov's interesting conception of

After examining the sketch of Russian history set out by the committee, the Western student is apt to exclaim: "But this interpretation is not so different from our own!" Quite so, and this convergence deserves emphasis. Still, one may be somewhat perplexed by the similarities, for the critical group of Soviet historians shows no inclination whatever to abandon Marxism-Leninism as the basis of historical research and understanding. We note, however, that the committee report and some of the commentators draw a distinction between a mechanistic, "logical" (aprioristic), citation-ridden, and therefore illegitimate employment of Marxism-Leninism and its more flexible, sensitive, dialectical use. I would translate this language into a distinction between poor and sound historical method. What may appear as an ingenuous and question-begging judgment may be tested in two ways. First, the specific methodological dicta commended by the critics command assent; among other things, they require balance in research and interpretation as against one-sidedness, the priority of evidence over formulas, a use of the comparative-historical method calculated to disclose the relationship between the general and the unique. Second, if the proof of the pudding is in the eating, then the substantive findings in the committee report and the research on which it is based testify to the enormous superiority of the newer methodology to the old.<sup>31</sup> Soviet and Western students of at least some phases of Russian history are now dealing with what is recognizably the same "continent," and, contrary to the situation some years ago, dialogue now appears entirely possible.

Though all this is heartening, a few cautionary observations are in order. To all appearances the debate over the transition from feudalism to capitalism has been permitted to run its course, with the laurels going to the victor in a free competition of ideas. The constraints upon work in some of the more sensitive areas—such as the history of the Communist party of the Soviet Union and contemporary history—have diminished little if at all. We cannot know the extent to which the demythologizing tendencies evident in the controversy considered here may spill over into other historical realms or if the "crude administrative interference" of the 1930s, to which one of the conferees referred, may reappear in regions from which it had been withdrawn.<sup>32</sup>

Russia as an Oriental or semi-Oriental despotism in the centuries under consideration. Such ideas were either angrily denounced or blithely ignored for some decades in Soviet historiography. See S. H. Baron "Plekhanov's Russia: The Impact of the West upon an 'Oriental' Society," Journal of the History of Ideas, 19 (1958): 388-404; and Karl Wittfogel, Oriental Despotism (New Haven, 1957), ch. 9.

<sup>31</sup> If my reasoning is correct, it should serve as an admonition that in dealing with Soviet historiography we not be put off by labels but are bound to look beyond to the substance of things.

<sup>32</sup> That both have occurred, however, is suggested by the recent case of A. Ia. Gurevich's Problemy genezisa feodalizma v zapadnoi Evrope (Problems of the Genesis of Feudalism in Western Europe). See David B. Miller's review in the AHR, 76 (1971): 756-57. That fresh winds are blowing in other areas of Soviet historiography has been made evident in review articles

Even on the transition from feudalism to capitalism in Russia of course differences between Soviet and Western scholars remain. To a certain extent they seem to me to be terminological rather than substantive, but they are also traceable to a lack of familiarity with other approaches—for example, the Weberian—to the problem of capitalistic development.<sup>33</sup> The distance has been reduced, in part, by greater willingness on the Soviet side to acknowledge the state's role in shaping Russia's socioeconomic history. But while the most perceptive Soviet historians have succeeded in avoiding the Scylla of "economic materialism," they have been so wary of the Charybdis of "statism" that they have still not accorded full value to state policy and action. One finds evidence enough of a better appreciation of the state now as obstructor, now as promoter of economic development, but this line of analysis seems never to be pursued systematically. If it were, Soviet historians might well find "the transition from feudalism to capitalism" a characterization incongruent with the "concrete-historical" facts of their country's past. Were such a perception to gain general acceptance, that would constitute a full-blown scientific revolution.

---

that have appeared since the completion of the present essay. See John Meyendorff, "The Cambridge and Soviet Histories of the Byzantine Empire: Religious History and Theology," Slavic Review, 30 (1971): 619-23; and Alexander Gerschenkron, "Soviet Marxism and Absolutism," ibid., 853-69.

<sup>33</sup> I have made a tentative application of certain of Weber's concepts to the Russian case in my article "The Weber Thesis and the Failure of Capitalist Development in 'Early Modern' Russia," Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas, 18 (1970): 321-36.

---

Reviews of Books

---

GENERAL

JULIÁN MARÍAS. Generations: A Historical Method. Translated by HAROLD C. RALEY. University: University of Alabama Press. 1970. Pp. xi, 220. $7.50.

The book under consideration is one whose gist could easily be condensed into a ten-page essay. In fact the author obliges us by providing, at the end of his work, a résumé that sums up his views on the relationship between generational succession and the study of history. Throughout his monograph he focuses simultaneously on two tasks. One is to offer a theory of historical development based upon the formation and interaction of generations: units that he defines chronologically, sociologically, and, finally, with regard to their "epoch-making" capacities. He then attempts to prove that the vitalist philosophy of Ortega y Gasset, his own mentor, is the precondition for any proper understanding of historical generations. Supposedly, Ortega wrote conclusively on this subject in El temo de nuestro tiempo (1923).

An obvious question presents itself. Since Ortega had treated his topic in an exhaustive way, why should Marías have bothered to go over the same ground? Whatever the answer, one may be glad that he did. Generations is full of useful hints for conceptualizing the cycles of ideas and movements against the background of changing times. And apropos of demonstrating the value of Ortega's thought, Marías makes informative excursions into the writings of other Europeans concerned with the generation in history.

Although his treatment of Dilthey, Comte, Ranke, and other non-Spanish thinkers is sometimes grossly oversimplified, there is a sense of purpose that almost redeems the author's superficiality. Marías wishes to save his countrymen from the impulse of going, cap in hand, to the Germans and French to learn about historical methodology. Ortega, a Spaniard, through the perception of true historical contemporaneity, had made an original contribution to the field.

Mention should be made of Professor Raley's skill as a translator. His clear idiomatic language makes all of Marías's argumentative nuances accessible to American readers. Moreover, his introductory comments are admirably brief and unobtrusive.

PAUL GOTTFRIED
New York University

LEO BRAUDY. Narrative Form in History and Fiction: Hume, Fielding, & Gibbon. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1970. Pp. viii, 318. $10.00.

This remarkable monograph is about the artistic element in historical method, the structure of narrative. Braudy sees Hume, Fielding, and Gibbon as experimenting with narrative forms that not merely presented but controlled their historical materials. It was of course Fielding who through fiction could most explicitly impose an imaginative order on factual reality. But the prominence Braudy consequently accords to his novels—twice as much space as to Hume's History and three times as much as to Gibbon's Decline and Fall—should not mislead the reader into thinking that the study is concerned with "literature" rather than historiography.

Braudy finds a progressive development in each of his three writers. Emancipating themselves from traditional historiography, with its classical didacticism, they essayed different narrative methods as their work went along. Hume, in his Stuart volumes, began with offering the traditional "character" explanations; he muted them in the Tudor volumes that followed, letting legal and institutional structures come to the fore; finally, in the volumes on the Middle Ages, he had recourse to interaction, contextual development, and the concept of the accretion of time. But Hume managed only to contain, not to control, his materials, presenting sometimes incompatible patterns, and not a consistent narrative voice. Fielding, concerned with private rather than public history, had more scope for redefining the historian's methods and tasks. In Joseph Andrews he rejected irrelevant factuality and distilled a factual sanction for authenticating history and fiction. In Jonathan Wild he attacked the use of providential and other transcendental explanations. His own program and practice are set out in Tom Jones. He searches for a structure to explain what is spontaneous and contingent, for "the balance between abstract and particular, type and context, essence and appearance." Here, as in other novels, he makes the narrator instruct the reader in the conventions employed and the states of affairs they illuminate. Fielding, Braudy remarks, teaches us how to understand reality through variety; his narrator is the model historian.

Gibbon—Fielding's admirer, who made a prediction to the effect that Tom Jones would outlive the Habsburg monarchy—also offered a method for understanding rather than a thematic interpretation. Sketched in the early Essai, pursued in the first three volumes of the Decline and Fall, and achieved in the last three is the ambition to make history the conscious creation of a literary object. The esthetic order gains precedence; themes like corruption matter less than literary structuring; relative and open-ended judgments encroach on causal determinants, and long-range causes yield to suggestive perspectives on time and place. Injunctions to the reader and the narrative "I" increasingly obtrude. Gibbon had no commitment to any systematic historical or psychological explanation, "only to his own narrative voice and the coherence it creates."

Braudy prefaces this study of the evolution of a new species of writing history by chapters on Clarendon and Bolingbroke. The treatment of Bolingbroke is marred by some misconceptions, attributable to its purely textual nature. That of Clarendon is not as original or searching as the account of the three major writers by which this monograph must be judged. The novelty of Braudy's approach—particularly for historians—marks a distinct advance in historiographical study. Since that study has often suffered from biographical reductionism, the reader will note with relief that Braudy ascribes nothing about Fielding to his politics or about Gibbon to the Enlightenment. Yet some readers may feel uneasy about Braudy's textual asceticism and may spot some narrative procedures that owed less to literary experimentation than to some convention or circumstance in the writer's career. But even they are likely to be swayed by Braudy's persuasive reasoning and effective diction. As a negative tribute to the quality and finish of the work, let it be noted that the only perceptible irritant seems to have been contributed by the publisher: the supererogatory practice of putting elision marks before quotations commencing with a lower-case letter.

GEORGE H. NADEL
Warnham, England

ÁGNES R. VÁRKONYI. A pozitívista történet szemlélet. [The Positivist View of History]. (Stúdium Könyvek, Number 67.) Budapest: Gondolat Kiadó. 1970. Pp. 217. 20. F.

The study under review appeared in a series of monographs aimed at the interested layman, which deal with a variety of subjects from philosophy through the natural sciences to the fine arts and literature. A dozen, or one-sixth, of the titles published so far focus on different aspects of history: included are two works by V. Gordon Childe on the dawn of European civilization and the prehistory of European society; one by Federico Chabod on Italy between 1918 and 1948; and several contributions by noted Hungarian scholars, such as the histories of Bulgaria (Emil Niederhauser), Poland (József Perényi), and the Hungarian village (Kálmán Eperjessy).

Ágnes Várkonyi's study is a somewhat abridged version of the introductory chapter of a forthcoming major work that proposes to describe the genesis of and different trends in Hungarian positivist historiography (p. 213). The author, who has written extensively on the social movements of seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Hungary and who is an expert on the anti-Habsburg struggle led by Francis II Rákóczi, has revealed her interest in the impact of positivism on Hungarian "bourgeois historiography" in two articles, the English versions of which appeared in Acta Hungarica. One of these analyzes the echo of H. T. Buckle's History of Civilisation in England (1963), and the other the impact of scientific thinking on Hungarian historical writing in the mid-nineteenth century (1968); along with the present booklet they anticipate the opus yet to come.

Writing from a Marxist point of view, Várkonyi's sophisticated approach to positivism is refreshingly different from the standard Soviet evaluation represented, for example, in the relevant article of the Great Soviet Encyclopedia (2d ed.; 1955), which still insists, with due reference to Lenin's Materialism and Empirio-criticism (1909), that fighting positivism is an important part of the overall struggle against bourgeois ideological influences. As a partial explanation for this difference one may refer to the peculiarities of the Hungarian historical context: between the two world wars official historiography, influenced by German Geistesgeschichte, attacked the representatives of positivism from the right equating their activities with mere data collecting. Várkonyi, however, points out that positivist historians followed a well-considered method, the aim of which was not the accumulation of data per se but the detection of the laws of history by a judicious adaptation of the methodology of the modern natural sciences (pp. 17, 85-90). Moreover, she confines herself to the writings of the great nineteenth-century positivists, concentrating on their differing and changing interpretations of the meaning of history. This sober demarcation of her goal has a twofold advantage. On the one hand, it enables her to avoid getting involved in the much debated and debatable issues related to the more recent school of logical positivism and, on the other, it helps her stress the essential without losing sight of important nuances.

Várkonyi draws a sharp line between Marxism and positivism in her analysis of the major historical writings and theories of Auguste

Comte, J. S. Mill, H. T. Buckle, J. W. Draper, W. E. H. Lecky, Herbert Spencer, Émile Littré, and Hippolyte Taine by stressing the common roots of widely differing positivist tenets, namely, philosophical idealism, agnosticism, and a mechanistic methodology (p. 14). But having paid her respect to Marx, Engels, and Lenin, she claims that antidogmatic Marxist historiography must go beyond citations taken from the classics in order to show that the champions of positivism appreciated the first great results of the natural sciences and came "from the ranks of an intelligentsia imbued with liberal and democratic aspirations. In several countries, e.g. Latin American countries, Russia, Poland, Italy, Romania, Serbia, and elsewhere, and not least in Hungary, many progressive people were attracted by [positivism's] ideas" (p. 16). Várkonyi also emphasizes that every place where the remnants of feudalism prevailed in the mid-nineteenth century, the antifeudal tendencies and rational elements contained in positivist thought tended to reflect those interests of the bourgeoisie that pointed in the direction of social progress (pp. 17, 185). To be sure, these progressive features of positivism began to fade away, in Várkonyi's opinion, after the shock of the Paris Commune in 1871 as indicated by the later works of Taine and Spencer who by that time intended to defend established bourgeois society against the movements of the proletariat (pp. 38-41, 84, 120-21, 128-29, 186-89). Obviously the author prefers revolutionary to evolutionary theories; this is also why she attempts to relate the three major phases in the development of positivism to the revolutionary years 1830, 1848, and 1871 (pp. 123-25). Yet it is legitimate to view intellectual trends against the background of the social, national, and scientific revolutions of the age, and Várkonyi's interpretation is far from simplistic: it pays due attention to the variety of emphases in positivist writings, crediting them with the raising of some basic questions about the meaning of history and the introduction of the idea of historical progress into bourgeois historiography (pp. 145-47, 211-12). Noteworthy, also, is the effort to summarize, at least in brief, the lasting impact of positivism on thinkers and writers in Central and Eastern Europe. A reference such as the one made in connection with the third Hungarian edition of J. S. Mill's On Liberty in 1943, which was a symbolic protest against fascism at the time, goes as long a way toward the re-establishment of much needed intellectual intercourse among scholars of different nations, as does the renewal of reverence for the rational traditions of even antirevolutionary schools of thought (pp. 205-12). Respect for intellectual achievements and recognition of the right to err are, after all, preconditions of meaningful dialogues.

GEORGE BARANY
University of Denver

GEORGE LICHTHEIM. Imperialism. New York: Praeger Publishers. 1971. Pp. vii, 183. $7.50.

George Lichtheim, whose works on Marxism and the history of socialism enjoy a well-deserved reputation, has made an interesting contribution to the study of imperialism. Lichtheim is a Marxist of the left-Hegelian Frankfurt School, and his book may be seen as a useful interaction of both Hegelian and Marxist lines of thought. Unlike the upholders of the Lenin theory he understands that the imperial relationship can exist apart from a capitalist context, and he appreciates, as a Hegelian, the critical role that state power and national consciousness play. At times his primary purpose in writing seems to be that of disabusing Marxists of all shades—a rather substantial number of people these days!—of “crude” economic preconceptions.

The brief volume presents a stimulating but inevitably uneven survey of Western imperialism. A Hegelian emphasis on state and national pride dominates Lichtheim's view of empire from Rome through the Middle Ages, and, perhaps because of Richard Koebner's influence, Lichtheim chooses to discuss such questions as the Kaiseridee of the Holy Roman Empire rather than Venetian merchant imperialism or, earlier, the “usurious” imperialism of Rome. The stress shifts to economics beginning with Lichtheim's analysis of the maritime empires of mercantilism. Lichtheim sees, as Hobson or Schumpeter did not, the reality of an imperialism not merely atavistically associated with but erected solidly upon a free trade base. But, unaware of Wakefield's theories of capitalist imperialism in the 1830s and of the role of classical economics in creating an imperial “ideology,” he views the 1880s as witnessing a “revival,” following an anti-imperialist period, of preindustrial imperialism.

In his final chapters Lichtheim dissects the Lenin theory, to the advantage of Karl Kautsky and Rosa Luxemburg, demonstrating that it does not work in today's world, and depicts a “populist” Maoism, which is more “revolutionary nationalism” than “authentic socialism.” One misses an attempt to deal with psychological or psychoanalytical theories of imperialism—that of Mannoni, for example—more especially since Lichtheim restores hubris to a role in political affairs. While Lichtheim does not attempt a theory to rival the classic formulations, it was not asked even of Hercules to do more than cleanse the Augean stables.

BERNARD SEMMEL
State University of New York,
Stony Brook

Anarchici e anarchia nel mondo contemporaneo: Atti del Convegno promosso dalla Fondazione Luigi Einaudi (Torino, 5, 6 e 7 dicembre 1969). (Fondazione Luigi Einaudi, “Studi,” Number 11.) Turin: the Fondazione. 1971. Pp. 654. L. 6,000.

This book contains the proceedings of a symposium on anarchism held in Turin in December 1969. The goal of the symposium was to give the terms anarchism and anarchy as broad a meaning as possible, to include all antiauthoritarian thinkers and movements from Jean-Jacques Rousseau to Daniel Cohn-Bendit and other student protesters of the late 1960s. Naturally this effort met with some resistance from orthodox anarchists who wanted to exclude everybody else and from libertarians close to anarchism but who refused the label. The participants were of three types: internationally known social and political historians, scholars specializing in the anarchist movement and for the most part anarchists themselves, and veteran fighters from that movement. Each of the six sessions consisted of a paper on a general theme, three to five papers on various aspects of this theme, and a discussion. The six general papers were: “The Genesis of Anarchism in the Nineteenth Century” (Leo Valiani), “Problems in Spanish Anarchism” (Aldo Garosci), “The Contemporary International Anarchist Movement" (Gino Cerrito), "Anarchism between Communism and Individualism" (James Joll), "Anarchism and Bolshevism" (Arthur Lehning), and "Traditional Anarchist Thought and the Contemporary Revolt of the Young" (Jean Maitron). Although the main focus of the symposium was on Europe, with some attention given to Latin America, it is regrettable that virtually nothing was said about the anarchist tradition in the United States; Emma Goldman was mentioned only in passing and there was no discussion of Henry David Thoreau, the Industrial Workers of the World, or the anarchist wing of the North American New Left.

Of particular interest is Cerrito's paper, with its sixty-two-page bibliography. Cerrito claims that anarchism was put on the wrong track by Prince Peter Kropotkin's utopianism and has had to fight its way back to its essential character as an activist movement championing the victims of oppression à la Michael Bakunin and Enrico Malatesta. Kropotkin, according to this view, believed that a completely harmonious and libertarian society would come about through an instantaneous, all-encompassing revolution. The anarcho-syndicalists of the pre-1914 era tried to revive the preparation of a working-class elite for the more specific and limited task of destroying the state through political action, especially a general strike. But the First World War drastically weakened the illusion of a self-sufficient working-class movement. Anarchism was further weakened by the rival attraction of the Bolshevik Revolution and by repression from communists and fascists during the interwar years. The most notorious example of such repression came during the Spanish Civil War. Unfortunately, says Cerrito, this event helped revive the myth of an instantaneous, all-embracing revolution even among the practical-minded leaders of the Confederación Nacional del los Trabajadores. (This charge of impracticality was vigorously denied by the Spanish anarchists present.) For the period since the Second World War Cerrito's survey mentions a multitude of minuscule continuing and occasional groupings ranging from the numerous branches of the Movimiento Libertario Español to exiled anarchists from Bulgaria and Cuba to Yiddish-speaking anarchists in the United States and Argentina.

James Joll and Jean Maitron maintain in their papers that the New Left libertarians in many parts of the contemporary world are imbued with the traditional spirit and tactics of anarchism and consequently cannot escape its dilemmas. These dilemmas include communism versus individualism, violence versus peaceful persuasion, and rationalism versus irrationalism. Another dilemma, the insistence on both doctrinal purity and individual judgment, leads to splits and divisions and a shrillness typical of self-righteous ideologues. Lack of direct access to the mass media poses a newer dilemma to those many anarchists who hope to educate the masses along libertarian lines. The bad press their more violent activities get from the media—in both communist and capitalist countries—can draw attention to them, but it can also turn potential sympathizers against them.

In addition to its substantive papers this book has much of value for future researchers on anarchism. There are up-to-date bibliographical references and information on work in progress on many aspects of the movement. For example, A. William Salomone reported that a graduate student at the University of Rochester was filling a gap (noted by Joll) in our knowledge about a group of young libertarians in the German Social Democratic party during the 1890s; Eric Hobsbawm said that someone at the University of London was studying the Cuban tobacco workers during the 1920s. There is a short piece about a new Max Nettlau Library on libertarian movements, which opened its doors in December 1969 in the city of Bergamo. Finally, much of this book itself is a document on the anarchist temperament and the anarchist way of viewing the world. Here the libertarian optimism of Kropotkin lives alongside the bomb throwers and the pessimistic nihilists. Not only do all anarchists hate authority and the state in all its forms, but some, like Pier Carlo Masini, argue that anyone who seeks political power must be sick. Surely there is more to the matter than that.

EDWARD R. TANNENBAUM
New York University

MAURICE MANDELBAUM. History, Man, & Reason: A Study in Nineteenth-Century Thought. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press. 1971. Pp. xi, 553. $15.00.

The subtitle of this book—A Study in Nineteenth-Century Thought—provides a better description of its contents than the title, History, Man, & Reason. The early parts of the work in which the author justifies his undertaking by asserting that thinking in the twentieth century is still widely determined by the notions and conceptions of the nineteenth century is interesting, stimulating, and a healthy corrective to those views which assume that, with the twentieth century, an entirely new intellectual world opened up.

In analyzing the thought of the nineteenth century the author focuses on three different strands of nineteenth-century thought, and this approach explains the book's title. In a first section the author is concerned with historicism. In a second section he deals with "the malleability of man," and this section discusses evolutionist, biological, and psychological theories: the central issue of this section is formed by the question whether conditioning can change human nature. The third section is concerned with the revolt against reason rather than with a defense of reason; the author discusses the positivistic rejection of all non-empirical knowledge and Kierkegaard's and Nietzsche's denunciations of rationalism.

Although the sharp separation of these three trends of thought leads to some overlapping and repetition because certain thinkers—for instance, Hegel—must be treated in the section on "History" as well as in the section on "Man," this form of organization has its advantages because it reveals interesting connections. For instance, I might mention that the philosophical context in which Helmholtz and Mach are placed is somewhat surprising but fully convincing.

The author's detailed knowledge of nineteenth-century thought is admirable. Nevertheless, I have certain reservations. He defines historicism as "the belief that an adequate understanding of the nature of any phenomenon and an adequate assessment of its value are to be gained through considering it in terms of the place which it occupied and the role which it played within a process of development." This seems to me an extremely broad definition, which, I think, allows no distinction between "history" and "historicism" and which underplays what seems to me the crucial problem of historicism: the impossibility of assuming the existence of generally valid moral norms. Furthermore, the presentation is very abstract; and the criteria that the author uses are primarily of a logical nature. I doubt that this approach does justice to the views of natural scientists; their theories grew out of scientific research and were tentative insofar as they would be changed if further research led to new and different results. Finally, the conclusion of the book is very different from what the reader expects. After having emphasized at the outset that our thinking is dependent on nineteenth-century thought the author simply states that he believes "that the nineteenth-century views of the intellect which have here been examined will, before long, be unacceptable." He does not enter upon any further discussion of the possibilities of survival of nineteenth-century intellectual thought, but the main thesis of the book seems to be that the author shifts the break with nineteenth-century thought from the beginning of the twentieth century to a later period.

FELIX GILBERT

Institute for Advanced Study

WILLIAM J. BRAZILL. The Young Hegelians. (Yale Historical Publications. Miscellany, Number 91.) New Haven: Yale University Press. 1970. Pp. 305. $10.00.

DAVID MCLELLAN. The Young Hegelians and Karl Marx. New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1969. Pp. ix, 170. $8.50.

These works on the Young Hegelians (David Friedrich Strauss, Bruno Bauer, Arnold Ruge, Friedrich Theodor Vischer, Ludwig Feuerbach, and others) fill a gap in intellectual history and also contribute to a better understanding of the formative years of Marx—and Engels, too. Professor Brazill, after examining the milieu in which the Young Hegelians emerged and functioned, analyzes their individual careers and thoughts during both the short period when they represented a collective force that influenced their contemporaries (including Marx) as well as in the following years when each of them went his own separate way, often in a more conservative direction. Professor McLellan's book restricts itself mainly to a study of the thought of each Young Hegelian and to the influence that it had on the development of Marx's views during the period when the Young Hegelians still operated, more or less, as a cohesive group.

The very intensity with which Marx and Engels later attacked the Young Hegelians offers the best proof that they regarded their former associates as a force to be reckoned with. Their first two joint works, The Holy Family and the major part of The German Ideology, were designed to discredit "Bruno Bauer and Consorts" lest others continue to pray in a shrine where they themselves had once worshipped. It should be clear, therefore, that any evaluation of the judgment of Marx and Engels in this connection must be defective in the absence of the more thorough and separate consideration of the Young Hegelians as such that Professors Brazill and McLellan offer. Simultaneously, the role of the Young Hegelians in discrediting the old order and above all the validity of traditional Christianity is clarified. If a contemporary generation occasionally has proclaimed the death of God, the Germans of the 1830s and 1840s read a few similar pronouncements.

Both authors show a certain reluctance to link Marx too closely with the thoughts and especially the activities of the Young Hegelians. Thus they fail to bring out clearly that Marx's interest in a professorial chair in Bonn perhaps was subsidiary to his desire to join Bruno Bauer there in an atheistic crusade. An equal vagueness is apparent in connection with Marx's earlier role in the policies of the Rheinische Zeitung. He accepted, among other things, responsibility for the selection of Adolf Rutenberg, a Young Hegelian from Berlin, as the second chief editor of the paper in 1842. In tracing the impact of the Young Hegelians on Marx Professor McLellan notably confines himself too much to the search for specific ideas and concepts that the latter may have derived from the former. The letters that he consulted certainly suggest that Marx in the course of several campaigns bivouacked frequently with Bruno Bauer and Arnold Ruge. But a cautious approach is justified in many other instances, as when he cites certain concepts that Marx may have adopted from specific Young Hegelians, notably Max Stirner. McLellan states (p. 136) that Stirner's book was "to a large extent an amalgam of current clichés . . . the ideas of alienated labour and exploitation were by no means confined to Marx at this time, even among the Germans."

Professor Brazill, in citing a special study on the subject, underrates the obstacles that German writers faced under the Carlsbad Decrees of 1819. He states that everything "less than twenty pages in length" was subject to censorship (p. 83). The decrees actually said twenty "Bogen" (printer's sheets of 16 pages each, namely 320 pages). A fuller identification is in order when he quotes the memoirs of a member of the Frankfurt Parliament to the effect that "next to Freiligrath, Feuerbach was the most silent man there" (p. 152). Otherwise the reader immediately thinks of Ferdinand Freiligrath who, following various vicissitudes in 1848, became what one might call the poet laureate on the editorial staff of Marx's Neue Rheinische Zeitung from 1848 to 1849. But these are minor lapses that detract little from the broad merits of the work.

The texts of Professors Brazill and McLellan are very readable and rest on a reasonably thorough investigation of the primary sources as well as secondary studies. If Professor Brazill appears somewhat repetitious, this reflects the difficulties inherent in the writing of successive accounts of the views of various Young Hegelians who had certain things in common. The documentation, bibliography, and indexes in both books certainly are adequate, though not painstakingly exhaustive.

OSCAR J. HAMMEN

University of Montana

JOHN STUART MILL and HARRIET TAYLOR MILL. Essays on Sex Equality. Edited and with an introductory essay by ALICE S. ROSSI. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1970. Pp. ix, 242. Cloth $8.75, paper $1.95.

It has not escaped notice that the sacred text of the Women's Lib movement, "The Subjection of Women," was written by a man. By extending the canon to include "Enfranchisement of Women," the editor of the present volume has been able to issue it under the dual authorship of John Stuart Mill and Harriet Taylor Mill. ("Enfranchisement of Women" had originally been submitted for publication as Mill's own work but was later attributed by him to his wife, his own share in it, he explained, being "little more than that of an editor and amanuensis.") The two also figure as the dual heroes of Alice Rossi's introductory essay, "Sentiment and Intellect," in which their marriage is represented as the near-idyllic relationship that approximates the "dream in the heart of many young women searching for liberation in 1970."

The nineteenth-century idyll unhappily falls rather short of the twentieth-century dream. Professor Rossi sees its only shortcoming in its denial of sexuality, apart from which she finds it an admirable union of sentiment and intellect. (Not, needless to say, Harriet's sentiment and John's intellect. It would be cruelly ironic if this were the meaning attached to the title of her essay.) Other Mill scholars might find it hard to understand how this vision of the marriage can survive a reading of Friedrich Hayek's edition of their correspondence, from which Harriet emerges as a person without intellectual distinction and notably deficient in sentiment—indeed as being uncommonly vain and overbearing, mean-spirited and small-minded.

One would like to be able to put aside personalities and judge this volume in terms of the very considerable issues raised by the subject itself. Yet personalities constantly intrude and not only in the introduction, which so inflates the intellect and elevates the character of Harriet Taylor. This first essay is followed by an exchange of views on marriage and divorce written by Mill and Harriet Taylor shortly after they met apparently for their mutual edification. Here, too, one cannot resist comparing their respective contributions—twenty pages by Mill of rational, lucid reasoning, and four pages by Taylor of lofty, romantic, inchoate sentiments, uninhibited by conventional syntax or logic. (In printing the latter, Rossi proves herself a better scholar than "Women's Libber," since it is just this kind of prose that confirms the worst stereotype of the "feminine mind.") Nor can one help comparing Harriet Taylor's "Enfranchisement of Women" with Mill's "The Subjection of Women," again to Mill's favor.

The theme of Mill's essay has become familiar enough in recent years. (The complete essay is available in several editions, and excerpts appear in numerous anthologies.) The subjection and subordination of women, amounting, Mill claimed, to a virtual condition of slavery, was typified in the marriage contract, which gave the husband control of his wife's property and person and made him the guardian of their children. It is sometimes said that the abolition of these legal disabilities has made Mill's thesis obsolete. But this does not take into account his subtle view of subjection, in which the victim may become an unwitting, or even a willing and willing, collaborator in her own abasement. Nor is his argument vitiated by the fact that men have often chosen to exercise their power benevolently, since it is the fact of power rather than its use or abuse that he found, and many still find, degrading.

But if we are to take the essay as a tract for our times, we must also consider another aspect of it, which might give pause to some, particularly among academics, who have so heartily endorsed it. For Mill was arguing not only for a policy of equality but also for a policy of liberty. It was equality of opportunity that he was seeking, which meant, for him, the open, unlimited freedom to compete. The demand for equal or even proportional representation in a faculty or governing body, for fixed quotas at various ranks, to say nothing of "discrimination in reverse," would have been utterly abhorrent to him. His position here, as in On Liberty, was thoroughly individualistic; it was not the corporate body of women—their corporate rights, identity, or consciousness—that concerned him, but the rights, identity, and consciousness of the individual person. And even more than in On Liberty (perhaps because it was written later), his argument was Darwinian: the free play of competition was necessary to ensure the survival and ascendancy of the fittest—the fittest individuals, whether men or women.

As with all sacred texts, this one has great potentiality for heresy.

GERTRUDE HIMMELFARB

City University of New York

LEWIS H. GANN. Guerrillas in History. (Hoover Institution Studies 28.) Stanford: Hoover Institution Press, Stanford University, 1971. Pp. vii, 99. $3.95.

This is a fine expanded essay on modern guerrillas and insurgency. The materials on ancient and medieval slave, peasant, and popular uprisings are too sketchy to be helpful; those that deal with nineteenth- and twentieth-century insurgency and counterinsurgency are excellent. In an essay of this kind an index and an annotated bibliography would have been most useful; the Hoover Institution Press has not had much experience in publishing materials of general military educational interest. The most obvious omissions in Dr. Gann's bibliography are C. E. Callwell's Small Wars: Their Principles and Practice (1899) and Wilhelm Rüstow, Die Lehre von Kleinen Kriege (1864). That there is no notice of the export of European-mounted rural constabularies as one feature of modern imperialism seems surprising in view of Dr. Gann's interest in colonial history. On the whole, however, this is a thoughtful and well-balanced work. Its tone is one of Clausewitzian respect for the chameleon-like nature of human conflict, and it is quite free of morals and maxims from other species that make some works on war as unhelpful as the experiment with George Smith's dog Dewey, who, instead of getting fits from his failures, proved to be "profoundly incurious about the puzzle."

THEODORE ROPP
Duke University

RAYMOND LISTER. Antique Maps and Their Cartographers. [Hamden, Conn.:] Archon Books. 1970. Pp. 128. $8.50.

Raymond Lister's new book on the history of map making, following his earlier work, How to Identify Old Maps and Globes (1965), is an attempt to present a short survey of the art and science of map making to the general public. Such an addition to the literature of the subject would indeed be valuable; unfortunately, the manner in which the author organizes his material tends to leave the reader confused rather than informed.

Lister presents the information he amassed in three different ways. Some of it is organized in a straightforward chronological manner; some of it is described under the headings of the principal schools of cartography, for example, Low Countries, France, Great Britain; and some information is provided under regional divisions, for instance, the cartography of Africa, Asia, and Australasia. In the process, some information is conveyed in a sketchy manner; for example, the presentation of Chinese cartographic traditions or the chapter on map making in America, which omits any mention of such pre-Columbian traditions as were preserved in Aztec codices.

While there are several misspellings and a few notable errors in the book, it does nonetheless render service to the general public in two ways. First, its bibliographical sections are truly useful, not pretending to be complete yet providing basic references and a number of detailed studies that clarify the topic under discussion. And second, those sections of the work that deal with British map making contain a sizable body of biographical data on British cartographers, and information on their work, that would have to be laboriously gathered from a number of scattered sources.

A final note on the illustrations seems to be in order. The book contains fifty-eight good full-page photos of maps and a handsome color reproduction on the dust jacket. Yet, while fully recognizing the exceptional importance and width of range of the collections of maps held by the British Museum, I cannot but regret the scanty representation of remarkable maps held in other collections, outside the United Kingdom. This lack is especially noticeable when it comes to specimens of map making prior to 1500 and to specimens of non-European cartography.

GEORGE KISH
University of Michigan,
Ann Arbor

OTTO MAYR. The Origins of Feedback Control. Cambridge, Mass.: M.I.T. Press. 1970. Pp. vii, 151. $7.95.

OTTO MAYR. Feedback Mechanisms in the Historical Collections of the National Museum of History and Technology. (Smithsonian Studies in History and Technology, Number 12.) Washington: Smithsonian Institution Press. 1971. Pp. x, 133. $3.25.

Mayr begins The Origins of Feedback Control with a definition of feedback drawn from that given in 1951 by the American Institute of Electrical Engineers. Armed with his definition he seeks in the past mechanisms that fit it and that subsequently form the raw data he uses to construct his chronological narrative. He opens his narrative with the float valve that was discovered in antiquity, that drifted out of sight during the thirteenth century with the demise of the water clock, and that finally reappeared in the eighteenth century. Temperature regulators, as he recounts, appeared during the seventeenth century in the laboratories of scientists, but the regulators did not become practical devices until the early part of the nineteenth century. The search for efficient safety valves added pressure regulators to the technology of steam engines. The rising use of windmills during the eighteenth century fostered the development of feedback control mechanisms, the most notable of which, the rotating pendulum, inspired the realization of the steam engine governor, so he tells us. After discussing an instrument that permits the clocksmith to regulate clocks accurately, he closes his narrative. In a few final pages he makes an interesting comparison between the rise of liberalism and that of feedback control.

The book Feedback Mechanisms amplifies and broadens the treatment given in The Origins of Feedback Control. In the former book, which follows the same approach as that followed by the latter, the author chronicles the various types of feedback mechanisms found at the National Museum of History and Technology, thereby realizing a catalog that reveals the richness of the collection of instruments and machines found in this museum.

Mayr's bibliographical references show that he researched extensively in the preparation of his two monographs. In them the historian will find useful details but will look in vain for themes or arguments that would help him understand what factors led to the discovery of feedback controls and to their evolution. A definition drawn from engineering practice of the mid-twentieth century constitutes a poor start for a historical study because it leads to "whig history," to a natural history of technology. Mayr's book reads the way treatises on taxonomy did before the publication of Darwin's On the Origin of Species.

ROBERT M. MCKEON
Tufts University

C. D. O'MALLEY, editor. The History of Medical Education: An International Symposium Held February 5-9, 1968. (Sponsored by the UCLA Department of Medical History, School of Medicine; Supported by the Josiah Macy, Jr. Foundation. UCLA Forum in Medical Sciences, Number 12.) Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1970. Pp. xii, 548. $20.00.

This is a very venturesome book. Sweeping from ancient times to the present, it tells the history of medical education in nearly every part of the world (with Canada, Australia, and most of Africa being the only major areas omitted). A collaborative effort, the volume brings together articles by nineteen scholars who attended a 1968 international symposium on medical history at UCLA.

Ambitious though it is, the book is not, on the whole, very successful. The History of Medical Education, to me, is flawed in two important respects. Most serious is the lack of any introductory or other editorial comment tying the various (and numerous) selections together into some semblance of a unified whole. A single title page is the only guide one finds to the book's four major sections ("The Earlier Period in the West," "The Modern Period," "Eastern Europe and the Far East," and "Western Hemisphere"). Admittedly, writing such an introduction would be tough going, given the diversity of the nineteen selections; but that does not reduce the need. It magnifies it. Not having editorial comment, one feels like a man who was expected to reassemble a bag of parts into the original machine without any blueprint to guide him. Such an introduction might have noted the historic contribution of rulers and national governments to medical progress, the frequent reform role of medical students, the anticipation of modern medical advances in earlier periods, and the influence of Islamic and Western medicine (chiefly in Renaissance Italy, the Netherlands, Scotland, and Germany) on other national systems.

The other shortcoming, less serious because it is not generally characteristic, was the failure of several authors to consider relevant social and cultural factors. More contributors might profitably have heeded their colleague, William F. Norwood, who suggested that medical historians follow the approach of the physician, who always "examines the history as well as the physical condition of the patient, including his total environment." Instead, several authors wrote as if medical education developed in a social vacuum, unaffected by the wars, politics, social needs, and cultural forces that beat against medical school walls. As a result their articles were too much a tale of who taught what, when, to whom, and by what means. Into that category fell the selections on Classical Antiquity, the Middle Ages, Italy after 1600, the Netherlands, Scotland, India, and Ibero-America (although there, the concluding portion did note the influence of external factors).

Other selections, however, took a much broader view, and a few were solid historical accounts. I found the selections on Japan, Russia, the U.S. to 1900, England, and France very rewarding. The piece on Russia, besides pointing up the advances during the Tzarist period, reminded us again how far ahead of us the Soviets are in providing adequate medical care for all citizens. Other useful articles are those on twentieth-century American medicine, valuable chiefly as a bibliographic essay and on Indian and Islamic medical education, which forcefully (perhaps too forcefully) presented the claims of those regions to one-time world leadership.

The History of Medical Education will prove useful and interesting to cultural historians and historians of science and medicine, provided they read it selectively. Overall usefulness, however, is pretty much limited to reference purposes. One simply cannot read this book through and come away with any sense of a unity in the history of medical education on a worldwide basis.

EDWARD H. BEARDSLEY

University of South Carolina

JOHN R. PAUL. A History of Poliomyelitis. (Yale Studies in the History of Science and Medicine, Number 6.) New Haven: Yale University Press. 1971. Pp. xv, 486. $15.00.

The history of disease has always interested medical historians, and writing the entire history of a single disease is an immensely challenging enterprise. Rarely has the task been carried out flawlessly, because it is difficult for one man to encompass with equal competence a span reaching, for instance, from Imhotep to Jonas Salk. Dr. John R. Paul (1893-1971), who for many years was professor of preventive medicine and epidemiology at Yale, has accomplished the feat better than most. In forty-two chapters he tells the story from ancient evidence of the crippling effects of polio through the modern recognition of its viral nature, its epidemiological and serological characteristics, and its growth on tissue cultures, to the effective means of immunization now used.

Though an ancient disease in all probability, only in the last hundred or so years has polio been recognized in widespread epidemic form. We now know that it is an intestinal as well as a neurological disease and that it is endemic in the less highly sanitated areas of the world, where most infections are unapparent. The development of the iron lung, the controversy over Sister Kenny's treatment with warm packs, the avoidance of immobilization of limbs, and the scientific excitement of the 1954 field trials with Salk vaccine followed by the tragic events of the Cutter-produced vaccine of the following year are beautifully told.

Some negative criticism, however, must be made. Because in two books of the Epidemics of Hippocrates no cases of polio are included, Dr. Paul therefore assumes that the disease existed in antiquity only in sporadic form. In the first place, the argument ex silentio is weak and, furthermore, of the seven books of Epidemics that have survived, only two have been translated into English. I hasten to add that Dr. Paul makes no pretensions about being a historian; yet he has written a book of history, so one is put on guard. More than half the book is devoted to the last thirty-five years, and quite justifiably so. Here one might question his relationship to the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis, which never seems to have been close. At times he sounds a bit querulous, and he has failed to develop the theme of private philanthropy and basic medical research, which is central to the story of poliomyelitis. Perhaps Dr. Paul may be excused from the latter charge because he has relied heavily on Saul Benison's memoir of Dr. Tom Rivers, and he knew that Benison is at work on a major study of the National Foundation's role.

All historians of twentieth-century medicine, especially of the rapidly developing field of virology, will be indebted to Dr. Paul. He illustrates how a scientist in the midst of events in the recent past sees their evolution and implications. His honesty and modesty are appealing, but perhaps the latter is overdone. The inscription on a fine photograph of Jonas Salk on page 416 says: "To John Paul—who long pointed the way."

GERT H. BRIEGER
Duke University

GILLIAN T. CELL. English Enterprise in Newfoundland 1577-1660. [Toronto:] University of Toronto Press, 1969. Pp. 181. $7.50.

A new book on Newfoundland is always welcome to the growing community of students of Canadian history as well as to those interested in the expansion of Europe. This work deals with two areas of English enterprise, the development of the vast fisheries off the Newfoundland coast from 1577 to 1660 and the attempts to establish permanent settlements on the island for both strategic and economic reasons. Her work is based on the port records of the English west country, and for the colony she has discovered papers and a journal of Sir Percival Willoughby, one of the principal investors in the London and Bristol Company for the colonization of Newfoundland. These throw some new light on John Guy, the first governor of the colony and later mayor of Bristol. Since Willoughby was an owner of iron works, Guy reported the discovery of iron deposits but concluded that the colony's economy would be based on timber and fish. This, of course, involved difficulty with the fishermen, who made seasonal journeys to Newfoundland. The company also made grants to five other patentees including Baron Baltimore. Of all these attempts at settlement between 1610 and 1630 Mrs. Cell concludes none "had proved the answer to the problem of how to colonize Newfoundland," although they had proved it possible to live on the island. How many settlers remained is not estimated.

On the fishery itself the work gives only partial results. The impressive attempts at quantification indicate the development of a substantial re-export trade of Newfoundland fish by west country ports and fishermen, but the records are incomplete. On the enforcement of fish-eating legislation, Mrs. Cell differs from Samuel Eliot Morison in believing that it was usually evaded, and her work lacks the precise discussion of shipping and seafaring that the work of J. H. Parry, Morison, and others has led us to expect. "Sack ship" even if meaningful to Newfoundlanders has little meaning when it is realized that such ships varied from seventy to five hundred tons, nor does she explain how a fishing ship of seventy tons could carry eight dories (p. 4) each weighing three to five tons to Newfoundland. In conclusion this is a useful work with an excellent bibliography but more tantalizing than satisfying in its conclusions because of the nature and scarcity of the sources.

FRANCIS COGHLAN
University of New Brunswick

JOHN HOHENBERG. Free Press/Free People: The Best Cause. New York: Columbia University Press, 1971. Pp. xvii, 514. $9.95.

The literature pertaining to freedom of the press is fairly extensive, including such representative titles as Morris L. Ernst's persuasive The First Freedom (1946) and Leonard Levy's legalistic Legacy of Suppression; Freedom of Speech and Press in Early America (1960). Yet it may well be true that nowhere in print is there as broad-gauged and informing an account of the history of press efforts to criticize the government as the volume under review.

Free Press/Free People is the seventh book of John Hohenberg, quondam working journalist in the United States and abroad and presently professor of journalism at Columbia University. His thesis appears to be that there is a "sensitive and little understood relationship" of interdependence between a free press and a free people and that neither can exist very long without the other in any country or any age. To substantiate this viewpoint, the author moves rapidly through history, focusing on such topics as the Zenger case, the struggle for survival of the United States abolitionist press, the contribution of Bismarck to the ancient and dishonorable art of press manipulation, and affirmations of the libertarian creed by John Stuart Mill, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and others. Whereas much of the book deals with the United States, Britain, and Western Europe—where the battle for a free press primarily has been waged—it also treats significantly the press in China, India, Japan, and Latin America.

Although the privately financed Hutchins Commission on the Freedom of the Press reported in 1947 that the current danger to press freedom lay within the press rather than outside, Professor Hohenberg has relatively little to say about the social responsibility of the press. Also there seems to be some contradiction between the quotation (p. 468) from Walter Lippmann about the fragility of an independent press and Hohenberg's vigorous affirmation that the days of the free press are not numbered.

The lack of either a bibliography or any other form of documentation seems unfortunate in the light of several unsupported statements about important issues. How, for example, does the author know that Japanese intelligence never picked up any information about the Chicago Tribune disclosure that the United States had broken the Japanese code (p. 258)? And what is his basis for saying (p. 348) that American newspapers had not fallen so low in public esteem for more than a hundred years as after the Kennedy and Oswald assassinations? These reservations aside, Free Press/Free People embodies a useful synthesis of the tensions between newspapers and their governments within broad dimensions of space and time.

J. CUTLER ANDREWS
Chatham College

BRIAN CHAPMAN. Police State. (Key Concepts in Political Science.) New York: Praeger Publishers, 1970. Pp. 150. $5.00.

This compact study deftly achieves the aim of Praeger's Key Concepts series: to clarify certain "emotive" terms through historical and semantic analysis. Five chapters trace the "police state" from its eighteenth-century origins to recent times; four chapters discuss "new meanings" of the term, police methods and psychology, and the author's conclusions. The analysis rests upon historical data from European states, whose concepts and practices of the police function have differed from those in English-speaking countries where the term "police state" has been used "indiscriminately" as a pejorative since the 1930s.

Chapman discerns three kinds of police states. The "traditional" model evolved within the bureaucratic structures of the pre-Napoleonic French, Prussian, and Austrian monarchies and reached fruition in Fouché's "state apparatus" as protector, censor, and moral guide for society, subject to law and a rational division of administrative labor. After 1815 the traditional police state both continued (symbolized by Napoleon III) and then gradually lost its intrinsic qualities in the legal and institutional reforms preceding 1914. A "modern police state" model arose as Weimar Germany's Rechtsstaat yielded to Hitler's system: "It was like using a Rolls Royce not in order to carry passengers in comfort, but to run people down in the street." Nourished by an extraconstitutional taproot of power, the police penetrated the entire state structure and fused once-dispersed powers into a monolithic "offensive force" in society that finally became the director of internal policy. At that point the "totalitarian police state" superseded its "modern" progenitor. Himmler's police apparatus replaced the party as the state's ideological and administrative vanguard. Police power proliferated proportionally with the state's authoritarianism; in a state where authority knew no limits the police in time sought to become the state. Such, too briefly, is the author's historical argument.

Very perceptively Chapman relates the problem of police powers to modern society generally. Even in nontotalitarian states police necessarily wield degrees of arbitrary power, so that "the application of the law, although not the law itself, becomes relativistic," and the potential for abuse of power is endemic. Not only legal, but viable social norms shared by the police are necessary restraints. Impatient social idealism applied by reforming zealots bent upon rapid change can spawn a modern police state. We must constantly choose between the police as "either an instrument or a master."

The book is a stimulating challenge to further research and interpretation. One regrets only that the "modern" and "totalitarian" police state types are derived nearly exclusively from the Nazi experience; only passing reference is made to the USSR and none to Fascist Italy.

HOWARD C. PAYNE
Washington State University

Mouvements nationaux d'indépendance et classes populaires aux XIX<sup>e</sup> et XX<sup>e</sup> siècles en Occident et en Orient. In two volumes. (Commission Internationale d'Histoire des Mouvements Sociaux et des Structures Sociales.) Paris: Librairie Armand Colin. 1971. Pp. xvii, 402; 414-715. 100 fr. the set.

KONSTANTIN SYMMONS-SYMONOLEWICZ. Nationalist Movements: A Comparative View. Meadville, Pa.: Maplewood Press. 1970. Pp. ix, 91. Cloth $5.50, paper $3.50.

The two volumes of the first study are issued with the cooperation of UNESCO, the Institute for Social and Economic History at Heidelberg, and the Volkswagen Foundation. They are published under the auspices of the International Council of Philosophy and the Human Sciences and the National Tunisian Commission for UNESCO. The reports result from a four-year cycle of study in two stages: the first gathering held in Tunis and the second at the Twelfth International Congress of Historical Sciences at Vienna in 1965. Some forty scholars contribute to the synthesis; two-thirds of the reports are in French, one-third in English.

The purpose is to investigate the participation of popular classes in national movements of independence throughout the world and to find possible connections between national and working-class movements. Major sections are devoted to Europe, the Arab countries, black Africa and Madagascar, Asia, Canada, and Latin America. There is a summary for each major section, and six scholars (Labrousse, Portal, Bédarida, Droz, Chesneaux, and Bureau) contribute to the general conclusions.

As is to be expected in studies of this kind, no amount of briefing beforehand can assure common treatment. The result is that synthesizers find difficulty in extracting trends or currents. The varying approaches reflect the diversity of national movements. (Scholars of nationalism rarely find consensus.)

The papers are uneven in value. On the plus side is the brilliant contribution of Eric Hobsbawm (London), who explains why Ireland provides a classic case of nationalism, whereas Scotland and Wales have developed no serious movements for national independence. Equally meritorious is the paper by Werner Conze and Dieter Groh (Heidelberg) on "Working-Class Movement and National Movement in Germany between 1830 and 1871." Of lesser importance are the contributions by historians in underdeveloped countries who cannot resist the urge to continue beating the dead horse of Western imperialism.

The final section is devoted to tentative conclusions on such matters as the existence of a diffuse national conscience, opposition to the foreigner, organic bonds between social struggle and national liberation, attitudes of revolutionary parties to nations, problems of actions between countries, and obstacles to national emancipation.

The contribution by Vladimir G. Trukhanovskii (Moscow) on popular masses in the Soviet Central Asian Republics reveals the sad fact that some Russian historians either do not know or are unwilling to accept the difference between history and historicism. Apparently there is a chasm between historians contaminated by the bourgeois Enlightenment and Soviet scholars blessed with total understanding.

Trukhanovskii opens with what he believes to be a correct interpretation of historical development. He is certain that, notwithstanding all its multiformity and contradictory character, history constitutes a single law-governed process. Mankind passes through five socioeconomic formations: primitive-communal, slave-owning, feudal, capitalist, and communist. The transition from one formation to another is determined not by the free choice of men but by objective laws operating independently of man's will under the principal law of social revolution. "With the establishment of the communist formation, antagonistic contradictions between the production forces and relations of production come to an end, the exploitation of man by man is abolished and the antagonistic classes and the class struggle disappear."

Trukhanovskii exempts the Soviet Central Asian Republics and Kazakhstan from his law of progression. Fortified by an eight-page bibliography from the "Archives," by "Documentary Publications," and by "Articles in Scientific Journals," he tells how popular masses in this area acceded to the socialist socioeconomic system by "by-passing the capitalist stage of development." The general law-governed process is not violated: "individual exceptions merely serve to confirm the general rule."

The Russian historian informs the newly emerged Asian and African states that they, too, "have the good fortune of being able, if they so desire," to obtain Soviet support. He quotes Lenin (1916): "We shall exert every effort to establish cordial and fraternal relations with the Mongols, the Persians, the Indians, the Egyptians, we consider it our duty and our interest to do so."

One turns with a sense of relief to the modest but scholarly study by Konstantin Symmons-Symonolewicz. Nationalist Movements: A Comparative View is a welcome addition to the growing literature on nationalism, certainly the finest sociological study since Florian Znaniecki's Modern Nationalities (1952). As a sequel to his earlier book, Modern Nationalism: Towards a Consensus in Theory (1968), in which he gave a valuable typology of nationalism, Symmons-Symonolewicz presents a comparative analysis of nationalism as a social movement. He seeks to fill a gap by considering nationalism as a social movement. He uses as his focus the factors that underlie the origin of nationalist movements, shape their development, and determine their source or failure.

Historians will be pleased by the author's approach: he is sensitive to nationalism in time and space. Unlike other sociologists he uses language readily understandable by scholars in other disciplines. He knows the enormous literature of nationalism well, and he uses it effectively. He concentrates on essentials, and his interpretations are rational and impressive.

In compact chapters Symmons-Symonolewicz discusses nationalism from cultural crisis to cultural and political self-assertion, national language and national boundaries, nationalism as ideology, the nation as a moral community, the crucible of alien rule, and nationalism in historical perspective. He describes the most common type of nationalism—that of subject peoples striving for cultural and political emancipation—and gives attention to the "life cycles" of European movements. He does not ignore the distinctive features of non-Western nationalism. Like the late Hans Kohn, he is convinced that there never has been and never can be any justification for a policy of national oppression. "So long as national, or ideological, oppression exists there can be no durable peace."

Symmons-Symonolewicz's study is encouraging to historians of nationalism who favor a multidisciplinary approach. It does much to help clarify an ism suffused with paradox, inconsistency, and contradiction. Above all, this first-rate study reveals that there is still merit in the Rankean goal: to tell it "wie es eigentlich gewesen ist."

LOUIS L. SNYDER

City College,

City University of New York

BARRY M. GOUGH. The Royal Navy and the Northwest Coast of North America, 1810-1914: A Study of British Maritime Ascendancy. Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press. 1971. Pp. xvi, 294. $12.00.

The northwest coast of North America was so remote from Great Britain and so close to the rising power and population of the United States that it is remarkable that Britain succeeded in holding it. Gough's thesis is that the main explanation lies in the strength of the Royal Navy. No matter how deeply Americans felt about "Fifty-four forty or fight," even President Polk could not overlook British power. The book traces the history of Britain's rule on the northwest coast during about a century, from the time when her fur traders appeared on the Pacific to the transfer to Canada in 1910 of the naval facilities at Esquimalt on Vancouver Island. Other topics of interest deal with the Oregon crisis, minor naval engagements on the Pacific with Russia during the Crimean War, Anglo-American difficulties during some small gold rushes, the dispute over the San Juan Islands, and repercussions in the northwest of the Anglo-American antagonism during and after the Civil War—all, except the Oregon controversy, events of little importance.

Gough naturally tries to make as much as possible of the impact of the navy in determining the outcome of these incidents. As a result he is apt to minimize other factors that may have been more significant. In analyzing the Oregon settlement, for example, he mentions Aberdeen's threat to commission thirty ships of the line and concludes: "In all likelihood, this alarming news induced the Americans to adopt a less belligerent attitude" (p. 79). Perhaps so; but the point is a contested one, and there is more reason than Gough admits to believe that the thirty ships were not crucial.

Beyond this point of detail there is an overall lack of clarity as to whether the decisive factor was, not British naval operations along the northwest coast, but British sea power in general. It scarcely needs arguing that the fact that Britain had the world's strongest navy threw a shield over British Columbia, just as it did over all British colonies. Much less evident is the contention that the occasional appearance of one or more warships on the coast had any additional effect. Thus the book is primarily a history of British Columbia developing under the protection of a mighty motherland, rather than a history of the specific contribution of naval units operating on the northwest coast.

The book is well written and thoroughly documented. The appendixes give details about ships and officers on the northwest coast. For anyone interested in a fringe area of British sea power, the book is to be recommended.

CHARLES S. CAMPBELL
Claremont Graduate School

ROBERT A. HUTTENBACK. Gandhi in South Africa: British Imperialism and the Indian Question, 1860-1914. Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1971. Pp. ix, 368. $9.75.

"The genius of the British constitution requires," M. K. Gandhi wrote in 1911 as he struggled with the South African government, "that every subject of the Crown should be as free as any other, and, if he is not, it is his duty to demand and fight for his freedom so long as he does so without injuring anyone else." It is one of the many curious aspects of this struggle, as of the later and more fateful one in India itself, that Gandhi did not appeal to any primordial rights of man but always stayed within the framework of a legalism that depended upon appeals either to existing British laws or to what he conceived to be the spirit of the British Constitution. This fact is probably more significant for the successes and failures of the movements he led than any insights that may come from the elucidation of his theological and philosophical positions. A principal merit of Robert A. Huttenback's study is that the juridical element is kept to the forefront, a reminder that while the confrontations between Gandhi and the bigots are a moving testimony to the dignity of the human spirit, the basic confrontations took place in the law courts—and in government offices. It was there that the officials—South African, Indian, and British—who were faced with the political dilemma of liberalism tried to work out a solution for a problem that was insoluble.

The problem was very neatly stated by Sir West Ridgeway, a former Indian governor, in the inevitable letter to the Times. He noted that the people in England who wanted all citizens in the Empire to enjoy equal rights were at the same time believers in the Empire—"academic imperialists" he called them (p. 332). With brutal clarity he pointed out that it was precisely the self-governing colonies—that is, the ones run by the whites—that would never tolerate the entry of blacks in any number and certainly would never give them equal rights. There is a special poignancy, then, in following Gandhi's quest for equality before the law for his fellow Indians in South Africa, for one senses that he really believed that to appeal to the law was to reach beyond the oppressors to a source of freedom.

Huttenback has written a worthwhile book, but like the rest of the works that have sought to illumine Gandhi's place in history, it depends to a very considerable extent upon our prior acceptance of Gandhi's greatness. We are told what Gandhi did, and how people responded, but not much about why he acted, or why he engendered the response he did. As Gandhi recedes in time and public memory his life and times become more enigmatic, less susceptible to the methodology of political history.

As a comment on the continuing lack of academic communication despite all the efforts of recent years, it may be noted that B. N. Mishra completed a doctoral dissertation for Patna University in 1969 on this same topic of Gandhi's South African years. Reference to it probably would not challenge Huttenback's general emphasis, but it adds to the understanding of the issue by greater attention to its importance for Indian politics.

AINSLIE T. EMBREE
Duke University

ARNOLD THACKRAY. Atoms and Powers: An Essay on Newtonian Matter-Theory and the Development of Chemistry. (Harvard Monographs in the History of Science.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1970. Pp. xxiii, 326. $12.00.

The evolution of science immediately before and after the development of Newtonian physics has frequently been described as the gradual refinement of a powerful analytical approach involving reductive descriptions of natural phenomena and the quantification of forces. Seen from this standpoint, scientists of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries were arriving at the "mechanization of the world picture," a phrase recently considered to be synonymous with the emergence of modern science. Historians have occasionally described the work of such scientists as Lavoisier and Dalton as a "delayed revolution," indicating the belief that the introduction of the mechanical view came later in chemistry than in physics.

Arnold Thackray, who teaches the history of science at the University of Pennsylvania, has presented a different view of the development of chemistry. In this impressive and sensitive monograph in the Harvard series on the history of science, Thackray demonstrates that the triumphs of nineteenth-century chemistry were not built on a reductionist foundation but rather were achieved in isolation from the science of physics.

Thackray's thesis is that the descriptive model used by the partisans of the new chemistry rested on a different concept of matter than that of the physicists in the Newtonian tradition. The physicists were enamored with the measurement of micro-scale forces of attraction and wished to explain chemical reactions in terms of a mathematical law that would do for "chemical mechanics" what Newton's inverse-square law had done so brilliantly for celestial mechanics. Furthermore, many of them accepted Newton's "nut-shell" theory of matter, which assumed both the inertial homogeneity of matter and the inaccessibility to observation of its most elementary constituents. These assumptions were unproductive and even obstructive when applied to chemistry; progress in that field came only when these concepts had been replaced by a nonreductive emphasis on macro-scale weight studies, the assumption of the inertial heterogeneity of matter, and a definition of elements that rested on the results of laboratory analysis rather than matter theory.

Thackray has not only revealed the internal characteristics of rival conceptual schemes of chemical structure but has also attempted to illustrate the links between these schemes and theology, philosophy, and developing industry. In a book of modest size no one could entirely succeed in the latter assignment; Thackray, realizing this limitation well, has written an unusual conclusion that is more a call for additional research than a summary of his own work. Both the achievement of the book and the invitation in its conclusion merit attention.

LOREN R. GRAHAM
Columbia University

THOMAS HAWKINS. Lebesgue's Theory of Integration: Its Origins and Development. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press. 1970. Pp. xv, 227. $12.50.

Equivalents to the concept of integration had been developed by Eudoxus and Archimedes almost two millennia before differentiation methods, such as that of Fermat, achieved dominance in the calculus of Newton and Leibniz. Integration, as distinct from antidifferentiation, resumed its rightful place in analysis when Cauchy in 1821 and 1823 defined the integral of a continuous function. During the next few decades Dirichlet and Riemann set the stage, well outlined by Hawkins in his first chapter, for the problem central to this volume—the distinction between continuous and integrable functions. The remaining five chapters, covering the years from 1870 to about 1910, describe how, as more pathological types of functions came under scrutiny, theorems had to be amended under new standards of rigor. Questions were raised as to the integrability of functions such as  $\sin[1/\sin(1/x)]$ , which has infinitely many infinitely dense points of discontinuity. We read how, during the 1880s, the role of measure-theoretic properties of sets was examined by such men as Weierstrass and Cantor; and the last decade of the century is described by the author as "a period of transition" in which "the notion of measurability . . . formed the crucial link."

Peano and Jordan, in 1887 and 1892 respectively, had adumbrated the notion of measure of a set, leading in 1895 to Borel's concept of a set of measure zero.

Lebesgue, like Borel a graduate of the École Normale Supérieure, shortly after his graduation published in the Comptes Rendus a series of research announcements that culminated in his doctoral thesis of 1902, "Intégrale, longueur, aire," and his classic Leçons sur intégration of 1904. These works presented a concept of measure more general than that of Borel and a definition of the integral that included that of Riemann as a special case. In a series of further publications (references are found in Hawkins's ample bibliography) Lebesgue developed his integral into "an analytical tool capable of dealing with—and to a large extent overcoming—the unresolved problems that had arisen in connection with the old theory of integration." His work was warmly received, and its triumph was assured by further abstractions, such as the Lebesgue-Stieltjes integrals of Radon (1913).

Hawkins's volume is not to be digested in a casual perusal by a mathematical tyro; but a reader with seriousness of purpose and a thorough grounding in real analysis will be rewarded with a well-reasoned account of the step-by-step development of one of the most important concepts in modern mathematics.

CARL B. BOYER
Brooklyn College,
City University of New York

CHARLES HARVARD GIBBS-SMITH. Aviation: An Historical Survey from Its Origins to the End of World War II. (Science Museum.) London: H. M. Stationery Office; distrib. by British Information Services, New York. 1970. Pp. xvi, 315. $9.00.

When Charles H. Gibbs-Smith's The Aeroplane: An Historical Survey appeared in 1960, it received rave reviews in numerous trade journals. Unfortunately, the significance of the book escaped the academic community, partly because the author so organized his material—less than 150 pages of narrative, followed by numerous quotations, a glossary, charts, and lengthy sections on the development of such things as kites and parachutes—that the book was more a dictionary or an encyclopedia than a historical survey.

Aviation: An Historical Survey, an extensive revision of the former work, corrects some of the organizational problems as well as some of the minor errors. Among other things, the glossary and quotations are kept, but the narrative is expanded (discussions of technical problems are reserved for a later volume). The result is one of the finest books published on the history of aviation, one as impressive for its perspective as for its detail.

Gibbs-Smith devotes almost half his narrative to the pre-Wright brothers era. The long and laborious birth of aviation, he feels, was in many ways more important than the natural maturing in an age of technology. The former involved thinkers and dreamers centuries removed from practical flight, followed by more than a century of "forerunners" who attempted to turn hope into accomplishment. Then, in little more than a decade, success. What followed was mostly one technological development after another.

Gibbs-Smith's sterling reputation, bearing the imprint of an impressive background in aviation history and a sound understanding of the science and technology associated with flying, certifies both his emphasis and his conclusions. His view of the Wright brothers, for example, contrasts sharply with the commonly accepted idea of two lucky bicycle manufacturers. He shows the Wrights to have been first-rate inventors and thorough students of flight who grasped certain essentials that somehow escaped their European counterparts. These essentials, according to Gibbs-Smith, were mastery of glider flight as a necessary prelude to powered flight, acceptance of the best aerodynamic theory, adequate testing before flight, and perhaps most important, the courage born of understanding to build inherent instability into their aircraft. In deliberately making their airplanes so they would have to be piloted with skill, the Wright brothers were selecting the one path that allowed mastery of the air. This, Gibbs-Smith suggests, was the reason why the Wright brothers were flying long distances and turning with ease, while their European rivals were still trying to get airplanes to stay in the air.

The refreshing perspective of Aviation: An Historical Survey is, however, only one of its prime qualities. There is also Gibbs-Smith's skillful blending of ideas, budding technology, scientific theory, and the perseverance of pioneers in describing one of the greatest advancements of all time. Hence the book should appeal to the intellectual historian, the historian of science and technology, the aviation buff, and perhaps the area specialist who, thanks to efforts beyond his present horizons, now races with ease to lands and archives that were once well out of reach.

PHILIP M. FLAMMER
Air University Review

BARNET LITVINOFF, editor. The Letters and Papers of Chaim Weizmann. Series A, Volume 2, November 1902–August 1903. New York: Oxford University Press. 1971. Pp. xlvi, 489. $12.75.

This second volume of the letters of the man who was for many years the leading figure in world Zionism maintains the high standard set in the first. One might have some reservations about the wisdom of the decision to publish all the letters in the Weizmann Archives, if only because at the present rate the publication is likely to require several decades. The condensation of letters to Weizmann to extracts or summaries in footnotes is at times awkward, and transliteration from Yiddish and occasionally Russian is not standardized. But overall the editing, translation, and annotation of this multilingual collection are excellent.

If the contents of the letters are relatively unspectacular, it is because in the period covered (November 1902–August 1903) Weizmann was not yet in the forefront of Zionist leadership, and in any case the movement itself was at a low ebb. The present volume closes on the eve of the Sixth Zionist Congress and the great controversy over the so-called Uganda (East Africa) colonization scheme, and instead of Uganda the largest single group of letters deals with Weizmann's activities in behalf of the premature project of establishing a Jewish university in Europe or Palestine. Nevertheless there is much of great interest here. The reader gets glimpses of Weizmann's enormous charm and intelligence and considerable material for Zionist and general Jewish history in the early twentieth century. The highlight of the collection is undoubtedly Weizmann's long letter of May 6, 1903, to Theodor Herzl, which gives a broad picture of the state of Russian Jewry and especially of its youth—a youth seen as drifting into the arms of socialism and the Bund and as alienated by the semiclerical and "Western" official Zionist orientation. Herzl and the early Zionist leadership appear unresponsive to the needs of the East European Jewish masses, whose spokesman Weizmann tried to be.

Future volumes in this monumental series will no doubt be of even greater interest, for they will trace Weizmann's rise and Zionism's stormy history. The high standards set in the early volumes ensure that scholars will find them fascinating to read and, above all, a comprehensive and useful source.

SOLOMON BEINFELD
Washington University

RONALD W. CLARK. Einstein: The Life and Times. New York: World Publishing Company. 1971. Pp. xv, 718. $15.00.

The present state of Einstein studies invites the energetic biographer. There exist vast archival materials largely untouched; a great number of relevant specialized works; and, in the way of competition, recollections of former associates, collections of anecdotes, hagiographies, picture books, potboilers, and "great lives in science." Mr. Clark, a practiced biographer who only three years ago gave us three generations of Huxleys in one volume, has responded to the invitation with the ambitious Life and Times under review.

Mr. Clark's particular contributions are the wide range of his sources and the admirable determination to fashion a full and balanced biography from them. They are, however, less easy to exploit than to discover. Mr. Clark's superficial knowledge of modern physics puts him at a disadvantage. The spirit as well as the content of Einstein's work eludes him; he must substitute romance or mystification for analysis (Einstein "soared up into the mathematical stratosphere where the battle had to be fought"); and he consequently cannot describe his subject's genius in terms of its most characteristic output. Likewise Mr. Clark's innocence of both the history and philosophy of modern science prevents him from placing Einstein's contributions in context. In particular, he misses the point of the heroic debates between Einstein and Bohr over the interpretation of quantum mechanics, and he exaggerates the bearing of the discussion on the scientific isolation of Einstein's later years. Nor does Mr. Clark appear to have the temperament or style required for his task. Where Einstein is economical, witty, careful, and precise, Clark is repetitious, prolix, pallid, and diffuse.

These characteristics mar even those parts of the book where Clark is most at home. His accounts of Einstein's external career—the employment in the Bern patent office, the steps up the academic ladder, the special professorship in Berlin, the pacifist and Zionist activity, the move to Princeton, the sailing, the fiddling, and so forth—are interesting and informative. But Clark gives his reader little help in constructing a consistent picture of the actor in these events. He emphasizes what he calls “paradoxes”—Einstein the unreligious Zionist, Einstein the pacifist behind the atomic bomb, Einstein the naturalized Swiss and German hater, who clung for twenty years to his position in Berlin. He tells us that the ill and soxless recluse of Princeton, the weary world figure, the uprooted European, differed little from the vigorous and dapper patent clerk of Bern, or from the famous Berlin professor, the friend of Rathenau, Weizmann, and the queen of the Belgians. He describes Einstein's nonscientific views and plans sometimes as “naive,” sometimes as “shrewd,” and sometimes as “prescient.” When one ponders these dicta in the light of Clark's claim that Einstein was “similar in work and outlook” to Max Planck—a strong nationalist, a good German, stiff, formal, and conservative—one conjectures that Mr. Clark has not read Einstein's character any more closely than he has read the theory of relativity.

JOHN L. HEILBRON
University of California,
Berkeley

GLENN B. INFELD. Disaster at Bari. New York: Macmillan Company. 1971. Pp. xii, 301. $7.95.

In August 1943 reports reached the United States that Germany might use gas. President Roosevelt responded with a public warning and confidential permission for the dispatch of a supply of mustard gas to the Italian theater. Some one hundred tons of the chemical were sent in strictest secrecy to the depot at Bari aboard the John Harvey. At this time the Allied air forces were overconfident; Bari, under “that old handmaiden of disaster, multiple command,” lay open, exposed, and well lighted. The Luftwaffe struck on December 2, 1943; it destroyed seventeen ships, damaged eight others, and caused a death toll of over a thousand among Allied military and Italian civilians. The John Harvey went down with all its crew and, thus, those who might have given warning were eliminated.

The Bari tragedy was well hushed up at the time and remained rather obscure until now. Infield, himself a pilot in the U.S. Army Air Force during the war, took great pains in gathering the material for his book. In Germany he interviewed General Student and Luftwaffe pilots who served under him; in England officials who had been involved gave information albeit reluctantly; in the U.S. Infield received full cooperation from the military. The bulk of the material, however, came from the author's visit to Bari, his survey of the area, and his discussions with survivors. He has put together a very readable monograph with clever chapter titles and has piled up the evidence to sustain his conclusions. Very few of the 617 military and merchant marine casualties need have died, he states, if knowledge of the chemical agent had been immediately available. “Most of the deaths were due primarily to the prolonged exposure.” Infield insists that “secrecy, then and now, is the main cause of such tragedies. All matters pertaining to chemical warfare agents are cloaked in this ‘iron curtain’ of secrecy, usually to the detriment of all concerned.”

There are no footnotes but the author provides a full bibliography and appendixes, and the sources for specific fact statements are rather clearly indicated by the context of the narrative.

HOWARD M. SMYTH
Bethany Beach,
Delaware

D. C. WATT. Survey of International Affairs, 1962. (Issued under the auspices of the Royal Institute of International Affairs.) New York: Oxford University Press. 1970. Pp. ix, 558. $14.50.

The Royal Institute's superbly useful Survey of International Affairs series has now reached 1962 with the release of the second volume prepared under the editorship of D. C. Watt. In addition to taking overall responsibility for the 1962 volume, Watt has written most of the book himself, delaying publication to take account of "the literary 'fall-out' of the Kennedy régime." This fallout greatly enriches the narrative in a number of chapters, for the Survey is based on already published materials and the information now available on the events of 1962 is unusually full, particularly with regard to the involvement of the United States in the world arena.

Given the inherent limitations in writing current history without access to government archives, this volume is admirably broad in coverage, objective in tone, and clear in perspective. Watt summarizes again the Cuban missile crisis and threads his way with clarity through the maze of Anglo-Franco-American policy in Europe, carrying this subject to the defeat of President Kennedy's "Grand Design" at the hands of General de Gaulle early in 1963. Watt includes also a brief treatment of the strategic policies of the nuclear powers (the United States, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, and France); a chapter on what he calls the "Intermarium," which deals with Finland, Poland, Yugoslavia, and Austria, with a separate section on the South Tirol; a summary of the crisis in the United Nations; and a very interesting survey of the acquisition of western New Guinea by Indonesia.

John Erickson is responsible for the illuminating discussion of Sino-Soviet relations from October 1961 to January 1963, while John Major treats the difficult problems of Africa, with a special chapter on the explosive relations of France with Algeria. Michael Donelan skillfully compresses into twenty-five pages the financial policies of the Western powers.

The crucial problems of Southeast Asia, the Sino-Indian conflict, and the Arab world centered on Cairo fall to Richard Gott. Gott did not, of course, have available the Pentagon Papers when he chronicled the events of 1962 in Vietnam and Laos, but their revelations probably would not have altered his conclusions materially.

The usefulness of this volume as a reference work is marred by the shabby treatment given by the Oxford editorial staff to senior United States officials below the very top level. Some officials (Rostow and Sorensen) are the victims of mere typographical errors, but the names of others—Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., Foy Kohler, Livingston Merchant, and Howard Trivers in the Executive branch and Harry Flood Byrd and Wayne Hays in Congress—seem to have been maltreated through deeper carelessness. The indexer has copied the mistakes of the text and has then added errors of his own. Finally, there is a certain lack of precision in the titles ascribed to various officers, notably Paul Nitze, who turns up in the wrong department. Americans surely deserve editorial care equal to that bestowed on statesmen from Europe, Asia, and Africa.

RICHARDSON DOUGALL
Department of State

ANCIENT

HANS GOEDICKE. The Report about the Dispute of a Man with His Ba. (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press. 1970. Pp. vii, 248. $12.00.

The ancient Egyptian literary work commonly known by the title of the Lebensmüde and here given a new title is one of the best known of all ancient works of literature, and many Egyptologists have made attempts to translate it and to understand its complexities. This new edition is an important contribution to the discussion that has continued ever since the first edition by Erman appeared in 1896, and the full treatment of both subject matter and language in this study advances our understanding of a fascinating document.

The text almost certainly dates from the first Intermediate Period or early in the Middle Kingdom and is one example of a group of writings all of which have, so far as we can understand them, considerable literary merit and are known for their pessimistic view of life and of the condition of Egypt at the time. The work studied here does not entirely fall into this category and as the editor shows is a speculative work concerning the nature of the life of man. It takes the form of a dialogue dispute between a man and his ba, the man defending an idealistic view of the afterlife while his ba takes a more practical and material view and deprecates the excessive concern of the man with death and its aftermath. The nature of the ba, that important element in Egyptian religious belief sometimes translated as "soul," is discussed by the editor at some length.

The book consists of a very interesting and elaborate discussion of the nature of the text, followed by a detailed and scholarly commentary on grammatical, lexical, and semantic aspects. The hieratic text is given by photographs of the original papyrus accompanied by a hieroglyphic transcription. This is preceded by a straightforward English translation from which it can be seen how difficult it is, in view of our limited knowledge of Egyptian, to have a proper understanding of religious and philosophical writings.

The non-Egyptological reader may well find it difficult to appreciate how the very complex and closely argued thesis in the main discussion can be sustained by our still hazy knowledge of what the document really says. The edition and commentary is a tour de force and gives some glimmering of the nature of Egyptian thought and literature.

P. L. SHINNIE

University of Calgary

E. W. MARSDEN. Greek and Roman Artillery: Technical Treatises. New York: Oxford University Press. 1971. Pp. xviii, 277, 14 plates. $16.00.

Engineering handbooks are a byword for meager style and turbid jargon; without the accompanying diagrams they would be well-nigh impenetrable. Ancient technologists conform to this pattern except that their illustrations, when not totally obliterated, are corrupt. Recently one cluster of these perplexing writers has engaged the attention of E. W. Marsden of Liverpool; his Greek and Roman Artillery: Historical Development (1969) collated the evidence in a novel but plausible synthesis. Syracuse, it seems, gave us the crossbow in 399 B.C. Somewhat later, perhaps about 350 B.C., Philip's Macedonian artificers invented the catapult, which despite appearances is not a crossbow—the arms are not joined but are mounted individually in twisted rope springs. Sundry refinements followed; certain larger versions were adapted for stones. Altogether the catapult reigned supreme without radical innovation until the advent of the trebuchet in the twelfth century.

Now we have the companion volume with texts of the five primary sources, translations (often the first), commentary, and drawings. The first primary source, Ctesibius of Alexandria's Artillery as re-edited by Hero of Alexandria, discusses the crossbow and modifications of the catapult until 270 B.C. One quibble: the text figures for euthytone catapults show the curved side of the crossbeams facing backward; according to a sketch transmitted in the manuscript they should be reversed. The second source, Bito of Pergamum's How to make War Engines and Artillery, specifically deals with four crossbows, a siege tower, and a scaling ladder. Marsden's date (ca. 240 B.C.) makes Bito old-fashioned; with the alternative, 140, he is hopelessly anachronistic. "The most curious thing about this work is that no one so far has been able to understand it," A. G. Drachmann commented in 1963. Marsden unravels every knot. Philo of Byzantium's Artillery, the third source, is a discussion of standard catapults for stones and javelins and four experimental designs. It was probably written between 230 and 200 B.C., for it ignores developments after 200 B.C. Marsden has made a full-size three-span arrow firer, weighing seventy-five pounds and shooting over three hundred yards. Vitruvius's Architecture (10. 10–12. [ca. 25 B.C.]), the fourth source, describes two catapults. The figures in his table of dimensions for different calibers are unexpectedly low; Marsden suggests that they are Roman inches rather than Greek digits. The fifth source, Hero of Alexandria's The Hand-Catapult (after A.D. 62), has baffled commentators such as Rudolf Schneider ("das Bruchstück eines . . . Lexikons für Konstrukteure," "vom Geschützwesen kaum eine Spur" [Römische Mitteilungen (1906)]). In Marsden's view it sets forth the standard Imperial arrow thrower that was pictured on Trajan's column and mentioned by fourth-century authors. Paradoxically some sources designate one component as the "bow"; it is not a bowstave, says

Marsden, but the sighting arch. His reconstructed cheiromballistra shoots 150 yards.

The final chapter concerns the sturdy "one arm" or "wild ass" (medieval mangonel), Hellenistic invention that finds no description before Ammianus. Marsden's scale model shot small missiles almost five hundred yards.

In short Marsden has curbed a whole stable of uninviting and refractory texts. His book is serviceable, ingenious, and persuasive.

W. MCLEOD
Victoria College,
University of Toronto

C. BRADFORD WELLES. Alexander and the Hellenistic World. Toronto: A. M. Hakkert. 1970. Pp. 265. Cloth $8.00, paper $2.95.

This book was ready for the publishers at the time of the author's sudden death in 1969, and it was seen through the press by Alan Samuel, who has added a brief epilogue. Welles inherited from Rostovtzeff the tradition of introducing Yale undergraduates to Hellenistic history, and every teacher who has attempted a similar task has wanted a book that complemented Tarn's Hellenistic Civilisation by offering an account of political history with more detail than in his introductory chapter. The difficulty of writing such a book is enormous, even for someone who is as perfect a master of his subject as Welles was.

After a brief introduction describing the achievement of Philip, there is an account of Alexander in chapter 2 in the "modern" manner, in full reaction against the interpretation of Tarn, who defended Alexander against his attackers and believed he was influenced in great part by idealistic motives. Welles insists on Alexander's ruthlessness, invites us to believe that his detractors are less likely to be lying than his defenders, and that Arrian's faith in the veracity of Ptolemy and Aristobulus is unjustified. The argument is presented with skill and conviction, but to those of us who want to know why Alexander was respected by some while others feared and hated him, it may seem rather one-sided.

The next chapter sets out to tell the story of the Hellenistic kingdoms from the death of Alexander to the battle of Actium, covering nearly three hundred years in a hundred pages.

It is perhaps too much to expect that a summary narrative of this kind will guide a student safely through the forest of these troubled centuries. It is easy to say that Welles included too much detail, but if one starts to cut down trees in the hope of better revealing the character of the forest, the result may be to transform the forest into a desert that has neither character nor form. Is the traditional "survey" the best method of introducing students to this period of history? It seems to me a pity that Welles adopted the plan of a single continuous narrative, attempting to keep track of simultaneous events in several different areas, instead of splitting up the narrative with digressions or giving separate accounts of the individual dynasties and the different problems and themes that call for discussion. Must an account of political developments necessarily precede a discussion of society and culture, and must the story necessarily be told in chronological order? Would it be helpful to describe the situation as it was about 250 B.C. before trying to explain how this result was reached?

I raise these questions the more readily because the highest praise is due to the subsequent chapters on "Social and Economic Aspects" and "Hellenistic Culture." Inevitably every reader will miss something that he would have liked to see included (my own regret was to find so little attention devoted to Hellenistic schools and the development of the gymnasium), but this is where a student will discover how much is known about the Hellenistic world that cannot be known about earlier periods of ancient history and how much knowledge has been gleaned from papyri and inscriptions.

LIONEL PEARSON
Stanford University

STYLIANOS SPYRIDAKIS. Ptolemaic Itanos and Hellenistic Crete. (University of California Publications in History, Volume 82.) Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1970. Pp. 113. $3.00.

The title of this small volume is somewhat misleading; much of the text deals neither with Hellenistic Crete nor Ptolemaic Itanos but with eastern Crete in the Hellenistic period. In brief, Spyridakis argues that by Hellenistic times three cities of consequence, Itanos, Prais-esos, and Hierapytna, survived in this area. Because of the "natural antagonism" between Eteocretan and Dorian, an explosive atmosphere, rife with tension and continuous conflict, prevailed. This incessant warfare, he believes, prompted the Itanians to invite the Ptolemies into their city about 270 B.C. Once established there the Ptolemies promoted peace in the area and used Itanos as a base for recruiting mercenaries until their deteriorating position in the eastern Aegean forced them to withdraw about 200 B.C., though they did return briefly under Ptolemy Philometor.

While Spyridakis's discussions of individual inscriptions and particular events are adequate, the work suffers from a number of serious defects. Only a few can be mentioned here. His desire to include everything, relevant or not, has resulted in a poorly organized volume. Matters of consequence are ill defined; thus on a single page (p. 3), Itanos is referred to as a virtual protectorate, a protectorate, and a possession of the Ptolemies, and the confusion is never entirely resolved (cf. pp. 82, 88). Of greater consequence, the author's conclusions seem to emerge more from his own basic assumptions than from the evidence he presents. His discussion of events after 145 B.C. demonstrates conclusively that warfare did not decline in eastern Crete after the destruction of Praisos, the one supposedly Eteocretan stronghold in the area. This negates his conclusion that warfare between Itanos, Praisos, and Hierapytna derived from some natural antagonism between Eteocretan and Dorian.

Anyone interested in Hellenistic Crete will find Van Effenterre more rewarding; anyone interested in Ptolemaic Itanos would be well advised to draw his own conclusions from the epigraphical evidence assembled by Guarducci.

THOMAS KELLY
University of Minnesota,
Minneapolis

JAMES H. OLIVER. Marcus Aurelius: Aspects of Civic and Cultural Policy in the East. (Hesperia: Supplement XIII.) Princeton: American School of Classical Studies at Athens. 1970. Pp. xv, 160, 8 plates. $10.00.

The purpose of this work is to publish a text, translation, and discussion of a remarkable document of Marcus Aurelius from Athens, containing his decisions in cases concerning office holding, membership of the council and Areopagus, and the appointment of the Athenian members of the Panhellenion (the Pan-Hellenic council of cities instituted by Hadrian). Documents revealing decisions by the Roman emperors continue to be published in ever-increasing numbers. But this one surpasses in importance and difficulty both the Tabula Banasitana, also from Marcus Aurelius' reign, now being published by William Seston in Comptes-rendues de l'Académie des Inscriptions, and the long series of imperial letters from the excavations of Aphrodisias.

The puzzles it presents as a document are rather briefly touched on by Oliver (pp. 35-37), as also by C. P. Jones in his prompt and valuable re-edition of the text, "A New Letter of Marcus Aurelius to the Athenians" (Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik 8 [1971]: 161). In fact it is clearly not a letter but appears from its final paragraph to be a collection of imperial legal decisions on Athenian cases put together and translated into Greek at the imperial court. The occasion and purpose of the compilation is not clear from internal evidence but may have been mentioned in the missing prescript.

Oliver is similarly brief on the background of imperial jurisdiction, a major, indeed central, part of the emperor's functions, on which the new document provides a flood of new evidence and new problems. Instead, as his wide-ranging title implies, he moves immediately to a series of problems about the constitution of Athens, events in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, and, above all, the Panhellenion, on which his chapter 4 provides the fullest collection of evidence now available. In short, he has published, with admirable speed, a vast and fascinating new document and has also provided with it both less and more than the reader could have hoped for.

FERGUS MILLAR
Queen's College, Oxford

JÜRGEN DEININGER. Der politische Widerstand gegen Rom in Griechenland, 217-86 v. Chr. Berlin: Walter de Gruyter. 1971. Pp. xviii, 279. DM 48.

The title of this book is to be taken with strict literalness; it is not a discussion of Roman imperialism in Greece but of the resistance, mainly the internal resistance, of Greek states to the expansion of Roman political and military power in their country. Roman imperialism is taken as an unanalyzed fact. The foregoing is a favorable criticism; it is good and serviceable to have a book of this kind. Nevertheless it is perhaps not quite so original as the author thinks. Writers in the past held the concept that the "democrats" were anti-Roman and the "oligarchs" pro-Roman; Deininger points out that we have been aware for some decades that the word "democracy" in the Hellenistic Age regularly connotes what classical Greece had known by "oligarchy." Therefore, he argues instead that the upper classes were divided into pro- and anti-Roman factions while hoi polloi were regularly and consistently anti-Roman, whether moderately or extremely. All of this is quite true, but one doubts whether in recent decades even those scholars who sometimes slipped, anachronistically, into using democratic in its classical sense really understood the word in that sense. One notes that Deininger himself uses the word anachronistically (pp. 240-41).

Deininger, in effect, discerns three phases in Greek anti-Romanism; the first, limited to the late third century, stigmatized the Romans as barbarians. During the second phase, from the Second Macedonian (or better, the Aetolian) War to the Third Macedonian War, there was a quarrel between anti- and pro-Roman upper-class leaders, the former supported by hoi polloi. The defeat of Macedonia and the rigorous suppression of anti-Romanism in Greece in 168-67 B.C. ended upper-class resistance to Rome; yet Deininger must admit that Greek leaders during the Achaean War, two decades later, certainly included upper-class figures (cf. pp. 228, 234). Finally, one may quibble about the terminal date as marking the absolute end of political resistance to Rome: even in the principate, Athens, at least, witnessed such resistance, if anti-Roman riots of hoi polloi meant anything.

In all, this is a useful book but not as important or profound as is the author's previously published study of Roman provincial councils.

STEWART IRVIN OOST
University of Chicago

CHESTER G. STARR. The Ancient Romans. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971. Pp. 256. $7.95.

It is occasion for praise and gratitude when a distinguished scholar sets his hand to an introductory work aimed at high school and junior college audiences. Students who enter Roman history via Professor Starr's admirable volume will not have to divest themselves of multiple misconceptions when they reach more advanced levels.

The work is intelligently conceived and successfully executed. Starr abandons the traditional textbook's concern for "coverage." There is not much bald narrative or tedious recital of facts. Four major subjects receive emphasis: the clash of Rome and Carthage, the career of Julius Caesar, the Antonine Age, and the rise of Christianity. Starr rightly prefers ample treatment of a few topics to a superficial touching of all bases. Special essays are devoted to certain other items, like the Etruscans, the army, Roman law, and late imperial art; Starr offers them as separate objects of attention, not buried in a mass of narrative. Excellent illustrations, charts, and maps grace the text; and the illustrations possess full explanatory comments, not just standard captions. Selections from the sources are placed at the end of each major section, organized under headings and elucidated by brief introductions. A convenient and appropriate design.

Some criticisms may be registered. It is misleading to portray the Twelve Tables as guaranteeing fair justice to all citizens (pp. 15-16) and quite erroneous to apply the term "democracy" to the Roman Republic (p. 16). Montesquieu and the Founding Fathers may have seen in the Republican constitution a system of checks and balances and a separation of powers, but their notions ought not to be confused with the facts (p. 59). The equestrian order as a "separate wealthy class" can hardly be discerned in the third century B.C. (p. 25). Nor should the equestrians be identified with commercial and financial leaders (p. 70). Starr omits all mention of agrarian problems and barely notices the lower classes in the late Republic (pp. 71ff). The concept of a "golden age of the good emperors" (p. 180) is belied by many of the sources that he himself includes. Little attention is paid to the Jewish background of Christianity and no hint given of the conflict in early Christianity over conversion of the Gentiles (pp. 185-87). The stress on imperial opposition and persecution of Christians fails to make clear how little official persecution there was before the mid-third century A.D. (pp. 189-92).

It is easy to find fault. But the merits of Starr's work earn appreciation. He has achieved lucidity without excessive oversimplification. The problems confronting an ancient historian and the tentativeness of conclusions are emphasized—a feature uncommon in introductory books. As an initial exposure to Roman history for younger students this volume has few peers.

ERICH S. GRUEN
University of California,
Berkeley

DONALD R. DUDLEY. The Romans: 850 B.C.—A.D. 337. (The History of Human Society.) New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1970. Pp. xxvi, 316. $7.95.

This volume in the History of Human Society series has an excellent introductory essay by the editor, J. H. Plumb. At one point Plumb reveals the assignment of the individual authors in the series: "Their aim will be to reconstruct the societies on which they are experts. They will lay bare the structure of their societies—their economic basis, their social organizations, their aspirations, their cultures, their religions, and their conflicts. At the same time they will give a sense of what it was like to have lived in them."

Dudley obviously wrote this book with the general series in mind, but the task is difficult for a Roman historian. The sources for Roman history, particularly the Roman Republic, are essentially political. The ancient Roman historians did not write about "human society," and Dudley knows his Roman historians well, perhaps too well to write the kind of book this series calls for.

Dudley's problem is evident in his treatment of the Republic. The social and economic problems of the Republic are directly related to politics and warfare, and the historian who writes about those problems must either assume that his readers know the political background or he must summarize it for them. Since the History of Human Society series is not directed to specialists, Dudley decided to summarize. Unfortunately he did not strike a balance between political background and the problems of society at large. There are too many brief chapters on politics. (The chapter on the three Carthaginian wars is five pages long, and the one on Antony, Cleopatra, and Octavian is not quite three full pages.) Marius is introduced as the creator of the professional army, but the reader is not told what happened to him after his victory over the Cimbri and Teutones.

The discussion of the Roman Empire is much more in keeping with the purpose of the series. There is more evidence, particularly archeological, for the history of society in the Roman Empire, and Dudley makes good use of it. There are brief chapters on such topics as "Travel," "Public Careers," "Frontiers," and "Universal Religions." In addition there are two good chapters on the provinces. Although Dudley is probably not critical enough of Christian tradition, his judgment is generally good and his treatment interesting.

Unfortunately almost half of the book is devoted to the Roman Republic and too much of that to unsatisfactory political summary. There are points in the last half of the book where the reader will begin to understand "what it was like to have lived" under Roman rule, but in general the book fails to give a clear picture of Roman society and culture.

There is a good index and bibliography. In the acknowledgements the author says that the illustrations were planned as "an integral part of the book," but some of them are unnecessarily poor, especially the ones of Hadrian's Wall, Masada, and Cosa. The title of the book is somewhat misleading since it does not end with the death of Constantine, as the date suggests, but with the final collapse of the Roman Empire in the West.

ARTHER FERRILL
University of Washington

ROBERT E. A. PALMER. The Archaic Community of the Romans. New York: Cambridge University Press. 1970. Pp. ix, 328. $12.50.

Each citizen of republican Rome found himself in the peculiar position of belonging to three different groups and three different assemblies involved in the functions of government: he was a member of a curia (comitia curiata), a century (comitia centuriata), and a tribe (comitia tributa). Of these the oldest and the most important for our knowledge of archaic Rome is the curia. Attempting to see through the haze of myth in Livy, Dionysius, and Varro by critical sifting of the evidence and with the help of heortological records, Palmer has given us his interpretation of what the curiae were and what role they played in the early government. At times he has let his imagination run too far and has seen curiae or suspected their influence in inscriptions where, in fact, they are not mentioned—for example, the Caeretan curia is really attested (CIL XI, 3593), but the curator of CIL XI, 3614 is a curator civitatis, and there is nothing there to suggest any reference to a curia. In general, however, Palmer's work contains much sound reasoning. He is not a slave to traditional scholarly views and is quite ready to break new ground. But his excavations will not always support the weight of his superstructure.

Palmer believes that there were, as tradition says, thirty curiae, but that the last three of them were not formed until the very early years of the Republic. He accepts a common etymology for the word (co-vir-ya) and defines it as an "assemblage or congregation cooperating by common consent." The Quirites turn out to be the members of the curiae. He concludes that the curiae were originally the distinct ethnic groups that were brought together in the hill district of Rome, eventually forming the Roman state. The assembly of all the curiae largely gave direction or advice to that united state, but it in turn was presided over and controlled by that very king whom it put into power. This curiate government was conservative and was ultimately confronted by a reactionary and progressive movement called the centuriate or Servian constitution. The opposition of the curiate to the centuriate can be seen, Palmer believes, in the power of the curiate assembly to elect the plebeian tribunes and the military tribunes, power the curiate ultimately lost. The new military centuriate system curbed and limited curial religion, eventually winning political success, but down to the Licinian-Sextian Laws of 367 B.C. the two systems existed side by side. Thus, for almost 150 years these two systems coexisted, the curiate system gradually losing power in all but a few areas. Apart from an occasional vagueness and a certain inability to see the weakness of details that arise from his main thesis, Palmer's interpretation of the curiate system makes good sense. For one thing it illuminates the conditions under which the curiate assembly had acquired the power to confer imperium on the kings and, later, on the higher magistrates.

This is a scholarly work, not easy to read, certain to evoke controversy, and required reading for all those interested in early Rome. But the reader must be careful not to confuse Palmer's theories with established truth.

ROBERT K. SHERK

State University of New York,
Buffalo

STEPHEN BENKO and JOHN J. O'ROURKE [editors]. The Catacombs and the Colosseum: The Roman Empire as the Setting of Primitive Christianity. Valley Forge, Pa.: Judson Press. 1971. Pp. 318. $6.95.

When he composed his History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, Edward Gibbon chose to introduce the Christian Church to his readers only after discussing Diocletian's tetrarchy. After two centuries of scholarly endeavor the Gibbonian approach is still widespread. Today a historian of the Roman Empire is likely to postpone an assessment of the Christian Church until the eve of its fateful alliance with the Roman state. The dangers of this procedure are manifest: despite precautions the Roman historian inevitably glosses over some aspects of the early Church; and just as inevitably his reader fails to understand why the Church was so powerful in late antiquity.

The present volume is a work of church history. Its purpose is to call attention to an analogous sin of church historians, their failure to take full account of the Roman Empire in their study of the early Church. This work consists of a series of essays, most of which were presented at the Philadelphia Seminar on Christian Origins in 1969, on the Roman environment of the Church to A.D. 135. Following an introduction by Robert M. Grant, there are treatises on early imperial politics by Stephen Benko; the institutions and social structure of the principate by John G. Gager, Clarence L. Lee, John T. Townsend, and John J. O'Rourke; administration in the early Empire by James L. Jones and William White, Jr.; and early imperial religion by Robert A. Kraft, Donald Winslow, Gerhard Krodel, and Robert L. Wilken.

Since this work is intended mostly for the student of the early Church, church historians will be the primary judges of its timeliness and value. But the essays will also be of use to the historian of the Roman Empire, and it is this aspect of the book that I wish to emphasize. The historical merit of these essays is not immediately apparent, for at first glance they seem to offer simply a conventional synthesis of the Julio-Claudian, Flavian, and early Antonine principate. Although some essays—notably those of Gager, Jones, and Wilken—are excellent, no new discoveries are presented. Furthermore, there are numerous small errors of fact and interpretation. In Grant's introduction, for example, Hadrian's favorite Antinous becomes "Antoninus" (p. 18). Grant and Kraft (pp. 17 and 82), influenced by the recently discovered inscription designating Pontius Pilate as [praefectus Iuda[ea]e], ignore the fact that after the accession of Claudius provincial governors of equestrian rank generally bore the title of procurator (see A. H. M. Jones, Studies in Roman Government and Law [Oxford, 1960], 115–25). The Roman historian, then, might view this collection of essays solely as an orthodox piece of early imperial history, but in doing so he would miss a spirit of curiosity that is evident throughout the book—a spirit that the contributors obviously wish to be contagious.

In effect, the results of this work are of less importance than the interest behind them. A group of church historians has compiled some fairly up-to-date information about the Roman environment of the early Church. Might Roman historians conduct a similar investigation of Judaism and Christianity during the early principate? All contributors to the present volume implicitly or explicitly invite a response from the historian. Grant's explicit invitation (p. 24) may serve as a Parthian shot at the Gibbonian approach: "The early history of Christianity is Roman history, and I should claim that Roman history itself needs the collaboration of those who try to relate the Christian movement to the whole life of the Empire."

FRANK M. CLOVER
*University of Wisconsin,
Madison*

EDITH MARY WIGHTMAN. Roman Trier and the Treveri. New York: Praeger Publishers. 1970. Pp. 320. $15.00.

This study is intended as a survey of the historical development of the land of the Treveri under the Roman Empire. The work is divided into seven chapters on the land and the people, the Treveri and Rome, the city of Trier, the countryside, daily life and economics, and religion. Also included is a four-page epilogue on the transition to the Middle Ages, a forty-five page bibliography, twenty-four plates, twenty-five figures, and eight maps. Despite its scholarly appearance the book is intended essentially for the "reader with a general interest in Roman studies." Experts are encouraged to read between the lines because the work is not adequately documented. The use of Latin quotations and the frequent allusions to scholarly controversies, however, seem to project this study beyond the competence of all but the most dedicated amateur.

These drawbacks might discourage the reader of even a great synthesis, but here they are a blessing in disguise since they will keep both experts and amateurs from wasting their time. Chronology, an essential element for the study of both history and development, is largely ignored. It might be charitable to suggest that the archeological record is insufficiently complete at this time to provide the exact chronology necessary for writing history. In economics, the one area where the author seems to have some notion of development, she misses the significance of vital evidence. She maintains, largely on the basis of mosaic evidence, that the Trier area reached its peak in prosperity during the late second and early third centuries. Yet, during the later second century cheap sandstone replaced the more expensive and more durable limestone as the common building material.

Perhaps it is unfair to apply the criteria of historical criticism to this work. An author whose speculations lead her to attribute causality to "the extravagant Celtic temperament" seems to lack a professional grasp of historical method. This book seems to be an archeological catalog comprised largely of descriptions of artifacts. The section on villas reads like a real estate salesman's brochure. The author's justification for discussing an artifact is frequently its "most interesting" construction or "very interesting" workmanship rather than its value as evidence for historical development.

BERNARD S. BACHRACH
University of Minnesota,
Minneapolis

BARRY CUNLIFFE. Fishbourne: A Roman Palace and Its Garden. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press. 1971. Pp. 228. $15.00.

Readers of the Journal of Roman Studies will recognize the fine ability of British archeologists to reconstruct the Roman presence in Britain from scanty evidence. When the physical remains are abundant, as on the vast site at Fishbourne near Chichester in Sussex, and are meticulously excavated, the reality of Roman Britain may be dramatically restored. Barry Cunliffe, who excavated Fishbourne, 1961-69, and supervised its restoration, has provided the visitor with the experience of a Roman palace and garden, sensitively preserved in a suburban setting largely with the help of volunteers and the local community. Although he has published a lengthy scientific record of the excavations elsewhere (1971), Cunliffe's book, addressed to a broad public, is a model of haute vulgarisation, clearly and imaginatively written, well illustrated with good photographs, plans, and reconstructions, and neatly demonstrative of archeological methods and Roman architecture.

The excavator's concern for the topographical implications of the site, its changing occupants, and the architectural history of the palace articulate his skillful presentation. The geographic nature of the site on the edge of a marshy seashore limited activity in pre-Roman times to salt-panning and fishing, jeopardized and complicated building during the Roman occupation, and probably contributed to the abandonment of the place in the fourth century. Fishbourne's location on the south coast of England opened it to Roman conquest from Gaul, then made the area important as a secure base for Roman operations in central Britain, and last exposed the place to the barbarian raids that ravaged the coastline. A similar interest in the occupants of the site enlivens Cunliffe's descriptions of the palace during its 250 years of settled inhabitation and culminates in a fine bit of historical detection that offers Tiberius Claudius Cogidubnus, client-king of the area under Claudius and the Flavians, as the probable owner and patron of the palace and gardens at Fishbourne.

It is the palace itself that captures our attention, the largest (about 450 by 500 feet), the costliest (approximately $3,500,000), and the most lavishly appointed yet discovered in Roman Britain. Although the site was first occupied by Claudian military buildings, later transformed into a proto palace under Nero, the vast palace seems to have been deliberately planned and built in the Flavian period by an architect who adapted Italian models and building practices to local materials, crafts, and climatic conditions. If Cunliffe's account of the adaptive process is fascinating, so, too, is his careful description of the design, construction, and decoration of the palace, of its division into public, administrative, and residential wings, and of the magnificent formal garden (250 by 330 feet), fully enclosed by the architecture that it complemented.

Frequently repaired and remodeled in the second and third centuries, the palace at Fishbourne was destroyed by a great fire ca. 300 A.D., and its building materials were subsequently looted or broken by plowing. But the palace and the life it contained have been vividly reclaimed by the author in his conscientious and entertaining account.

RICHARD BRILLIANT
Columbia University

JOHN HOLLAND SMITH. Constantine the Great. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1971. Pp. 359. $8.95.

Constantine the Great has more than one thing in common with the other figure from the ancient world who has merited the same epithet: Alexander III of Macedon. Both started a new age. Both had an instinctus divinitatis about them, although its manifestations were different. Both changed the course of history about as much as individual men can hope to do. And each generation of scholars has found a new Constantine and Alexander the Great. The nineteenth century stripped Constantine of his Christianity and left him a hard-boiled politician. This century has allowed him to be at least sincerely superstitious, a child of his age.

John Holland Smith's Constantine is a compromise figure. He resurrects the view that Constantine's vision before the battle of the Milvian Bridge, if it was anything at all, was the sun high in the atmosphere shining through a veil of ice crystals. Visions in the late Empire are easier to explain by psychology. Like many before him, Smith sees something significant in the fact that Constantine waited until near death before he received baptism. Yet deathbed baptism was a common practice of the time; even Theodosius the Great planned to receive his baptism then, although he miscalculated and recovered from what he thought was his last illness after baptism. There is no point resurrecting this old chestnut.

At the same time, something that "may or may not have been sudden conversion to faith in Christ" happened before the battle of the Milvian Bridge. Smith does not commit himself. There is nothing wrong with suspending judgment, but Smith's compromise Constantine is not quite believable.

Smith generally writes from original sources with disappointingly few references to modern scholarship. There are occasional errors in judgment: he argues, for instance, that Constantine's edicts of 326 concerning sexual irregularities could not refer to the "affair" of Crispus and Fausta, since they do not mention it specifically. However, Smith's Constantine is a readable biography, no great contribution to scholarship, but reasonably reliable.

J. A. S. EVANS

McMaster University

MEDIEVAL

EDWARD PETERS. The Shadow King: Rex Inutilis in Medieval Law and Literature, 751-1327. New Haven: Yale University Press. 1970. Pp. xv, 257. $10.00.

O, what pity is it/ That he had not so trimmed and dressed this land/ As we this garden! (Richard II, III, iv.) Medieval men did not normally think of kings as gardeners. The problem that concerned Shakespeare in Richard II, however, was one that had long concerned them as well: the king who was unsuitable to his high dignity. In this volume Mr. Peters has assembled some aspects of the history rex inutilis from the deposition of Childeric III to the deposition of Edward II. He has cast his net widely. Childeric, Louis the Pious, Boson of Vienne, Arnulf of Corinthis, and Pepin of Aquitaine—as well as Gregory VII's use of this early deposition tradition—have been caught in the first chapter; Beowulf, the chansons de geste, the Heimskringla, and the early Arthurian romances in the second; and a hundred years of canonist discussions in the third. From these he moves to the deposition of Sancho II of Portugal by Innocent IV in 1245, later Arthurian literature, the abdication of Celestine V, and, finally, the depositions of Adolf of Nassau and Edward II.

Mr. Peters is at his best when analyzing particular texts. His discussion of the Childeric reference in Gregory VII's letter to bishop Hermann of Metz is one of several that are both perceptive and persuasive. Medieval historians will also be grateful for the extended treatment of Sancho's deposition, an event that has not won the attention it clearly deserves in histories of regnum and sacerdotium in the Middle Ages.

The collection of so many events and literary traditions between the covers of a book ought to be justified by a synthetic vision that gives them patterned relationships and significance. The present book, however, does not do so. It is a collection of studies on a theme rather than a coherent history. The result is, in places, a curious imbalance, in others a piece without a place. In the chapter on the Arthurian romances, for example, he gives us an elaborate summary of the plots of the Vulgate narratives; in the chapter on canonist deposition theory, however, only the briefest mention is made of legal discussions concerning episcopal inutilitas, though this discussion bears directly on the deposition of King Sancho II. In another chapter there is a lengthy and very interesting discussion of changing theological conceptions of acedia. But this is connected with the theme of the chapter in only the vaguest possible way ("the concepts of acedia and other vices . . . had contributed to a background against which royal inadequacy might be viewed") and then drops completely from sight. If Mr. Peters is really saying what the structure of his book implies—that the phenomena he discusses are parallel but not connected—it would have been interesting to have his reflections on how the legal, the literary, and the moral-philosophical traditions managed to go their separate ways for so long within a single intellectual culture. As it stands, the book will serve as a collection of well-crafted articles.

FREDRIC CHEYETTE
Amherst College

IRVING A. AGUS. The Heroic Age of Franco-German Jewry: The Jews of Germany and France of the Tenth and Eleventh Centuries, Pioneers and Builders of Town-Life, Town-Government and Institutions. New York: Yeshiva University Press; distrib. by Bloch Publishing Company, New York. 1969. Pp. xi, 380. $12.00.

There is no question that Professor Agus knows his Responsa literature and has a superb understanding of Jewish intramural relations. How can one properly discuss the Jews as "pioneers and builders of town-life," however, when one not only does not discuss the town but also makes no use of recent socioeconomic scholarship that deals with the problems of the period's urban and economic development? Professor Agus's other studies based upon the Responsa are the chief authorities for this work: in chapter 1, for example, 60 of 131 footnotes are from others of Agus's works; in chapter 4, the proportion is 150 of 178; in chapter 7, it is 59 of 62, while in the crucial last chapter (11, "Relationship between Jews and Non-Jews") it is 56 of 65 footnotes.

Because Agus pays scant attention to non-Jewish material, he overstates his position. He speaks of "The Heroic Age," and the "pioneers," yet I found neither heroes nor pioneers in this work. While it is true that Jews did make the dangerous trip to the East (as did some Christian pilgrims), most of the Jews of whom he writes lived in the established communities west of the Rhine. Mainz seems to be the eastern outpost in Germany. The author states that "the Jews were the first self-ruling town dwellers of Western Europe in the early Middle Ages. In many places northwest of the Alps where a town sprung up, it thus developed around a nucleus of a group of Jewish families organized as a community." Not only is no evidence cited for this, but when Agus does discuss Jewish resettlement it is in terms of being invited into an established community.

The author briefly quotes August Kluckhohn (1857) and James Westfall Thompson (1928) as "modern scholars" describing life in the tenth and eleventh centuries. Life during that period was indeed difficult, but to conclude that Europe was "war-torn, constantly feuding, robber infested, and completely lawless" is an overstatement that modern (later than 1928) scholarship would not support.

The late Professor Cecil Roth once warned against neglecting the "hidden Jews," that is, the poor Jew out in the countryside. Professor Agus denies their existence. For him the source of the Franco-German Jew (and for the entire East European Jewry) was about 5,000 (or 1,000 families) rich, prosperous, landowning merchants with a "tremendous dedication to the study and practice of Judaism." Nowhere is this proven.

There is another major problem. The book is impersonal and general. The reader is constantly faced by a lack of specific names, dates, and places: "The Queen of Hungary relied on two Jews. . . . She often sent one of them on important missions." Which queen? When? Where? The footnote in this case cites Agus's two-volume Urban Civilization (p. 232). The reader learns that Jew A did this, that, or the other; but where or when is not stated. It would seem as though time and place had no meaning for Jewish life.

There are some minor problems: what, for example, is R. Glaber's first name? There is a choice: Rudolfus, Ralph, or Raoul. Footnote 1 of chapter 3 (p. 96) starts out "See ibid., pp. 99-100, where," and ends, "See ibid., p. 101, note C." I presume the ibid. refers to his two-volume Urban Civilization, cited in footnote 107 (p. 77) of chapter 2.

Agus's work is excellent as a study of Jewish life, and it is also helpful as a supplement for European economic development (the sections on the Jew as a borrower of Christian capital, and on the purchasing power of a pound of silver are significant), but when Agus writes of the non-Jewish world or when he begins to compare and contrast, let the reader beware.

J. LEE SHNEIDMAN
Adelphi University

WOLFGANG VON STROMER. Oberdeutsche Hochfinanz, 1350-1450. In three volumes. (Vierteljahrschrift für Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte, Beihefte, Numbers 55-57.) Wiesbaden: Franz Steiner Verlag GmbH. 1970. Pp. xxi, 218; 220-460; 463-608. DM 30; DM 30; DM 36.

URSULA SCHWARZKOPF. Die Rechnungslegung des Humbert de Plaine über die Jahre 1448 bis 1452: Eine Studie zur Amtsführung des burgundischen Maître de la Chambre aux Deniers. (Veröffentlichungen des Max-Planck-Instituts für Geschichte, Number 23.) Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht. 1970. Pp. 217. DM 26.

These three numbers of the Vierteljahrschrift für Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte are designed to be bound together as a single volume of some six hundred pages. The first traces the outlines of a general commercial-financial history centering on the city of Nuremberg from the mid-fourteenth to the mid-fifteenth centuries. There is little that is remarkably new in this picture of south German relations with the Hanse in general and with portions of Flanders in particular, with Lombardy (particularly with Milan and Venice), and with Austria-Hungary and the trans-Carpathian region. The great value of this part of von Stromer's work lies in his extensive research in public and private archives, his confirmation of many commercial documents used by earlier scholars, and his discovery of numerous additional documents not utilized by economic historians before this time. The result is to fill out much that has been mainly conjectural heretofore.

The second portion of von Stromer's work is more original and will probably need to be modified somewhat when future scholars have investigated the sources from a different point of view. Here the author is concerned with the relationship between Nuremberg financiers and the policies (especially the Italian policies) of the imperial Luxembourg dynasty. Undoubtedly the availability of extensive credit as well as financial expertise allowed the members of the Luxembourg dynasty to act with greater confidence and more ambition than would otherwise have been true—and perhaps the ease and availability of such financing contributed to their failure to take a sufficiently realistic view of the peculiar problems of the medieval empire.

The last section of this work is filled with transcriptions of original documents, tables, bibliography, and indexes. Von Stromer's bibliography, even though presented in curiously abbreviated form, is excellent. The various indexes, covering the individual members of mercantile families as well as the great houses and places mentioned in the documents, are most useful. Only the inflated price at which this work sells will detract from its general scholarly appeal.

It is more difficult to fit Professor Schwarzkopf's monograph into the general theme of economic history. Her work is more narrowly the study of the accounts kept by one man, Humbert de Plaine, during a brief period (1448-52) while he exercised financial control at the Burgundian court of the duchess, Isabella of Portugal, and was also master of accounts for her son, Charles the Bold, Count of Charolais. As such, this is a careful study of accounting methods developed in the Burgundian territories and practiced by Humbert de Plaine; but at the same time it offers something a little broader—a study of the social and economic place held by members of those families who had devoted themselves for several generations to mercantile and financial activities. Quite obviously the original humble beginnings of the Burgundian mercantile families did not prevent their entering the ducal service and being rewarded for their services by grants that might bring them into the lower ranks of the feudal aristocracy.

For the student interested in the development of accounting procedures as well as for the social historian interested in the activities and products for which greater or lesser sums of money might be spent in the Burgundian territories while that conglomerate duchy was at the peak of its prosperity and power, this will be an extremely useful work.

K. F. DREW
Rice University

JOSEPH RATZINGER. The Theology of History in St. Bonaventure. [Chicago:] Franciscan Herald Press. 1971. Pp. xv, 268. $12.50.

This book, a translation by Zachary Hayes of Die Geschichtstheologie des Heiligen Bonaventura (1959), is unchanged from the original, as Ratzinger comments that the reviews of his work did not substantially alter his basic thesis, except for some modification of his views of the dependence of Bonaventure on Joachim of Fiore. He analyzes the historical views of "the prince of mystics" through his university sermons delivered at Paris in 1273. These Collationes in Hexaemeron were mined in an attempt to discover how the theology of history had changed from the great static concepts of the Church fathers like Augustine to the new dynamic views of the Joachimites.

Accepting much from Joachim's Concordia Veteris et Novi Testamenti, Bonaventure was led to agree that "new knowledge arises constantly from Scripture; and this happening, this history, continues onward as long as there is any history at all." Scriptural exegesis clarifies the past and in turn permits prophecy. As Christ is the center of the ages and as all is determined by "that same divine order which is the unifying law of all reality," a theology of history becomes imperative, seeking not only the "meaningfulness of events" but the "eventfulness of meaning." Chaos, randomness, and caprice are thus ruled out of the main stream of human history.

Bonaventure found the source of his inspiration through the progressive reinterpretation of Scripture and from a mystical attempt to ascertain the inner meaning of the Old and New Testaments and their relationship to each other. The Middle Ages were, like most ages, full of change and controversy. The battle raged between the views and conclusions of an Aquinas and those of the advanced mystics. Somewhere in between was the "orthodox" mysticism of Bonaventure. If allegory and numerology, doctrines of six or seven ages of man, the great chain of being, and the identification of Francis of Assisi with Elijah and John the Baptist cannot be taken for granted by many of today's pragmatic historians, Dr. Ratzinger has nevertheless done all a great service by producing a clearly worked out map of part of the mind of a great medieval thinker.

ALLEN D. BRECK
University of Denver

ANTHONY BLACK. Monarchy and Community: Political Ideas in the Later Conciliar Controversy, 1430-1450. (Cambridge Studies in Medieval Life and Thought, Third Series, Number 2.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 1970. Pp. xii, 189. $10.50.

From the thirteenth century on, the relationship between the head and members of bodies politic was a recurrent issue in the political life of European societies, and each such struggle for authority occasioned new efforts to define in theory the relation of the ruler to his community. This book, true to its title, examines the theories advanced for and against the claims of the Council of Basel (1431-49) to be the supreme authority in the Church. The work is admirably organized as three concise essays.

Part 1 delineates the views of the Baslean Conciliarists, among whom John of Segovia emerges as both the typical and leading thinker. At Constance the Conciliarists had claimed that the council was in some special cases superior to the pope; most notably the Basleans generalized this claim into superiority in every respect. Among Segovia's political ideas the most remarkable is "the concept of trust," which measures the injustice of government by, as it were, the credibility gap. Thus any presidens who acts contrary to the intention of his people, or the majority of that multitudo, has in fact lost the trust (credulitas) that for Segovia was the basis of authority. Such an evil president is deposed ipso facto because, once he has discredited himself by opposing his own private judgment to the will of the majority as duly expressed in a representative assembly, he can no longer be presumed to be a public person who represents the common will.

Part 2 treats the apologists employed by Pope Eugenius IV (1431-47), whose doctrines are accordingly dubbed "Eugenian Papalism." Led by Torquemada's uncle John (alias Turrecremata), they founded the necessity for all monarchies on a Neoplatonic natural theology in which all earthly authority emanates from God, the supreme hierarch. One wonders whether in this view temporal power descended to kings from the papacy, but presumably the papalists, bidding for royal support, tactfully left that implication carefully folded up.

These two essays may themselves be characterized as an emanation from Walter Ullmann, whose distinctive style of scholarship they eminently reflect. Judged by Ullmannesque standards Antony Black is largely successful, for he achieves a highly selective synthesis, broadly conceived and executed with praiseworthy clarity and concision. But since nonspecialists especially will be attracted by this masterful manner, it is only fair to advise the reader that Black's grasp on scholastic thought before 1350 is not as broad and firm as his frequent bold generalizations might lead one to suppose. His errors, however, are for the most part those peccata proficientium that experienced scholars should tolerate in a first work displaying great talent and much effort.

For example, Black overestimates the originality of his Basleans because he does not recognize their debt to Marsiglio of Padua, who had concluded that only a general council has the authority to designate and depose the pope (Defensor pacis 3. 2. 32). Concerning deposition we are told instead that "what Marsiglio [sic] had already said of the small state, Conciliarism applied to a larger community" (p. 44). Still worse, a Baslean doctrine in which Turrecremata himself discerned Marsilian influence "more probably had a common source in civic and other associations" (p. 54).

The third part, in contrast to the first two, marks a welcome descent from those lofty realms of abstracted theory where we too often make it appear that theories were framed solely for their own sake rather than in response to particular historical circumstances. With a political scientist's keen sense of the interplay of theory and practice, Black shows how, as propagandists and diplomats, the theorists on both sides developed, deployed, and artfully adapted their distinctive themes in the course of two decades of political maneuver.

One can only hope that Black will not rest content to be a brilliant essayist but will now do for Segovia what Francis Oakley, whose interests resemble his own, has done so solidly for Pierre d'Ailly.

RICHARD KAY

University of Kansas

JANE E. SAYERS. Papal Judges Delegate in the Province of Canterbury, 1198-1254: A Study in Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction and Administration. (Oxford Historical Monographs.) New York: Oxford University Press. 1971. Pp. xxv, 398. $17.75.

The use of local ecclesiastics as judges delegate was an innovation in the twelfth century that made possible an effective papal jurisdiction over provinces as distant as Canterbury. The legal theory and something of the practice in certain causes célèbres have been fairly well known, but evidence for the complete functioning of the system of judges delegate has remained buried in scattered ecclesiastical archives. The author has completed the tedious but important task of ferreting out the cases and abstracting the administrative procedure and has done it well.

The main strength of the book lies in the description of procedure and of the types of cases. In fact, the principal use for the book other than by those persons specifically interested in the subject is likely to be as a handbook to guide other medievalists who are faced with the problem of coping with documents from cases before judges delegate that they may encounter in the course of related researches. In an appendix there are specimens of the various types of documents produced at stages in the procedure that can well serve as comparisons.

As a sometime practitioner of administrative history, I may be permitted the comment that one of the weaknesses of the genre is that the writing often becomes a summary of case after case and instance after instance. Miss Sayers's work is no exception, with entire chapters pounding relentlessly on as a slightly expanded and heavily documented outline. The reward from this meticulous scholarship is only partially forthcoming, for the author has a marked reluctance to develop general conclusions. Her two pages of formal conclusions, even when supplemented with some general remarks in the introductory pages, can do little more than suggest some of the broader questions on which her views would have been valuable.

It is true that F. W. Maitland and Z. N. Brooke showed that England was an integral part of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Rome, but how did the use of judges delegate contribute to the growing power of the papacy? Although mentioned, the parallel appointment of papal legates is also not fully explored in relation to judges delegate. Most of all, the book lacks a sense of development or emphasis on trends that would allow a reader to understand why Archbishop Pecham in 1284 called appeals to Rome one of the major abuses of the Church.

The author's opinion that ecclesiastical courts drew cases away from the secular courts is startling. If this is so, the situation had changed since the days when Ranulf Glanville twitted Walter Map about the inefficiency of ecclesiastical justice. The major disappointment is that so little emphasis is placed on development that the book would not provide an answer either way on this question of efficiency, even though the question is central to an evaluation of the overall effect of the practice of using judges delegate.

CHARLES R. YOUNG
Duke University

J. A. WATT. The Church and the Two Nations in Medieval Ireland. (Cambridge Studies in Medieval Life and Thought, Third Series, Volume 3.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 1970. Pp. xvi, 251. $13.50.

This solid volume deserves to take its distinguished place with other scholarly monographs in the Cambridge Studies in Medieval Life and Thought. The author handles his difficult subject, the Church in Ireland through the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries, with detachment and reserve—virtues that other scholars who have written about that troubled island have not always possessed. What renders the practice of these virtues imperative here is, first, the sensitivity of the subject, and, second, the care with which the limited and frequently uncertain documentary evidence must be examined. So we find the author commiserating with himself over his task: "There is no more difficult problem in medieval ecclesiastical history than to know the mind of an Irish bishop" (p. 147).

The reader is inclined to agree with Dr. Watt that Henry II's invasion of Ireland was "the most important event in the history of the Irish Church between the fifth and sixteenth centuries" (p. 40). The author also makes a strong case for his view that the Church in Ireland, which he believes may have been on the threshold of beginning its own reform, was destined because of that invasion to remain throughout the Middle Ages "a remote and backward province of the Church, stunted in its growth, distorted in its development" (p. 2).

What blighted the expectations of the papacy—which approved English dominium of the island—and of the Irish hierarchy, which appears initially to have acquiesced in that rule, was a dormant nativism that the intrusion of the foreigner caused to surface. So acute did this antagonism between Irish and English grow that religious orders as dedicated to the spiritual ideal as the Cistercians and Franciscans found it impossible to accommodate both Irish and English in the same communities. The Crown, whose principal concern was political control, did not help matters by applying the principles of common law as they touched the clergy and by demanding the same voice in the selection of bishops in Ireland as it enjoyed at home. What might have proved a stronger unifying force than a common religion was royal taxation, and had Edward I and his successors pressed their fiscal demands with greater harshness and persistence, time might have served to dull the sharp animosities that divided the Irish, the Anglo-Irish, and the English clergy.

Although Dr. Watt leaves the reader with a bleak picture of the Church in Ireland, he introduces on the way a number of fascinating Irish churchmen whom, one hopes, he and other scholars will shortly bring into fuller view.

JOSEPH DAHMUS
Pennsylvania State University

RÉGINE PERNOUD. Héloïse et Abélard. Paris: Éditions Albin Michel. 1970. Pp. 298. 19.50 fr.

This is an extremely fine book that is well worth reading on several counts. Using the story of Héloïse and Abelard as her focus, Miss Pernoud has recreated much of the complexity and diversity of the thought world of the twelfth century. In her technique she belongs to the family of historians that includes Christopher Brooke; she is steeped in the milieu she describes, and because it clearly has an immediacy for her she is able to convey her sense of the period vividly to the reader.

Abelard's education, the full range of his scholarly development, and his philosophical ideas are presented very lucidly; but rather than seem like old ground gone over again, Pernoud catches the intellectual excitement of the period. Abelard's passion for dialectic becomes comprehensible in human terms, though humanizing Abelard does not in any sense detract from Pernoud's portrait of him as the greatest genius of his era. She seems, in fact, to agree with Abelard's assessment of himself—an assessment that should probably be slightly modified. But the key to his personality and character, as Pernoud presents it, lies in the fact that his extraordinary intellectual drive was the main force in his life. Seen in this way, his love for Héloïse was basically his response to her unusual intellectual gifts.

The portrait of Héloïse is beautifully drawn and the love story is told very much from her point of view. An interesting and tragic tension existed between Héloïse and Abelard because she was passionately in love with him but able to perceive his shortcomings as an emotional being. Pernoud compares her to Simone de Beauvoir and sees a parallel between de Beauvoir's reasons for not wanting to marry Sartre—her reluctance to see him become "professeur en province et, définitivement, un adulte"—and Héloïse's wish not to marry Abelard. But Héloïse still belongs to the twelfth century, and her devotion to Abelard and the way she saw their love was colored in good measure by the ideals of courtly love. She was a woman of real spirit—both literally and figuratively.

I consider it appropriate (and probably not an accident) that a woman was asked to review this book, because I can say with confidence that in it Héloïse really has her day.

JILL N. CLASTER
New York University

PETER LLEWELLYN, Rome in the Dark Ages. New York: Praeger Publishers, 1971. Pp. 324. $10.00.

In this brief account Rome refers primarily to the capital city, and the dark ages encompass the centuries between 476 and 962, from the days of King Theodoric the Ostrogoth to the coronation of Emperor Otto I. Though Italy and the Empire come under discussion, the argument basically focuses upon the continuity and the eventual victory of papal Rome. The book is well written, and the author intersperses his narrative with colorful translations from the sources; however, the volume is compact, replete with unfamiliar names, and not easily read.

After a sympathetic account of Theodoric, the author relates the reconquest of Italy by the Byzantine forces of Belisarius and Narses. It is an exciting account that arouses sympathy and admiration for the defeated Ostrogoths and disdain for the Byzantines and Romans. The reconquest brought no great relief to Rome and Italy; instead Franks, Lombards, plague and floods, and the inept administration of many Byzantine officials decimated the population and impoverished the survivors. In perilous times Pope Gregory I assumed the political and spiritual leadership of Rome and much of the peninsula. Not until the eighth century did the Roman popes rise high above the machinations of Byzantines, local dukes, and archbishops. This chapter, "Rome and the Byzantine Empire," is very convincing. In "Rome and the Pilgrims" the author very ingeniously uses the pilgrims to indicate the architectural changes from imperial to papal Rome and likewise to extend Roman ideas and practices northward and westward.

The victory over the Byzantines left only the Lombards and the Roman noble factions. The struggle involved intrigue, treachery, and murder; in the end the Frankish support against the Lombards saved Rome and papal authority. These successes did not always guarantee papal control in Rome itself where political factions resorted to the most nefarious activities to dominate the papal office, and they often succeeded. Even the close alliance between Leo III and Charlemagne and the imperial coronation of that monarch did not eliminate completely the factional threat. In fact the deterioration of Carolingian authority permitted the return of factional control that brought disaster, ignominy, and the intervention of Otto I in 961.

As a political, diplomatic, and military narrative the volume is convincing. I hope that the author will offer a similar account in the pastoral, social, and economic sphere to complete his arguments.

HILMAR C. KRUEGER

University of Cincinnati

GABRIELLA ROSSETTI. Società e istituzioni nel contado lombardo durante il Medioevo: Cologno Monzese. Volume 1, Secoli VIII-X. (Archivio della Fondazione Italiana per la Storia Amministrativa. First Series, Monografie, ricerche ausiliarie, opere strumentali, Number 9.) Milan: Dott. Antonino Giuffrè. 1968. Pp. 242.

Miss Rossetti has presented us with a mass of detail concerning the history of Cologno Monzese and its environs, a rural area of the Milanese contado, during the eighth through the tenth centuries. It requires some patience to wade through a cluttered presentation, but Miss Rossetti has drawn from the welter of place and proper names (to which an index is mercifully provided) certain conclusions of interest to the economic and social historian.

Leaving aside the subordinate arguments and myriad problems of interpretation, the one recurring theme of the work is the economic penetration of Cologno by the Milanese monastery of Saint Ambrose. Although Cologno remained socially Lombard throughout the period under consideration, by the ninth century Lombard landowners had fallen upon hard times. The division of the patrimony among male heirs had resulted in breaking up the relatively large unitary familial holdings of the preceding century into small and economically marginal farms. The coming of the Franks and feudalism further aggravated the economic situation of the Lombard population of Cologno since the Franks occupied positions of power and burdened the land with a variety of dues. Into this situation stepped the abbots who pursued, from the mid-ninth century, a seemingly continuous policy in Cologno of putting together unified blocks of land. They secured land both by donation and foreclosure, but they apparently relied most heavily upon exchange as the means to their end. In exchange for ground contiguous to their existing holdings in Cologno and elsewhere in the contado, the abbots traded ground in Milan and sites in the castle of Cologno, which had been built under their aegis and jurisdiction in the mid-tenth century. This policy drew a scattered Lombard population to the castle, which subsequently acted as a social and economic focal point for the region. At the same time it stimulated immigration from Cologno to Milan as Colognese exchanged patrimonial parcels for sites in the city. Thus, those able to immigrate were from the relatively well-to-do class of landowners who, when in the city, turned to ecclesiastical or legal careers as entrees into urban life.

Such a picture of monastic penetration of Cologno and its consequences overlooks a number of important questions. For example, how were these acquired lands exploited? Were they leased or worked directly within the larger framework of monastic holdings? Furthermore, the subject is slighted of emigration from the city in the form of investment as urban merchants, ecclesiastics, and others purchased rural land. Miss Rossetti relegates this important aspect of the history of Cologno to a footnote, although she promises to take it up in the sequel. Still, we know from Professor Cinzio Violante's study, La società milanese nell'età precomunale (1953), that of the names of the holders of adjacent properties mentioned in the Colognese documents of the beginning of the eleventh century, twenty-eight were lay and but twenty-one ecclesiastic. In any event, should not this counterflow from city to country have been examined within the context of the present volume and thus counterbalance the impression of an all-conquering monastery gobbling up the lands of a depressed peasantry in Cologno Monzese?

Miss Rossetti promises a second volume. We may look forward to this with the hope that she will undertake a greater effort at synthesis and that she will cast her results in a less bewildering form.

THOMAS W. BLOMQUIST

Northern Illinois University

ALFRED HAVERKAMP. Herrschaftsformen der Frühstaufer in Reichsitalien. Volumes 1 and 2.

many sources and a careful cataloging of diverse applications of the term, it is not entirely satisfactory. Wehlen fails to convey any general sense of what res publica meant to ninth-century men concerned with the nature of the state largely because he refuses to inject himself into the discussion as interpreter, summarizer, and synthesizer.

I therefore proceeded to the treatment of Nithard and Paschasius Radbertus without a firm sense of the ideological context in which they operated. Wehlen's analysis of his two documents is more rewarding. He carefully sorts out the uses made by each author of the concept res publica and explores in precise terms the sense they gave to the term. His investigations will provide students of Carolingian political theory with considerable help in identifying and defining certain elements of the vocabulary of political thought and with valuable insights into the major concerns of those interested in the ninth-century state. In a larger sense, Wehlen establishes that both historians found in the term res publica a "programmatischer Begriff," an ideal against which they could evaluate the political difficulties of the era stretching from about 830 to 843. Wehlen's study has the added advantage of being based on two documents that deal with actual historical events, thereby permitting the reader to see how at least two Carolingian writers applied theoretical concepts to concrete situations.

The work, however, has serious limitations. Wehlen's technique of piling quotation upon quotation, apparently based on the assumption that the sources speak for themselves, is not conducive to a clear understanding of the ideas behind these quotations. The task he sets for himself demands a greater attention to analysis and explication. Nithard and Paschasius Radbertus stand isolated in their age because of Wehlen's failure to relate their ideas effectively to those of their predecessors and contemporaries. Given the fact that both were partisans and apologists (Nithard for the cause of Charles the Bald and Paschasius Radbertus for the "Einheitspartei" and Lothair), one is never certain whether either is seriously concerned with the nature of the state in a theoretical sense. Wehlen's fixation on their use of the concept res publica delimits any concern with a larger view of the political consciousness of his authors. Finally, the study does not effectively establish the critical point that res publica was a fundamental concept in the political ideology of the early ninth century. At least I felt that the perspective of the study was too narrow to permit a fuller understanding of what the title promised: "Staatsauffassung im Zeitalter Ludwigs Frommen."

RICHARD E. SULLIVAN

Michigan State University

KURT-ULRICH JÄSCHKE, Die älteste Halberstädter Bischofschronik. (Mitteldeutsche Forschungen, Volume 62, Part 1. Untersuchungen zu mitteldeutschen Geschichtsquellen des hohen Mittelalters, Volume 1.) Cologne: Böhlau Verlag. 1970. Pp. vii, 238. DM 54.

Some twenty years ago Helmut Beumann, an intellectual historian at the University of Marburg with a special interest in medieval historiography, wrote a brilliant interpretative study of Widukind of Corvey, which, alas, went unnoticed in these pages. He is now editing some studies on the historians of central Germany during the High Middle Ages, of which the volume under review is the first. This book by Kurt-Ulrich Jäschke is a painstaking attempt to determine content and structure of earlier, nonextant versions of the chronicle of Halberstadt, a work of the thirteenth century. Beyond that it seeks to establish whether the growth of Church organization in central Germany during the later tenth century found an echo in the historiography of the period. The author rejects the assumption shared by an older school of historians that Thietmar of Merseburg (d. 1018) had been the first to write history in central Germany and that his work was the source for all subsequent historiography in that region. He also refutes a more recent thesis of Bernhard Schmeidler, who claimed that nobody wrote history in such ecclesiastical centers of the German frontier as Magdeburg, Nienburg, and Halberstadt before the twelfth century. In an amazing application of the great-man theory, Schmeidler made Abbot Arnold of Nienburg and Berge, who lived during the middle of the twelfth century, the first historian in this area and the author of an array of local annals and chronicles. Instead Jäschke returns to the view that the origins of these works are diverse and complex.

More specifically he advances the thesis that an influential prototype of the episcopal chronicles of Halberstadt was composed as early as 992 or 996.

The historiographical revisions proposed in this meticulous study may seem less earthshaking to a reader on this side of the Atlantic than to a German medievalist not so many miles from the scene; one might even feel, and wrongly I believe, that here a mountain of rigorous medievalism has given birth to a revisionist mouse. True, there is an air of unreality about discussing authorship, motive, impact, or popularity of works whose being and nature are postulated on the fragile foundation of deduction and hypothesis. Yet from a methodological perspective Jäschke's closely reasoned and heavily annotated book cannot be faulted: the microscopic examination of the texts, the cautious establishing of complex textual interdependencies, and the exhaustive recourse to every conceivable clue, especially charter evidence and cursus, make this an important work, though difficult to read.

BERNHARD W. SCHOLZ
Seton Hall University

GEORGES and DÈMÈTRIOS TORNIKÈS. Lettres et discours. Introduction, text, analyses, translation and notes by JEAN DARROUZÈS. (Le monde byzantin.) Paris: Éditions du Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique. 1970. Pp. 381. 86 fr.

This is a useful book, useful not only for the texts it offers, but also for the prosopographical information it contains. The brothers Tornikes were Byzantine functionaries, and to a degree also intellectuals, who lived in the twelfth century. George, the eldest, made his career in the Church, becoming eventually bishop of Ephesus. This is the first complete edition of his letters and discourses. Demetrios, George's younger brother, was a functionary of the state who achieved the position of logothete during the reign of Isaac II Angelus. There are three letters by him included in the present book.

The main body of the book consists of the Greek texts and a summary in French of their contents. Four texts, however, George's long encomium of Anna Comnena, his letter to the Pope, and two other letters to the Pope by Demetrios, are accompanied by translations in full. There are some notes, but more important is the long introduction where such problems as the careers of the authors, the chronology of the composition of the texts, and their manuscript tradition are treated and where a detailed analysis of the family background of the men to whom the letters were addressed is given.

Byzantine epistolography is highly rhetorical, difficult to read, and very often barren of any concrete information. There may be a few exceptions to this generalization, but the correspondence of the Tornike can hardly be one of them. Nevertheless, we do learn something: the decadent state of the city of Ephesus; the ruinous conditions of its famous church of St. John the Theologian; the reluctance of ecclesiastics, domiciled in Constantinople to accept provincial bishoprics; the differences that separated the Greek and Roman Churches. We learn something also about Anna Comnena, perhaps the greatest woman intellectual of the Middle Ages, both East and West. The encomium of Anna by George Tornikes is no doubt the most important text offered by the present book. Composed several years after her death, it describes at length her intelligence, education, intellectual activities, and other experiences. An encomium can hardly be said to be objective; at best it tells only one side of the story. In this encomium, for instance, the author passes over in silence the political ambition of Anna, an ambition so intense that it involved her in plots against her emperor brother. Nevertheless for the study of the life of that remarkable Byzantine woman and of the intellectual currents in Byzantium during the first half of the twelfth century, this encomium, despite its rhetorical declamations, is invaluable.

PETER CHARANIS
Rutgers University,
New Brunswick

MODERN EUROPE

PETER G. BIETENHOLZ. Basle and France in the Sixteenth Century: The Basle Humanists and Printers in Their Contacts with Francophone Culture. [Toronto:] University of Toronto Press. 1971. Pp. 367. $12.50.

This survey complements Bietenholz's previous work on Italian humanism and the Basel printing industry. Its goals are limited: Bietenholz begins by assuring that no extant studies "will be duplicated, and none will be made obsolete" by his book (p. 19), and concludes that he will "stop well short of a complete survey" of Franco-Balois relations (p. 242). Furthermore this volume will be followed by another that has been set aside for an analysis of books and for a number of lengthy pièces justificatives. His volumes attempt to see how far the culture of Erasmian Basel and its influence formed a "recognizable factor in the composite tissue of the sixteenth-century French mind" (p. 20). His primary mode of approach is a meticulous examination of Francophone participation in Basel's printing industry from the 1470s until 1650.

The result is an interesting but uneven compilation in which the whole never quite equals the sum of its parts; the synthesis has been deferred for his second volume. Bietenholz has quantified his subject excellently in his first part, "France and Printing at Basle," especially on pages 51-53 (one wishes that the divisions by subject matter were not buried in a footnote). The connections between France and Basel reached a visible peak between 1520 and 1555, the age of Erasmus and of his Balois epigoni, most attractively represented by the Francophone exile Castellio. This section is supplemented by a valuable short-title bibliography (pp. 249-336) that lists the thousand-plus titles on which his study rests. While some of these entries make one wonder about Bietenholz's definitions (for example, why were Jakob Sturm, George Buchanan, Peter Lombard, or Johannes of Segovia "Francophones"?), the principal French authors published at Basel emerge clearly: Castellio leads with 55 entries, followed by Ramus (35), Gilbert Cousin (33), and François Hotman (31). And sometimes the absences are equally revealing: Bodin has only three entries and Calvin five (including of course the original Institutes).

Bietenholz's two other sections are uneven. "Francophone Expatriates at Basle" succeeds very well when discussing the French church, Castellio, Baudouin, or Ramus, while "The Focal Contacts in France" succeeds best with Francis I's court or the post-1550 politiques. Many other sections, however, are a largely unconnected, discontinuous series of notes, from which only a few memorable vignettes, like the portrait of the Bauhins (pp. 63f), emerge.

E. WILLIAM MONTER

Northwestern University

DAVID C. STEINMETZ. Reformers in the Wings. Philadelphia: Fortress Press. 1971. Pp. viii, 240. $8.50.

Most studies of the Reformation, whether written by sympathetic or hostile historians, focus on the major Reformers such as Erasmus, Luther, Müntzer, Zwingli, or Calvin. It requires originality to devote an entire book to the second line of reformers, "the reformers in the wings, the supporting members of the cast who by their lesser and often unnoticed activity furthered the course of the drama to its final curtain." Such a study is facilitated by the fact that some of these reformers were powerful thinkers in their own right. Reading this book, one wonders why it was that the early sixteenth century produced such an amazing number of original theologians.

Devoting an essay of eight to twelve pages to each of the reformers, Mr. Steinmetz presents his study in an attractive and lucid form. Altogether twenty reformers are presented, arranged in four major groupings: late medieval Catholic Reform (Geiler, Staupitz, Contarini, Stapulensis, and Pole), the Lutheran tradition (Melancthon, Bugenhagen, Osiander, Amsdorf, and Brenz), the Reformed tradition (Bucer, Bullinger, Hooper, Vermigli, and Beza), and the radical reformers (Carlstadt, Schwenckfeld, Hubmaier, Denck, and Marpeck). Although the reformers discussed are men of very diverse tendencies, the author skillfully avoided the danger of publishing only a collection of disparate essays. Briefly sketching the life and actual work of these men, Mr. Steinmetz, a theologian, concentrates on the theological issues, thus providing a connecting link between the essays. Indeed, the essays offered him the opportunity to introduce practically all significant issues of sixteenth-century theology: the Nominalist background; the problem of the literal and spiritual interpretation of the Scripture; the relationship between Old and New Testaments; the covenant theology; and the various conflicting doctrines on justification, predestination and free will, the Lord's Supper, the teaching office of the church, and the relationship between Church and state. Although he bases most of his essays on secondary works, Mr. Steinmetz does use the writings of Staupitz, Melancthon, Carlstadt, Schwenckfeld, and Hubmaier. A useful bibliography follows each essay.

As Mr. Steinmetz's book offers an overall study of a variety of colorful personalities and complex theological topics, it may be used to great advantage in courses on Reformation history. Most textbooks mention these reformers only in passing. On the other hand, students generally do not have the time to read the voluminous works that have been written on these reformers. Mr. Steinmetz's readable and attractive book will fill a definite need. This is not to say that it is without minor flaws. I do not understand why the essays on Geiler and Bugenhagen were included, for they do not tell much about either man. Should these essays have been added to the four sections only for the sake of symmetry?

CLAUS-PETER CLASEN
University of California,
Los Angeles

W. FRED GRAHAM. The Constructive Revolutionary: John Calvin & His Socio-Economic Impact. Richmond, Va.: John Knox Press. 1971. Pp. 251. $7.95.

Professor Graham presents an interpretation of John Calvin as a revolutionary leader and thinker, perfectly aware of the social and economic implications of his own teachings and deeply involved in the problems of the beleaguered Genevan republic. To the accepted portrait of Calvin as chief architect of a theology that was revolutionary in its own time, Dr. Graham adds and explores the perspective of Calvin as an activist, and a secular, revolutionary leader. While the author sees the origin of Calvin's social views in the reformer's own theology, it is the non-nihilist revolutionary who "wanted to uproot evil and usher in a new age based on the old, without destroying society" that is emphasized. Searching the records of Geneva's municipal councils, the Venerable Company of Pastors, Calvin's works, and a host of relevant secondary sources, Professor Graham has effectively documented most of his assertions. Calvin's struggles with money lenders, merchants, grain speculators, city bureaucrats, the cost of living, wage and price controls, education, food and medical care for the poor, and the staggering influx of refugees are presented with commendable clarity and brevity; the portrait of the involved activist is indelibly drawn. But Professor Graham is consistently judicious, and Calvin's shortcomings are weighed with the rest. He does not hesitate to describe Calvin's nearly merciless repression of anyone he considered a threat to the internal discipline of the community; in fact the author suggests the theological origins of this behavior in Calvin's Christology. It is a remarkably comprehensive and convincing case for so brief a volume. The perennial Weber thesis controversy is treated with unusual accuracy, sophistication, and originality; but some of the author's other suggestions are perhaps less likely to carry his readers along. Probably the most fertile sources of comment will be such assertions as "history discloses how men make their own future," and Calvin's career is an example of "how revolutionary leaders have helped man in the past." But Dr. Graham is a capable advocate, and a succession of potentially obscure topics are skillfully dealt with in eminently readable prose. The handsome dust jacket, however, is an inadequate substitute for a clear black and white map or schematic view of Calvin's Geneva. For the general reader as well as the scholar this volume merits wide circulation.

ROBERT W. GREEN
Pennsylvania State University

Studia Leibnitiana: Supplementa. Volume 4, Theologie; Ethik; Pädagogik; Ästhetik; Geschichte; Politik; Recht. (Akten des Internationalen Leibnitz-Kongresses, Hannover, 14.-19. November 1966.) Wiesbaden: Franz Steiner Verlag GmbH. 1969. Pp. vi, 263. DM 44.

In 1966 a Europe forever purged, we may hope, of arrant nationalism by the ordeals of the twentieth century paid generous tribute to one of her most celebrated ecumenical spirits when she marked the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the death of Leibniz. Commemorative observances in Paris, Geneva, and Milan culminated, appropriately enough, in an international congress held in Hanover from November 14 to November 19. The Leibniz Gesellschaft instituted on that occasion commissioned a new quarterly, the Studia Leibniana, which first appeared in 1969. A vehicle for the publication of longer monographic studies has also been provided in the form of supplementary volumes to the Studia. The first five of these, however, contain the addresses presented at the 1966 congress, with volumes 1-3 devoted to philosophical and scientific subjects and volume 5 to the history of philosophy.

Volume 4 of the Supplementa, with its sixteen Vorträge associated with seven titular rubrics, is especially wide ranging. The notorious multifariousness of Leibniz's ideas and activities requires no comment, but it is well to remember that a philosophical system based on the notion that individual beings are at once infinitely varied, interrelated, and expressions of an ultimate unity offers certain problems for the scholar who wishes to investigate any particular aspect of the system. And the difficulty is more rather than less severe in the case of the student of Leibniz's historical work, for here the empirical side of his method tends to disorganize, though by no means to discourage, his search for progressively more inclusive "unities-in-variety."

Of those contributors to the volume under discussion whose subjects are historical, some are content with one dimension while others, as a group more ideologically inclined, pursue Leibniz the "panhistor," but all understand Leibniz's profound interest in history, which is sometimes overlooked in general works. Eduard Winter sees Leibniz's Kulturpolitik as bound up on the conceptual level with the Grundgedanken of harmony, universality, continuity, and progress, as functionally related to the advance of education along many lines, and as geographically manifested in a kind of world civilization. Waldemar Voisé keeps his panhistor busy explicating several relationships: that linking the past, present, and future in the historical process; the bond between history and politics that might serve as the basis of a "science of a new sort"; and, very nearly (as well as somewhat extravagantly), the intimate affiliation of politics and statistics. Günter Scheel follows in detail the elaboration of Leibniz's plan for a typically monumental Opus historicum, which was, just as typically, never brought to realization. The political ideas of Leo Stern's dialectically bedeviled panhistor lead to the depiction of an ideal world that is to issue from the reconciliation of competing interests, though these ideas originate in reflections upon the political problems of the day and especially in Leibniz's famous attempt to achieve a reunification of religious disciplines. This last subject is approached from different points of view by Jean Guitton and Lotte Knabe, but both predictably make the connection with the current ecumenical movement. The panhistor is demoted to Apollon antisaxonicus by Jean Neveux and merely watches as Paul Wiedeburg ably investigates a statement alleged to have turned Louis XIV against Leibniz's Egyptian Plan.

Many signs indicate a promising prospect for Leibniz studies: the abiding interest of a genuinely international group of capable scholars—and this country is very honorably represented; the modest but pleasing progress made on the German Academy edition of Leibniz's complete writings; and the plans made by the Leibniz Gesellschaft for another congress in the summer of 1972. And for this the 1966 meeting set a worthy standard.

WALTER J. BRUNHUMER

Western Michigan University

RAGNHILD HATTON and M. S. ANDERSON, editors. Studies in Diplomatic History: Essays in Memory of David Bayne Horn. [Hamden, Conn.:] Archon Books. 1970. Pp. xiv, 384. $11.00.

The editors of this volume of essays in honor of the late Edinburgh historian D. B. Horn permitted considerations of persons to mar its thematic integrity as set forth in its title. Three of the eighteen historical essays (Denys Hay writes an introductory chapter on Horn himself) have little or nothing to do with diplomatic history, although Dietrich Gerhard's piece on regionalism and corporate order in European history (first published in Historische Zeitschrift in 1952) makes one wish that he had turned his particular gifts of erudition, imagination, and incisive thought toward the general problem of the states system. The essay by Guido Quazza is for the most part a sketch of the internal history of the Italian states in the first half of the eighteenth century; C. A. Macartney contributes a close study of the precise character and origins of the Austro-Hungarian Compromise of 1867.

All the other essays are on themes of diplomatic history, and most lie in the period between the Peace of Westphalia and the French revolutionary wars, the period in which Horn himself did most of his work. Some are concerned with episodes that have been little known or at best misunderstood, and they rest upon fresh archival research as well as wide-ranging command of printed sources. Notable among these are the study by Andrew Lossky on Dutch diplomacy and the trade negotiations between France and Russia in 1681, built around the correct identification of a document twice printed in the nineteenth century but wrongly attributed; Ragnhild Hatton's own contribution—a study of John Drummond, an English merchant turned diplomatic agent in Holland during the War of the Spanish Succession; and Stewart Oakley's account of the thwarted plans of Gustavus III for war with Denmark in 1783–84. The essay by G. C. Gibbs on the laying of treaties before the British Parliament in the eighteenth century links diplomatic history with domestic constitutional developments in a way significant for both, as does the study by Henry L. Snyder of the problem of diplomatic appointments during the Godolphin ministry for domestic political history. V. G. Kiernan lightens the fare with wry anecdotes of the small fry of diplomacy, careerists of greater ambition than influence. M. S. Anderson's discussion of theories of the balance of power in the eighteenth century—one of the key problems of European diplomatic history—is informative and thoughtful.

The volume is rounded off by a characteristically sagacious essay by Sir Herbert Butterfield on the significance of diplomacy in the relations of states and peoples; he observes in particular that diplomatic negotiations are not essentially efforts at persuasion but the verbal equivalent to war, in the Clausewitzian sense of the imposition of one will upon another—but better than war for all that. The other essays by James N. M. Maclean, John C. Rule, Walther Mediger, Alice Carter, Michael Roberts, I. H. Nish, and Esmonde Robertson display the same qualities of excellence of research, intelligence, and perceptiveness. The absence of nationalist passions should not go unremarked, all the more when it is accompanied, as in these authors, by an awareness that what was at stake in the episodes they study was not the private affairs of the statesmen, great or small, but the fate of peoples.

HERBERT H. ROWEN
Rutgers University,
New Brunswick

PIERRE CHAUNU. La civilisation de l'Europe des Lumières. (Collection Les grandes civilisations, Number 11.) [Paris:] Arthaud. 1971. Pp. 664.

Within the past five years, and in some instances perhaps prematurely, increasing numbers of quantifying historians in France have turned aside temporarily from their magisterial regional studies of ancien régime society and have undertaken striking syntheses intended for the nonspecialist and the cultivated public. Often applying to the archival and statistical findings of an entire generation an intuitive genius worthy of the heirs of Marc Bloch and Lucien Febvre, scholars such as Fernand Braudel, Pierre Goubert, Pierre Léon, Robert Mandrou, and Pierre Chaunu have written a remarkable series of essays. They sweep confidently across France, Europe, America, and Asia of the sixteenth through eighteenth centuries, and guarantee for this period the central place of a social and economic interpretation in the widest sense. On the right wing of present-day annaliste scholarship, Chaunu is perhaps the most productive member of the group. Completing his twelve volumes on Seville and the Atlantic (1504–1650) in 1960, he has devoted much of the past decade to two studies of European expansion for the Nouvelle Clio series. He has capped his career at Caen and the Sorbonne with a pair of syntheses, one for the civilization of seventeenth-century Europe (1966) and more recently, one for that of the Enlightenment.

Six years ago Chaunu concentrated upon the apparently paradoxical circumstance of the birth, development, and triumph of a mechanistic cosmology within a self-contained Europe suffering from illiteracy, war, economic crisis, and demographic stagnation. Environmental difficulties notwithstanding, the Age of Reason survived; and as its spokesmen turned from ontology to empiricism in the eighteenth century, it commenced molding a material civilization in its own image. The present volume underscores the coming to terms of mind and environment in the Enlightenment. From the 1680s on, increasing numbers of Europeans consciously or instinctively ordered their collective existence in a manner consistent with empiricist thought. To Chaunu the fruit of this filtering down of certain ideational processes, this triumph for intelligence, is illustrated in most dramatic fashion demographically. The gain of ten years of life from 1680 to 1780 and the sparing of forty millions, who a century earlier would have perished in infancy or adolescence, derive—according to Chaunu—from the practical concerns of Enlightenment thought, from “le retour des pensées sur les choses.”

In support of his position Chaunu entertains a polemical stance that runs consistently through his volume. Though he avers that the eighteenth century represents the climactic moment of traditional European civilization, the heroes of his hypothetical Enlightenment number those pragmatists who led others into the value system of nineteenth-century liberalism. They include improving English landlords; those enlightened despots and their servants sincere in combating illiteracy and hunger; thinkers such as Locke and Voltaire who constructed political theories upon a conception of the possible; all empiricist scientists and scholars from Leeuwenhoek through Abbé Nollet and the Benedictines of St. Maur; Kant who legitimized an interior faith as he fixed the limits of reason; and Chardin who painted “des choses qui ont une âme, parce qu’elles sont la récompense de l’effort intelligent de l’homme, du travail.” On the other hand, Chaunu’s villains are those who refused to let ontology die, the pure theorists who turned their backs upon the facts or progress. They include French rentiers and parlementaires; Rousseau and Mably who pushed European political thought toward the utopian, the unrealizable, and the destructive; materialist theoreticians such as Holbach and La Mettrie whose “systématiques grossières trahissent l’esprit [empiriste] des Lumières”; and rococo artists working in a false baroque, a baroque denuded of its supernatural raison d’être. Chaunu’s opinions are sometimes outrageous and occasionally amusing. His associating the Curé Meslier with the Black Mass and the (unproven) French practice of coitus interruptus with the poison of neo-Augustinian pseudoskepticism provoke chuckles, not thought.

Chaunu’s idiosyncrasies notwithstanding, his Civilisation has a good deal to recommend it. There are 247 superb photographs with commentary, representing a marriage of illustration to text that brings to mind Lewis Mumford’s City in History. Yet the book’s chief merit lies in the summaries on the state of historical quantification in France today. The chapters on population densities, growth rates, migratory habits, and the correlations between literacy and mortality are highly useful. Chaunu accepts uncritically too many of Le Roy Ladurie’s hypotheses on the relationships between climate and social habit, but it is good to see such seminal work obtain the advertising it deserves. The same holds true for the quantitative historical studies of the book and its eighteenth-century readership now being undertaken in France and the United States, though a slip in transcription leads Chaunu to estimate for four years (1723–27) what in reality represents legal French book production for sixty-six years (1723–89). The aforementioned areas, as well as those concerning social attitudes toward marriage, women, children, and death, represent fields where vigorous research in Western Europe and the United States is resulting in an imaginative and carefully constructed monographic literature. Enduring Chaunu’s hypotheses and polemic is not too high a price to pay for being introduced to work of those who are transforming our entire conception of society in the ancien régime.

RAYMOND BIRN

University of Oregon

FRANCO VENTURI. Utopia and Reform in the Enlightenment. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1971. Pp. v, 160. $8.50.

Professor Venturi of Turin, widely known as a cosmopolitan, erudite, and judicious writer on the political history of the Enlightenment, has concentrated in Utopia and Reform upon two aspects of the subject about which he has been publishing for the last thirty years. He examines the extent to which eighteenth-century republicanism derived less from the exemplars of classical antiquity than from the recent history and character of Italian, Flemish, and other communes and of Dutch, Swiss, English, German, and Polish state systems. He then isolates the problems of vital importance in the developing social consciousness of the age, problems involved in considering the right to punish. Though discussion focuses upon these two matters, the volume is full of illuminating remarks on the bibliography of the Aufklärung, on its motto, "Dare to know," on England's puzzling shortage of philosophes comparable with those of the Continent and Scotland, and on the chronology and geography of the Enlightenment.

In the sixties, though even then tension was growing, the crisis of conscience was over; religious and moral problems had given way to political and social concerns, Pyrrhonism was supplanted by a new faith in nature, philosophic system by experimentation, and legal questions by economic inquiry. Even in remote parts of Europe the encyclopedists of Paris stimulated thought, while slowly revolutionary movements in Corsica, Russia, America, and elsewhere in turn encircled France.

With the French Revolution the cult of the ancient world revived and must be distinguished from the republicanism inherited from the Middle Ages and Renaissance. Montesquieu's scrutiny of the problems facing republics was always in the context of his own times, which forced him to consider size, federation, moral spirit, and internal and external dangers in relation to the threatened contemporary republics. Venice and Genoa, the United Provinces and Switzerland suggested questions. A new republic in America later illustrated one answer to these, as in mid-century the English compromise had offered another.

Venturi connects the right to punish with the fundamental relationship of individual, society, and property. Philosophes confronted by the existence of crime, and the need to repress it, decided that the state's only tasks were to estimate the damage caused by law breaking in both public and private spheres, and to restore harmony. Legislators and jurists, Beccaria declared, should rule "tremblingly" and try to combine equality and freedom with order and security.

A brief description does but scant justice to the richness and originality of a slim, but difficult and concentrated book.

CAROLINE ROBBINS

Rosemont, Pennsylvania

MICHEL DEVÈZE. L'Europe et le monde à la fin du XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. ("L'évolution de l'humanité," Volume 71.) [Paris:] Éditions Albin Michel. 1970. Pp. 703. 12 fr.

This will be an encouraging book for those who fear that history may disappear in an accumulating mass of microscopic studies of local matters. Michel Devèze, a professor at the University of Reims, has indeed proved himself in the field of intensive research, having produced some years ago two large volumes on the forests of sixteenth-century France. Now he offers us a work of synthesis in the best French tradition of that difficult art. It is a true synthesis, carefully put together, piece by piece, with over eleven hundred references to hundreds of specialized books in half a dozen languages. It reflects the broad views associated with the name of Fernand Braudel and the École Pratique des Hautes Études, and it is at the same time volume 71 of the series Évolution de l'humanité, founded by Henri Berr over sixty years ago and now carried on by the Centre International de Synthèse.

The author begins with the formation of the concept of Europe in its modern sense in the seventeenth century. This he attributes to a new perception of the globe and the continents that came from the age of discovery, to a differentiation between the old and new worlds, and to a feeling that the peoples of western Eurasia were distinguished, no longer as Christendom, but by sharing in a common secular culture, which had technical and organizational advantages in the production of wealth and power. The superiority of Europe in these respects, while becoming apparent in the fifteenth century, was fully evident in the eighteenth, thanks in part to the decline of Islam and the withdrawal of China and Japan into themselves, but owing mainly to the unprecedented development in Europe of a spirit of innovation. This spirit, which favored science, invention, governmental restructuring, conquest, and expansion, is explained (as by Ranke and others) by the competitive relationship among the European peoples in contrast to the more peaceable and stable but hence less innovative civilization of China. In any case, by the eighteenth century, and by the use of a marked maritime superiority, both naval and commercial, Europe was the most active and aggressive member of an interconnected worldwide system of which it was also the main if not the only beneficiary.

It is impossible to summarize the rich detail of this enormous canvas. Its main sections present the impact of Europe on Asia, Africa, and the Americas, and then the impact of these other continents on Europe itself. We are not put off with mere generalizations. There are fascinating particulars on a wide array of topics—the Jesuits in Paraguay; the Dutch in Japan; the Russians in Siberia; the production of gold and silver in Spanish America and Brazil; the impact of tea, coffee, cotton, and South Pacific astronomical observations in Europe; the democratic ideas of John Wise in Colonial Massachusetts; and the deism of Ethan Allen in early Vermont. The author's knowledge is so enormous that it seems absurd to point out the few errors that any one reader can identify; nevertheless, his mistaken idea that J. S. Copley and Benjamin West were born in England leaves him with a less than adequate appreciation of the state of the arts in the Anglo-American colonies. His bibliography shows an extraordinary familiarity with books in English. He knows the work of Needham on China, of Curtin on the Atlantic slave trade, and of Bamford on forests and French sea power. His treatment of Japan is derived almost entirely from works in English, including those published in English by Japanese scholars. It is surprising and unfortunate that he has apparently missed a few works that could have been useful to his purpose, including McNeill's Rise of the West, Lach's Asia in the Making of Europe, and Davis's Problem of Slavery in Western Culture.

For so vast and complex a theme no single century offers a very satisfactory basis for periodization. The author finds, however, that the close of the eighteenth century was in its way the end of an era. If Britain won out as a colonial power in the Napoleonic wars, the French won the ideological battle with the beginning of diffusion of ideas of the French Revolution to the rest of the world. The antislavery movement portended the end of the eighteenth-century system. With Abbé Raynal and others doubts were expressed on the racism and exploitation that underlay the great positive accomplishments of the worldwide system of commerce, exploration, and science. The French expedition to Egypt in 1798 stirred Islam, the slaves in Haiti rebelled, and the independence of Latin America could be foreseen. The ultimate limits of the expansion of European power could be faintly discerned—in the West by the independence of the United States and in the East by the resistance to Europe of the sleeping giants, Japan and China.

It is books like this that, for teachers, might help to solve the problem of combining the negative thing called "non-European" history with European history as we have known it.

R. R. PALMER
Yale University

DONALD DREW EGBERT. Social Radicalism and the Arts: Western Europe. A Cultural History from the French Revolution to 1968. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1970. Pp. xxxiii, 821, liii. $15.00.

Professor Egbert's work on Socialism and American Life (1952) led him into a study of modern radicalism "as reflected in theories of art, works of art, and the social activities and beliefs of their creators" from the French Revolution to the present day. The result is, as the author notes in his preface, not art history but the history of "social conceptions as they affect and are affected by the theories, actions and creations of . . . the modern artist." It is also the story of the alienation of avant-garde artists from the state and society. The first part of the book deals with the chief ideologists of social radicalism in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries; the subsequent three sections cover France since 1815, England, and the rest of Europe. The survey of the esthetic views of the early socialists and anarchists was no doubt the least complicated part of the book to write, and it is also the least controversial. While Marx and Engels are frequently quoted and even more often invoked to this day in this, as in so many other contexts, they did not really aim at providing specific guidelines for art and artists. In the West, at any rate, the direct political impact of utopian socialism and anarchism on the arts was probably larger than that of Marxism. Saint-Simon's concept of the artist as a leader of society had considerable appeal; Fourier's influence on surrealism (and beyond) and the impact of anarchism on the symbolists and the New Left is well known. There are some curious lacunae: Lassalle is mentioned, but only in passing; Franz Mehring's name does not even appear; nor does the Gotha party conference of 1896 figure, the first occasion, I believe, in modern times, on which the attitude of the proletariat toward modern art was discussed by the highest body of a Socialist party with millions of followers. Generally speaking, Professor Egbert devotes far more space to developments in France and Britain (and seems more familiar with them) than to trends in Central and Southern Europe. There is a highly informative chapter on Belgium, but Austro-Marxism and its attitude to modern art is not even mentioned. The same applies, incidentally, to the narrower field of art history; the reader will look in vain for a discussion of Avenarius and his circle, for Max Liebermann and the Berlin Sezession.

But the real difficulties in a work of this kind lie beyond the discussion of esthetic theories. The author does not restrict himself to the fine arts and the "minor arts" but frequently refers to the theater and the cinema and to literature and music; this is a sensible approach because it is clearly impossible to deal with the "fine arts" in isolation. But once the scope of the investigation is broadened, the choice of illustrations and references becomes by necessity selective and arbitrary.

It is of course well known that the political and the artistic avant-garde have by no means been identical, and the discrepancy between the two has, if anything, become more pronounced over the last seventy years. It is comparatively easy to point to attempts to change the environment made by artists and critics from Ruskin and William Morris on; it is far more difficult to show, except in a very general way, to what extent artists have been determined in modern times by their environment. Art forms and, a fortiori, personal style have to a large extent developed independent of the social order, and there is no obvious connection between revolution in the arts and political revolution. To give but one example: the founding fathers of nonobjective art, Kandinsky and Kupka, Klee and Feininger, were all radicals of sorts, but what Professor Egbert says about Feininger applies to all of them: "his social interests scarcely affected his art." The same, needless to say, goes for Schönberg and Stravinsky, for Proust and Kafka and Joyce. Only a few artists have opted for total political commitment (for example, Fougeron, Taslitsky, and Paul Horgan), but they were not exactly the greatest of their age, and the political tribulations of Picasso are well known. The author makes the interesting point that the choice of the medium matters in this context. The most famous radicals such as Daumier, Steinlen, and Grosz were all essentially graphic artists; when they turned to painting their art was not of the same quality.

Professor Egbert's book is a mine of information, and it will offer something of interest to every reader. His judgment on major issues is sound, and the conclusions that emerge are unstartling: that many artists were to a varying degree alienated from society; that being individualists, they tended toward some form of libertarian anarchism rather than collectivism and strict party discipline; or that artists are more likely to be radical in their youth than in their old age. The author notes that in recent decades the alienated avant-garde has become in the noncommunist world the artistic mainstream with the active help of the establishment; as a result there is no longer an avant-garde.

If on concluding this massive volume one feels nevertheless a sense of dissatisfaction, this has to do to some extent with the intangible and inchoate character of the subject: to deal adequately with the many topics raised, a dozen volumes would be needed. At the same time the case for studying in detail the artist's political ties is not proven; if the political orientation of the artist, as Egbert says, does not account in the deepest sense for the artistic merits of his work, they cannot possibly provide a major key to the understanding of his work. The class interests and the political aims of the peasantry are obvious, those of the artists are not. The answer provided by Herbert Read (that there has never been before the modern epoch an art without social significance) is not quite convincing, for "social" is not a synonym for "political." True, the artists' politics are of sociological interests, but then a third-rate artist may well reflect the Zeitgeist more accurately than the lone, isolated genius. Among the shortcomings of the study is the fact that it reads in parts like a catalog of artists and their work, which does not always clarify their respective importance or relevance. The ideological impact of the writings of Francis Klingender and Christopher Caudwell is surely not equal to that of the leading Continental left-wing theoreticians in this field. The terms "radical" and "Marxist" are used rather freely and sometimes indiscriminately; to call Wilhelm Hausenstein or Walter Benjamin Marxist is at least questionable. William Morris is alternatively called a "Marxist" and a "revisionist"; but even the revisionists did not reject, as Morris did, the class struggle. On Romain Rolland it is said that he "died a convinced communist although he had never entirely shed the influence of East Indian mysticism," which means of course that, with all his admiration for Stalin, Rolland was not a Marxist. Again, the fault is not entirely the author's, for artists have been (and are) notoriously insistent in their ideological beliefs. But this makes it all the more important to differentiate between Marxist and Marxisant, between Communist and Salon Kommunist, between socialist and antiestablishment attitudes—or to refrain from such classification unless it can be done with a minimum of confusion.

WALTER LAQUEUR
Tel Aviv University

JONATHAN BEECHER and RICHARD BIENVENU, translated, edited, and with an introduction by. The Utopian Vision of Charles Fourier: Selected Texts on Work, Love, and Passionate Attraction. Boston: Beacon Press. 1971. Pp. xiv, 427. $12.50.

This volume, introduction, selection, translation, and notes, represents an excellent piece of work. The introduction provides a penetrating summary of Fourier's remarkable system. It both emphasizes its essential unity and treats with sympathetic understanding its diverse parts. The selections are generally brief, very numerous, and skillfully arranged to present with great richness and fidelity the strange teaching of the father of the phalanx. The exposition moves from "first proclamations" to "commerce, industry, and work in Civilization," and "philosophy, morality, and sex in Civilization," followed by "the theory of passionate attraction," "the ideal community," "attractive work," and "the new amorous world," with "the mathematical poem," Fourier's theories of cosmology and analogy, as the conclusion. The book also contains a preface, a note on the sources, a bibliographical note, a glossary, and an index. The translation is splendid, a feat that can be properly appreciated only by those who have worked much with Fourier. The notes, that is, brief introductions to the several sections, as well as some more technical notes at the bottom of the pages, constitute the least distinguished part of the volume; but they, too, serve their purpose in helping the reader.

Some particulars, of course, can be criticized. There are, for example, the rather lame pages on whether Fourier's system was or was not tyrannical (pp. 271-73), whereas Professors Beecher and Bienvenu really know that everything depended on the efficacy of Fourier's formula: if the formula is valid, life in Harmony would be the very essence of rapturous liberty and joy, if it is not valid, there would be no Harmony, or, if something of the sort could be somehow imposed, it would be a total tyranny. Again, while the authors are completely correct in emphasizing the extreme refinement and good taste of the future society, they are nevertheless wrong when they assert that "Harmony would have no room for the Promethean dynamism or the sweating bodies and calloused hands" (p. 72). As Fourier repeatedly informed us, the marvels of Harmony would include just such dynamism, found only very occasionally in present-day life, for example, when miners dig desperately to rescue trapped comrades or when soldiers storm enemy positions in the heat of battle. But these and other possible cavils do not impair the generally very high quality of the volume.

It is good to have so much Fourier so well presented and readily available in English. Although the prophet of Harmony aimed to encompass the universe in a formula, he also had formulas for everything else, some of them a paragraph or a sentence long, and these formulas too often stop the reader. "The poor incessantly attempt to rob the rich on an individual basis, and the rich continually plunder the poor as a class" (p. 302).

NICHOLAS V. RIASANOVSKY
University of California,
Berkeley

ORON J. HALE. The Great Illusion, 1900-1914. (The Rise of Modern Europe: A Survey of European History in Its Political, Economic, and Cultural Aspects from the End of the Middle Ages to the Present.) New York: Harper and Row, 1971. Pp. xv, 361. $8.95.

Two ideas, theses almost, link the many details of this book. One is that "the years from 1900 to 1914 were not simply the sunset of the nineteenth century—or the last act in a Victorian play—but rather a period that clearly belongs to the twentieth century," not an end but a beginning, "not the twilight of a golden age but the seedbed of our twentieth century problems and concerns." The other thesis is that while it was the great illusion of a progress-proud age to believe that a general war among the nations of Europe had become unthinkable, that war, when it came, was by no means inevitable, that "it cannot be argued convincingly that the First World War was predestined or prefigured in the arts and sciences, in economic relations, in the area of ideas, or even in the public relations of the peoples of Europe."

Case proven? Not quite, not on the first count, that is. There are of course some formidable obstacles in the way of showing that any given fourteen years will form a historic unit, even if they happen to occur between the opening of a century and the beginning of a war. Then, too, the nature of the book, designed as it is as a survey in the Langer series, makes the task no easier. The mass of detail tends to obscure whatever pattern may exist—the eternally carping critic: too many details on the one hand, too few on the other (sometimes, the urge to inclusiveness results in an almost private shorthand). Or will the reader really know, without further explanation, what either plural voting in Belgium or the Selden Patent were, or be able to make very much of a half-line mention of De Mun? There is the fact, besides, that on more than one occasion the discussion of early twentieth-century trends reaches back into the nineteenth, and rightly so, since the discussion of new departures in biology would be as incomplete without Darwin as the description of the automobile industry without Daimler.

On the second point, that the war was forecast neither in the stars nor in the hearts of villainous politicians, the book is very much more convincing. One reason is that the narrative finally slows down here; there is a chance for breath and for reflection. The other is the profound understanding not only of European diplomacy but of the European mood that suffuses these pages. Thus there are, to balance the obligatory accounts of friction, some excellent passages on the many equally real efforts at cooperation and accommodation. The Balkan Wars and the Moroccan crises are fully described, but so is the formation, in the same period, of several hundred international organizations, governmental and private. Thus, while the book is clearly a post-Fischer one, the judgments are full of the sort of old-fashioned good sense that may well be tomorrow's style again—on the determinist road to war pattern: "wisdom made manifest after the event"; on Bethmann Hollweg: "There were flaws and weaknesses in his makeup, and he woefully misjudged the situation in 1914. But fundamentally, he was a man of honor, sensibility, and peace." Was the writer unfamiliar, then, with the past decade's torrent of argument? No, he was fully aware "that current research on German war aims has revealed a new Bethmann Hollweg, but it should be remembered that war leadership produces unique transformations; the Lloyd George of 1909, for example, was not identical with the Lloyd George of 1918."

There may, of course, be those who will disagree still and side with the revisionists of the 1960s. But after Hale, they had better be very sure of their ground. And, in general, there is something fairly churlish about any criticism of this volume, the preceding lines included. For in essence this is a book by an author who has read widely and well, who has taken note of all recent works of importance and of much unfamiliar material as well (there cannot be many other American historians of Europe who refer quite so frequently and casually to the Neue Zürcher Zeitung), who has kept his own good counsel throughout it, and who has provided the reader with a path through a thicket of facts. It would seem quite enough for one book.

JOACHIM REMAK
University of California,
Santa Barbara

PAUL G. HALPERN. The Mediterranean Naval Situation, 1908-1914. (Harvard Historical Studies, Volume 81.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1971. Pp. x, 415. $13.50.

On the eve of the First World War many European naval officers expected to see, when the struggle began, a great and decisive battle between England and Germany in the North Sea. There the main protagonists faced each other, the hostile fleets separated by a mere twelve hours steaming time; and there, at Jutland, the only large naval battle of the war did take place. As a result most research on the navies of the period has centered in the gray Atlantic. But what of the blue Mediterranean? The French, English, Italians, and Austrians, not to mention the Russians and Turks, had strategic interests and bold dreams for this area.

Mr. Halpern's book is the first comprehensive study of the prewar naval situation in the Mediterranean. He has obviously spent a number of years on the work, and it is a definitive account. The author has consulted the archives of France, Britain, Italy, and Austria as well as many private papers and relevant individuals. The book devotes a chapter to each of the main powers: France, as the dominant nation; her chief rival, the Italians; and the Austrians, whose navy grew from a coast defense force to a major contender in the Mediterranean balance of power. The fears and hopes of that bygone era are evoked. France was apprehensive about the possible union of the Italian and Austrian navies, which would seriously threaten her commanding position. She could count on little help from the British, who had withdrawn the bulk of their ships to the north. The Italians, with their technically daring and beautiful vessels, saw a chance—with their old antagonists, the Austrians, now allies—of sweeping the French from the sea. And the Austrians, seeking a wider role, spent lavishly for enormous dreadnoughts that they really did not need for their defense. These great battleships were then a symbol of prestige, and nations from Chile to Turkey wanted them, whatever the cost.

This was a period of innovation in ships and innovators in naval administration: Fisher and Churchill in England, Delcassé in France, Grigorovitch in Russia, Montecuccoli in Austria, and Cattolica in Italy. They purged the deadwood in the officer corps, kept their ships at sea and away from ceremonial functions, and generally tightened up the slack conditions that had crept in during the long years of peace.

The last chapter carries the drama forward to its conclusion and shows the actual events that occurred in wartime. It is, as the author states, an anticlimax. Italy remained neutral and later joined the Allies, thus ending the French fear of an Italian-Austrian combination against them. While Austrian submarines were active, no major action was fought by that navy.

The book has no photographs—a pity, since the Imperial War Museum has such a fine naval collection for this period. The author could have spiced the story with a few anecdotes as his writing is sometimes rather unvaried. But he handles the mass of detail as well as the dominant themes in a straightforward manner. For those who wish to know the period, it is an indispensable book.

REGIS A. COURTEMANCHE
C. W. Post College

ALBERT SEATON. The Russo-German War 1941-45. New York: Praeger Publishers. 1971. Pp. xix, 628. $15.00.

Thirty-one years after Hitler's invasion of the Soviet Union, the Russo-German war continues to attract the attention of historians, military writers, and journalists. There are, still, some major problems connected with this aspect of World War II that, in its duration and ferocity, was the counterpart to the Allies' war against Japan. Why did Hitler start this campaign that proved so costly for Germany? Why, in spite of repeated warnings, was Stalin caught off guard in the beginning? Why did the fortunes of war change so dramatically? These are not easy questions, and Colonel Seaton has tried to answer them in a scholarly and readable book, which should please the specialist as well as the general reader. Based on a broad range of German sources—official documents, journals, war diaries, unit histories, and personal diaries and memoirs—and on the available official Soviet histories and memoirs, the author concentrates on military operations and on problems of leadership and command responsibilities. The relative paucity and inaccessibility of Russian material is reflected in a somewhat unbalanced treatment, which, except in the case of war atrocities, favors the German side in breadth and detail. The summaries of strategic and tactical decisions and the assessment of responsibilities of military and political leaders on both sides are the most valuable parts of this study. The descriptions of military operations, on the other hand, are involved and complicated and not easy to follow, and although there are maps for each major campaign, they are, for the most part, poorly drawn and of little help.

Discussing the pre-1939 European diplomatic developments, Seaton believes "that Chamberlain was right and Churchill was wrong" in their assessments of the Soviet Union, which, in Seaton's opinion, was not ready to come to the aid of Czechoslovakia. He blames Hitler for starting the war in the east and for the German defeat at Stalingrad. Germany had no chance of winning the war to begin with, because Hitler was confused in his military and political aims, his intelligence service was poor, his resources were insufficient, and his general staff was inadequate. And while Stalin and the Soviet High Command made serious mistakes throughout the war, they were, on balance, superior to Hitler and his generals. In the last analysis, however, "Britain and the Soviet Union owed their survival to geography and to climate and only secondarily to their own endeavours."

In closing and with unacknowledged hindsight, Colonel Seaton faults Britain and the United States for not invading Europe through the Balkans and Scandinavia to defeat Hitler and, at the same time, to prevent the Soviet Union from dominating Europe.

GEORGE O. KENT
University of Maryland

durch die deutsche Wehrmacht. (Studien und Dokumente zur Geschichte des Zweiten Weltkrieges, Number 13.) Göttingen: Musterschmidt. 1970. Pp. 404. DM 78.

More than half this volume is taken up by reprints of documents; the rest is an illuminating study of the last pathetic phase of Hitler's venture into the Balkans. The author's declared purpose is to set the record straight because both the 120-volume Yugoslav official documentary history of the war and the two-volume work by the Yugoslav general staff are "one-sided, have pronounced biases, and contain falsifications and exaggerations" (p. 9).

In his effort to present an objective account Hnilicka has tried to study all the documentation everywhere, and he deplores the fact that while the papers in American and British archives are readily available those in Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union are not. He makes good use of what he had access to and has indeed come up with a lot of raw material. He perused the published memoirs of participants and conducted interviews with survivors both in Germany and outside, notably in Yugoslavia itself.

The title is somewhat misleading, for the work does not deal exclusively with military affairs. Perhaps its most interesting and valuable sections, however, are the accounts of the military, SS, secret police, and Nazi political agents who were attached to the Hitlerite satellites in the Balkans—Nedić's Serbian and Pavelić's Croatian regimes. The author shows great understanding of the latter. Indeed, he declines to consider General Nedić a collaborator in the customary sense of the word so much as "an honorable Serbian royalist" (p. 47)—although it would have been helpful had he defined exactly what he meant by the customary sense of the word.

The author is concerned with a topic the essentials of which have been obscured by the partisan versions of history written by the victorious forces of Balkan communism. He is to be commended simply for attempting to tell the other side of the story in a scholarly fashion. What does become clear from his book is that had the peoples of the Balkans had their wish, the situation in the area would be very different from what it is now, for the noncommunist population had looked to be liberated by British and American troops rather than the Red Army (p. 48).

KARL HNILICKA. Das Ende auf dem Balkan 1944/45: Die militärische Räumung Jugoslawiens

Hnilicka's book makes a substantial contribution to the military, international, and domestic history of the last two years of World War II in the Balkans. Any work of scholarly standard that assails the monolithic interpretation of the history of any period is to be welcomed. So is the present one.

BÉLA K. KIRÁLY
Brooklyn College,
City University of New York

MAY MCKISACK. Medieval History in the Tudor Age. New York: Oxford University Press. 1971. Pp. 180. $7.25.

The search for British antiquities in the reign of Henry VIII was primarily motivated by the necessity for justifying the Reformation in the English Church; by the time of the founding of the Society of Antiquaries in 1586, the Tudor establishment having long since been reaffirmed by the queen, antiquarianism appears often to have become an end in itself. Thus, Bishop Godwin in 1601 confesses that his delight in the study of history and antiquities "hath been somewhat greater than was needful for a man that had dedicated himself and his labors unto the service of God's church in the ministry." Oblivion had long since become as potent an enemy as the pope. Miss McKisack tells the story of this antiquarian urge beginning with Leland's itineraries with license to salvage books from the dissolved monastic libraries, through the more coordinated efforts of Parker and Cecil to recover and print early British historians both ecclesiastical and secular, to the patriotically oriented topographers Stow and Camden. Even the queen, on the occasion of receiving Lambarde's digest of the records in the Rolls Chapel, responded that she would be "a scholar in her age."

Miss McKisack gives generous acknowledgment to earlier studies of the movement, notably that of T. D. Kendrick (1950), but she has resurveyed the field with manifest profit, updating the scholarship and making new and extensive use of manuscript materials in the royal, diocesan, and university collections. It is therefore the more regrettable that she came so late upon F. J. Levy's Tudor Historical Thought (1967), which had already dealt with many of the antiquarians she treats. Her chapter on general histories of Britain is the least satisfying since it is relatively derivative and, as a result, occasionally inaccurate. C. L. Kingsford's English Historical Literature of the Fifteenth Century (1913) still remains the soundest authority here. Value judgments are for the most part avoided. But to say that Protestant prejudice is a "major handicap" of Elizabethan historians is not merely to ignore the equally prejudiced Catholic historians of the period but to overlook the historical value of the prejudice itself.

W. GORDON ZEEVELD
University of Maryland

CONRAD RUSSELL. The Crisis of Parliaments: English History, 1509-1660. (The Short Oxford History of the Modern World.) New York: Oxford University Press. 1971. Pp. xvi, 434. Cloth $9.75, paper $2.95.

This survey of English history from the accession of Henry VIII to the Restoration of Charles II incorporates the results of much recent research, but it is not merely a compendium of other historians' views. It is an intelligently constructed synthesis that is reinforced by the author's own research and enlivened by his selection of appropriate and often humorous examples and quotations. A sensible balance between factual and illustrative material makes this book more readable than many studies of its kind. Although it takes the form of a political narrative, it does not suffer from a lack of thematic emphasis or analytical insight. An introductory portrait of Tudor England and a chapter entitled "Puritanism and Fashion 1570-1640" include a variety of topics that can be discussed only within a broad chronological framework.

Although Mr. Russell does not give sufficient coverage to humanism and the problem of poverty, he describes other social, economic, and intellectual developments adequately. His discussion of the related issues of inflation and government finance merits specific praise. Russell is most successful, however, as a political historian. He offers an excellent account of the parliaments of the early seventeenth century and the best brief summary of the ship-money dispute to date. In analyzing religious developments he engages in a current debate by arguing that Puritanism, even in its Presbyterian form, was essentially conservative. It became dangerous to the Crown only when it moved into political opposition and revolutionary when fused with the secular radicalism of men like John Lilburne.

The central problem of explaining the civil war and revolution of the mid-seventeenth century Russell approaches cautiously. He argues that the war itself was unintentional and is therefore explainable only by mutual fear and distrust. The collapse of the system of government that preceded the outbreak of war he attributes to the failure of the government's religious and financial policies. He tends to be suspicious of underlying social explanations, insisting quite correctly that the revolution in its first stages did not constitute a challenge to the established social order. Yet this should not have prevented him from clearly relating the political breakdown of the early 1640s to the social changes of the preceding one hundred years. Although the author establishes a connection between the educational revolution and the growing self-confidence of the gentry in the House of Commons, he does not give proper attention to the crisis of the aristocracy or the alienation of the "country" from the "court." He is reluctant to take a stand on the gentry controversy, which he considers to be a statistically insoluble problem of rising or falling incomes. It might have been more fruitful to view the "rise of the gentry" as a complex social problem concerning the changing relationship between the gentry and the peerage rather than a strictly economic process.

Nevertheless Russell's book, which is part of an important series, deserves a wide audience. A reliable and up-to-date introduction for the student, it will serve the historian as a careful, balanced, and lively synthesis.

BRIAN P. LEVACK
University of Texas,
Austin

J. D. GOULD. The Great Debasement: Currency and the Economy in Mid-Tudor England. New York: Oxford University Press. 1970. Pp. viii, 198. $7.00.

Professor Gould has written an almost model monograph on the highly complex, technical, and easily misunderstood subject of the Great Debasement. He leads both general Tudor and expert economic historians alike gently, but with evident enthusiasm, through the labyrinths of Tudor minting of coins and government monetary policy and resolves a number of scholarly controversies along the way.

He specifies the scope and limitations of his book at the outset: that his is the first study of the subject by a modern economic historian but that it lays no claim to be a "balanced and systematic view of all economic aspects of the Great Debasement" (p. 5). When one considers the thoroughness of this volume, however, one cannot help wondering what the author has omitted.

Other scholars will have to test the broadest significance of this study claimed by the author—that "the theory of mint affairs and of the foreign exchanges offered in this work . . . should . . . prove useful to economic historians who wish to concern themselves with monetary and allied topics in any part of the medieval and early modern periods" (p. 6). They will require a sufficient body of data such as Professor Gould had at his disposal (and he is admirably cautious in explaining the evidence he has used, its limitations, reliability, and the gaps in it). Evidently modern quantitative techniques and analytical tools may have limited applicability if, for example, the author is correct that no adequate assessment of imports and therefore no clear balance of payments position can ever be established. He pleads, moreover, for the creation of an import index, for which the essential requirement will evidently not be a knowledge of econometrics, but the kind of ingenuity in using scattered, difficult-to-interpret evidence that has always characterized the best in medieval and early modern historical scholarship.

The text is admirably printed, with a few very minor errors. Where feasible, charts have been included near the text they illustrate. Only a few extensive tables and three graphs have been relegated to the end of the volume. A few topics are discussed in appendixes, several shorter technical points in explanatory footnotes.

Professor Gould may chiefly be faulted for a tendency to protest too much his inadequacy to deal with some aspects of his subject. While intellectual modesty is as commendable as it is rare, no one presupposes the historian's omniscience (and the author pays full tribute to those upon whose work he has built, while he is very generous toward scholars with whom he disagrees).

He uses rather haphazardly "I," "we," and "one." For my taste the "we" might well be eliminated altogether since the author is neither king nor pope.

One can only trust that Professor Gould's remoteness from manuscripts in England will not prevent his making further significant contributions to the study of this period. One would anticipate reading them with both profit and pleasure.

HOWARD S. REINMUTH, JR.
University of Akron

WILLIAM S. MALTBY. The Black Legend in England: The Development of Anti-Spanish Sentiment, 1558-1660. Durham: Duke University Press. 1971. Pp. 180. $6.75.

At the beginning of this century, Julian Juderías, a Spaniard disturbed by his country's reputation for cultural backwardness, coined the expression "Black Legend" to refer to the writings of Spain's critics past and present. Soon after, historians picked up the term, using it primarily to describe the literature concerning Spanish maltreatment of the Indians. Now William Maltby, investigating anti-Hispanism in Renaissance England, applies the term to Tudor-Stuart works on Spain, including translations of sixteenth-century Spanish histories, religious writings of early English Protestants, literature on the revolt of the Netherlands, overseas expansion, and the Armada, as well as other miscellaneous pamphlets produced in the seventeenth century. Maltby examines these works one by one, shows how they consistently exaggerated, distorted, and misrepresented Spanish actions, and claims that they were responsible for establishing an English stereotype of the Spaniard as cruel, immoral, treacherous, and proud. This stereotype, according to the author, was reinforced by similar strains of anti-Hispanism in France and the Netherlands, so that the "legend of Spanish barbarism was allowed to grow and to become part of the intellectual baggage of Western man."

Black Legend is a loaded term; and Maltby's decision to adopt not only the term but also Juderías's thesis that there has been some sort of virulent anti-Hispanism present in the last four centuries of Western thought was an unfortunate one. It led him to oversimplify Tudor-Stuart conceptions about the Spaniard and to ignore the real ambivalence in the Englishman's attitude toward his enemy. Renaissance Englishmen may well have hated the Spaniards, but, in writers such as Raleigh, there is also a certain awe, which sometimes even borders on admiration, for their power and accomplishments, particularly in the New World.

Maltby's preoccupation with the Black-Legend thesis also impels him to devote an inordinate amount of space to exposing the biases and inaccuracies of Tudor-Stuart writers without bothering to develop in any systematic or meaningful way the nature of the relationship he admits exists between these biases on the one hand and the Reformation and incipient nationalism on the other. For example, his book contains no discussion of the recent scholarship on Tudor-Stuart millenarianism, even though it is obviously pertinent to his subject. As a result, his study adds little to what is already known about the ideology behind the Protestant nationalism of England in this period.

CAROLE SHAMMAS
University of Wisconsin—
Milwaukee

K. R. WARK. Elizabethan Recusancy in Cheshire. (Remains Historical and Literary Connected with the Palatine Counties of Lancaster and Chester, Volume 19, Third Series.) Manchester: [Manchester University Press] for the Chetham Society. 1971. Pp. viii, 200. £3.60.

This is a monograph of superb scholarship and painstaking research, judicious, and, on the whole, well balanced in its analysis and conclusions. K. R. Wark has added another important study to the growing literature on recusancy in Elizabethan and early Stuart times, providing an in-depth survey of the sources for Cheshire, thus completing the work of T. S. Willan, who surveyed recusancy in Lancashire in the reign of Elizabeth I some twenty-five years ago. Wark continues for yet another county the able work done by Dom Hugh Aveling for Yorkshire in recent years. If such studies could be forthcoming for all the counties, a much needed major investigation of at least this area of Catholicism in Tudor and Stuart England might be undertaken.

The study begins in 1559 with the enactment of the Elizabethan religious settlement and traces the activities and fortunes of recusant Catholics in Cheshire up to 1603, as well as the efforts of authorities to curb it. Utilizing a wide array of materials—including the most important single source for understanding Cheshire recusancy before 1580, the Metropolitan Visitation Book of 1578, as well as subsequent Diocesan Visitation records, Parish Registers, Bishops' Transcripts, Recusant Rolls, Plea Rolls, Crown Books, Quarter Sessions' Records, Sessions' Depositions and Examinations, Mayors' Letters, and others—Mr. Wark has assessed statistically and through personal vignettes the strength or weakness of recusancy as a serious governmental problem in Elizabethan times. The author succeeds admirably in this while still providing occasional glimpses of the human drama, the excitement of prison escapes, and the poignancy of young boys being whisked out of the country for years of exile and forbidden education abroad (pp. 81, 103, 108–10).

Mr. Wark offers excellent testimony to the impact of the gentry as the largest sustaining group, while noting that the lack of clear leadership from great families whose influence was predominant in the country was decisive in limiting the extent of recusancy in Cheshire, which Mr. Wark puts at a "known" 302 out of an estimated population of 63,865! More interesting is his examination of those social classes least studied in this matter, that is, business, professional or craftsmen, husbandmen, laborers, and servants. As would be expected, the largest number of known recusants were women. This he found to be true even though he indicates that before the 1590s the importance of women went largely unrecognized, so that until that date they were not indicted to the extent that the men were. Mr. Wark also supports with clear evidence the accepted view that as the reign progressed Elizabeth's government resorted less to imprisonment and more to enforcing the laws for severe fines and loss of lands and goods, hoping to impoverish the recusants into obedience to the laws as a more successful means of obliterating the group.

While Mr. Wark offers little in the way of startling or new ideas, his meticulous research helps immeasurably to substantiate earlier general interpretations. There is, however, a curious inconsistency in his abrupt, and from his own evidence unproven, conclusion that before the end of the reign of Elizabeth I recusancy had developed a vitality no penal law could crush. All his evidence and intermediate analysis had pointed to recusancy as a minor, insignificant problem in the body politic as far as Cheshire was concerned.

The study is invaluable for its lengthy appendix containing a list of Cheshire recusants with a brief summary of what is known about each (pp. 138–73) and in his excellent and thoroughly up-dated bibliography. No scholar in the field can afford to ignore it.

SISTER JOSEPH DAMIEN HANLON
St. Joseph's College, Brooklyn

RICHARD L. HILLS. Power in the Industrial Revolution. [Manchester:] Manchester University Press. 1970. Pp. ix, 274. £4.00.

HAROLD CATLING. The Spinning Mule. (David and Charles Library of Textile History.) Newton Abbot: David and Charles. 1970. Pp. 207. £2.75.

J. GERAINT JENKINS. The Welsh Woollen Industry. Cardiff: National Museum of Wales, Welsh Folk Museum. 1969. Pp. xviii, 410. £2.75.

KENNETH G. PONTING. The Woollen Industry of South-west England: An Industrial, Economic and Technical Survey. (Origins of Industry.) New York: Augustus M. Kelley. 1971. Pp. x, 214. $20.00.

These four volumes reflect the sustained interest of English historians in the British textile industry at a time when it acted as a major catalyst of economic and technological change. The first two studies in the group are confined to technological advance, mainly in the cotton industry. That by Dr. Hills now becomes the best single account that we have of the development of cotton manufacturing equipment between the 1730s and 1820. The author offers no widesweeping reinterpretation of earlier work by Miss Julia Mann and Mr. Walter English. Rather, in a well-documented monograph he probes into the details of technical development and especially relates manufacturing equipment to power sources.

Particularly enlightening is his investigation of the work of the inventors John Wyatt and Lewis Paul. Although they partially or fully conceptualized several advanced spinning devices (for example, their intention of placing drafting rollers inside a revolving tube implied tube twisting), it is most unlikely that they ever spun by roller drafting, the major innovation sometimes attributed to them. Mainly because, as Dr. Hills observes, they failed to establish the relationship between fiber length and roller spacing. Besides demonstrating the well-known fact that waterframes and mules, in exhausting traditional power supplies, stimulated the development of the steam engine as a source of regularly transmitted power, Dr. Hills carefully plots the installation of Boulton and Watt engines in textile mills before 1800 and reconstructs the problems facing early engine builders and their textile mill clients. The study seems most impaired by Dr. Hills's neglect of much of the artifactual evidence, the early machinery that may be found in museums in Lancashire and London.

Dr. Catling's examination of the development of the spinning mule is a fascinating, though unavoidably technical, history of a single highly significant machine. In it the author nicely utilizes his rare combination of experiences as a teenage mule piecer and as a long-time textile research engineer. Several aspects of the book struck me as of particular value: the lucid explanations, supported by helpful diagrams, of the techniques and advantages of intermittent spinning on spindle wheel, jenny, and mule; the equally clear accounts of the mule's working parts and their modifications; the results of engineering research into Richard Roberts's quadrant, which the author concludes could achieve "almost perfect winding" (p. 82); the subtle distinctions between the Bolton fine-yarn mule and the Oldham coarse mule and the more familiar differences between cotton and woolen mules; and the author's own recollections and analysis of mule room operations. Inexplicably Dr. Catling has omitted the spinning-mule data found in the "Manufacture of Cotton" article in Rees's Cyclopaedia. Though Dr. Catling gives some figures of mule spindleage and output, the economic aspects of his account would have come into sharper focus had he used more machine-makers' records (for example, Dobson and Barlow's order books, which run complete from 1851 to 1951). Despite these weaknesses, no one attempting to write about the British nineteenth-century cotton industry should omit reading this book for insight into the technological tastes and limitations of British cotton-mule spinning; for instance, standardized maintenance, possible with interchangeable parts, was frustrated in Lancashire mule spinning because each "gaffer" was allowed to tune his pair of mules to a high degree of individuality.

The two remaining volumes are regional histories of the woolen industry. In his definitive portrayal of that in Wales, Mr. Jenkins examines woolen manufacturing techniques and the industry's pre-sixteenth-century structure, based on home and fulling mill, before treating five manufacturing subregions in turn: Montgomery, Merioneth, north Wales, west Wales, and the southeastern counties. The picture emerges of an industry handicapped by undercapitalization, bad organization, small-scale production, strong conservatism, and a variety of depressing English influences. These last began when the Shrewsbury drapers monopolized the finishing and marketing of Montgomery and Merioneth cloths from 1562 until the 1770s. Later, concentration following factory organization was frustrated by east-west canal and railway networks that severed mid-Wales from Glamorgan's growing industrial valleys and opened central Wales to mass-produced English goods. Merioneth mills survived by processing local wool to meet local needs, until wool prices rose during the Boer War and Welsh farmers turned to English manufacturers for higher profits. But the real problem was the absence of a strong capitalist class, rather than nefarious English practices. In west Wales, the industry's sixty prosperous years ended after the First World War because of failure to modernize equipment or to follow wider fashion trends toward lighter fabrics; dependence on the south Wales workers' demand for medium to heavy woollens had disastrous results during the miners' strikes of 1921-26. Mr. Jenkins's organization of his material leads to some repetition; otherwise only minor errors were disturbing. The carding machine illustrated on page 36, for example, is certainly not Paul's of 1748; and the water-frame never spun wool, as opposed to worsted (p. 238).

Mr. Ponting's new introduction to the West of England woolen industry consists of a historical narrative, illustrations of extant evidence and artifacts, a collection of documents, a list of surviving buildings, a glossary of trade terms, a bibliography, and an index. I consider the concept of such an integrated survey excellent but wish that the imperfections in its execution were less numerous. The historical account is unbalanced since over a third is devoted to the conflict in 1802-03 between the shearmen and clothiers over the introduction of machinery, a struggle adequately depicted previously by J. L. and Barbara Hammond and Professor Arthur Aspinall. Curiously, the earlier battles over the introduction of the jenny and the longstanding hostility between manufacturing and agricultural interests are hardly noticed. Second, there are too many slips for it to be regarded as a wholly reliable introduction; for example, mistakes in patent dates on pages 47, 48, 55, and 66. Third, the documents suffer from irregular editing; for instance, commentary appears sometimes at the head and sometimes at the foot of the gobbet (pp. 137, 139). Also two important sources have been omitted: the 1661 description of clothmaking by the economist Sir William Petty, son of a Hampshire clothier and the 1823 description by William Partridge, a Gloucestershire dyer who emigrated to the United States. Finally, the American price of this book is outrageous.

In conclusion, three specific defects found in more than one of these studies seem worth mentioning. First, it has long since been shown that neither Leonardo nor Jurgin invented flyer spinning (cf. Catling, p. 14, Ponting, pp. 30-31). Second, B. D. Jackson's invaluable dating of the Rees Cyclopaedia articles, the unrivalled source for early nineteenth-century British technology, seems unknown to several authors (Hills, p. 245, Jenkins, p. 59). Last, the omission of footnotes by Dr. Catling and Mr. Ponting exemplifies a deplorable economy increasingly practiced by the newer English presses.

DAVID J. JEREMY
Merrimack Valley Textile Museum

GEORGE RUDÉ. Hanoverian London, 1714-1808. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1971. Pp. xvi, 271. $8.95.

This is the first volume to appear in the new History of London series, whose promise of high scholarly character is attested to by the distinguished list of authors that its general editor, Francis Sheppard, has gathered together. Professor Rudé has written a sound, traditional, satisfying history, which places London in the context of broader national developments without ever letting it lose its identity in the process. Chapters on its physical expansion, economy, social structure, amusements, religious life, and government provide lucid and convenient summaries of the standard works on the subjects, but do not attempt to reassess their conclusions.

How differently would Rudé have written the book a quarter century ago? It is in no sense a reproach to him, but certainly one to the industry of London historians, to be forced to answer, not much. The picture of Georgian London given us by Sir John Summerson, Dorothy George, and even the Webbs remains remarkably intact. For its political history, thanks to more recent works by Dame Lucy Sutherland, Ian Christie, Francis Sheppard, and Rudé himself among others, the past few years have seen more fundamental changes in our understanding. The chapters on London politics, therefore, particularly insofar as they deal with the role of the "mob," are the most valuable in the book. But the apparent durability of the earlier studies in the social, institutional, and architectural history of the metropolis, while tributes to their sound scholarship and persuasive interpretations, suggests that the present generation of historians is neglecting eighteenth-century London.

Such neglect is hard to understand; London's libraries and archives abound in unexploited source material, while Georgian London ought to exert a peculiar fascination today: a city sizable even by our standards, precociously afflicted with every conceivable twentieth-century urban problem, from poverty, pollution, congestion, riots, and crime to suburban sprawl and alienation; a great manufacturing center hardly affected as yet by the new techniques of the industrial revolution; a city with a mass electorate long before 1832 and with radical organizations decades before the French Revolution; a city undergoing all the most unsettling stresses of the modern megapolis, yet universally admired by contemporary foreign visitors for its wealth, cleanliness, and order. We need both more specialized studies and more re-examinations of received opinions on eighteenth-century London, to make Rudé's book, admirably though it sets forth the present state of our knowledge, rapidly obsolete.

DONALD J. OLSEN
Vassar College

FRIDA KNIGHT. University Rebel: The Life of William Frend (1757-1841). London: Victor Gollancz. 1971. Pp. 320. £3.00.

Other than one of five columns in the DNB, there was no biography of Frend until Mrs. Knight's. She discovered a trunk full of his correspondence that provides detail for the story of his life. A fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, and an able mathematician, Frend suffered banishment in 1793 after the vice-chancellor's court and the senate judged that his book, Peace and Union, offended against a university statute, meaning against the temper of the times. The account of this proceeding, meant to be the high point of the book, is the most disappointing part of it. Mrs. Knight spoiled her opportunity by relying entirely upon Frend's published version of the case, by her unnecessary partisanship, and by her inadequate scholarship. Frend's tactless conduct as a university rebel obscured the academic freedom issue and made his defeat predictable. Thereafter in London he lived among political radicals, dissenters, and literary people. The discussions of Frend's personal associations at Cambridge and in London are the best parts of the book. Frend maintained these personal connections and his interest in good causes even after 1806 when he entered upon a twenty-year career as actuary for the Rock Life Assurance Company. Mrs. Knight accounts for this career in one badly garbled page. By this time the book has gotten away from her. In middle and old age, Frend had a busy and satisfying life as husband, father, actuary, journalist, reformer, and friend of many of the literati, but all of this appears in sketchy form without depth and substance. A biographer of Frend needs to know more of the history of Frend's times than Mrs. Knight bothered to learn. Instead of writing a very good book, she only wrote a pleasant one about a man who was actually bigger than the person she presents. Still, whoever undertakes to write a more substantial biography of this interesting man will find it difficult to bring out Frend's personality and character better than Mrs. Knight has done.

CARL B. CONE
University of Kentucky

D. C. M. PLATT. The Cinderella Service: British Consuls since 1825. [Hamden, Conn.:] Archon Books. 1971. Pp. x, 272. $11.50.

Described as "the first comprehensive work" on its subject, this book breaks new ground in a little known field. The British Consular Service became a government service in 1825, but consular services on a private basis had begun much earlier. The book deals with administrative and social aspects, which supply almost the only firm ground for a historical survey. This was a relatively minor government service whose miscellaneous activities, though cumulatively important, left little record. Scattered in five continents and working as individuals isolated from each other, consuls had only the most tenuous relations with London, the seat of power, prestige, and patronage. Their miscellaneous functions, poor reporting, the slow mails, the lack in London of administrative oversight of their work, and the absence of fixed policies robbed the records of threads of continuity. The book makes extensive use of archival material, including consular reports, the evidence, minutes, and reports of investigating committees (which mostly left things as they were), parliamentary debates, and consular memoirs.

To have discerned the continuities and interest in such a chaos of particulars and to have digested it into a short, tightly packed book is a real achievement. Footnote references to sources are meticulous, and there is a good bibliography. The author's eye for essentials, the economy and lucidity of the writing, and the wide and careful research impress the reader. The unifying theme of the "Cinderella Service" adds interest to the book.

Two long chapters deal with the General

Service in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Two more, each of special interest, deal with the Levant and the Far Eastern services—both in international frontier areas of primitive administration and weak sovereignty, where Western powers sought to regulate contact by capitulations and extraterritoriality. Each chapter contains succinct subsections dealing comparatively with such matters as functions, recruitment, training, service conditions, salaries, control, and inspection. Political and judicial functions and extraterritoriality are emphasized in the two regional chapters.

The account of the amalgamation in 1943 of the Foreign Office, Diplomatic, Commercial Diplomatic, and Consular Services into a single Foreign Service brings the "Cinderella" theme to the forefront. It is the major emphasis of the preface and introduction and recurs in each chapter. In the epilogue the author avowedly becomes "partisan," exchanging "the role of historian for that of social commentator and critic." The consul was the victim of "social injustice," kept down by "the social distinctions and snobberies" of the Foreign Office and the highly privileged diplomats. Amalgamation instead of securing "equality" left the consul weaker. He still suffered from the "contempt" in which "for a century and a half the job itself was held." There was a time when "no self-respecting Foreign Office clerk or diplomat would have been seen dead with a consul as colleague." A historian bent on defending the underdog may risk going out too far on thin ice.

H. DUNCAN HALL
Bethesda, Maryland

J. F. C. HARRISON. The Early Victorians, 1832-1851. New York: Praeger Publishers. 1971. Pp. xix, 195. $10.00.

For historians raised on John and Barbara Hammond's compassionate picture of England during the Industrial Revolution, J. F. C. Harrison's The Early Victorians will evoke pleasure and nostalgia. Harrison once again describes the social experience of the Industrial Revolution with a Hammondesque vividness and sympathy. The old landmarks are still prominent: the Industrial Revolution, population growth, urbanization, the factory system, King Cotton, and the dramatic cycles of prosperity and depression. The emphasis, of course, is on poverty and squalor. Harrison will not allow, any more than will the Hammonds, posterity to forget the starving frame knitters, naked coal hewers, inebriated navvies, and harassed menial servants; nor will he allow posterity to overlook slums whose intense overcrowding, bad water, and lack of sewerage meant high death rates, sexual promiscuity, drunkenness, and misery. In dramatic contrast to this squalor is the life of the upper classes.

Harrison's picture of the aristocracy emphasizes the elegance of their country homes, their local power, their foxhunting, and their use of spring traps and transportation to rid themselves of poachers. His picture of the middle class underscores their nouveau riche passion for fine homes, fashionable clothing, and many servants. Both classes expected deference from the poor. In press and pulpit they preached doctrines of self help and religious seriousness and advocated the gaol and the New Poor Law's grim workhouses for the really erring and lazy.

Harrison, in drawing again this picture of exploitation, has done a service for historians. However familiar this story of harshness and inequality, it is one that deserves retelling. But Harrison has done more than redraw a picture. He has also added refinements and discriminations. His treatment, for example, of class structures is particularly discerning. He goes beyond the simple upper-, middle-, and lower-class schema to delineate the many and varied divisions that made up the social complexity of Victorian England, divisions in which a well-paid iron foundry worker lived better than a poor property-owning green grocer. It is Harrison's particular descriptions of these various classes and how they fitted into the complex network of Victorian society that, along with insights on social movements and social attitudes, give this work some originality.

It is thus all the more regrettable that he has not purged himself entirely of a Hammondesque disposition to exaggerate suffering and oversimplify oppression. On page 81 he says of the New Poor Law of 1834, "outdoor relief was to be abolished and all recipients made to enter the workhouse." To remind Mr. Harrison that the New Poor Law said nothing at all of a workhouse test might be pedantic, but it is not pedantic to remind him that the Poor Law Commissioners (whose orders, not the law, defined the workhouse test) never imposed it on every applicant. They always included in their orders classifications for those paupers who were entitled to outdoor relief. Never did they make "all recipients" enter the workhouse. This error is not an isolated one. Harrison's work is full of exaggerations, ranging from the mistaken notion that the early Victorians were "firmly in the grip of Malthusianism" (p. 6) to pictures of sexual promiscuity in factories, seven-shilling weekly wages in Wiltshire, and naked coal hewers. There were, to be sure, Malthusians, sex in factories, seven-shilling wages, and naked coal hewers in early Victorian England, but a careful reading of Kenneth Smith's The Malthusian Controversy (1951) or of the government reports on factories, agriculture, and mining will show that they were the exceptions. Harrison's admirable sympathy for suffering has led him to mar his largely accurate and often perceptive study with oversimplifications. This is unfortunate since the socialist tradition in English historiography, which has done so much to illuminate the reality of misery and oppression, has always been attacked for its biases and distortions. To free that tradition from those charges, historians as important as Harrison and as famous as E. J. Hobsbawm, general editor of this series and a reader of the book in manuscript, must be much more accurate and balanced.

DAVID ROBERTS
Dartmouth College

C. H. S. FIFOOT. Frederic William Maitland: A Life. (Studies in Legal History, published in association with the American Society for Legal History.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1971. Pp. x, 313. $10.00.

Mr. Fifoot has put the whole historical world in his debt by publishing an edition of Maitland's letters in 1965 and now by writing the best life of Maitland we could ever have. Miss Ermengard Maitland asked him to write it and made available to him all the family papers and a rich yield of family memories. Maitland was born in London in 1850; two sisters were born in 1849 and 1851. The family had already, by marriage, acquired land in Gloucestershire. Maitland's grandfather Samuel Roffey Maitland came from a Scottish family with strong Nonconformist leanings, so that, although he went to Cambridge, he did not subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles and could not take orders, but by the Easter term of 1816 he became a barrister. Scholarship and music were both more attractive to him than the law. He abandoned both the law and the Church but gave himself to the critical study of Evangelical writers. Maitland himself said "that we still have to do for legal history what S. R. M. did for Ecclesiastical history. His Facts and Documents is the book I admire most. . . . It teaches us that a statement does not become true because it is constantly repeated. A chain of testimony is never stronger than its first link."

Samuel Maitland had one son, John Gorham, born 1817, who had a distinguished career at Cambridge, third classic of his year, seventh wrangler, second Chancellor's medalist, and a member of the Apostles. He was called to the bar but, like his father, did not practice. He wrote a few pamphlets on income tax and became secretary of the Civil Service Commission. His wife was a daughter of John Daniell; she died while her youngest child was still a baby. Gorham died in 1863, but he and Samuel (who died three years later) had both added to the family money so that after providing for the two girls in the usual fashion of the day, it sufficed to give F. W. Maitland both a good education and "the sense of stability and independence which in itself justifies private income. But he inherited from his paternal grandfather more than land and money; a keen and original vision, intellectual powers, both wide and deep, moral courage and a resolve never to do less than his best. His was a rich inheritance."

But Maitland was not a prominent Etonian either in play or work; he hated the classics and felt cricket and football rather slow, but loved the river and walking. The same tastes dominated his Cambridge years. He was elected to the Chitchat club and in due course to the Apostles and to the Sunday Tramps, where he met Vinogradoff.

During the ten years that followed his success in the tripos in 1872 Maitland came to realize that his future lay with the history, not the practice of the law, but had not Henry Sidgwick provided £300 a year for four years for a readership in law, nothing might have been done to help him. That Sidgwick meant Maitland to benefit seems certain although Mr. Fifoot does not actually say so. The 1880s were the years of decision for Maitland's public and his private life. At Leslie Stephen's house he met Florence Fisher, a sister of H. A. L. Fisher. She and her sisters could not have much spent on their educations with seven brothers to be launched on the world. She had had a country upbringing, which was to stand her in good stead in the Grand Canary. She was, moreover, a lover of music, and "a splendid player on the violin, viola and piano." When they were married Maitland was thirty-six years old and Florence was twenty-two. After a Devon holiday they set up house in Cambridge for the autumn term. In November the Selden Society came into being, largely through the energy of Maitland, but it was unfortunate that P. E. Dove, a barrister who was struggling unsuccessfully to collect work, was left too much power over the funds of the society. In 1894 he found that he owed the society £1,000 and that the society owed a large bill to the printers. Before the society had been in existence for ten years Dove gave up hope of pulling things together and committed suicide.

• To a historian Mr. Fifoot has settled conclusively what has always been a disturbing problem: how far ought we to accept Sir Frederick Pollock as the effective collaborator with Maitland in writing The History of English Law? That question is now settled once and for all. This great book is Maitland's as we always felt that it was. Pollock's hand need only be traced in the section on Anglo-Saxon law where even a new edition could not entirely eradicate the unsuccessful efforts of Pollock.

The happy family life of the Maitlands was continually overshadowed by the threat of illness. After much discussion they determined on the Grand Canary as the most convenient place to go. Save for the winter 1904-05 they went there every year. Despite constant illness, Maitland never refused any challenge whether it came from the Deputy Keeper of the Public Records and the Year Books or the family of Leslie Stephen and the duty to write a book to preserve his memory. When he died in 1906, Maitland had done far more than most men have ever done in a longer life.

†DORIS MARY STENTON

J. K. CHAPMAN, editor. A Political Correspondence of the Gladstone Era: The Letters of Lady Sophia Palmer and Sir Arthur Gordon, 1884-1889. (Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, New Series, Volume 61, Part 2.) Philadelphia: the Society. 1971. Pp. 52. $2.00.

History's losers have a nostalgic fascination about them. Often good people in terms of their own time, they are overtaken by events and changes that they have little capacity to control or even understand. In public they may put up a forthright defense, but in private they reveal their apprehensions and dismay.

Lady Sophia Palmer and Sir Arthur Gordon were such people. As the editor of their letters says, they were "conservative Liberals, not themselves leading politicians." Products of the mid-Victorian political elite, they viewed with increasing alarm the democratization and radicalization of English politics in the 1880s and of their leader, Gladstone.

They are interesting not so much because they "counted" but because they knew or were related to a great many people who did. Lady Sophia was the daughter of Gladstone's Lord Chancellor, Lord Selborne, and by family and acquaintance she was connected to leading political figures in both parties. Sir Arthur was the youngest son of the fourth earl of Aberdeen. After a political apprenticeship as his father's private secretary, he became a brilliant colonial governor over a period of thirty years, always imperiously preferring the Crown colonies to the self-governing ones.

The correspondence of Lady Sophia and Sir Arthur, scarcely any of which has previously been published, extended from 1880 to 1912. Professor Chapman has made a selection from their political letters from 1884 to 1889, along with two letters of Lady Sophia on the general election of 1880 and the death of Gladstone. Her letters, because she was in England, have more detail on people and their private views, while his, mostly written from the distance of colonial assignments, are mainly reflective discussions of political issues. The letters are generously annotated, but it would help to know which ones Gordon wrote when he was out of England.

Not much is added to our knowledge of political events here, although a good deal is confirmed. More interesting are the central themes of fear of the future and betrayal. Whether the issue be socialism, the franchise, Ireland, sanctity of property, or the Church, both correspondents reveal a sense of doom. They had little recognition of the economic and political stresses reshaping the country, and Gordon could only despair at "a large, inert mass ready, though not willing, to be revolutionized" by "the few who really desire revolution." The villains were Chamberlain, Churchill, and most of all Gladstone "whose dangerous demagogic gifts did untold harm latterly." But with a forgiveness that ironically revealed her Victorian anachronism, Lady Sophia could say of Gladstone at his death, "Yet after all the real power of the man lay in his faith in God."

WILLIAM HENRY MAEHL, JR.
University of Oklahoma

G. R. SEARLE. The Quest for National Efficiency: A Study in British Politics and Political Thought, 1899-1914. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1971. Pp. x, 286. $8.50.

G. R. Searle's study of the political ideal of "national efficiency" attempts to transcend the political historian's conventional concern with party, institutions, and policy. But Searle is most persuasive as a traditional political historian successfully tracing the complicated course of Lord Rosebery's bid for national leadership from 1900 to 1902, the Education Act of 1902, the Webbs' Poor Law Minority Report, and Lloyd George's abortive efforts toward a national coalition government in 1910. To identify a "national efficiency group" Searle argues that a reaction to Britain's decline as a great power in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, exacerbated by disillusionment with Liberal political forms, led to a "corporate identity" among such disparate political figures as the Webbs, H. G. Wells, G. B. Shaw, R. B. Haldane, A. J. Balfour, Lord Rosebery, Alfred Milner, Robert Morant, L. S. Amery, and Lord Esher. To these people Searle attributes a common ideology of imperialism, Broad Church traditions of social thought idealizing the German state, reliance upon experts in government, and state-aided science and technology.

Searle's criteria for membership in the "national efficiency movement," evidently derived from the Webbs' analysis of inefficiency and their bureaucratic and suprapolitical remedies, are applied only to those eager to promote national strength. This treatment of ideas qua programs introduces substantive and methodological problems. An individual's use of politically popular rhetoric in the decade following the Boer War is not sufficient evidence that he belonged to an "efficiency group," especially since the same priorities and goals were advocated by liberals whom Searle puts in opposition to this group. C. F. G. Masterman and Herbert Samuel within government and Alfred Marshall, J. A. Hobson, and L. T. Hobhouse without had been serious and influential critics of wasted human resources before the Boer War made national reform a popular issue. The political activities of men like Balfour and Haldane, furthermore, cannot be discussed apart from the intellectual and spiritual assumptions that governed everything they did. Searle's exploration of politics and political thought exclusively in terms of the machinery of government ignores the development of political thought and conduct as part of a larger revolution in social, economic, and political theory and practice occurring from the 1880s to 1914 in the closely related communities of scientists, men of letters, members of parliament, dons, bankers, and businessmen.

REBA N. SOFFER
San Fernando Valley State College

P. F. CLARKE. Lancashire and the New Liberalism. New York: Cambridge University Press. 1971. Pp. ix, 472. $18.50.

DAVID AYERST. The Manchester Guardian: Biography of a Newspaper. Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1971. Pp. 702. $15.00.

The center of Clarke's argument is (1) Lancashire was one of the critical areas of political geography (Greater London was another) where the post-Gladstonian Liberal party had to make gains in order to win a general election; (2) the party succeeded here, not only in 1906 but in the 1910 elections; and (3) its success in working-class constituencies here showed how strong and healthy the party was on the eve of the 1914 war. So much for all those from George Dangerfield to Roy Douglas who have argued the inevitability of Liberal decline by 1914.

The case for Liberal strength is not made simply in terms of the number of seats held by Liberals through the elections of 1910 (indeed Clarke shows that by December 1910 the Conservatives had doubled the number of seats they had in 1906 in the northwest). It is the fall in the Conservative poll that indicates their relative weakness; another sign is the marked Liberal success in the "more highly enfranchised" seats (that is, those with over sixty to sixty-five per cent of the adult males on the register).

All the same, the author concedes that what would have happened in a 1915 election, without a war, is "an open question." By restricting himself to Lancashire and the northwest he skips the fact that seven Liberal seats lost to Conservatives from 1910 to 1914 were the result of three-cornered contests. And surely it would have surprised the Webbs to hear that the term "progressive" has been "consigned to . . . American history." This is a serious, if very expensive book, with an excellent bibliography.

The chronicler of Manchester's Guardian proceeds with unhurried, affectionate detail from the aftermath of Peterloo to the Suez crisis of 1956. He relies upon the files and archives of the Guardian, including letters by its editors, and especially the letters of C. P. Scott. Over three-quarters of the book is devoted to the age of Scott (editor 1871-1932, or effectively 1871-1926) and after. The golden age began after the Boer War but before Scott's purchase of the paper in 1907.

This is a labor of love without any easily incapsulated thesis. There are fascinating anecdotes: Admiral Lord Fisher wanted Redmond made prime minister in 1916; before the Balfour Declaration the leader-writer Herbert Sidebotham saw the advantage of a Jewish Palestine (as a British dominion) safeguarding the Suez Canal; on Captain Walter Lippmann's advice, Scott tried to hire first Gilbert Murray and then his son-in-law Arnold Toynbee as an American correspondent in 1919.

Laurence Scott, grandson of C. P., found out in 1950 that Guardian readers all over tended to be well-educated people who cared much more for international politics than for local cricket. In 1959 the masthead read simply The Guardian; in 1960 the first London printing was run off. This is a good book about an admirable journal. Unhappily the footnotes are buried in the back, under chapter numbers.

BARRY MCGILL
Oberlin College

ARTHUR J. MARDER. From the Dreadnought to Scapa Flow: The Royal Navy in the Fisher Era, 1904-1919. Volume 5, Victory and Aftermath (January 1918-June 1919). New York: Oxford University Press. 1970. Pp. xxiii, 416, 7 charts. $12.00.

In this concluding volume of his magisterial series on the Royal Navy in the Fisher era, Professor Marder has to handle three different themes: the triumphant conclusion of the war at sea; the readjustment of the navy from war to peace; and a summary, not only of the five volumes of this series, but of a scholarly lifetime devoted to the senior service. All are handled with the precision, clarity, and careful analysis that have marked the preceding volumes.

The most dramatic episode in the first part of the book is the surrender of the High Seas Fleet to Sir David Beatty's Grand Fleet on November 21, 1918, but the chapter that will be read most attentively is doubtless that which describes the final defeat of the submarine campaign. Marder's analysis and the statistical tables accompanying it demonstrate clearly the point made in volume 4: convoy was the answer, and in the circumstances of 1917-18, the only answer to the U-boat. Other expedients, such as the vast northern mine barrage and the spectacular Zeebrugge raid, had only the most fleeting and marginal effect. Yet the belief that convoy was defensive and therefore not consonant with sound principles of maritime strategy died very hard. The battle between the advocates of convoy and hunting groups had to be fought out again in 1939-41. The entire story of the convoy system and its vicissitudes is an instructive example of the weak staff work at the Admiralty as well as of the deficient intellectual grasp of strategy and tactics by many senior naval officers—two characteristics that Marder highlights in his concluding chapter, "Reflections on an Era," as some of the worst failings of the Royal Navy during the First World War. It also illustrates another of Marder's conclusions: the unfortunate effect on the navy of the belief that the Nelson tradition required constant offensive action. In terms of the U-boat menace this translated into futile offensive sweeps a policy that, if persisted in, would have led to disaster. It was unfortunate that Sir James Saumarez was not given a small tithe of the attention that went to Nelson.

During the period between the armistice and the signing of the Versailles Treaty, the naval settlement with Germany occupied a great deal of Admiralty attention, as did demobilization, reorganization, and the naval aspects of the allied intervention in Russia. The two events of greatest significance for the future, however, were the "sea battle of Paris"—the clash between the British desire for primacy at sea and the American demand for a "navy second to none"—and the Admiralty's recognition that Japan was the most likely naval threat in the future. The story is taken up from this point on (with somewhat less clarity) in Captain S. W. Roskill's Naval Policy Between the Wars: The Period of Anglo-American Antagonism, 1919-1929 (1969), but by the time the High Seas Fleet scuttled itself at Scapa Flow on June 21, 1919, enough had happened to make it clear that that event was the end of an era rather than the prologue to a new age of British supremacy at sea.

Marder's conclusions about the Royal Navy in the Fisher era lead the reader to reflect on Marder's achievement. It is not very likely to be bettered or supplanted for a long time to come. The recent publication of the third volume of the official Churchill biography by Martin Gilbert (Winston S. Churchill: the Challenge of War, 1914-1916 [1971]), with copious extracts from the Churchill papers, does not substantially modify Marder's evaluation of Churchill's tenure of the Admiralty in 1914-15. On the Goeben episode, for instance, Marder's discussion is considerably fuller than Gilbert's. In fairness, Mr. Gilbert's declared intention is to rely exclusively on contemporary documents. An eight-hundred-page book largely devoted to Admiralty affairs that does not once mention Marder's work, however, will strike many readers as remarkable. If this partial opening of the most important remaining private archive dealing with naval affairs during the First World War does not necessitate any serious modification of Marder's work, it seems safe to assume that nothing else will. Not everyone will share his great enthusiasm for "Jacky" Fisher or his more restrained enthusiasm for Jellicoe. Additions and corrections to the record will continue to be made. The work as a whole, however, is indispensable to our understanding of the last era of British supremacy at sea and a splendid monument to the ships and men who sustained it.

RAYMOND CALLAHAN
University of Delaware

MAURICE COWLING. The Impact of Labour, 1920-1924: The Beginning of Modern British Politics. (Cambridge Studies in the History and Theory of Politics.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 1971. Pp. ix, 570. $17.50.

This book could have been the most notable contribution to our understanding of modern British politics. With all its faults it must still be considered one of the truly important studies in the field. The first to discuss the response to Labour from 1920 to 1924 and to show the extent to which Labour became "the major problem" for Liberals and Conservatives, it is also the first to explain that, with respect to Labour, the struggle within the Conservative party concerned tactics rather than policy and that the Conservatives who defeated the Coalition in 1922 were just as opposed to socialism as those who wished to remain allied with the Lloyd George Liberals. So, it seems, were the Asquithian Liberals who wanted to organize a center party in order to provide an alternative other than Labour to Lloyd George. Indeed, once the Coalition fell all Liberals—particularly Lloyd George—wanted to establish themselves as the alternative to the very same threat.

Why they failed and the Conservatives emerged as the party of constructive resistance forms a second, almost parallel theme. One might say themes, except that they are linked through the person of Stanley Baldwin whose political genius and studied moderation Cowling freely admits. In doing so he tacitly questions some of the sentimental myths surrounding the Conservative leader. More explicitly, he anticipates Roy Douglas, The History of the Liberal Party (1971), in suggesting that the Liberals' decline, far from being inevitable, was actually the result of astute tactics on the part of Baldwin as well as internal divisions and a series of miscalculations culminating in Asquith's decision to put Labour into office in 1924.

The story of this decision, like the rest of the book, is drawn from many private papers. Interspersed are amusing, if sometimes oblique, descriptions of the politicians involved. Yet the detail can be overwhelming and difficult to follow because The Impact of Labour, 1920-1924 is poorly constructed and because its parallel themes—Labour's threat and the success of the Conservatives in meeting it—unfold in confused, uneasy tandem. The second yields long lists of feuding factions whose relevance to the problem of how best to deal with Labour is not always made clear. The basis of the problem is itself unclear and, for this reason, so are the grounds for the tactics adopted by the victorious moderates.

Take Baldwin's conscious effort to destroy the Liberals in 1924. One might have thought that in rejecting coalition as an answer to Labour, he would have looked to a revived Liberal party. His decision to adopt a protectionist platform in 1923 helped to revive it. But Cowling denies that the effect was intended without saying when Baldwin determined on Liberal collapse or when he came to accept either the eventuality or the possibility of Labour rule. At times he suggests that the leadership of Ramsay MacDonald after 1922 made the difference; at other times he suggests that Black Friday and the collapse of direct action in 1921 counted most. Either way there are problems. Leaders of the Labour party had never endorsed direct action and, contrary to what Cowling believes, their acceptance of parliamentarism did not begin in 1921. Whatever changes in policy occurred after that date cannot be ascribed to new methods of achieving them: if the changes were as great as Cowling implies, then it is hard to see why everyone was so fearful in 1922, and if the significant change came after 1922, then Cowling must prove that MacDonald differed substantially from previous leaders of the party.

This he cannot do. His emphasis on the threat of Labour may be a useful corrective to Robert Skidelsky, Politicians and the Slump (1967), and others who minimize the differences among parties. But in the end he does not explain how great those differences were, whether Labour's threat was as real as it was perceived to have been, or why the conclusions drawn from the same perception differed so widely. Such omissions are serious in a book about the impact of Labour. Even more serious, perhaps, is his failure to discuss the constitutional implications of all the proposals for some sort of coalition or center party to keep Labour permanently out of office.

BARBARA MALAMENT
Yale University

NOREEN BRANSON and MARGOT HEINEMANN. Britain in the 1930's. New York: Praeger Publishers. 1971. Pp. x, 358. $11.00.

The excerpts are the best part—Sir John Boyd Orr speaking the truth on poverty and malnutrition, three angry Conservative M.P.'s reporting the brutalities of a Mosley rally, and a Rhondda Valley miner recalling how he and his mates stole coal and timber from the mines. When the authors let the contemporaries speak Britain in the 1930's comes alive. Nearly all else is disappointing.

The social and industrial topics skimmed in this discursive book have absorbed and continue to absorb the energies of dozens of specialists; yet for recent findings one searches in vain. For detailed accounts, meaty and authoritative, one must still turn to monographs long known. For synthesis one does far better with Charles Mowat's Britain Between The Wars, published in 1955.

Best done, I thought, are chapters on "The Unemployed and the Means Test," and on malnutrition ("Eating and Not Eating"). But the chapter on "The Radical Trend in Culture" remains a catalog of names. The subject of "Industrial Graveyards" presented an opportunity to show, in vivid human terms, what chronic unemployment meant; but the opportunity went by default, buried among generalities and statistics. Surprisingly weak is the chapter on "Class Structure and Class Outlook," which one would hope to be particularly strong in a series designed "to bring together . . . what we know . . . about the structure and changes in British society" (p. viii). The chapter on "Homes, Landlords, and Building Societies" does not begin to suggest either the complexities of housing or the ferment of ideas through the decade. Two excellent chapters discuss industrial unions and their organizational efforts. The authors succeed in highlighting several themes: slowness of mass organization, lethargy of union leadership, the impact of the unemployed marches, the continued decline in workers' share of output despite rising productivity, persistence of stratified inequalities in income and spending power, and official apologetics, now evasive and now callous, for inaction.

Professedly "social history" concerned "primarily with the everyday lives and attitudes of the British people" and the "ordinary person," this book veers to the political often. The process is never haphazard. Attention focuses on the more striking efforts of Communists at the grass roots or on the more egregious (and, by implication, typical) profascist comments from the upper class. One result is to leave virtually unexplained the government's eventual liberalizations or modifications of policies originally callous or miserly. The book's credibility gains nothing from this partisanship.

PAUL B. JOHNSON
Roosevelt University

FRANKLIN REID GANNON. The British Press and Germany, 1936-1939. New York: Oxford University Press. 1971. Pp. x, 314. $10.50.

Gannon's first chapter may be described as an essay in minor revisionism devoted to a subject, appeasement, that has largely escaped such treatment. This substantial study is the product of strenuous effort. The revisionism is minor in scale because the author is not primarily concerned to impugn the present by subverting its vision of the past. Instead the author argues that appeasement was the result of British reaction to the Nazi regime as well as the result of a complex of attitudes dividing Britain's Left and Right—and splitting each of them. Some of these divisive problems persist "to bedevil both contemporary politics and the possibility of a detached consideration of the inter-war period" (p. 31).

The revisionism largely consists of denying the foresight of Leftist liberals and the guilty propensity of the Right for Hitler as a mighty fortress against Bolshevism. There is nothing wholly new in this except for the sympathetic presentation of the Rightist position. Gannon's background setting presents the press competing for circulation. They were therefore unwilling to worry readers severely by drawing conclusions that might call for a costly response. An understandable but quite unheroic discretion was compounded by the fear of jeopardizing Britain's frail economic recovery. Left and Right were largely in agreement—"never again"—about World War I: the former favored the League of Nations, disarmament, the expression of outrage against Hitler, and, in smaller numbers, a national and international popular front; the Right favored rearmament, the British Empire, and the prospect of a settlement with Germany. At various times parts of both groups distrusted France and larger numbers thought the Versailles Treaty illegitimate and regarded Czechoslovakia as its unloved scion.

Gannon's pages convey the journalistic and editorial thoughts and sentiments in which appeasement flourished. His account of a selected number of London papers (as well as the Manchester Guardian) is interesting but somewhat random. Purists of method will not accept his rule-of-thumb justification of his selection. Those with a taste for drawing parallels with our times may find reading this book a haunting experience. But for all its interest the book is disappointing in the coherence of its design, in the inadequate development of the theme that appeasement marked a crisis in the conscience of liberalism, and in its impoverished concluding section.

M. A. FITZSIMONS
University of Notre Dame

K. THEODORE HOPPEN. The Common Scientist in the Seventeenth Century: A Study of the Dublin Philosophical Society, 1683-1708. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia. 1970. Pp. xii, 297. $7.50.

Ireland produced few important seventeenth-century scientists; one of the more interesting ones, however, was William Molyneux (1655-98) of Dublin, a friend and correspondent of John Locke and Edmond Halley. It was Molyneux who worked to galvanize the meager scientific resources of Ireland and to establish a working scientific society for Dublin.

It is a widely held belief, and basically a sound one, that important elements of the scientific revolution of the seventeenth century are epitomized in the numerous societies for the pursuit of science that sprouted during the course of it. The organization that has justifiably commanded and continues to garner the lion's share of attention has been the Royal Society of London. In his study K. T. Hoppen chose not to re-evaluate the basic premises of the literature but rather to examine in depth an offshoot of the London group. The Dublin Philosophical Society, founded in late 1683 and early 1684, offers a striking opportunity for the examination of the concerns, goals, and methods of late seventeenth-century science. "We possess in the records of the Irish group an accessible and fully documented case of a scientific society consciously organized upon what was conceived to be the principles of the Royal Society of London. We have here, as it were, a model of the Royal Society, stripped of its complex and obscured origins, its historical accidents, and its warring factions. In short, the Dublin Society provides a clear reproduction of the public face of later seventeenth-century science."

Hoppen has diligently collected the minutes, letters, and other papers pertinent to the Society, along with an impressive bibliography of secondary works; the sum provides an image of exhaustive and painstaking research leading to what will doubtless stand as the definitive description of the structure and function of the Dublin Philosophical Society.

Yet from the point of view of the historian of science, there remains something more to be done. The heart and soul of the Dublin Society was Molyneux, who, although best known for his single political tract, devoted an overwhelming part of his efforts to astronomy, dynamics, and optics. Molyneux left enough scientific correspondence (with the astronomer Flamsteed and with Halley, for example) and other manuscripts to keep a small team of scholars busy with new and exciting material.

Hoppen makes no concerted attempt in this book, however, to dig deeply into the character and value of Molyneux's achievement. Molyneux's very interesting translation of much of Galileo's Dialogues concerning Two New Sciences is passed off (pp. 129-30) as the Dialogues concerning the Two Chief World Systems.

But if Hoppen has not plumbed the depths of the science carried on in seventeenth-century Ireland, he has produced a polished, detailed, and valuable account of the organization and development of a scientific society that will surely provide part of the groundwork for that much-needed reassessment of the character and role of cooperative scientific efforts in the scientific revolution.

ROBERT H. KARGON

Johns Hopkins University

GEOFFROY ATKINSON and ABRAHAM C. KELLER. Prelude to the Enlightenment: French Literature, 1690-1740. Seattle: University of Washington Press. 1970. Pp. 221. $7.95.

This book is the last of three volumes by the late Geoffroy Atkinson on French literature in the period from 1690 to 1740. It is presented with interpretive commentary as a collection of quotations ("the quotations, and not our comments, are the meat of this book") that Abraham C. Keller has translated and selected from Atkinson's notes.

The authors stress the diversity of literary themes and eschew stuffing the Prévosts and Marivaux into categories but emphasize those themes that show a break from the classical age and anticipate Romanticism. Thus, in part 1 ("The Emotional Revolution") the excerpts reveal a penchant for wallowing in emotion that the generation of Racine would have found comical or ridiculous but that to later writers such as Bernardin de Saint-Pierre would have seemed natural. Aspects of the "emotional revolution" such as sentimentality, personal confession, and primitivism indicate how "lesser writers first cultivated the genre and prepared the public taste for the master-work of Jean-Jacques [Rousseau]." The strongest evidence of a shift in literary values was in the libertine view of love that presaged the romantic attitude of the later eighteenth century.

Themes commonly associated with the Enlightenment included toleration of intellectual and religious diversity, freedom from dogmatism, skepticism of revealed religion, cosmopolitanism, sympathy for the poor, exoticism, belief in progress and perfectibility, social and racial equality, and the utility of science. In part 2 ("The Broadening World of 1700") Atkinson and Keller find these themes in such obvious writers as Bayle, Montesquieu, the lesser-known Jean Buvat, and the anonymous authors of the Journal des Sçavans. While many motifs of the Enlightenment are audible in its prelude, the authors discern more emotionalism than rationalism, more that anticipates Romanticism than the Age of Reason.

Central to the authors' purpose is the attempt to pin the literary innovations of 1690-1740 to the taste of a growing bourgeois audience. Achieving unusual acceptance by all social classes, the intellectuals wrote "quite consciously, for the enjoyment of their fellow commoners, often with open or tacit disregard of the approved values of traditional aristocratic society." Their novels, which preached a plain ethic of benevolence and personal happiness, helped to make the daily life of commoners an object of sympathy.

The principal strength of this book is the careful selection and presentation of a popular literature of sentiment, exotic adventure, revelations of the bedroom, and even social protest. The authors discover that the literature of science and reason found a smaller audience than did the literature of sensibilité. But herein, too, lies the book's weakness. The authors fail to analyze the audience for these books beyond the amorphous middle class. Who bought which books and in what quantity? In his preface Professor Keller has forsworn a statistical analysis of book sales. But he makes the matter of the audience so crucial to his discussion of the literature, and he so tantalizes the reader in his conclusion with the information that Atkinson possessed "considerable data about writers, publishers, and public acclaim or failure" proving that "audiences were much larger and more bourgeois in their make-up than in the heyday of the reign of Louis XIV," that one is left begging for a social analysis of this public and its taste. One is tempted to propose that Professor Keller write yet a fourth volume.

ROBERT ISHERWOOD
Vanderbilt University

CHARLES COULSTON GILLISPIE, Lazare Carnot, Savant. A monograph treating Carnot's scientific work, with facsimile reproduction of his unpublished writings on mechanics and on the calculus, and an essay concerning the latter by A. P. YOUSCHKEVITCH. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1971. Pp. xi, 359. $17.50.

This handsome volume offers a fresh perspective on Lazare Carnot, the "organizer of victory" in the campaigns of 1793 and 1794 and the only member of the Comité du salut publique to continue in power in the Directory. From the archives of the scientific academies of Paris and Berlin, Dr. Gillispie and Professor A. P. Youschkevitch have recovered forgotten papers that exhibit Carnot in his youth as a military engineer who wrote on mechanics and the calculus in the effort to win recognition in academic competition. His career in politics and government is better known than his real significance as a scientist whose work led to the creation of the laws of thermodynamics by his son Sadi. From the present point of view, his part in public affairs and military administration appears as an interlude; his role in the Terror and his directorate lasted about five years, 1792-97, and his service to Napoleon consisted of the defense of Antwerp in 1812-13 and the ministry of the Interior in 1815. On returning from exile to France in 1800 he resumed public scientific activity, serving on various commissions of the Institut de France, première classe, and publishing in the fields of geometry and mechanics. After Waterloo he went into exile again and died at Magdeburg in 1823.

In 1778 the Académie des Sciences of Paris offered a prize for the most precise statement of "la théorie des machines simples en ayant égard au frottement et à la roideur des cordages," with the proviso that the laws of friction and the effect of the rigidity of ropes be determined by new experiments applicable to naval machinery such as pulleys, capstans, and inclined planes; as none of the essays were satisfactory, a similar topic was announced for 1780. Carnot entered both competitions, and the theoretical section of each paper now published emphasizes the mathematics involved in raising weights, "the purpose of the greater number of all machines actually used." The context of the competition was clearly the three-decked man-of-war, with its numerous heavy guns and elaborate rigging, requiring powerful hoisting gear, whether in action at sea or under construction or repair in arsenals. Summarizing these essays, Dr. Gillispie writes that Carnot generalized from the principles of action of certain machines to the principles of machines collectively, thereby "making physics out of the industrial reality of the age."

The third essay, presented in full, was entered for a competition established in 1785 by the Académie royale des sciences of Berlin calling for a theory of what is called infini in mathematics. Professor Youschkevitch's commentary relates this "Dissertation" to Carnot's later mathematical works as well as to earlier studies of calculus and points out that "a number of the remarkable ideas that Carnot failed to include in the final [published] version of his work have continued to be unknown." Taken in chronological order the three papers show a development in clarity, in the enunciation of principles, and in the definition of quantities; in short, a power of exposition and penetration that was not recognized by the examining committees.

Dr. Gillispie's work illustrates the maturing of the discipline of the history of science from an inclusive gathering of information concerning science and scientists to concentration on specific theoretical advances in the light of immediate circumstances. These three previously unknown documents reveal the widening generalizations that may be expressed, as Carnot himself puts it, in progressively simpler formulations, a kind of language that advances understanding even as it limits such insight to a narrower professional public. This book permits the reconstruction of one man's contribution to the science of mechanics and applied mathematics and thus adds notably to the intellectual history of these critical years. The effect of the whole book is enhanced by the photographic reproduction of crucial texts just as Carnot wrote them, without transcription, translation, or editing. There can be little doubt of what he meant, so clear is his language and his handwriting.

HARCOURT BROWN
Brown University

GONZALO REDONDO. Las empresas políticas de José Ortega y Gasset: "El Sol", "Crisol", "Luz"

(1917-1934). In two volumes. (Colección Rialp, de cuestiones fundamentales, Number 15.) Madrid: Ediciones Rialp. 1970. Pp. 476; 608.

Ortega y Gasset was the dominant intellectual of Spain in this century; the translations of his works were best sellers in many countries. A professor of metaphysics, a journalist, publisher, parliamentarian, philosopher, and humanist, his influence was far reaching. Redondo deals with Ortega as a journalist whose role was inseparable from that of a politician, in a period of change from an oligarchic, liberal, semiconstitutional monarchy to a military dictatorship and then to a republic. Thus the author contributes not only to Spanish history but to the role of the intellectual in politics.

Ortega did not influence events only through his newspaper but was involved in the founding of two political groups. Unfortunately the book does not tell much about these organizations; it centers on the history of three newspapers (El Sol, Crisol, and Luz) that served Ortega and his friends as platforms and reveals the interaction among the editor and collaborators of a journal of opinion, the financiers who owned it, and the government that used subsidies and tariffs to pressure the owners and through them the editorial policy. The conflict between the independent, liberal intellectual and Azaña—the intellectual turned politician—and the realities of party politics in a divided society are analyzed. Ortega attacked the old politics of restoration Spain, hoping that the socialist would play the role of a labor party. Despite his Spanish nationalism he looked sympathetically upon Catalan regionalism. Criticism of the oligarchic two-party system led El Sol to find hope in the intervention of the army and Primo de Rivera, only to be soon in opposition to the dictator. The dictablanda that succeeded leads to the Delenda est Monarchia, the call for a republic, the loss of El Sol under the financiers' pressure, and the creation of a new paper, Crisol (soon transformed into Luz), four days before the proclamation of the republic. Ortega intervened constructively but critically in the constitution making and policies of the Left bourgeois socialist coalition, but seven months later he wrote "No es est," which expressed his disillusion. After giving up his regular journalistic activity he came out with a most insightful analysis of the failures of the Left republicans but also with a prophetic warning to the Right of the mistakes it would make.

Liberal but elitist, conservative but committed to serious reform, opponent of clericalism but also of demagogic anticlericalism, Ortega was soon disillusioned by party politics, pettiness, and demagoguery. The call for a great national party, the appeal and faith in youth, and the critique of party politicians were elements in Ortega's thought reflected in the nascent fascism whose leaders expressed their admiration for him. With his "Viva la República" he still thought that the new regime remained the only alternative. A mixture of economic and political intrigue deprived him of Luz; defeated in his efforts to create a new party and to arouse those Spaniards he believed ready for a different style of politics, he returned to academia. This intensely political man, insightful and a perceptive critic, turned silent when he felt that he could not play a responsible and effective role. Less than three years later the Civil War started.

Anyone interested in the contradictions and tragedy of the sincere intellectual in politics, the relationship between economic and political power and the mind, and the difficulties of creating a civil society and democratic politics in Spain will find this book interesting, although long-winded. He will, however, miss an analysis of the relationship between Ortega the thinker and the journalist-politician, the response of others (except Azaña) to his endeavors, and his relationship to those who joined him in his efforts.

JUAN J. LINZ
Yale University

EDUARDO BRAZÃO. Présence du Portugal en Belgique (De Philippe d'Alsace à Léopold I.<sup>er</sup>). Companhia de Diamantes de Angola (Diamang), Serviços culturais: Dundo—Lunda—Angola. Publicações culturais, Number 80. Museu do Dundo, Estudos de história (ultramarina e continental). Lisbon: the Companhia. 1970. Pp. iv, 18—198.

To those acquainted with Professor Bailey W. Diffie's stimulating study, Prelude to Empire—Portugal Overseas before Henry the Navigator (1960), one of the more absorbing aspects of pre-Columbian Europe's developing interest in maritime commerce was Portugal's role in establishing trade connections with the Low Countries. This subject, usually given but cursory treatment in existing accounts of the late Middle Ages and Renaissance, is now competently and thoughtfully explored by Senhor Eduardo Brazão, the former Portuguese ambassador to Belgium.

This work, originally published in Portuguese in 1969 and now in a French edition, traces the close and continuous commercial and cultural relationships between the Portuguese and Flemish from Portugal's rise under Afonso Henriques in the twelfth century to the ambassadorship of the famed Portuguese poet, Almeida Garrett, to the newly independent Belgium of the 1830s. Its purpose is to underline the strategic importance of Portugal's geographic position as Europe's Atlantic gateway and to emphasize the essential thrust given by early Portuguese-Flemish commerce to the eventual expansion of maritime discoveries sponsored by Henry the Navigator. Carefully researched, fully documented, and excellently illustrated with both photographs and color portraits, the study describes early Flemish interest in Portugal during the Crusades, the formalizing of ties between the two areas in the marriage of Philip of Alsace with Teresa, the daughter of Afonso Henriques, and the subsequent evolution of maritime trade between the Portuguese ports of Lisbon and Oporto with the Flemish ports of Ghent, Bruges, and Antwerp. Originally the midway point on routes from Italy to the North Sea ports and subsequently by virtue of its own much-desired products, Portugal established itself as a major entrepôt in Northern Europe's early trade network. Both in Bruges and in Antwerp its feitorias or trading posts became prominent foreign commerce centers that weathered the wars of the Counter Reformation. Their representatives were likewise appreciated foreign residents who developed friendly relationships between the two nations that have endured seven centuries.

Brazão's study attests admirably to the adage once expressed by Belgium's Leopold II that a nation is never small as long as it borders the sea. It also provides much valuable new information on the curious yet significant contribution of Portugal to the growth of European maritime commerce.

C. J. KOLINSKI
Florida Atlantic University

VALDEMAR ANDERSEN. Den jyske hedekolonisation [The Jutland Heath Colonization]. (Skifter udgivet af Jysk Selskab for Historie, Number 24.) Aarhus: Universitetsforlaget. 1970. Pp. 246. 37.95 D. kr.

Reclamation of swamp, bog, waste, and forest lands in Europe matched rising populations from the 1750s through the whole of the nineteenth century. Its conceptual origins and progress denote, likewise, economic and social changes. Throughout Europe these efforts brought a mixture of populations; Spain, Prussia, Russia, and others sought the unwanted, the dissenters, and refugees from wars or repression, and these colonization efforts exceed the small example of the Jutland case. Denmark reclaimed lands, resettling both its own and German migrants by reason of economic factors alone, for the members of the Rente-kammer (tax office) thought that reclamation of the sandy wastes of a small portion of the west-central Jutland coast would profit the state. Immigrants recruited by J. F. W. Moritz from Pfalz, north of Heidelberg, were promised twenty years of freedom from taxation and military service, "day money" of varying sums, monetary assistance for the trip, and provisions to keep them alive. Many harassed Pfaltzers accepted, but the bleak heath of Jutland proved too forbidding and most colonists went elsewhere—to Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, or other beckoning states.

The persistent colonists were mostly Danes and not Germans, and heath reclamation continued well into the last quarter of the nineteenth century under both private and public auspices. The area reclaimed in the eighteenth century was hardly proportionate to the costs; the assembled sum of 1,046,667 rigsdaler of 1783, while reasonable, averaged an enormous amount per acre. Yet these colonizations inspired a willing movement by Danes where costly effort, delayed rewards, and meager living were balanced only by promises.

The most conspicuous weakness of Andersen's book is that the concluding "European perspective" ought to have been a prelude to explain and place in context this Danish example. It would also have been prudent to examine more fully cameralist and free-trade economic views of such writers as Erik Pontoppidan or J. H. von Justi to test the claim of mercantilist inspiration for the project, for the similar views of its chief supporters—A. G. Moltke and J. H. E. Bernstorff—cast doubts on Andersen's generalization. Likewise, the amount expended on the colonization would deny its value in mercantilist terms and would point to cameralism as its inspiration. The narrow confines of the work within the eighteenth century exclude the next century's major effort and even overlook the agricultural changes transpiring within Denmark simultaneously with the colonization scheme. In other respects the work is competent; an excellent bibliography, lists of immigrants, and reproductions of original documents enhance its value, even if the index is a sort of afterthought.

RAYMOND E. LINDGREN
California State College,
Long Beach

JOSEF SEUBERT. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der Reformation in der ehemaligen freien Reichsstadt Dinkelsbühl. (Historische Studien, Number 420.) Lübeck: Matthiesen Verlag. 1971. Pp. 72. DM 15.

Nothing of great moment marks the history of Dinkelsbühl in the late Middle Ages. An average city of about four thousand with a modest contado in the Swabian-Franconian region, comfortably wealthy from textiles and metal wares, and possessing a stable mixed government of patricians and guildsmen, the little imperial city entered the Reformation era with typical ecclesiastical conditions suggesting the need for change: too many clerics, an arrogant monastic provost exercising the jus patronatus over municipal parishes, and general dissatisfaction with the Church's spiritual guidance. By 1523 Luther had followers among leading tradesmen and politicians, and in 1525 the council began to legislate for the clergy. Widespread citizen support for rebelling peasants brought a brief backlash in 1525 (as it did in nearby Rothenburg), but under the influence of the Lutheran preacher Bernhard Wurzelmann the new religion was firmly established by government action in the 1530s. From then until the Schmalkaldic War Dinkelsbühl was officially Lutheran, although the old religion never ceased to be practiced. In the reaction following the emperor's victory the government was lodged in the hands of conservative Catholic patricians, and in 1555 parity was established in religion but not in politics, from the exercise of which the Lutherans were excluded. Their ecclesiastical ordinance of 1572 was a unique example in Germany of an evangelical church organization independent of political authority.

Seubert's little monograph tells all this in efficient prose but offers little beyond the recital of familiar events. The "investigations" of his title are nothing more than descriptions of incidents in the Reformation in Dinkelsbühl. At the most interesting junctures in the story (the active support given to the besieging peasants by substantial numbers of burghers, reasons for religious choice among citizens, the impact on society of the new marriage court, etc.) the author avoids analysis or confesses inability to explain. Beyond a certain usefulness as an outline of events and a handy reference to the sources, the book seems to serve no real purpose.

GERALD STRAUSS
Indiana University

CARLA KRAMER-SCHLETTE. Vier augsburger Chronisten der Reformationszeit: Die Behandlung und Deutung der Zeitgeschichte bei Clemens Sender, Wilhelm Rem, Georg Preu und Paul Hektor Mair. (Historische Studien, Number 421.) Lübeck: Matthiesen Verlag. 1970. Pp. 95. DM 18.

Carla Kramer-Schlette presents a highly schematic, comparative study of four Augsburg chroniclers living at the outbreak of the Reformation. The work is conceived first in terms of the chroniclers' presentation of objective material bearing on the social, political, and constitutional relations of the city and, second, in terms of the subjective cultural worth of the sources according to the consciousness of the authors. Whatever historical value the chronicles possess lies in the latter realm.

With a single exception there are no surprises here. The chroniclers ignore motives and context. One seldom obtains a glimpse of the internal power structure and its relationships.

Even the new religious ceremonies and doctrines, although supported by all but Clemens Sender, are reported vaguely. Our questions are obviously not theirs. Their nominalistic perception usually fails to penetrate beyond the externals of an event: for Georg Preu the reformacion is principally the destruction of idols. Occasional vignettes emerge: the aged Emperor Maximilian on his knees at mass; Charles V, bare headed, in the Corpus Christi procession; the description of a brutal execution. It is still the world of Huizinga. And yet the relieving influences of humanism are curiously absent. The chronicles ignore Augsburg's culture and Conrad Peutinger is only mentioned to be attacked for self-serving. Preu, himself a painter, delights in the iconoclasm. In the bibliography of the monograph one notes the absence of Paul Joachimsen's study of Sender's predecessor, the Benedictine monk-humanist and Augsburg chronicler Sigismund Meisterlin, as well as Joachimsen's great work on humanism's impact upon German Renaissance historiography. The problem of humanism's presence or absence at least warrants formulation. Excellent in its close analysis, the monograph yet suffers from being too narrowly conceived.

JOHN M. HEADLEY
University of North Carolina,
Chapel Hill

GERHARD MASUR. Imperial Berlin. New York: Basic Books. 1970. Pp. vii, 353. $7.95.

Of all the capitals of modern Europe only Berlin leaped suddenly to the pinnacle of fame and power. A disunited Germany had known many cities of eminence and cosmopolitan elegance; Berlin was not always one of them. In the 1850s Berlin's economic growth quickened, and after 1871 her new place as the capital of Imperial Germany sealed her importance in the world.

Berlin was a superb example of the old and the new existing side by side; the court remained, the bourgeois plutocrats arrived, as did tens of thousands of immigrants from the country seeking employment. Jews struggled to establish themselves in the wake of full emancipation. Here was a city of conflicts and problems, of cultural ambition and garish ostentation. Here is a topic that might attract historians of different genres: a modern historian would explain this strange amalgam from a new perspective and with new techniques, while an older type of historian might try to recreate the atmosphere of Berlin, to sketch the conditions of society and the rise of its artistic and intellectual life. We need studies of all kinds.

One would have expected Professor Masur, who spent his early years and university days in Berlin, to give us an elegant version of the older type of history. His work, however, is marked by such serious faults of organization, substance, and style that it possesses few of the virtues and many of the weaknesses of this earlier genre.

Professor Masur has written a short book based on published sources; he did not turn to archival or statistical material. He endeavors to cover all facets of Berlin's life, and his book is a useful introduction to the city's economy, society, and high culture. He offers a kind of generalized Baedeker, but his scholarly aim and method are not clear. "This is not an economic history of Berlin," he writes, but neither is it a social history of the city, for it says little about how different classes lived, worked, played, or thought. He makes the important assertion that "in the second empire Berlin became an a-religious city," but he does not elaborate on this and in this apologetic epilogue merely reiterates his assertion and contends "that in consequence that phase of Berlin life could be ignored without loss." Can it? It is an aperçu that should have been bolstered by fact and illustration and enriched by reflection. Even the Youth Movement—born in Berlin—is dealt with in one inadequate paragraph. Much space is devoted to a conventional summary of German political history, especially during the Great War. Masur's judgments in this realm lack freshness and imagination. To conclude, for example, that "it is difficult to see that Ebert had a choice unless he had wanted to become another Lenin," is to be content with Ebert's own perspective on his predicament. Have we learned nothing in the intervening half century?

As one would expect, Professor Masur, the author of The Prophets of Yesterday (1961), dwells on Berlin's varied cultural and artistic life. As in the rest of the book there is much here that is informative and pleasantly anecdotal. Theodor Fontane certainly was the most interesting Berlin writer of the time, but Masur's fifteen pages on him constitute a mixture of biography and plot analysis not an interpretative essay on Fontane's role and work. It is surprising that someone so familiar with Ranke would have devoted but one—conventional—page to him. Finally the reader misses a treatment of Berlin's popular culture. What did the different groups or classes read? The book is consistently idiosyncratic without being consistently interesting.

Imperial Berlin is written with ease, but occasionally an imprecise phrase or stylistic lapse ("the emotional subjectivism of the romantic movement now somersaulted and embraced the collective order") mars the text. The best passages of this book are anecdotal and autobiographical, and one regrets that Professor Masur did not choose to write the recollections of a cultured, upper-class Berliner; perhaps he could have done for Imperial Berlin what Stefan Zweig in The World of Yesterday (1943) did so poignantly for prewar Vienna.

FRITZ STERN

Columbia University

GIUSEPPE TALAMO. La formazione politica di Agostino Depretis. (L'età del Risorgimento. Studi e testi, Number 7.) Milan: Dott. A. Giuffrè Editore. 1970. Pp. 246. L. 2,400.

Until recently Italian historians have rarely regarded the writing of biography as an important scholarly endeavor, and this work by Giuseppe Talamo gives cause to fear that the art may not yet be understood in Italy. The subject, Agostino Depretis, virtuoso and founder of the practice of trasformismo, overshadowed an entire decade of Italian history. Much is known of his parliamentary dictatorship from 1876 to 1887, but little has been written of the preceding sixty years of his life. Talamo seeks to fill this gap, but the result falls far short of the goal.

This is a set of five crudely linked and badly structured essays, each with appended documents, on as many segments of Depretis's life and family background that carry us to the turn of the century when he was thirty-eight years old. The first study is on the establishment of the Depretis family (Agostino and his father Francesco) as landowners of growing wealth, and the second purports to treat Agostino's administration of the lands of the wealthy Piedmontese family of the Gazzaniga Arnaboldi. Essentially what emerges is that Depretis was of Lombard origin, not Piedmontese as has long been believed, and that in 1843 he conceived a modern scheme for the management of the Gazzaniga holdings. But these are needles to be dug from Talamo's haystack. The author has presented information germane to the formation of the future statesman, but it is in the form of ponderous, raw statistical material, the type of data readout one would get from a computer programed to report on the family's economic and business activities. Such information is little more than a tiny insight into the minutiae of agrarian economy in one small region; on the future prime minister we have precious little. While Depretis's birth registry is faithfully reproduced in the original Latin, he appears again only as an adult, an illustration of the author's tendency to omit biographical information. Why have we no account of his formative years? Not one word has Talamo provided on Depretis's education, or cultura, something Italians have always regarded as a deus ex machina in their leaders. Was he indeed a lawyer as is generally believed? If so, more than incidental mention of the fact is crucial to his political formation.

In the next two essays on Depretis in Parliament in 1848-49 and as mayor of Stradella in 1849-50, Talamo veers a bit closer to his subject. We are told, almost incidentally, that Depretis's experiences in the decade prior to 1848 slowly matured him and that he fought for broader application and more liberal interpretation of the Statuto in the Kingdom of Piedmont, that he was a democrat. In short Depretis is quite clearly delineated in his Left convictions of the moment, but Talamo concludes here with a tantalizing mention of the connubio and nothing more. Hence, apparently on the threshold of allusion to Depretis's reactions as a deputy to that first form of trasformismo, the author leaves his reader to speculate.

The chapter on Depretis as mayor of Stradella is actually a three-part essay in which only the last section deals directly with the subject. The remainder is, first, a socioeconomic study of the town with pedantic lists of its "zoo-technical patrimony" and, second, a brief account of Depretis as city councilman. The material is neither uninteresting nor unimportant, but Talamo's handling of it lacks coherent narrative.

The last essay treats the founding and brief life of the Progresso, a Turin newspaper in which Depretis was actively interested in 1850-51. Here again Talamo knits ideas together a bit better, but he fails to tell much that is not already known about an obscure subject. The Progresso had links with Mazzini, we learn, but so did various other contemporary periodicals. Would we not be more aided by a study of Depretis the publicist that is broad enough to include also his work with La Concordia in 1848 and after?

Talamo's work is excessively fragmentary; depth studies of moments do not elucidate decades. The writing is frequently turgid, and the author often yields to trivia and cannot resist engulfing his reader with oppressive documentation that hinders an already leaden text. Often he drifts into digressions from his already inappropriate title, and there is one supporting document of no relevance (a memoir on agricultural conditions [pp. 70-76] in Depretis's home region dated 1879, more than thirty years beyond the most recent reference to the subject).

Making fair allowance, as indeed we must, for the author's promise in his preface of a later evaluation of this material, the volume still remains a frustration. It is frustrating because so much painstaking research has gone into the task, but it smacks of the assiduousness found occasionally in an industrious but unimaginative graduate student. Talamo has taken a figure who still appears stodgy in Italian history, and so he has left him. Even if Depretis did govern in a period of "dry-as-dust," his stature was such that someone should be able to bring him alive. Yet Talamo leaves all this to the reader's fantasy.

In his introduction the author notes that parts of his book originally appeared in scholarly journals, but he does not inform us that chapters 1, 2, and 5 were first published as dispen- se or university lectures (La formazione di Agostino Depretis [1968]). Indeed what is wrong with this book is that it maintains the classroom format. Comparison with that first edition is sadly enlightening, for little has been changed beyond an occasional word or, worse, paragraphs and entire pages shifted from one chapter to another. At least the addition of an adjective to the book's title clarifies matters slightly, but all remains raw and pedantic. Yet Talamo is listed as the author of a forthcoming biography of Depretis in the Unione Tipografico-Editrice Torinese series. Perhaps, as the subtitle of the 1968 edition suggests, this is nothing more than notes for a biography. If Talamo's research continues in this depth, a polished complete biography might be outstanding; if he publishes it in the present form, one volume will not suffice and Depretis will still await his biographer.

Another aspect of this work is ironic and tragic. Produced as lectures at the University of Rome in the disastrous year 1967-68 and required for examinations in Risorgimento history, these pages are a document that illustrates and perhaps justifies complaints of students rebelling against the present curriculum.

BENJAMIN F. BROWN
University of Kansas

LUCIO AVAGLIANO. Alessandro Rossi e le origini dell'Italia industriale. (Università degli Studi di Salerno. Collana di studi e testi, Number 2.) Naples: Libreria Scientifica Editrice. 1970. Pp. 554. L. 6,000.

Alessandro Rossi (1819-98) was the founder of one of Italy's greatest establishments of the nineteenth century, the woolen manufactory of Lane-Rossi, which employed on the eve of the twentieth century over five thousand persons. Only a small portion of this volume is, however, devoted to a business history of this famous concern or to the early industrialization of Italy. Consequently in the scant fifty pages devoted to the business, attention to economic questions is both sketchy and elementary. To an economic historian this is a pity, the more so because the author apparently had access to the pertinent information, some of which he put in that half of the work given over to documents and tables.

Mr. Avagliano was clearly more interested in the public career of Rossi than in his business affairs, and his choice of emphasis is understandable. Rossi was one of those early entrepreneurs who, like Robert Owen, was deeply concerned with the welfare of his workers and of society in general. Thus one is not surprised to find that he was an exponent of a guild organization of the state, Catholic social welfare movements, model housing for his workers, the education of youth, and mutual aid societies. In politics he was at first a Cavourian liberal who opposed the old Destra, but he later supported Crispi and worked for the protective tariff of 1887. He was active in local politics at Padua, served as a deputy, and was then appointed to the Senate.

This biography touches on a multitude of questions that confronted Italy in the last third of the nineteenth century, but it does not take a hard, clear look at any of them. Its virtues are that it has a great amount of detail, which will make it valuable as a reference book, and a wealth of leads to business archives.

SHEPARD B. CLOUGH
Columbia University

C. DAICOVICIU et al., editors. Acta Musei Napocensis. Volume 7. (Comitetul de Stat pentru Cultură și Artă.) Cluj: Muzeul de Istorie. 1970. Pp. xvi, 668.

This most recent collection of writings on Transylvanian history by the scholars of Cluj is, like previous volumes in the series, weighted toward the pre-Roman and Roman periods and various aspects of the national movement between the latter part of the eighteenth century and the end of the First World War. This emphasis reflects, on the one hand, both the interests of the editor, the distinguished classical archeologist and historian, Constantin Daicoviciu, and the intensive study of ancient history at Cluj and, on the other, the increased nationalist orientation of Romanian historiography in the last decade. Only brief mention may be made here of a few of these and other articles.

In the first group, Valentin Vasiliev describes pieces of jewelry discovered recently in Scythian graves that suggest the need for a fresh look at the problem of the Scythians in Transylvania; Iudit Winkler describes the chronology and types of the earliest Geto-Dacian coinage; Hadrian Daicoviciu makes a number of interesting observations on Trajan's first war with the Dacians; and I. I. Rusu continues his series of "epigraphical notes" on Greek and Roman inscriptions. In the second group, Aurelia Bunea presents a well-documented study of how the Romanian question in Hungary was treated in the Romanian parliament between 1892 and 1899. She concludes that the nationality policy of the Hungarian government helped to turn Romania away from the Triple Alliance toward the Entente. Acațiu Egyed has written a brief but enlightening article on the emigration of peasants from Transylvania between 1900 and 1913. He analyzes their social status, reasons for leaving, destinations—the great majority went to the United States—and the effects on Transylvania of this sizable exodus. Finally, Dumitru Suciuc discusses critically the attitude of the French press toward the union of Moldavia and Wallachia in the period from 1856 to 1859.

There are, in addition, two short but important articles dealing with the period of the Völkerwanderung: a description by Kurt Horedt and Dumitru Protase of a late fifth-century treasure discovered near Cluj that may be Ostrogothic rather than Gepid and may, therefore, necessitate a reassessment of Germanic settlements in the area and an analysis by Ștefan Ferenczi of two jars dating from the end of the sixth or the beginning of the seventh century that may be the oldest traces yet discovered of Slavic settlement in Transylvania. Mention must also be made of Magdalena Bunta's extremely interesting and original contribution to the history of the Anabaptists in Transylvania in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and Marius Porumb's study of selected sixteenth-century icons in Maramureș and northern Transylvania.

The volume also gives some attention to more recent historical developments, but in these articles the influence of current political trends is clearly evident. Gheorghe Bodea, for example, provides much useful information on the establishment of a democratic regime in northern Transylvania in 1944-45, but he is mainly concerned with stressing the leading role of the Communist party and the cooperation of Magyars and Romanians. The result is, inevitably, a one-sided piece that ignores diversity of opinion and controversy and never gets to the heart of the age-old nationality problem in Transylvania.

KEITH HITCHINS
University of Illinois,
Urbana-Champaign

DAVID JORAVSKY. The Lysenko Affair. (Russian Research Center Studies, Number 61.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1970. Pp. xiii, 459. $13.95.

If one wonders why this study by a historian on the genetics controversy is reviewed by a political scientist in a historical journal, the answer is quite simple: the Lysenko theories, purported to be genuine, turned out to be a quack science supported primarily by Soviet authoritarian politics that, in turn, have been subject to historical inquiry.

American scholars who study closed societies are always searching for cracks or holes in the political walls through which they might observe and analyze political cultures manipulated by authoritarian elites. The Soviet Union has such a society, and Professor David Joravsky is an American scholar who found a "hole," the Lysenko affair, through which he chose to observe and analyze "the evolving interaction of agriculture, natural science, ideology, and political power" in the Soviet Union. The prime rule of this case study, according to Joravsky, "is to determine the political unknown by its interaction with strategically selected knowns, as they are evidenced in the public record." Joravsky did so, and as a result he tried to answer two basic questions: "How can we distinguish Soviet ideology from other types of thought, and, how can we be precise and factual in analyzing ideological influences in Soviet history?"

Unlike some of the earlier writers on this subject (for example, J. S. Huxley, Conway Zirkle, and John Langdon-Davies) Joravsky tries to refute the allegation that Lysenkoism was a direct outgrowth of Marxist theory in the 1930s. According to Joravsky, "the most well-known Lysenkoite writings lay overwhelming stress on agricultural practice as the chief source." And since the criterion of practice is the chief principle of Soviet ideology, Joravsky equates Lysenkoism with Soviet ideology rather than with Marxist theory. While it is plausible to argue that Soviet ideology was and still is geared toward "the criterion of practice," it is equally justifiable to claim (as Joravsky does) that Soviet agriculture suffered for thirty-five years because of Lysenkoite practices. If so, why did the Soviet leaders, with the exception of Brezhnev, permit this setback in Soviet agriculture? The answer, at least to me, is obvious. When the Lysenko controversies reached a high plateau in Soviet scientific circles, the issues involved in the controversy were so close to the sensitive ideological pole of communist dogma that it was imperative for the Soviet elite to render interpretations based on Bolshevik morals. The question raised by the issues was not which theories would lead to greater agricultural output in the Soviet Union but which theories were more compatible with the dogma when applied to agriculture and genetics. In the final analysis, the issues were reduced to Soviet socialist science versus "decadent bourgeois science." Of course, as in many other cases, the interpretation rendered by the party was consistent with Soviet hypocrisy. While many Soviet agricultural scientists were paying lip service to Lysenkoite theories, at the same time they were practicing "bourgeois science" in agriculture and genetics. Soviet leaders tolerated this situation because the increased yield of corn, wheat, and other crops in such areas satisfied their ideological interests.

The creator of "agrobiolgy," Lysenko persuaded Stalin and his successors to accept his approach to Soviet agriculture because it could render the desired increases in farm yields at little or no cost. Thus, from 1929 to 1964, with a few ups and downs, Lysenko had the support of the party and its auxiliaries to impose his "scientific methods" not only on collectivized peasants but also on scientists, first in the preparation of seeds and in the science of plant physiology, then in plant breeding and genetics, and finally in a wide range of agricultural techniques and related sciences—from afforestation to the use of fertilizers, from cytology to soil science. As a result the damage to Soviet agricultural science was enormous. This aspect of Lysenkoism, however, is only of secondary interest to Professor Joravsky. His primary concern is the political repercussions that followed the Lysenko controversies under Stalin and Khrushchev. Therefore, he examines the voluminous public record that abounds with evidence of change in policies but offers little insight into the secrecy of high Soviet politics. It is perhaps for this reason that Professor Joravsky does not contribute much to our knowledge of the period of the struggle for power after Stalin's death. Although he cites the V. S. Dmitriev case, its political significance is not fully explained. Nor does he explain the criticism of Lysenko launched in 1954 by Malenkov's protégé, Khrushchev. Professor Joravsky claims that from the end of 1954 until his ouster in 1964, Khrushchev had supported Lysenko in all his endeavors. The evidence, however, suggests that it was not until December 1958 when Khrushchev, Pravda, the presidium of the Soviet Academy of Sciences, and Izvestia assailed the editors of the Botanicheskii zhurnal for criticizing Lysenko. From 1952 until 1958 Lysenko was systematically refuted by the editors of the journal. Although we have no proof that such criticism was instigated by N. S. Khrushchev, we do know that he did not stop this criticism until 1958.

From a historical point of view, one can draw at least two valuable lessons from Joravsky's study of Lysenkoism. One is that there has been a tendency in this country to oversimplify the relationship of Soviet science to Soviet ideology. In this respect Lysenko did almost as much harm to American space science as to Soviet biology, for he encouraged skepticism in the United States about scientific achievements in the Soviet Union. A second point is that the basic task of Soviet science is to facilitate the universal development of the productive forces of the country. It is a dutiful and fully subordinated tool of the elite in power. Thus, when the Soviet leaders felt the need for the services of the scientists, they were willing to rehabilitate those having committed "treason."

PETER A. TOMA

University of Arizona

NEAR EAST

G. E. VON GRUNEBaum, editor. Theology and Law in Islam. (Second Giorgio Levi Della Vida Biennial Conference, May 9-10, 1969, Near Eastern Center, University of California, Los Angeles. Published under the auspices of the Near Eastern Center, University of California, Los Angeles.) Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz. 1971. Pp. 105. DM 48.

The occasion for Theology and Law in Islam was a conference held in May 1969 to mark the bestowal of the Giorgio Levi Della Vida medal upon the late Joseph Schacht, and the six papers published here are the proceedings of that conference: Schacht himself on "Theology and Law in Islam" (pp. 3-24); W. Montgomery Watt, "The Great Community and the Sects" (pp. 25-36); Walther Braune, "Historical Consciousness in Islam" (pp. 37-42); Gerhart Ladner, "Reform: Innovation and Tradition in Medieval Christendom" (pp. 53-74); George Makdisi, "Law and Traditionalism in the Institutions of Learning of Medieval Islam" (pp. 75-88); and Fazlur Rahman, "Functional Interdependence of Law and Theology" (pp. 89-97).

The papers of Schacht and Makdisi taken together summarize the interrelationship between jurisprudence and Islam's dialectical theology (kalam) from the beginnings down to the twelfth century, and it is immediately apparent that comparisons are difficult. Jurisprudence reached maturity in the early ninth century when kalam was approaching adolescence. It was the law, too, that dominated Muslim institutions of higher learning, and theology came into them, as Makdisi points out, by a side entrance—through the academic sermon. In this connection Makdisi gives an instructive summary (pp. 77-79) of the fundamental differences between the Muslim madrasah and the European university.

Rahman's approach to the same question is not so much historical as ideological. Jurisprudence is a science of the particular act and kalam of the universal principle. There never developed between them, Rahman regrets, a system of moral philosophy. In my opinion, the conclusion appears to render something less than justice to both Muhasibi and Ghazali.

Watt is interested in the heresiographies and their presuppositions, and the greater part of his paper is given over to tracing the history of some of the names put upon various sects, generally by their opponents but occasionally, as in the case of the Shi'ites, by the partisans themselves. The example of the Shi'ah, though offered only in passing, is particularly interesting, but it is the only place in the volume where the issue comes up. The notorious problems of Shi'ite theology and Shi'ite traditions have been addressed by very few Western scholars, and that unhappy fact is painfully illustrated in this collection.

One of Watt's theses is that Western scholars look for "progress" in the matter of intellectual history while the Muslim more often finds reprehensible "innovation." This may be true of the traditionalist Muslim lawyer, but Braune attempts to nuance Islam's view of history by adducing the contrasting attitudes of the pre-Islamic poets, the Prophet, the Mu'tazilites, and the Sufis. Braune makes the case that the Mu'tazilites were Islam's chief apostles of man's historical self-realization and consequent reform, while Sufism took men out of history.

Ladner's portrait of medieval Christendom is quite different, with the monastic orders in the van of reform movements. Ladner does not make a point of them, but the differences are provocative for an Islamicist, and it is to be regretted that the editor, as so often in the past, did not in this instance publish the participants' comments on each other's papers.

F. E. PETERS

New York University

GEORGES I. BRATIANU. La mer Noire: Des origines à la conquête ottomane. (Acta Historica, Number 9.) Munich: Societas Academica Dacoromana. 1969. Pp. 394. DM 38 ($9.50).

This volume, written some two decades ago by Professor Bratianu and now published for the first time, represents an important addition to our understanding of the Black Sea during ancient and medieval times. It also makes us regret even more the tragic end of its author after he fell into the hands of his political opponents following World War II, when he was still in his prime.

The book itself is divided into four parts or sections. The first begins with a description of the special physical and geographical characteristics of the Black Sea and the areas that surround it and then surveys its history in ancient times until the end of the early Roman Empire. The second portion deals with this region from the third through the twelfth centuries A.D.—which might be called a late Roman-Byzantine age. The third section concerns itself with the years between the time of the Fourth Crusade and the mid-fourteenth century, which the author calls a Mongol-Italian period and with which he has dealt extensively in an earlier book. The last portion tells the story of the two centuries between 1300 and 1500 A.D., which saw an intensive rivalry for Black Sea mastery between Venice and Genoa and the first conquest of the sea and its shores by the Ottoman Turks.

As one would expect from a knowledge of the author's earlier work, there is a heavy emphasis upon social and economic factors in the history he relates, although political developments are not slighted. It is also worth noting that this remarkable work of synthesis is placed in a world setting that relates events taking place in the Black Sea region with those affecting the wider world of Eurasia and Africa. One is also struck by the breadth of Bratianu's knowledge and understanding of the historical process and the wide range of his scholarship, which makes this book as fresh and timely as if it were written yesterday.

In short here is historical synthesis at its best, beautifully written by a scholar who is able to explain his own chosen area of Europe and Asia so that it not only throws light upon other regions during ancient and medieval times, but at the same time deepens our understanding of history in general.

ARCHIBALD R. LEWIS
University of Massachusetts,
Amherst

MICHAEL CURTIS, editor. People and Politics in the Middle East. (Proceedings of the Annual Conference of the American Academic Association for Peace in the Middle East.) New Brunswick: transaction Books; distrib. by E. P. Dutton, New York. 1971. Pp. 325. Cloth $8.95, paper $3.95.

The motivation of this volume and of the conference at which most of the papers were first presented is the belief that analysis of various aspects of the Arab-Israeli conflict will contribute to its peaceful resolution. Some of the contributors approach the objective somewhat indirectly. S. G. Haim's contribution is a useful summary of recently available Arab information concerning the origin of the Ba'th party. Two studies, one by H. H. Smythe and Sandra Weintraub and the other by Yochanan Peres, treat ethnic and cultural groups in Israel. The former views the conflict between Orientals and Europeans more seriously than does the latter. The Peres study uses survey data to deal with sophisticated and important theoretical questions. Eliyahu Kanovsky challenges most current estimates of recent economic developments in Egypt, Israel, and especially Jordan.

The approach to the objective is more direct in the remaining eleven essays and in the accounts of the three discussion periods. Several subjects recur throughout, even in essays whose chief concern lies elsewhere. Doubts of the Palestinians' claim to be an entity are raised by Ben Halpern (whose chief thesis is that Israelis and Arabs have borrowed each other's ethical arguments), Marie Syrkin, Samuel Merlin, and Yehoshafat Harkabi. Their aim is to deny the need of the Palestinian Arabs for all of former Palestine—that is, the elimination of Israel and the reconstitution of Palestine—in order to realize their national existence, since the Palestinians, as Arabs, can enjoy national existence in a large Arab territory. Don Peretz argues for the legitimacy of a Palestinian entity. We may add that the present insistence on the Pan-Arab nature of Palestinian nationalism seems strange in view of the former objection to the involvement of non-Palestinian Arabs in the Palestinian question. Furthermore, the Palestinians today are giving the same answer to the question of local patriotism and Pan-Arabism, which are not regarded as contradictory, that other Pan-Arabs did from the 1920s on. Syrkin and Merlin, as well as Peretz, believe a "Palestinian State," that is, the Jordanian west bank, preferably with the addition of the east bank, can facilitate the ultimate settlement. Most of the contributors with Israeli sympathies believe that Arab refusal to recognize the existence of Israel is independent of Israeli policy or action. The exceptions are Peretz and even more Merlin, who is critical of aspects of Israeli internal politics and argues that Israel cannot claim to be willing to negotiate with the Arabs in good faith and without preconditions. Jon Kimche thinks, erroneously in my opinion, that the British from 1918 on deliberately prevented Arab-Jewish cooperation. Amos Perlmutter offers an up-to-date version of the familiar criticisms of Dulles and American cold warriors in general. He is often penetrating when dealing with particulars, but his treatment suffers from the usual combination of snippets of historical information with an interpretation that is no more convincing than was the theory of the cold war social scientists he criticizes. Shlomo Avineri explains how New Left critics can be won over to Israel by showing that Israel, not the Palestinian Arabs, is the analogue of North Vietnam. Peretz probably would disagree. Avineri's discussion ignores the vital effect of British military force on the relative positions of the Jewish and Arab communities in Palestine. In any event Arab, not Israeli, membership in the universal church of peoples' national liberation has been certified by the prelates—the bishops of Havana, Peking, and Hanoi.

Representing Arab views, Abdul Aziz Said believes that the post-1967 Palestinian movement is a new and truly revolutionary phase in Arab history, and F. J. Khouri argues that Israel could agree to the return of the Palestinians without endangering its security. F. H. Hinsley believes, with good reason, that only the powers can bring about a settlement of the Arab-Israeli problem and, with less apparent reason, that there is an emerging agreement among the powers.

C. ERNEST DAWN
*University of Illinois,
Urbana-Champaign*

R. HRAIR DEKMEJIAN, Egypt under Nasir: A Study in Political Dynamics. Albany: State University of New York Press. 1971. Pp. xvi, 368. $10.00.

At first glance this bulky volume may appear to be a rather forbidding exercise in the application of concepts from sociology and political science like the "routinization" and "legitimation" of the charismatic leader's rule. But the reader who perseveres soon finds that Professor Dekmejian has written a lucid and readable analysis of interest to many besides the professional social scientist. Drawing both on Arabic materials and on studies by Western scholars, he exposes the shallowness of supposing that Gamal Abdel Nasser was a second-rate fascist dictator or the dupe of the Kremlin. He argues persuasively that Nasser was the greatest Arab hero since Saladin and Muhammad and that his popularity among Egyptians survived almost unscarred a long list of failures, from the defeat by Israel in the Suez War of 1956, through the secession of Syria from the United Arab Republic in 1961 and the disastrous involvement in Yemen's civil war ("Egypt's Vietnam"), down to the Six Day War of 1967. Nasser's offer to resign at the close of that humiliating conflict was rejected by acclamation, and his death three years later was the occasion for mass mourning of an intensity matched in recent history only by Indian grief for Gandhi and Nehru.

How are we to account for this extraordinary record of nothing succeeding like the absence of success? Because, Professor Dekmejian contends, Nasser endowed the abstractions of Arab nationalism with a new psychological reality and still more because his reiterated stress on the need for dignity gave the Egyptian peasant a chance to identify with the Nasser government in contrast to his traditional hostility toward his rulers. Yet, as the author also observes, "charisma can only inspire men, it cannot organize them" (p. 250). He argues that the year 1961 marked the watershed of Nasser's domestic policy, as the Syrian secession led him to complete the organization of a sweeping program of "Arab socialism," which owed as much to Islamic traditions and democratic European examples as it did to Marxism. At the same time more determined efforts were made to create a viable mass party, the Arab Socialist Union. Its vicissitudes and the shifting roles of the military and academic elite in Egyptian cabinets (many ministers had Ph.D.'s) are followed in considerable and informative detail.

Throughout the book Professor Dekmejian (who is of Armenian stock) is no uncritical hero-worshipper. He notes, for example, that Nasser made General Neguib an "unperson" as soon as he had maneuvered him out of the presidency in 1954. And he blames the fiasco of the Six Day War in part on the backfiring of Egyptian "brinkmanship" based on Nasser's underestimation of the intensity of the Israelis' nationalism and their disposition to seize the boldest of the options open to them.

JOHN B. CHRISTOPHER
University of Rochester

AFRICA

J. DESMOND CLARK. The Prehistory of Africa. (Ancient Peoples and Places, Volume 72.) New York: Praeger Publishers. 1970. Pp. 302. Cloth $10.00, paper $3.95.

Since the publication of H. Alimen's The Prehistory of Africa, translated by A. H. Broderick (London, 1957), archeologists have taken great strides in Africa. A new survey was overdue. But this book is not merely a survey brought up to date; it is a work that shows a bold change in conception over all former textbooks. No longer is this a record of man's tools but a history that weaves the physical and cultural evolution of mankind into a single story. Hardly anyone but Desmond Clark could have succeeded in this venture. And no story could be more stirring than man's emergence from the apes and his slow but accelerating evolution ever since.

The book opens with a chapter on methodology and then follows the main chronological sequences: the australopithecine and Homo habilis; Homo erectus (the unspecialized hunter); modern man (Homo neanderthalensis, Homo rhodesiensis, Homo sapiens); the specialized hunting and gathering societies; the farmers and present-day people. The most crucial step in man's evolution is the emergence of modern man to whom the author attributes the invention of speech and ritual and the discovery of fire between 70,000 and 35,000 years ago.

One admires Clark's virtuosity and breadth of knowledge that cover many disciplines in the natural, physical, and social sciences. Here and there are some weaknesses—in linguistics, perhaps, or in psychology—but even so there are no real lapses. Truly Homo mirabilis wrote this account!

For the earlier periods a few remarks must suffice since the historian is most interested in the last chapter of this book. The first warning must remain that this is a case where there are too few skeletons in the closet, especially when one deals with modern man and later ages. Human remains are too few to allow us to term as "racial" the subtle variations found. These variations are not gross anatomical differences as they were during the early evolution of man. They can fall well within the range of variability of modern populations.

Also, there are not yet enough excavations to feel confident at all points that the distribution maps given will not undergo major changes as time goes by. A splendid example is the case of the channeled and dimple-based potteries associated with the coming of iron to Equatorial, East, and Southern Africa. Since this book was written, there has been at least one stylistic study that shows a dozen subvarieties in this "co-tradition." But more important, sites are now known on the lower Congo, on Lake Leopold II, and at least a few shards have come from Kinshasa so that the whole distribution is altered. At all times, therefore, the reader must remember that Africa's archeological exploration is still in its infancy or adolescence. He must also remember Clark's own words in his first chapter about the need for interpretation of data and therefore the possible fallibility of some interpretations.

The last chapter deals with the initial stages of food production, the spread of domestication (especially in East Africa), the spread of the Bantu, metallurgy, and Iron Age societies. One cannot agree with the statement on page 193 that pharaonic government is very reminiscent of the rule of the despots of later times on the upper Nile and in West Africa. This is in a moderate form a revival of the "Sudanese kingship" theory, which will not hold water. The pharaohs remind one just as much of Javanese monarchies or early Indian states.

Attention is drawn particularly to Clark's treatment of the early date for cattle in the Sahara and to his ingenious proposition that this may indicate either independent domestication in North Africa or, perhaps more likely, an introduction by sea from Italy to Tunisia by the middle of the fifth millennium. Only further data will allow us to decide whether either of these two theories is correct or whether we should stick to the theory of diffusion from the Middle East.

On the spread of agriculture a few major points must be mentioned. First, of all the domesticated crops (see the map on page 212 and the table on page 213), only the sorghums and millets domesticated in the eastern Sudan or in Ethiopia spread into East, Equatorial, or Southern Africa. This virtually implies that agriculture had spread before the Bantu came. The date for the spread from Ethiopia to Kenya (p. 208) is put at the end of the first millennium B.C., but this assumption really rests on a single carbon-14 data, which may well (thirty-three per cent probability) be wrong. To me it seems wrong because we find that by 1800 B.C. African millet had already reached India, from Ethiopia presumably. So one should not be surprised if new sites show that animal domestication and agriculture reached East Africa much earlier than 1000 B.C.—in fact not long after 2000 B.C. In this whole discussion one might as well make abstraction of all the physical anthropology that is correlated with cultural movement simply because we do not have enough skulls and bones to be certain that we are dealing with different populations, “newcomers,” “blends,” or simply normal variation within a single population. On the same general topic the date assigned (p. 210) to Lanet by its excavators (the middle of the sixteenth century A.D.) can also be a freak, and it looks like one. But one must remember that linguistics, physical anthropology, and the study of culture show that in the first millennium B.C., the first millennium A.D., and later very complex human movements have taken place in East Africa as well. That puzzle will not be unraveled in the near future.

The author shows convincingly (pp. 205–06) that agriculture was almost certainly practiced in the southern Congo at an early date, before the coming of the Bantu. This fact must be accepted, and every interpretation of the processes that led to the spread of Bantu-speaking people and the domination of their languages over all others in the African “peninsula” must take this fact into account along with the probability that Bantu-speaking people may have moved before iron had spread among them.

The description of the spread of the Bantu is merely a rephrasing of Malcolm Guthrie’s hypothesis. It is not more than a hypothesis. Many linguists, while admiring much of Guthrie’s monumental work, disagree with his historical implications.

By and large one agrees with Clark’s view about the spread of iron in Africa. Perhaps, however, iron reached East Africa first on board the ships of south Arabian traders; and it reached Daima (p. 215), not from Meroë, but from the bend of the Niger after having crossed the Sahara. Graham Connah feels that this is the only likely explanation for the sites in northern Nigeria (see, for example, Thurstan Shaw, Lectures on Nigerian Prehistory and Archaeology [Ibadan, 1969], 33). Since the Iron Age civilizations belong to the historical record in many cases, the short summary given here seems very general indeed to most historians and needs no discussion.

When all is read, one can only admire the book and learn from it. It will influence and even shape any interpretation in African archaeology for years to come. Some dates may be wrong, some assertions may become obsolete, but the approach will endure. That is what makes a great book.

JAN VANSINA
University of Wisconsin,
Madison

ROBERT I. ROTBERG. Joseph Thomson and the Exploration of Africa. New York: Oxford University Press. 1971. Pp. 360. $10.00.

ROBERT I. ROTBERG, editor. Africa and Its Explorers: Motives, Methods, and Impact. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1970. Pp. 351. $12.95.

One cannot often review two books with such unreserved pleasure. By virtue of Professor Rotberg’s sensitivity and his brisk but restrained style, Joseph Thomson is rescued from both the tedium and the hyperbole often encountered in tales of trial and tribulation in darkest Africa and is transformed into one of those infrequent biographies that can be read for sheer enjoyment, should one’s interests happen to go no further. Rotberg, like Thomson, knows how and when to be “cool in print.”

Thomson’s portrait, however, is not altogether endearing. His approach to Africa was essentially romantic, his observations were often naive. He hungered for fame, could be prudish and hypocritical, was unstable and restive—a professional wanderer—and was plagued by fits of melancholy. His obsession with Africa drove him to illness and an early death. But despite his faults he is remembered for the sturdy gentleness, boundless goodwill, and gregariousness that got him through many a scrape and made the peaceful progress of his expeditions almost unique in African exploration. One of the book’s themes is Thomson’s conversion to Darwinian beliefs and imperialism. Arriving in East Africa as an idealistic youngster prepared to admire and respect Africa on its own terms, he left the continent eleven years later convinced by observation, bad experience, and the fashionability of racial theories (and, one wonders, by the demoralizing effects of sickness?) that Africans spoiled by European contact could be redeemed only by long apprenticeship under benevolent European rule.

Thomson's achievements were limited. Coming as he did at the end of the era of exploration, only his first and third journeys were scientifically productive. Professing disdain for commercialism, three of his trips were nonetheless sponsored for commercial motives, while one can only be called recreational. A man of erratic insight, he realistically foresaw that Africa's trade potential was limited but assumed that the Kenya highlands were wholly unsuitable for white settlement. Always in a rush to cover the ground, his journals and published works proved to be disappointingly impressionistic and inaccurate. The total impression is that Thomson was perhaps the most important of the second rank of explorers.

The book is fully equipped with the proper scholarly paraphernalia: index, notes, a good bibliography of Thomsonia, and appendix noteworthy for the texts of Thomson's African trade treaties. Two technical negatives can be registered. The voluminous footnotes, parenthetically fascinating as they are, are somewhat distracting. The most significant should have been absorbed into the text, the rest discarded. Many place names found in the text are frustratingly missing from the maps.

Africa and Its Explorers is focused on nine men who, with one or two omissions, contributed most to African exploration and made the deepest public impression. The contributors were charged with a twofold task: to assess their subjects' historical contributions and to place them in an African context by a careful examination of all available indigenous accounts. The editor undertook a third task in the introduction: a comparative study of the explorers' motives and methods and of their individual responses to Africa and Africans. The outstanding merit of this collaborative effort is the achievement of the second task, of an African perspective that serves as a most useful corrective to the prevailing Eurocentrism of studies of exploration. The book is a series of neat vignettes that furnish the reader with an Überblick of preimperial Africa through the eyes of the men on the spot, African as well as European.

JOHN P. HALSTEAD
State University of New York,
Buffalo

RUTH FIRST. Power in Africa. New York: Pantheon Books. 1970. Pp. xiii, 513. $10.00.

JON WORONOFF. Organizing African Unity. Metuchen, N. J.: Scarecrow Press. 1970. Pp. x, 11-703. $15.00.

T. PETER OMARI. Kwame Nkrumah: The Anatomy of an African Dictatorship. With a foreword by NII AMAA OLLENNU. New York: Africana Publishing Corporation. 1970. Pp. xix, 229. $8.50.

PETER GEISMAR. Fanon. New York: Dial Press. 1971. Pp. 214. $6.95.

The first two works, Power in Africa by Ruth First and Organizing African Unity by Jon Woronoff, are studies of Africa as a whole; while the latter two are studies of specific figures—a pioneer of the African revolution, Nkrumah, and a major philosopher of both the African and Afro-American revolutions.

In Power in Africa Ruth First has made a real contribution to African studies through her searching analysis of the role of the military in nation building among the African states. A statement in the introduction reveals the nature of the work; the author says, "This book is about army intervention in politics, but more about politics than armies." It is not, accordingly, a book about the mechanics of armies and coups d'état, their logistics and command structures, but about the way army interventions in politics reveal the nature of political power and its areas of failure in Africa.

The opening section of the book deals with the African political and economic situation in the period that followed independence. A brief but well-done analysis of the various problems of Africa is included. The role of the army in the new African states and the "contagion of the coup" are especially effective. The second section of the book entitled "The Colonial Sediment" is required reading for all who would understand or attempt to understand independence in the African continent. The third, fourth, and fifth sections study the "successor states," the breakdown of authority, and the role of the coup. The author selects three nations as the focus of her study of the coups of Africa—Ghana, Nigeria, and the Sudan. The last portion of the work, and a most potent one, seeks an analysis of the army and its future role in nation building in Africa. Power in Africa is more than a summary of the various African coups; it is an effective presentation of the role of the military and its interrelation with other elements in the political and general life of the new African nations.

Organizing African Unity is a rather voluminous study of the Organization for African Unity. While some of its materials are duplicated in such works as V. T. Thompson, Africa and Unity, it nevertheless makes a contribution to the study of the African search for unity. It is regrettable that the format of the work leaves much to be desired in the matter of explanatory materials. The casual student of African studies would, I fear, experience difficulties in following the presentation of the materials and the views of the author.

T. Peter Omari, in his Kwame Nkrumah: The Anatomy of an African Dictatorship (1970), has added a valuable link in the understanding of Nkrumah. The student of African history, especially Ghanaian, now has available a rather extensive group of books—Nkrumah's own writings; A. A. Araf, The Ghana Coup (1966); John Phillips, Kwame Nkrumah and the Future of Africa (1960); Bob Fitch and Mary Oppenheimer, Ghana: End of an Illusion (1966); and Henry L. Bretton, The Rise and Fall of Kwame Nkrumah (1966).

Mr. Omari's introductory chapter seeks to present an overview of the Nkrumah period. While he presents Nkrumah's guilt, he finds that others, principally the judiciary, share the blame. The succeeding chapters trace the Nkrumah period; especially noteworthy is the chapter "The Many Sides of Nkrumah." Included in an appendix is a presentation of "Nkrumahism-African Socialism: Ghana's Conception of Socialism." This work adds a balanced account to a controversial period of African history.

The last work, Fanon by Peter Geismar, is the latest effort to capture the mercurial personality of Frantz Fanon. While this study of Geismar's gives a real insight of Fanon's psychiatric theories, it fails to capture clearly Fanon as a philosopher. In all fairness to Mr. Geismar, the implications and nuances of Frantz Fanon will never be easy to capture. A bibliography of Fanon's writings, both political and medical, is appended.

VAN MITCHELL SMITH
University of Texas,
Arlington

VINCENT M. BATTLE and CHARLES H. LYONS, editors. Essays in the History of African Education. (Center for Education in Africa, Institute of International Studies, Teachers College, Columbia University.) New York: Teachers College Press, Teachers College, Columbia University. 1970. Pp. ix, 123. $3.50.

MICHAEL ANTHONY SAMUELS. Education in Angola, 1878-1914: A History of Culture Transfer and Administration. (Teachers College Studies in Education.) New York: Teachers College Press, Teachers College, Columbia University. 1970. Pp. xiii, 185. $7.95.

Five theses and seminar papers submitted to the Center for Education in Africa, Teachers College, Columbia University, comprise the volume edited by Battle and Lyons. The authors and essays are as follows: Charles H. Lyons, "The Educable African: British Thought and Action, 1835-1865"; Henry John Drewal, "Methodist Education in Liberia, 1833-1856"; Vincent M. Battle, "The American Mission and Educational Development in the Southern Sudan, 1900-1929"; Priscilla Blake-more, "Assimilation and Association in French Educational Policy and Practice: Senegal, 1903-1939"; and Richard Heyman, "The Initial Years of the Jeanes School in Kenya, 1924-1931." These essayists have produced commendable studies, and their coverage of the sources is adequate, despite an overreliance in the first two papers on the admittedly excellent book by Philip D. Curtin, The Image of Africa (1964).

Several themes stressed by the essayists are familiar to the historian of Africa. They are the close relation between the development of educational and administrative policy, the impact of the missionary influence on education in sub-Saharan Africa, the parallelism in the civilizing and evangelizing objectives of most missionaries, and the American influence upon African education.

In contrast to the diversity of topics in the essays, Samuels concentrates in his volume on the study of Angolan education in the 1878-1914 period. Consideration is given to the numerous forces that resulted in contemporary educational organization. The educational story also depicts the highlights of an important era in colonial history. Educational development is surveyed in accounts of the growth of governmental administration and Christian missions. Rivalry between Protestant and Catholic missions; the relative value of "civilizing" Africans through labor, language, and other cultural influences (educação) as opposed to traditional schooling (instrução); and the slow progress of the Portuguese and Angolan local governments in building an educational system are other themes. In both books the similarity in the interests of government and the missions, and, in the long run, the subordination of the latter to the former are obvious.

The Samuels study is based on an impressive array of sources as reflected in an exhaustive bibliography, and illustrative maps and an index are helpful. In modesty and understatement, the author displays a seasoned scholarship and masterful treatment of his topic. Samuels and the essayists emphasize the need for research on African education and suggest many topics awaiting the attention of historians. These volumes are recommended to specialists and those with a general interest in Africa.

GARLAND G. PARKER
University of Cincinnati

ALAN SCHAM. Lyautey in Morocco: Protectorate Administration, 1912-1925. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1970. Pp. xi, 272. $8.75.

Attention! The student of Moroccan affairs is likely to read the jacket copy, which does this book a disservice, and perhaps the first fifty pages, then lay this book aside as yet another rationalization of French colonialism (called mission civilisatrice, or "white man's burden" in English). It would be a mistake. The introductory chapter relies on French sources, including the writings of Lyautey himself, and repeats all the old clichés concerning roads, ports, dams, mines, and the necessity of treating the "natives" with understanding, respect, and generosity.

Even in the introductory pages, however, the author (almost unwillingly, it seems) exposes the paradox between Lyautey's protestations and his actions, and in the final chapter provides a critical assessment of Lyautey's failure to live up to his noble words. He points out that the French took over in Morocco to protect the Algerian border and French dominance in North Africa. The other ascribed reasons only supported that primary goal.

Lyautey, a royalist, was pledged by the Treaty of Fez to protect the authority of the sultan; he systematically destroyed it. He acknowledged the presence in Morocco of "cultured men who dealt as equals with European statesmen, who are skilled politicians and diplomats" (p. 29), but "owing to their lack of education in the modern European sense they were not regarded as capable of taking part in the French administrative mainstream" (p. 48). He never failed to insist that "one thing we have achieved: that is the knowledge of how to win the sympathy of the native. . . . Despite everything, these races have remained faithful to us," but he did not live to see the conquest (he called it pacification) of these natives despite the tremendous military effort. Whatever may have been the excesses of his successors, Lyautey created the institutions and set the policy that led to the overthrow of the protectorate.

There is little new in the story of the French failure in Morocco. But the author has provided in Lyautey in Morocco something that is new: a detailed description of the governing institutions of the Sherifian Empire before and after the protectorate was established. Here lies the great value of this book. The author also has provided nine appendixes of reference material, a glossary of Arabic terms (many with meanings peculiar to Morocco), and an extensive and valuable bibliography.

LEON B. BLAIR
*University of Texas,
Arlington*

E. A. AYANDELE. Holy Johnson: Pioneer of African Nationalism, 1836-1917. (Africana Modern Library, Number 13.) New York: Humanities Press. 1970. Pp. 417. $11.50.

Reverend James Johnson, a Sierra Leonean who became an assistant bishop in the Anglican diocese of Southern Nigeria, was tormented by a cultural schizophrenia reminiscent of Sun Yat-sen's on the other side of the world during the same early twentieth-century period. On the one hand Johnson was a man of his own people, passionately espousing African "purity," working for African self-government, and rejecting the materialism, the arrogance, and the whiskey-soaked immorality of Europe. On the other, he embraced European religion, including temporal forms and organization, with equal passion; he favored European science and technology and urged agricultural improvements and education in basic engineering for Africans; and he bitterly denounced much that was characteristic of African societies. With some of the British in Africa, on whom he looked with an increasingly complicated ambivalence, Johnson imagined that it would be possible to design and carry out a rational plan whereby Africa kept what was wholesome in her own traditions and adopted from Europe only those ideas and techniques that would harmonize with native ones. Inevitably he experienced disillusion and frustration. His sincerity, energy, and remarkable perseverance, however, brought him great fame throughout West Africa and in England. His accomplishments in proselytizing and in making Africans more aware of their own worth were more than enough to justify the subtitle of this book, even if the nationalism that finally emerged was as different from James Johnson's ideal as the kingdom of Italy was from Mazzini's.

Professor Ayandele of Ibadan has not produced an intimate portrait because, as he points out, he did not have access to personal papers. But this account, based mainly on prodigious research in the files of the Church Missionary Society, the Aborigines Protection Society, and the Public Record Office, is an authoritative and valuable rendering of the official side of Bishop Johnson's work. The author deserves high praise for his scholarly objectivity in an age when politics have intruded into academic life rather more than one would wish.

ROBERT HEUSSLER
*Hoover Institution,
Stanford University*

RICHARD WEST. Back to Africa: A History of Sierra Leone and Liberia. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 1971. Pp. 357. $6.95.

Richard West, an English journalist, has attempted a comparative study of the "Westernized" settler communities of Sierra Leone and Liberia. (The book's subtitle inaccurately suggests a broader purview.) Parts one and two, together comprising nearly one-half of the volume, are interesting and well-written accounts of the colonization movements in Britain and the United States and of the founding of the settlements at Freetown and Monrovia. West takes a largely biographical approach, with numerous quotations from the writings of Granville Sharp, Zachary Macaulay, Jehudi Ashmun, R. R. Gurley, and other participants. He has a flair for selecting apposite quotations, and he explores a number of topics passed over or given bare mention by other writers. Parts three and four survey the histories of the settlements during the last two-thirds of the nineteenth century and the early years of the twentieth, with a chapter on Marcus Garvey and his Back To Africa movement. West incorporates copious extracts from foreign observers, including Richard Burton (inevitably), Harry Johnston, and Mary Kingsley, from Edward Wilmot Blyden, and from James Africanus Horton, Benjamin Anderson, and a few other Creoles and Americo-Liberians. The selections on Sierra Leone include choice samples of European condescension and defamation balanced to some extent by critiques of the authors and some colorful passages on the drinking habits and other excesses of resident Europeans. West's presentation has serious limitations: quote—commentary—quote is no substitute for systematic historical reconstruction and analysis. Part five is a brief fifty-page account of developments in the past half century, concluding with some surprisingly shallow and trivial reminiscences from the author's two-month trip to Sierra Leone and Liberia. The reader has cause to wonder what perspectives

West, the journalist, gained from doing historical research.

In sum Back to Africa is a very uneven piece of scholarship. West fails to provide more than superficial descriptions and analyses of Creole and Americo-Liberian societies. Many topics are poorly researched, and there are numerous errors of fact or interpretation that could easily have been avoided. The method of footnoting is haphazard: the reader wants to know where all the quotations were found and to whom the author is indebted for opinions and interpretations. Nonetheless some sections are very good, with excellent use of quoted material coupled to stimulating commentary. The illustrations are well chosen to complement the narrative. If the specialist will be disappointed—or annoyed—by West's treatment of some topics, it is only fair to acknowledge that the general reader will find Back to Africa a highly readable and frequently entertaining introduction to Sierra Leone and Liberia.

GEORGE E. BROOKS
Indiana University

S. A. AKINTOYE. Revolution and Power Politics in Yorubaland 1840-1893: Ibadan Expansion and the Rise of Ekitiparapo. (Ibadan History Series.) [New York:] Humanities Press. 1971. Pp. xxi, 278. $10.00.

This is an important study, adjusting as it does the perspective on nineteenth-century history of the key Nigerian group known collectively as the Yoruba. For the marginal effects of European colonialism in Africa have included not just the Euro-centered view of history, now finally vanquished, but the more subtle tendency in restudying and revising to deal with those Africans with whom Europeans were first preoccupied. Thus in Nigeria students of African history have looked either at the coast and its immediate hinterland, or at the Islamic empire of the Fulani and its predecessors in the north.

Akintoye takes us further inland than have previous studies in Yoruba history (the notable exception is Johnson's History of the Yorubas, written in the 1880s and as much a source as a historical account). Himself Ekiti (that is, from one of the Yoruba subgroups central to his study), Akintoye has that invaluable insider's ability to obtain and utilize oral evidence. Nor has he neglected written material, including British sources. He also handles with detachment the role of Ibadan, that most formidable Yoruba power and opponent of the Ekiti and other subgroups of northwestern Yorubaland; he presents, indeed, the most valuable analysis of nineteenth-century Ibadan's impact available in print to date.

As the title and subtitle indicate this is a study in military and diplomatic history. It is mainly a book for specialists; the novice in African history may lose his way amid the many names of people and places and positions (one could wish for more and clearer maps, particularly for one that put Yorubaland in Nigeria).

Nonetheless, the book is of more general interest. It gives an excellent and concise introduction to the whole of eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Yorubaland. It treats interestingly the question of Yoruba unity or lack thereof, a question that continues to matter in twentieth-century Nigerian politics. Further, historians with interests elsewhere on the continent and beyond will find valuable material for comparative purposes. For, always with extensive evidence carefully examined, Akintoye tackles such problems as how urbanization took place; how a state whose expansion was military incorporated refugees and the conquered; and how related African groups, threatened by signs of European advance, did or (as in this case) did not perceive the threat—or did not regard it as of sufficient importance to set aside differences. Here, too, are examples of an African provincial, or even perhaps colonial, administrative system; of a confederal organization formed for military purposes; and of the continuing role of "domestic slavery" in politics, economics, and the army.

A synthesizing conclusion as illuminating as the introduction would have been welcome. Still, each of the author's analyses emerges with clarity throughout the book, making it a valuable and stimulating contribution.

JEAN HERSKOVITS
State University College,
Purchase

HARRY A. GALEY. The Road to Aba: A Study of British Administrative Policy in Eastern Nigeria. New York: New York University Press. 1970. Pp. x, 184. $7.50.

Professor Gailey is concerned with four linked topics: the establishment of British rule in southeast Nigeria; the imposition of an apparatus of local government inspired by Lugard's Northern Nigerian system; its manifest unpopularity, culminating in the women's riots; and, tentatively and briefly, Sir Donald Cameron's reforms. The book is briskly written and clearly organized, no slight achievements given the multicentricity of groups involved.

Gailey confesses that conditions in Eastern Nigeria in the spring of 1967 led him to abandon the idea of interviewing the "old men and women in the villages" in order to analyze the riots. Consequently he has written an essentially administrative history, with the rioters seen mainly through administrators' eyes. Yet it is administrative history of a remarkably rich kind. Lugard, after dismissing the anthropologist employed by the Southern Nigerian government, succeeded in making his own views prevail, but there was no monolithic unity of opinion within the bureaucracy. Disagreement was sharp and articulate, allowing Gailey to reveal the issues at stake in the dialectic of policy making.

He shows how alien district officers, parvenu warrant chiefs, usurious clerks and court messengers usurped the traditional authority of the village elders. When the riots revealed the unpopularity of this regime to all but the most complacent administrators, Cameron set about establishing institutions of local government more in accord with the precolonial pattern.

Gailey gives tantalizing glimpses of the social history he was forced to abandon. The Dancing Women's Movement, the Spirit Movement—which attacked non-Christians, especially chiefs and their families—and the remarkable leadership and discipline of the Oloko women, all deserve extended examination while some of the "old men and women in the villages" still survive. When the social history of protest in southeast Nigeria is studied in depth and compared with similar movements elsewhere in Africa—and in other continents—the significance of the Aba riots, and the British bureaucratic mistakes precipitating them, will be better judged. Meanwhile, Gailey has written an extremely useful case study of British colonial officialdom in crisis.

HENRY S. WILSON
University of York

J. S. LA FONTAINE. City Politics: A Study of Léopoldville, 1962-63. (African Studies Series, Number 1.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 1970. Pp. xiii, 246. $13.50.

Few cities have undergone such sudden and profound change as Leopoldville at the time of La Fontaine's study in 1962-63. In the three preceding years, the city had not only become the capital of an independent Congo but had doubled in population, since it was a rare island of security in a country torn by civil war. To understand the effects of these phenomena the author conducted her own surveys of two of the city's communes, which she then integrated with other available political and social studies creating a general synthesis.

The strength of La Fontaine's book resides in its examination of the network of personal contacts between ordinary Zaïrois and their leaders. Discussing the fundamental problem of housing, she sensitively analyzes the relationship between tenants and landlords. In the realm of politics, she specifies the qualities necessary for success in both national and local office, attributes she calls publicity and patronage.

La Fontaine's broader interpretation, however, is gravely contaminated by her reliance on the distinction, so dear to colonial social anthropologists, between traditional and urban Africans. According to this view migrants to the city arrived conditioned by the static organization and kinship network of their villages, and they only gradually learned to subordinate these "tribal" characteristics to more modern political behavior. The argument carries with it the implicit assumption that rural Africans remained virtually unaffected by colonial rule until they moved to a city.

This viewpoint seriously distorts the colonial reality. Africans migrated to the cities after their old way of life had been substantially modified by the demands of colonial governments. Thus, colonial urbanization was not so much "a means of repudiating the traditional" (p. 149) as the most important in a continuous series of changes that transformed African society as it had existed before the European conquest.

BRUCE FETTER
*University of Wisconsin—
Milwaukee*

DOUGLAS L. WHEELER and RENÉ PÉLISSIER. Angola. (Praeger Library of African Affairs.) New York: Praeger Publishers. 1971. Pp. ix, 296. $11.00.

Though several works on various aspects of Angolan history have appeared in recent years, Angola is perhaps the first attempt at a general synthesis within a single volume. It is possible that such an attempt is premature. As Wheeler himself observes, "The pre-European history of Angola is one of the least known histories of tropical Africa." Monographic studies of the early colonial era (1575-1800) have thus far raised as many questions as they have answered and do not lend themselves to a brief and uncontroversial summing-up. Consequently specialists in central African or Portuguese colonial history may find Angola much less satisfying than will the nonspecialist public for which it appears to have been written.

The abortive 1961 rising against Portuguese rule is clearly the focal point of the book. Approximately a quarter of the text is devoted to the rising and its aftermath. This is Péliissier's contribution. It is a painstaking and dispassionate examination of the evolution of the major nationalist factions, their respective achievements and failures, and the Portuguese response to the kinds of threats and opportunities that a divided nationalist movement offered. Péliissier's assessment of the contemporary situation is that the nationalist guerrilla campaigns have, ironically, provoked "an unprecedented stimulus" to Angola's economic development since 1960. He believes that the future of Angola will depend more upon the generation of Africans now enrolled in the greatly expanded secondary school system than upon the nationalist activists presently engaged in the liberation movement.

Wheeler's main contribution to the volume takes the form of an extended prelude to the section written by Péliissier. This format has the advantage of providing thematic continuity, though it runs the risk of seeing the Angolan past largely in terms of a sort of evolutionary movement toward the 1961 rising. Thus he repeatedly alludes to massive Bakongo popular resistance to Portuguese influence ("the African jacquerie") beginning as early as the sixteenth century. As presented, Wheeler's case for widespread proto-nationalist "jacqueries" rests more upon assertion than upon evidence. On the other hand his treatment of the emergence of assimilado protest during the nineteenth century is well documented and is appropriate to an interpretation that focuses on the growth of African political consciousness and on the rising of 1961.

As a general survey of those aspects of the Angolan past that help illuminate the crisis of 1961 and as an analysis of events between 1961 and 1971, Angola is genuinely useful. And it is in this period—the almost contemporary past—that the bulk of its prospective readers are most likely to be interested.

F. JAMES BERG

Colgate University

ROBERT HEUSSLER. British Tanganyika: An Essay and Documents on District Administration. Durham: Duke University Press. 1971. Pp. xii, 154. $6.75.

The colonial district officer deserves the attention of historians, be they students of modern Africa or of the imperial process. Local administrators enjoyed their "heroic" era, in general, before the First World War: that is, before the crystalization of central bureaucratic structures, a time when initiatives were idiosyncratic and responsive to local political currents. Robert Heussler is not mistaken, therefore, in choosing to focus upon district officers; but he has failed to understand the contexts, regional and temporal, that defined the scope of the individual's activity.

By turning a blind eye to the German period, the formative colonial years in Tanganyika and surely the heroic time of district administration, Heussler makes an inauspicious start. He then takes up the various aspects of an official's task, with an extraordinary disregard for periodization and chronological sequence that will frustrate those who look for clues to the development of administration in the country. The essay illustrates a methodological trap well known to historians and others dealing with oral tradition, for it is only an enlargement of the "actors' model" of events. District officers often felt isolated at their posts and out of sympathy with dictates from the capital, preferring to see themselves as local barons. To be persuaded that these men did in fact have great influence, we must be told far more about local politics and the historical circumstances of the respective districts.

The occasional merits of this short essay and the accompanying illustrative documents hardly compensate for the stereotypes of African society and politics it retails. A thoroughly researched study of the district officer will, among other things, draw on African evaluations.

MARCIA WRIGHT
Columbia University

GERALD L. CAPLAN. The Elites of Barotseland, 1878-1969: A Political History of Zambia's Western Province. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1970. Pp. xi, 270. $8.50.

This is the history of the Lozi, the dominant grouping of Barotseland, centered on the flood plain of the upper Zambezi in present-day Zambia. Its ruling class traditionally held ties with the white establishment in Southern Africa; because of this and by virtue of their strategic location, the Lozi have constituted a political nexus of far greater importance than numbers alone would have warranted.

One should not take this book as yet another parochial study by an expatriate. This is a significant achievement, of merit equal to Ajaye's Christian Missions in Nigeria (1965), or Ogot's History of the Southern Luo (1967), in both methodology and synthesis. Although it breaks some new ground, its real benefit remains as an analytical and interpretive history, balancing both previously explored and new sources, affording insight into any number of historical issues claiming universality far beyond Barotseland's borders. Here is played out the vain attempt of a great African kingdom to prevail by accommodating rather than resisting European power, battling (but never stemming) the relentless erosion of its powers by the "indirect rule" that ensued. We see the pivotal role of "Western" (mission) education in the formation of new elite groups, whose destiny the missions—and governments—ultimately failed to control. We are shown how structural underdevelopment in a colony, customarily interpreted as imperial absent-mindedness, is often a conscious policy to further imperial aims and how "tribal clashes" are class conflicts by another name. Finally, we see the sorry consequences of a traditional ruling class allying with European interests to suppress the rise of the new elite and in the process secessionist movements being born.

The book essentially depicts the interaction between European power (mission, chartered company, and colonial administration) and two African elite groups: initially the Lozi establishment, and subsequently the mission-educated elite. The latter, which was to become the backbone of the United National Independence party, ultimately tested the Lozi traditionalists, and after the Europeans departed, prevailed. Professor Caplan masters a variety of sources, oral and written, to chronicle these highly complex themes with a sure touch. He details King Lewanika's symbiotic relationship with the missionary Coillard, leading to the signing of the fateful (and fraudulent) Lochner Concession. The king's subsequent realization of what he had done and his efforts to turn aside the consequences contain all the elements of a Greek tragedy. Lewanika's aims of fashioning an educated elite to modernize and protect his lands were dashed as the British South Africa Company reneged on its commitments, arrogated his powers unto itself, and forced him into a final, groveling capitulation. In the process his "modernizing" elite developed such a stake in preserving itself and the monarchy that it became entrenched as the royalist party, utterly reactionary and manipulated by the Europeans, until its downfall on their departure.

Caplan might well have detailed more thoroughly the educational process by the missionaries, which produced the new middle class, and he might have exposed the questionable relationship between missionary and company. Some of the main figures, again particularly the missionaries, remain shadowy. But no matter: this is an important book, carefully constructed, painstakingly researched, and packed with detail. For any graduate student embarking on African field research, Caplan's discursive passage on the nature of his evidence ought to be required reading.

ALAN R. BOOTH
Ohio University

LEONARD THOMPSON, editor. African Societies in Southern Africa: Historical Studies. (Published under the auspices of the African Studies Center, University of California, Los Angeles.) New York: Praeger Publishers. 1969. Pp. vii, 336. $8.75.

Since World War II African history has become a "growth discipline," and its methods and perspectives are now being applied in Southern African studies. Leonard Thompson, who wrote a major work well within the traditional mode of South African history, has been eager as teacher and scholar to adopt the new approaches. In 1968 he organized a conference at the University of Zambia; this volume contains thirteen papers from that conference, six of them by former students. The papers are: Leonard Thompson, "The forgotten factor in southern African history"; D. W. Phillipson, "Early iron-using peoples of southern Africa"; Brian Fagan, "The later Iron Age . . ."; Monica Wilson, "Changes in social structure . . . : the relevance of kinship studies to the historian"; Martin Legassick, "The Sotho-Tswana Peoples before 1800"; Shula Marks, "The traditions of the Natal 'Nguni': . . . the work of A. T. Bryant"; Gerrit Harinck, "Interaction between Xhosa and Khoi . . . 1620-1750"; Alan Smith, "The trade of Delagoa Bay as a factor in Nguni politics"; William Lye, ". . . Sotho peoples after the Difaqane"; John Omer-Cooper, "Aspects of political change in the Mfecane"; David Hammond-Tookes, ". . . a model of Cape Nguni political process"; Richard Brown, "The External relations of the Ndebele kingdom . . ."; Anthony Atmore, "The passing of Sotho independence 1865-70"; and Colin Webb, "Great Britain and the Zulu people 1879-87." Two of the authors are archaeologists, two anthropologists, and ten historians. Although the papers vary in readability, the standard is uniformly high.

Volumes of papers whose only common interest is in the past of a particular region inevitably invite the criticism that the papers could have been dispersed as articles in journals. The point is well taken, but it can be partially met by arguing that this is a book for Southern African specialists. More seriously, these papers, on the whole, lack succinct endings to make clear the authors' precise conclusions and their significance for a historian, though the reader is given real help by the editor's valiant introduction. Second, in describing migrations that lack a unifying thread of some sort and that involve a large number of names in addition to those of places, clear exposition in relation to adequate maps is essential. The maps included are excellent, but they are placed at the end of each paper, and the narrative and analysis are not explicitly connected with them.

These papers raise general issues; there is space to consider only two of them. Political pressures, to which all Southern African scholars are subject, give to the phrase "from an African point of view" a treacherous ambiguity. The detachment of the authors of these papers is impressive though it is due in part to the fact that the subjects avoid political issues. However, Atmore's conclusion, in which the end of Sotho independence is seen in terms of "white control," "interwhite conflicts," and "white interference" (pp. 300-01), overlooks the fact that it was hardly unimportant—either historically or to the Sotho—whether the Orange Free State, Natal, Cape Colony, or the High Commissioner were responsible for the governance of Lesotho. It would be a pity if the older South African history, which ignored variety among Africans, were to be succeeded by one that lumps all whites together.

Second, there is the question of the role of narrative and its relation to interpretation. Historians are not concerned only with event, but also with process and event. But what is the value to the historian of the study of the migration and subsequent distribution of peoples or the impact of languages on each other? What story is the Southern African historian trying to tell? Are these studies of languages, migrations, and consequent distributions to become the very stuff of history, or are they aids to interpretation?

The balance between narrative and interpretation can be seen in two of the papers dealing with the Mfecane. Smith's paper on trade is ingenious and careful, but it involves large assumptions; for example, ". . . it is improbable that this caravan could have originated in any place other than Zululand" (p. 187). Furthermore, so many statements have to be qualified that the paper becomes suggestive rather than conclusive. Unfortunately, the paper ends abruptly, and the material is not exploited.

Omer-Cooper, working on the basis of his earlier pioneer essay, The Zulu Aftermath (1969), is frankly interpretive, but rather than qualifying his statements, he appears to adopt a major thesis on continuity in the Zulu kingdom on the basis of an assertion that certain "innovations" were not "radical" (pp. 216, 227). Although sorting out events and interpreting them must go on together, do we yet know enough about the Mfecane itself—about the sheer flux of events—to justify interpretations for which it may be difficult to find evidence?

Professor Thompson and his colleagues raise an important set of issues. Many Southern African historians have turned away from the traditional questions because the approach was too political and too preoccupied with whites. But what central theme is to replace the old one of the development of the state and the impact of its policies? In other words, are the new historians concentrating sufficiently on problems of narrative, dealing with events in which Africans were the sole participants, or others in which only the "white side" has been subjected to detailed examination?

JEFFREY BUTLER
Wesleyan University

R. RAVEN-HART, translated with notes by. Cape Good Hope, 1652-1702: The First Fifty Years of Dutch Colonisation as Seen by Callers. In two volumes. Cape Town: A. A. Balkema. 1971. Pp. xv, 222, xi, 223-527. R. 30.00 the set.

This is a paste-and-scissors work, but excellent of its kind. The subject is a pretty well-worn one, as books by visitors to the Cape in the colonial period form a favorite quarry for South African historians. For example, the travel literature relating to the Cape has been extensively used by the editors of the Van Riebeeck Society's publications and in works like Edward Strangman's Early French Callers at the Cape (1936). However, Raven-Hart has exhumed some unpublished accounts from the archives at Cape Town, The Hague, and London, which he has dovetailed with the better known published ones.

The arrangement is strictly chronological, thus involving the separation into two parts of accounts that describe the Cape on the writer's homeward and outward voyages. Each account is accompanied by a briefing (if I may use the term) on the historical background relating to the individual's visit. A very full index, combined with a bibliography and glossary, facilitates consultation of the work, once the reader understands its rather complicated arrangement. The accounts themselves vary greatly in extent and in interest. Some of them, like those on pages 412-16 and 447-51, are such small beer as to be hardly worth printing. The hitherto unpublished accounts do not add anything material to what we already know; but the editor-translator judiciously evaluates them all and indicates where they confirm or contradict each other. The great majority of the callers of all nationalities were far more interested in the Hottentots than in the white inhabitants of the Cape. This interest is reflected in the index, which has thirteen and a half columns of references to the Hottentots and their activities.

Judging from the preface this work is perhaps chiefly intended for persons living in South Africa who have only limited knowledge of seventeenth-century history. The two volumes are richly illustrated; but unfortunately the reproductions have been made from photographs of the original engravings and illustrations, thus making many of them rather smudgy and inferior. Raven-Hart's enthusiasm for his self-imposed task is infectious; but although this work may well make fascinating reading for aficionados of early South African history, it is dispensable for anyone else.

C. R. BOXER
Yale University

RAYMOND K. KENT. Early Kingdoms in Madagascar, 1500-1700. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 1970. Pp. xvi, 336.

In this seminal study Kent accomplishes a major reinterpretation of Malagasy history. Previous interpretation, which generally rejected the African contribution to the state-building process in Madagascar occurring after 1500, had been conditioned by the massive scholarship of Alfred Grandidier and his son Guillaume. Nevertheless, there were serious flaws in the work of the Grandidiers and their successors, which Kent demonstrates by a careful analysis of the written sources they used, and by an equally searching analysis of an impressively wide range of oral, linguistic, and other nonarchival evidence.

Kent's conclusion is that early in the first Christian millennium migrations from the Indonesian archipelago brought many varying groups of these islanders to the western Indian Ocean world where they spread widely into east central and southeast central Africa, this migration taking place before the arrival of the Bantu-speaking peoples into these regions. As the Bantu migrations continued, an Afro-Malagasy "race" resulted, of varying cultural composition due to the process of contact in each locality. This pressure also led to Indonesian settlement in Madagascar, where previously only a limited number had gone, thus establishing the lasting Indonesian language base for the peoples of the island. The process was largely completed by the tenth century. Then early in our second millennium, when Indonesians on the African continent were confined to regions on the eastern coast and in the south, new pressures from Bantu-speakers and from the east-coast Muslim trading communities caused the last important movement of Indonesians to Madagascar. The migrants had by this time absorbed much from the Bantu cultural milieu, and some spoke only Bantu languages. Their movement ended by the end of the fourteenth century, and they set the stage for future developments on Africa's greatest island.

In this painstaking study, with its extensive references demonstrating the widest use of all forms of evidence relating to Madagascar's past, Kent has made a lasting contribution to the island's history. His conclusion is now established: "In short, the traditional past of Madagascar makes absolutely no sense without Africa" (p. 265).

N. R. BENNETT

Boston University

ASIA AND THE EAST

PAMELA NIGHTINGALE. Trade and Empire in Western India, 1784-1806. (Cambridge South Asian Studies, Number 9.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 1970. Pp. xv, 264. $11.50.

OLE FELDBÆK. India Trade under the Danish Flag, 1772-1808: European Enterprise and Anglo-Indian Remittance and Trade. (Scandinavian Institute of Asian Studies Monograph Series, Number 2.) [Lund:] Studentlitteratur. 1969. Pp. 239. 45.75 S. kr.

The years from 1757 to 1818 can be characterized as the period of consolidation of English power in India. Throughout this period British policies were molded by the internal situation in India, the actions of other European powers, and the commercial interests of both the East India Company and the servants of the company who traded privately. The role played by British commercial interests in the extension of British control in western India and in the activities of the Danes is examined by Pamela Nightingale and Ole Feldbæk respectively.

Dr. Nightingale's thesis is that British imperialism in western India was not imperialism primarily for political gain and that the economic considerations of both the company and the private traders led to the consolidation of British authority over Malabar and Gujarat. With clarity and style Dr. Nightingale discusses her findings and in so doing not only has accomplished the affirmation of her thesis but has differentiated two types of economic imperialism: imperialism for the creation of a commercial monopoly and imperialism for the creation of stable conditions that allow for the pursuance of commercial goals. The transition between these two commercial philosophies by the English East India Company in western India has been accurately depicted in the examination of British policy toward Malabar and Gujarat.

Mr. Feldbæk in his examination of "the state of things behind the Danish facade" (p. 7) has shown the effect of British policies on the fortunes of the Danish Asiatic Company and private Danish traders. His findings regarding the official commercial activities of the Asiatic Company are not new and in essence reaffirm the notion that as British power increased, the commercial prospects of the Asiatic Company declined. What is unique, however, is the detailed account of the private Anglo-Indian commercial activity carried on under the Danish flag. This is a story that has not been told before with such thoroughness. From this account an appreciation can be had of the magnitude of these Anglo-Indian remittances as well as the important role that the Danes played in the continuance of clandestine English private trade.

The advantage that Dr. Nightingale had, which Mr. Feldbæk did not, was the availability of private correspondence and commercial documents through which she was able to reconstruct the function of both the collective interests of the private commercial community and individual relationships in the formulation of British policy in western India. Mr. Feldbæk, on the other hand, had to glean his information regarding private trade chiefly from English, French, and Dutch sources, as few of the private Danish papers are extant. Whatever Mr. Feldbæk's account lacks in intimacy is compensated for by the volume of data cited and the number of examples given.

The only noticeable deficiency in Dr. Nightingale's work is the absence of a glossary that would have removed any possible vagueness regarding the meanings of such terms as adawlat and chauth, which are used but not defined in the text. The principal weakness in Mr. Feldbæk's study is likewise not one of substance but one of form. Within the body of the text he has included so much data that at times the flow of the discussion is disturbed. Some of this data should have been added to the excellent appendixes, which include valuable information on currency equivalents, values of cargoes, and the profitableness of Indian cargoes.

Within their defined areas of inquiry, these two works should be considered essential secondary sources for those interested in understanding the motives, means, and consequences of the consolidation of British power in India.

ANN BOS RADWAN

University of Pennsylvania

H. I. LONDON. Non-White Immigration and the "White Australia" Policy. New York: New York University Press. 1970. Pp. xv, 318. $6.95.

EGON F. KUNZ. Blood and Gold: Hungarians in Australia. Melbourne: F. W. Cheshire. 1969. Pp. xviii, 301. $7.50.

ALBERT A. HAYDEN. New South Wales Immigration Policy, 1856-1900. (Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, New Series, Volume 61, Part 5.) Philadelphia: the Society. 1971. Pp. 60. $2.25.

Although these books are concerned with Australian immigration, their particular topics necessitate individual appraisal. Dr. London's book describes how a population-hungry Australia rationalizes the exclusion of most non-white people. He reports that in 1968 there were 41,000 non-Europeans in Australia, of which group only 20,000 were Australian citizens. He feels that Australia may have to terminate its policy of "Australianizing" all immigrants and to accept some newcomers who may not be socially assimilable. Most Australians, he admits, prefer their homogeneous society—even long-resident Australian-Chinese seem to prefer "White Australia" to a nation open to major influx from Asia.

The author notes that the policy has been moderated to a degree during the sixties. Reform groups have developed. Politicians have grown sensitive to the criticism of excolonial nations in the UN. The increased number of Asian students at Australian universities has triggered student activism against the White-Australia policy. Polls and the press show some change in public attitudes—wide sympathy, for example, toward the Asian victims of such causes célèbres as the Nancy Prasad case. There is a feeling that Australian population needs can no longer be provided wholly from Europe and that the present policy of exclusion may imperil national security by isolating Australia from her Asian neighbors.

The Australian rationale against admitting large numbers of non-Europeans emphasizes the point that unassimilated pockets of immigrants endanger social harmony, might lead to racial violence, and might even embroil Australia with Asian nations. There remains some belief that nonwhites are, in certain respects, inferior to white Europeans. There is a decided sentiment that Australians have the right to decide who shall dwell among them. The major political groups tend to reflect this view although the Roman Catholic Democratic Labor party, the Communist party, and some Christian churches condemn the exclusion policy. The Liberal-Country administration also carried out some modifications in 1966, which have increased immigration opportunities for nonwhites, though still favoring the degree-holding, Westernized elite of this category. The Australian Labor party's traditional opposition to "cheap colored labor" continues but may be liberalized under the new leader, E. G. Whitlam. All parties have taken note of the racial problem in the United States and in Britain and of the racialism and exclusivist legislation by Asian and African states.

The author, who believes a more liberal policy and, ultimately, an end to racially defined exclusion must come, has presented a readable, interesting account. He seems, at times, a bit unfair in his criticism of Australians for occasional boorishness toward nonwhites or neglect of social contact with such immigrants. Australian standards are no worse than those of any other nation with an immigration problem. And relations between Australians and white "New Australians" suggest that Australia may not be ready for more complex large-scale immigration problems.

Dr. Egon F. Kunz presents a somewhat romantic view of Hungarian immigration to Australia, a very small element of its human influx. We see the ebb and flow of a basically reluctant immigrant group, pulled toward Australia by gold, liberty, and sanctuary or pushed by poverty, war, injustice, and rebellion. The waves began with humble, largely Jewish arrivals in the 1830s, to be followed by the larger Magyar groups of refugees from the 1848 revolution, by gold seekers, and by refugees from the impact of the two World Wars, from the advent of communism, and finally from the invasion of Hungary by Soviet Russia in 1956.

The Hungarians seem always to hope for a return to the Central European homeland and so remain quietly Magyar in life-style and rather neutral in politics, although very active, Dr. Kunz reports, in all other fields of endeavor, especially the arts, sciences, and university teaching. Hungarian Protestants have moved into the Anglican fold in Australia, but Catholics have adjusted only with difficulty to the peculiarities of the Irish-Australian Catholic community. The rise of "Little Budapests" should be balanced against the record of considerable intermarriage with Australians of British stock. The author's style is at times repetitious, and there are too many lists in the text that really belong among the footnotes. There are occasional puzzling statements such as a reference to an 1854 voyage of the ship

Golden Age, "the first ship ever to go from Australia via the Panama Canal to England" (p. 69).

In contrast to Dr. Kunz's book, Professor Hayden's short study is excessively compressed. It takes up the Australian immigration question for the period 1856-1900, following approximately on the heels of R. B. Madgwick's book covering 1788-1851 and treating only New South Wales. Detailed accounts of successive governments of rough-edged politicians are presented, showing where the continually improvised policies for assisted or nonassisted immigration were influenced by the pastoralists' fear of recruiting more free-selectors, and by labor's suspicion of immigrant competition, and by the fluctuations of economic conditions limited by the rather earth-bound decisions of local political warfare. The author believes that while economic forces played a large part in shaping immigration legislation, the politics of land and of the wider franchise created political priorities that sometimes overrode or smothered economic requirements.

CHARLES S. BLACKTON
Colgate University

AMERICAS

CARL ORTWIN SAUER. Sixteenth Century North America: The Land and the People as Seen by the Europeans. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1971. Pp. xii, 319. $10.95.

Sauer uses sixteenth-century accounts of the North American continent to reconstruct the conditions before Europeans came to stay, to indicate the incipient change induced by their contact, and to obtain "an overview of what this country was." This is not, however, a source book. The geographer dominates the page, narrating the context of experience in which the observations cited were made. For example, Hernando de Soto is properly introduced as a brutal predator, the sources for his expedition are briefly described, and its organization and its progress rehearsed. We follow the march accompanied by a guide who continually cites contemporary report with a running commentary approving, questioning, or correcting it. The method is to observe observation; the style is dry, clipped, and packed with fact; the tone is neutral. Thus, Sauer has attempted here for North America what he achieved so brilliantly for the Caribbean in The Early Spanish Main (1966). Once again we find the grasp of physical geography and occasionally the insight into the mental process of discovery that marked the earlier book, though here the material, one feels, is less familiar to the author and the subject less confined in area and period. As one might reasonably expect, the sections on Spanish exploration of the south are the best—happily indeed for they make up the greater part of the book. European preconceptions and attitudes, which of course shaped the explorers' impressions, should perhaps receive more attention in a round and fair view of the historical event, but Sauer's mind is quite legitimately on the object rather than the subject and on the geographical rather than the anthropological aspects of the object. He shows that object—the land with its endowment of vegetable, animal, and human life—to have been in many ways more admirable than latter-day Europeans or Americans have imagined and as yet little affected by European intrusion. We may with some confidence hope that Sauer's close adherence to the narrative records and his cool realism will prove as salutary to students as they are refreshing to a historian.

K. R. ANDREWS
University of Hull

C. HARVEY GARDINER. William Hickling Prescott: A Biography. Introduction by ALLAN NEVINS. Austin: University of Texas Press. 1969. Pp. xxi, 366. $7.50.

JOHN HEMMING. The Conquest of the Incas. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich. 1970. Pp. 641. $12.50.

Many years will doubtless pass before another biography of Prescott appears, so thoroughly has Professor Gardiner researched the life and times of this Boston brahmin who produced classical works on the history of Spain and its conquests in America. Certainly it will be difficult to turn up much new meaningful material on his family, education at Harvard, marriage, friends, search for a suitable topic to write on, and the life-long vigil to conserve his eyesight.

As one reads the mass of minutiae presented to document the progress of Prescott from his birth in 1796 into a prominent family until his death in 1859, "attended by several doctors," one wonders whether any historian in the United States has provided for posterity as much information on himself and his historical methods as did Prescott—with the exception perhaps of H. H. Bancroft's Literary Industries (1890). We see the well-to-do clubman struggling with the competing claims of social life, family responsibilities, and persistent illnesses; his constant exhortations to himself to conserve his time and energy for serious studies; his preoccupation with the way his books were published—the paper used, illustrations, color of bindings, copyright problems, royalty arrangements, and dispatch of review copies to promote sales.

We are, in fact, told too much. Professor Gardiner might well have heeded Prescott's own challenge to himself: "Do not be afraid of being too brief." The reader wearies of the almost daily health reports and the chitchat about social trivia and his children, though we learn almost nothing about his wife.

The most significant omission is any detailed or analytical evaluation of Prescott the historian. From the scholar who has made himself the foremost authority on the subject, we might well expect a more substantial treatment. Why is Prescott's Ferdinand and Isabella (1838) "distinctly Prescott's masterwork" (p. 145)? Is it true that "scholarly myopia attends most judgments of Prescott's histories" (p. 143)? Why did the American Historical Association in 1949 select another wealthy and socially prominent Bostonian, Francis Parkman, along with Frederick Jackson Turner, when the Pan American Institute of Geography and History requested the names of representatives and significant American historians? Was this myopia, a mature judgment, or ignorance of the true merits of Prescott's Conquest of Mexico (1843) and Conquest of Peru (1847)? Despite the labor lavished during the last decade and more by Professor Gardiner on Prescott, he gives no answer to these fundamental questions.

The Conquest of the Incas demonstrates once more that the writing of history cannot be left exclusively to the professional historian. It also reflects how much has been learned about Inca history and Spanish action in America since Prescott bravely tackled the same subject over a century ago. Mr. Hemming has profited from the many contributions of widely scattered specialists, but it is the combination of his own imagination, diligence, and attractive style that has enabled him to produce the first satisfying and sound general work on the conquest of Peru that has appeared in a generation. Even this gifted writer, however, has been unable to escape the fatal fascination of the tangled genealogical story of Inca descendants as they struggled to establish their claims with the Spanish bureaucracy. And though he has missed a few useful items by Marcel Bataillon and Alfonso García Gallo, the only serious omission appears to be the works of the Swedish ethnohistorian Åke Wedin. (See Magnus Mörner and Hans Andersson, "A Reappraisal of the Sources of Inca History: The Works of Åke Wedin," The Americas, 25 [1968]: 174-90.)

What makes this comprehensive treatment so valuable is the author's fresh look at the conquest, from which has resulted a balanced view of this complicated process, including Inca reactions and viewpoints on Spanish rule. The narrative flows along smoothly, and there is due attention to Spanish legal and religious preoccupations. Excellent notes, maps, and illustrations plus a good index add to the value of the volume.

Mr. Hemming closes his work with an account of the modern explorers, especially Hiram Bingham, who sought for the lost city of Vilcabamba. As every true historian of Peru wants to do, Mr. Hemming made his own explorations and had adventures too. He visited one of the Inca sites at Choquequirau after a perilous trip across the Apurímac canyon by means of strands of telegraph wires: "I tied myself to a curved piece of wood that slid along these wires, with my feet dangling above the swirling grey waters, and hauled across with my arms for 250 feet along the swaying wires" (p. 481), a fitting finale for a rich experience in research and writing.

LEWIS HANKE
University of Massachusetts,
Amherst

EUGENIA MEYER. Conciencia histórica norteamericana sobre la Revolución de 1910. (Series Historia, Number 22.). México, D. F.: Instituto Nacional de Antropología e Historia. 1970. Pp. 234. $3.60.

North American observers of the Mexican Revolution of 1910 have over several decades tortuously wrenched themselves from an inherited negativism toward everything Mexican and launched themselves into a commendable but perhaps futile search for the realidad mexicana. So argues Eugenia Meyer, a Mexican historian, in her analysis of changing American attitudes toward the revolution in this important, though incomplete, historiographical essay.

Trapped by their Protestant Anglo-Saxon prejudices concerning racial mixture, the Roman Catholic Church, and the Spanish tradition, most American authors writing from 1910 to the 1930s considered the revolution a logical and to-be-expected extension of Mexico's chaotic past. The rebels, they contended, heedlessly dismantled the peaceful and progressive state established by Porfirio Díaz and justified later United States intervention by proving their inability to govern themselves.

Events surrounding World War I, however, caused Americans to broaden their intellectual horizons, to tolerate the fact of the revolution, and to sift the results for an understanding of how Mexicans as individuals had been forged by their circunstancia.

Racism persisted as evidenced by Wallace Thompson (The Mexican Mind: A Study of National Psychology [1922]), but sensitive observers with social concerns, such as Carlton Beals (Mexico, an Interpretation [1923]) and Ernest H. Gruening (Mexico and its Heritage [1928]) discovered the Mexican to be a praiseworthy and creative person possessed of an appreciation for human existence that in most ways surpassed values being pursued in the so-called developed societies. This new-found appreciation for Mexican culture culminated in the work of Frank Tannenbaum (The Mexican Agrarian Revolution [1929]), who was undoubtedly inclined by his socialist tendencies but whose work remains among the most perceptive yet concerning Mexican character.

Professor Meyer principally treats the era from 1900 to 1940, although her epilogue approaches the present. In this final section she notes that a professionally trained corps of United States historians is producing a stream of monographs that approach the truth of the revolution—the truth being a more or less official Mexican viewpoint of its own revolution. In short, not only has the revolution itself become institutionalized, but also the manner in which United States historians view the event. Furthermore, the need to affirm United States values in light of the cold war, to contradict Soviet affirmations of a frustrated class struggle in Mexico, and, more importantly, to discredit the Cuban kind of social change has led American historians to label the Mexican model “the preferred revolution.”

The major shortcoming of the book is Professor Meyer's admitted failure to consider those United States domestic currents that have undoubtedly influenced much of the writing on Mexico. For instance, one better comprehends the interpretations of William E. Carson (Mexico, the Wonderland of the South [1909]) or Nevin O. Winter (Mexico and Her People . . . [1923]), when it is pointed out that the idea of white supremacy permeated the Progressive spirit. It also needs to be said that the Mexican Indianist movement of the 1920s coupled with the discontent of many American intellectuals toward their nation's emphasis on materialism influenced authors of the period to idealize Mexico's pastoral society. How their country's internal affairs affected the attitudes of United States writers toward Mexico is studied by Donald L. Zelman in his dissertation at Ohio State University, “American Intellectual Attitudes Toward Mexico, 1908–1940” (1969).

Despite the failure of Professor Meyer to develop fully her investigation, her book stands on its own as a pioneering effort to evaluate Mexican historiography from the Mexican point of view. Students of Mexican history can only agree that more of the same is needed.

PAUL J. VANDERWOOD
San Diego State College

BERTA ULLOA. La Revolución intervenida: Relaciones diplomáticas entre México y Estados Unidos (1910–1914). (Centro de Estudios Históricos, New Series, Number 12.) [México, D. F.:] Colegio de México. 1971. Pp. xi, 394.

Despite the cartoon on its cover depicting Tío Sam choking and kneeling La Patria, this is a work of careful scholarship with no discernible bias. In fact Miss Ulloa is less critical of Woodrow Wilson's Mexican policy than the North Americans Robert Quirk and Arthur Link. Her research is impressive, and she relies almost exclusively upon primary materials from Mexican and United States archives in presenting a straight, factual account of relations between the two countries between 1910 and 1914. She does not write as colorfully as Quirk nor with the impact of John Womack, but she has put together as complete a study of the events as may be found in any language.

There is probably more here of value to the Mexican scholar than to the North American. That is, most of the documents used may be found in United States archives (the National Archives, the Manuscripts Division of the Library of Congress, and manuscript collections of the University of Texas and Yale University), which, because of their availability, have already been researched to a considerable extent by U.S. scholars. Miss Ulloa does cite material from the archives of the Mexican Foreign Ministry, but the amount is slight and the ground seems familiar. Because much of the story is taken from U.S. documents, one may feel a “coals to Newcastle” effect. However, it is likely that Mexican scholars will derive a great deal more from a work of substance as this is in the original Spanish than from any comparable translated work.

Moreover, North American scholars will be disappointed if they look for a “Mexican viewpoint.” Miss Ulloa's judgment is balanced. One cannot detect even the “insidious” cultural influence that supposedly makes objectivity unattainable. On the other hand, the lack of an interpretative framework is a weakness of the book. Miss Ulloa permits herself to observe only that Woodrow Wilson wanted desperately to dominate Mexican political affairs and that he was ineffective. Further, she concludes that the military successes of the Constitutionalists, not the actions of Wilson or the Niagara Falls Conference (to which she nonetheless devotes one of her longest chapters), were responsible for the fall of Victoriano Huerta.

This work is part of the project sponsored by El Colegio de México under the direction of Daniel Cosío Villegas to write a contemporary history of Mexico. The project includes the collecting and editing of documents and the publication of individual and group research. Miss Ulloa's volume lends real distinction to the project.

CHARLES D. AMERINGER
Pennsylvania State University

GEORGE WILLIAM PILCHER. Samuel Davies: Apostle of Dissent in Colonial Virginia. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press. 1971. Pp. xi, 229. $9.75.

Samuel Davies (1723-61) is best known as the "New Side preacher who consolidated the spontaneous revival in Hanover county Virginia being conducted by laymen whom Governor Gooch had christened 'Presbyterian'" and for his leadership of the successful legal battle for recognition of "the rights of dissenters under the English Toleration Act of 1689."

To these aspects of his career this biography adds little that is new. It does round out the picture of the man who during a career of less than fourteen years achieved a reputation as perhaps "the greatest preacher that America has known," whose oratory set an example followed by Patrick Henry, whose sermons (published posthumously in England in five volumes) went through more than twenty reprintings between 1766 and 1867, who was "America's first important writer of original hymns," who published poetry that was read throughout the colonies and was reprinted in 1968, who was recognized as one of the most eminent leaders of the Great Awakening, who pioneered in "the education of Negro slaves and . . . Indians," who was known as a foremost educator, and who for the last year and a half of his life was president of the College of New Jersey, for whose first permanent buildings he had spent fourteen months in Britain raising money.

Unfortunately Professor Pilcher's biography is a eulogistic extension of the funeral sermon given by Samuel Finley, Davies's successor at Princeton. The conclusion that his life "displayed a remarkable unity of inward belief and outward action" is contradicted by the evidence. What emerges is the portrait of an oversensitive young man from a poor Baptist family turned Presbyterian, married into a prominent Williamsburg Anglican family, and struggled through a life beset by constant "feelings of inadequacy" and an inner turmoil that one may guess was related to his perennial ill health.

Structurally the portrait is a collage of material from and about Davies pieced together with Pilcher's uncritical observations. The resulting conglomerate calls attention to many apparent contradictions in Davies's career that are left unresolved and suggest that he erected a protective façade of pious deviousness. A few examples will make this clear.

Aside from having "seven [licensed] pulpits located in five different counties" Davies recorded that in two months he rode five hundred miles and preached forty sermons, often in the woods, while extending his work widely in Virginia and into North Carolina. Yet he staunchly denied that he was an itinerant. Pilcher agrees, saying that to Davies itineracy "meant going from place to place in a deliberate attempt to win converts," and he adds that this was something Davies "did not do," for he preached only "to congregations already converted." Yet it is also noted that he was a revivalist who always preached "to bring sinners to repentance." In this connection Pilcher seems uncritically to accept Davies's denial that he was a disruptive force in the colony, which a relative accused him of being, while also noting that he brought about "a mass defection from the established church."

Davies, says Pilcher, "was essentially a man of peace, preaching the words of a Prince of Peace" and admonishing his hearers to "cultivate a pacific temper towards one another, both as individuals and nations." Yet he preached preventive war in the name of defense, urged enlistment as a Christian duty, disobedience to which would bring God's curse, and "equated patriotism with Christianity and became, through his pulpit, the colony's best recruiting officer."

Davies's successful fight for the rights of dissenters, says Pilcher, helped "lay a firm base for the ultimate separation of church and state." Yet Davies, who favored Anglican bishops for America, never questioned Establishment in principle and thereby threw his influence on the side of its perpetuation.

As for the education of slaves, Pilcher makes it clear that Davies's desire was to give them the ability to "read the basic texts of Christianity" in order that they might become church members, which he supposed, although he never told the slaves this, would "make them more loyal to their masters." Davies approved slavery in principle by holding slaves himself and, Pilcher weakly observes, "expressed whatever doubts he had about the institution by refraining from praising it." Actually his position suggests a Christian legitimization of slavery by separating being Christian from being free.

SIDNEY E. MEAD

University of Iowa

WILLIAM JAMES MORGAN, editor. Naval Documents of the American Revolution. Volume 5, American Theatre: May 9, 1776-July 31, 1776. With a foreword by RICHARD NIXON and an introduction by F. KENT LOOMIS. Washington: [Naval History Division, Department of the Navy.] 1970. Pp. xxviii, 1486. $13.25.

I have been critical of the navy's documentary history of the Revolution in the past; if I continue to be so it is not out of sheer perversity. The project itself is of the utmost historical significance, yet it has never measured up to the high scholarly standards set by similar projects such as the Jefferson Papers, the Adams Papers, and the Franklin Papers. Its editorial practices have been faulted on many counts: the failure to state precise criteria for including or omitting documents, the tendency to reproduce documents from secondary sources when the primary sources themselves were available, the pronounced Whiggish bias in the written commentaries, and an index that has not always taken into account matters of current concern to scholars who are seeking different data as they resort to quantification techniques or to cross-disciplinary approaches in their research. Although the project has improved certain of these practices, it has yet to attain the level of competence in documentary editing that has been reached by other major editorial enterprises.

In the volume under consideration two major flaws are evident. First, there is the reproduction of numerous documents from Peter Force's American Archives (1837-53). Some of these sources, to be sure, have been destroyed or lost and can no longer be found in the original. But to rely so heavily upon the crude efforts of Force in these days of modern editing standards seems highly questionable. Second, there is an excessive reliance upon colonial newspapers for information. Much of this work was done by the project's former editor, the late William Bell Clark, who searched the press for shipping entries and prepared a voluminous file on the arrival and departure of vessels. Clark's file should have served as the focal point for further research into ships' logs. Colonial newspapers, after all, were no more accurate or detailed in their information than their modern-day counterparts.

Given the head start this project had with Clark's monumental collection of naval document transcripts, the financial backing of the federal government, and the availability of unemployed Ph.D.'s to serve as research assistants, scholars have every right to expect a higher standard of performance in this important historical undertaking.

GEORGE ATHAN BILLIAS
Clark University

JOSEPH L. GRABILL. Protestant Diplomacy and the Near East: Missionary Influence on American Policy, 1810-1927. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 1971. Pp. x, 395. $13.50.

In his 1968 presidential address John K. Fairbank challenged his colleagues in the American Historical Association to study "the missionary in foreign parts" whom he called "the invisible man of American history." Joseph L. Grabill has responded with this first comprehensive account of the influence of Protestant missionaries on the relations between the United States and the Ottoman Empire. The title is somewhat misleading. The bulk of the work deals with missionary efforts to guide the United States in remaking the Empire during and following the First World War and, more specifically, with the attempt to create an independent Armenia under American tutelage.

There is much to admire in this account. The research, at least up to 1919, is thorough and instructive, and some of Grabill's conclusions are impressive. (He is probably right, for example, that the Armenian disaster could have been less had the missionaries' schools and hospitals been as open to the Turks as to their subjects.) Confessing himself in his preface to be an active Christian, he has sought to be impartial, and for a time the reader is persuaded that he has been. It appears, however, to at least one reader that the effort has cost him too much. He has leaned so far over to give the Turks their due that he has weighted his testimony against the Armenians, the missionaries, the Near East Relief, and Woodrow Wilson. The scarifying treatment of the American president in particular contrasts unpleasantly with the author's indulgence toward the bigoted Admiral Bristol, whose chief motivation was to make the new Turkey a happy hunting ground for American business.

Moreover, the very thoroughness of the research in its limited area may leave the impression that an independent Armenia guided by the United States was solely a conception of American Protestantism. The statement of the British ambassador (p. 230) that the Armenian mandate might still be put across by Morgenthau, Elkus, and Smith—two Jews and a Catholic—attests the inadequacy of such a view. Grabill has conscientiously set it down but seems not to have perceived its irony.

Worst is the account of the destruction of Smyrna in 1922, in which the statement of President MacLachlan of International College that the Turks not only committed no crimes but protected the college from destruction (by whom, one wonders) appears to have been credulously accepted. It is to be hoped that Professor Grabill will read Marjorie Housepian's excellently documented The Smyrna Affair and learn in harrowing detail that the Turkish army, far from maintaining order, set fire to the city and killed approximately 190,000 Greeks and Armenians by shooting, stabbing, fire, and deportation to the interior, while ships of the allied powers rode idly at anchor in the harbor; only the intervention of private individuals finally obliged them to save some of the victims. In this holocaust MacLachlan saw only that his school was spared. If Grabill had wanted to write a book against missionaries—as it sometimes seems he did—that would have been a good place to start.

The writing is generally serviceable, at times even making its points sharply, but some of it is awkward and some not even correct English. It does not appear to have profited from the kind of editing we ought to expect from a major university press.

In spite of these reservations the book should be read. Its author has ventured into unexplored territory and has done much of his research well. If he has fallen too often into error, I am persuaded he has done so from an excessive desire to be fair, of all intellectual maladies the least likely to spread.

JAMES B. GIDNEY

Kent State University

ALLAN NEVINS. The War for the Union. Volume 3, The Organized War, 1863-1864; Volume 4, The Organized War to Victory, 1864-1865. (Ordeal of the Union, Volumes 7 and 8.) New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1971. Pp. 532; 448. $15.00 each.

These two volumes bring to a satisfactory though premature close the most ambitious undertaking of one of the most remarkable men ever to enter the ranks of historical scholarship. Publication of the series collectively titled Ordeal of the Union began in 1947, when Allan Nevins was already fifty-seven years old. His general plan contemplated as many as ten volumes on the three decades of the Civil War era from 1847 to the end of Reconstruction. At his death in 1971, he had completed eight volumes, carrying the story down to 1865. To scarcely twenty years of American history he had devoted about one and one-half million words—the equivalent of perhaps fifteen ordinary books. Yet even without counting this magnum opus Nevins would still be regarded as one of the most prolific and gifted of American historians. Indeed, the list of his other publications since 1947 would probably match the lifetime production of many well-known scholars. When one also considers all of his earlier works, including two Pulitzer Prize biographies, it seems safe to say that no other American has ever produced so much historical writing of such high quality. It is a record that may never be equaled.

The first four volumes of Ordeal, though panoramic in their subject matter, were primarily about the coming of the Civil War.

They appeared most opportunely at a time when Civil War causation was the focus of extraordinary scholarly attention and controversy. During the years 1942 to 1950 the problem of explaining the disruption of the Union was wrestled with in significant books by Avery Craven, James G. Randall, Roy F. Nichols, David M. Potter, and Kenneth M. Stampp. Debate between the so-called revisionists and their critics over the irrepressibility of the conflict had reached its peak. The Nevins volumes were the climactic contribution to this outpouring of literature on the reason why, and they remain, in Potter's words, "the only great overall narrative based upon modern research." Aiming at historical synthesis on a grand scale, Nevins tried to assimilate conflicting scholarly views into an interpretation that seemed, as a result, to be ambiguous if not contradictory. More often than not, he appeared to place himself squarely in the nationalist tradition of James Ford Rhodes, but at times his tone became revisionist as he condemned the "failure of American leadership" in the 1850s and asserted that the war "should have been avoidable." This eclectic approach caused much confusion among reviewers who found him fair and unfair in his treatment of the South, sensitive and insensitive to the moral aspects of the slavery question.

At the conclusion of his fourth volume Nevins echoed Rhodes in declaring that the war was fought over slavery. But not slavery alone, he added. It was also a war over "the future position of the Negro race in North America." This addendum, though untenable as an explanation of why the war came, has considerable validity as an explanation of what the war came to mean, and it anticipated the trend of scholarship in the years that followed. After 1950 interest shifted from the somewhat jaded subject of war causation to the seemingly more relevant subjects of racism, slavery, the Negro and his white champions, and the problem of why the Emancipation Proclamation became largely a "deferred commitment." Only by exploiting the racial theme fully and giving it primary emphasis could Nevins have made his later volumes as timely and fashionable as the earlier ones, but he did not choose to do so, perhaps holding something back for special treatment in his final volumes on Reconstruction.

Not that slavery and the Negro are neglected in The War for the Union, but they are only marginally related to the principal argument with which Nevins sought to give this sweeping narrative a general conceptual structure.

The theme of the war volumes, Nevins announced in 1959, was to be "the impact of the war on national character." More particularly: "Their thesis, insofar as a single idea can be applied to a struggle so manysided, is that the war measurably transformed an inchoate nation, individualistic in temper and wedded to improvisation, into a shaped and disciplined nation, increasingly aware of the importance of plan and control." This assertion, variously phrased, appears again and again like a leitmotif throughout the rest of the work. Antebellum America was "amorphous," "limp," "formless," "protoplasmic," "spineless." The war produced a "coordinated," "directed," "organized" nation. Reiteration is bulwarked with elaborate description, most notably in a chapter of the third volume entitled "The Sweep of Organization." The transformation, it is plainly implied, was overdue and beneficent, ushering in modern America, whereas at the beginning of the whole series Nevins had declared that the war left "part of the country . . . half ruined for generations, and all of it set back by decades." Definition of the word "organized" and its equivalents is never very clear. In some passages we are led to believe that there was a wholesale shift from individualistic to collective effort during the war years; on other pages the significant change becomes the nationalizing of organizations admittedly already well developed at local and regional levels. Similarly, we are told both that war produced the transformation with revolutionary suddenness and that the war merely accentuated or stimulated changes set in motion before 1860. Furthermore, although he asserted that the transformation was measurable, Nevins made no real effort to measure it. He provided enough data perhaps to justify an initial hypothesis but developed no design of proof.

The fact is that Nevins had too much peripheral vision and flexibility of mind for the relentless pursuit of a grand thesis, and his style of writing was not suited to such enterprise. History he once defined as an "integrated narrative . . . written in a spirit of critical inquity for the whole truth." That the spirit was with him always can scarcely be doubted, but in his intensive search among the varieties, complexities, and ambiguities of history he found truth pluralized and seldom consistent. Even his more limited generalizations and judgments often have a two-way stretch. As for wholeness, in this series it became largely a matter of scope. One is impressed first of all by the vastness of his scale and the reach of his knowledge, but with reach there was also grasp and integrative understanding. Details are occasionally wrong and judgments are sometimes questionable, but reading Nevins gives one that sense of mastery which in public life is associated with statesmanship. The true measure of his achievement is what he made of the past, not what he abstracted from it.

Primarily narrative and descriptive, with interspersed passages of analysis, these two final volumes, like their predecessors, may be regarded as an updated, professionalized specimen of traditional literary history, and Nevins has perhaps carried that kind of scholarship about as far as it can go. To some readers his writing will also seem old-fashioned in another way. His outlook was that of a confirmed nationalist in the sense that he placed the nation at the center of his attention and associated the highest human values with nationhood. For him, as for Lincoln, the great conflict was above all a "war for the Union." He justified giving more emphasis to Northern than to Southern affairs on the grounds that the Confederacy was a temporary aberration. He had little sympathy for the Peace Democrats, labeling their 1864 platform "silly and evil." His pages vote overwhelmingly but not unanimously for Lincoln. In one long chapter, "The Tragic Lot of the Freedmen," he passed severe judgment on the Lincoln administration for its insensitivity and incompetence in dealing with this problem. Yet, on the political front he displayed a persistent hostility to Radical Republicans like Charles Sumner who were most concerned about the Negro's welfare.

As Civil War history, however, the Nevins volumes are by no means traditional. Military events, treated adequately though somewhat discontinuously and with wretched maps, are but part of the larger subject, which is the wartime nation. No doubt Nevins made his most original contributions in those chapters detailing the effort behind the fighting, including such things as military transportation, industrial conversion, procurement of medical supplies, and the outpouring of war songs. These sections make heavy reading, laden as they are with names and statistics. But then there are other chapters on politics and diplomacy in which lively narration and deft character sketches quicken the pace again. Beginning with Vicksburg, "the organized victory," and Gettysburg, "the fumbled victory," these volumes continue past Appomattox and the tragedy in Ford's Theater to include two chapters on demobilization. It is a suitable ending, but there was plainly more to come, and one wishes, sadly, that it could have been so.

DON E. FEHRENBACHER
Stanford University

WILLIAM N. STILL JR. Iron Afloat: The Story of the Confederate Armorclads. [Nashville:] Vanderbilt University Press. 1971. Pp. x, 260. $10.00.

In his Confederate Shipbuilding (1969) William N. Still, Jr. gave us a brief, informative analysis of the difficulties that hampered Southern construction of warships, both wooden and ironclad. In Iron Afloat he concentrates upon the armor-clad vessels, telling why and how they were built and equipped, describing their battles in lively narrative style, and showing their contribution to the Confederate war effort.

Early in the war the enterprising Confederate secretary of the navy, Stephen R. Mallory, decided to offset the numerical superiority of the Union's wooden fleet by building iron-armored warships. In pursuit of this policy "approximately fifty ironclads were laid down or contracted for within the Confederacy, and twenty-two of these were commissioned and placed in operation." More might have been completed had not the Confederate shipbuilding program encountered chronic difficulties, such as shortages of iron and skilled labor, and inadequate transportation. In discussing these troubles, Still draws repetitiously upon Confederate Shipbuilding, reprinting a number of passages almost verbatim.

The ironclads were used mainly for river and harbor defense, and for this purpose Secretary Mallory and his chief naval constructor John L. Porter favored casemated rams with inclined sides designed to deflect projectiles. Modeled after "the prototype Confederate ironclad," the Virginia, these warships were crude in appearance, slow and clumsy, and generally underpowered with inferior engines. Still defends them against critics who have emphasized their "makeshift" qualities. As warships, he argues, they were "potentially formidable," and Union naval commanders feared them. However, his own clear exposition of their defects helps fasten the term "makeshift" in the reader's mind.

His conclusion as to how much the ironclads contributed to the Confederate war effort is judicious. He points out that first the Virginia and later the James River squadron guarded stretches of the James against Union naval forces, that the Albemarle played an important part in the Confederate victory at Plymouth, North Carolina, in the spring of 1864, and that ironclads strengthened the harbor defenses of Savannah, Charleston, Wilmington, and Mobile.

HAL BRIDGES
University of California,
Riverside

DAVID M. JORDAN. Roscoe Conkling of New York: Voice in the Senate. Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1971. Pp. xiii, 464. $15.00.

We have long needed a first-rate biography of Roscoe Conkling, for his political career was important not only to New York but to the nation during the Lincoln, Johnson, Grant, Hayes, Garfield, and Arthur administrations. Frustrated by a lack of relevant manuscripts (Conkling destroyed many of his personal papers), historians have been inclined to take the judgments and generalities of the haughty boss's many enemies at face value, and the result has been less than satisfactory. Donald B. Chidsey published a biography in 1935, but it was none too scholarly, and David M. Jordan labels it "a popular account."

Jordan is a practicing attorney in Pennsylvania who first became interested in Conkling as an undergraduate at Princeton. For a decade he worked, on his days off and vacations, on a full-scale biography of the senator. The product, Jordan's first book, is an often useful but badly flawed work that, unfortunately, by its sheer bulk, may deter scholars from undertaking the thorough study that remains to be done.

The book has strengths. Jordan writes well (though the text is padded to a bewildering degree with common knowledge), he sketches the lives of a good many secondary political figures whose careers have been almost forgotten in recent decades, and he has an extraordinarily sophisticated view of James Garfield. He read widely in secondary sources, traveled to numerous archives, made admirable use of the Utica Public Library, and called attention to the importance of the Alonzo B. Cornell papers. But the volume's errors and faulty interpretations are legion, and one may wonder why the experienced editors at Cornell University Press, if not Jordan, were unable to catch them. Limited space permits mention of but a few.

Jordan's failure to examine New York newspapers in depth caused him virtually to overlook the Conkling machine's tight control of New York City Republicanism from 1871 to 1882. He did not carefully investigate the Phelps-Dodge case or the New York Customhouse controversy, and he badly misconstrues the Conklingite struggle with the Hayes administration. The account of Conkling's flirtation with Tilden during the postelection struggles of 1876 results in confusion. Jordan overlooks the significance of the Conkling-Lamar affair of 1879, and his portrayal of the senator's relationship to Katharine Chase Sprague after 1879 is unconvincing.

Part of the author's difficulties stemmed, apparently, from a hasty reading of documents—such as the Chester Arthur papers in the Library of Congress and the New-York Historical Society. Surely his amateurism hampered his effectiveness. At one point P. R. Levin's Seven by Chance (1948) is employed as documentation; on occasion one is soured by such sentences as: "The basic quality of American life was materially affected by the depression of the seventies" (p. 195). Horace Greeley is compared with Harold Stassen, James G. Blaine with Richard Nixon. And Jordan seems to have learned very little from several books he cites, such as Ari Hoogenboom's important Outlawing the Spoils (1961).

As a whole, this is the better of the two Conkling biographies, but it is hoped that historians will consider the task unfinished.

THOMAS C. REEVES
University of Wisconsin—
Parkside

HOWARD MUMFORD JONES. The Age of Energy: Varieties of American Experience, 1865-1915. New York: Viking Press, 1971. Pp. xix, 545. $12.50.

The Age of Energy attempts to locate a "center" or "leading principle" in the period extending "from the age of Andrew Johnson to the presidency of Woodrow Wilson," an American era that by the author's admission "never really attained either political or cultural unity." Professor Jones's search for the meaning of the "extraordinarily diverse" forces contained within a "tumultuous republic" leads him to the principle of energy that in an extended conceit he applies to the life styles of American entrepreneurs, the restless cosmopolitanism of a new elite, and an aggressive eclecticism in the arts as well as to the creation of material abundance and the robust, unreflective tone of late nineteenth-century politics.

There are both advantages and disadvantages to the concept of energy as an organizing idea, the advantages stemming from its suggestive power and the range it affords the author's insatiable curiosity and lively concern for the cultural fact, whether it be the decor of Gilded Age sporting palaces, the menus of fashionable restaurants catering to gargantuan appetites, or the sudden rash of "How to" books signifying a renewed concern with craftsmanship. Yet if the strengths of Professor Jones's fascinating survey lie in the province of the descriptive, so too do its limitations—in the inevitable imprecision of the concept of energy as it is stretched to cover the bewildering variety of American behavior in these years. Thus to take merely one example, while it may be instructive in a limited sense to consider Walt Whitman and John D. Rockefeller as similar embodiments of the principle of energy, holding like visions of "a happy, wasteless, and plentiful society," the suspicion remains that they were, after all, two very different sensibilities with widely divergent systems of values. Something like this reservation writ large persists and constantly qualifies our assent to the argument—our conviction that variety, multiplicity, and idiosyncrasy ultimately triumph despite the author's case for underlying unity.

These doubts are confirmed when Professor Jones turns to the pragmatic sanction as exemplified in Theodore Roosevelt, the "magnetic center" of the age, subordinating "other and lesser conflicts" within it. The author eschews both the moralistic interpretation of "an age of excess" and the bureaucratic preferences implied in a "search for order." At its deepest level, therefore, The Age of Energy seems a response to personality, to that "amazing gallery" of powerful and picturesque figures—Annie Oakley, Ned Buntline, Adah Isaacs Menken, Daniel Drew, Jim Fisk, John D. Rockefeller, Andrew Carnegie, and Theodore Roosevelt—in whom various forms of energy come to concentrate. What held American society together in these years and supplied its citizens with such great vitality, Professor Jones argues, was the widely shared belief that ultimate meaning is determined by practical consequences and that "you can affirm any two things as good if they 'work' until you find in practice that they cancel each other or that something else or some other pair of opposites 'work' better." The question for the historian, however, is when and, more particularly, how such a handy rationalization occurred to post-Civil War America and whether conceiving of individual choices and decisions as comparable or even contradictory expenditures of energy really illuminates an age.

These questions enmeshed in the central concept of the study are mirrored in the form of the book, which is a series of personal essays or lectures with which Professor Jones has delighted generations of students of American culture. His presence and voice are constant, and what we see most clearly is the process of a vigorous mind at work on unshaped material, asserting and explaining a method, qualifying but making generalizations forcefully, discovering, quoting at length, cataloging, and combining. The result is a kind of "action history" of an intellectual engagement with the scaffolding intentionally left standing. If the final effect is that of a set of "notes toward a definition of culture" rather than a satisfying synthesis, we nevertheless sense that here is much the same sort of energy that the author so admires in the people of the Gilded Age.

JOHN L. THOMAS
Brown University

LAWRENCE D. RICE. The Negro in Texas, 1874-1900. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 1971. Pp. ix, 309. $10.00.

ARLEN L. FOWLER. The Black Infantry in the West, 1869-1891. Foreword by WILLIAM H. LECKIE. (Contributions in Afro-American and African Studies, Number 6. Negro Universities Press Publication.) Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Publishing Corporation. 1971. Pp. xviii, 167. $9.50.

Although both these books deal with Negroes in the West during brief periods of the post-emancipation generation, there is no topical overlapping. They both manifest to some extent the understandable desire of the doctoral candidate to limit his coverage as much as is permissible.

The Rice volume is basically a political history of Negroes in the black belt and major cities of Texas from "Redemption" to the disappearance of the Negro as a political factor, with background attention to his economic, social, and cultural situations—a geographical emphasis that excludes not only Negro soldiers and trail drivers but also the expulsion in 1886 of the entire Negro population of Comanche County. One can sympathize with Dr. Rice's wish to avoid "the labyrinth of the Reconstruction story," but it is difficult to understand the Negro's political situation after "Redemption" without more knowledge than is available of his position during Republican dominance. The Fowler volume, too, does not begin as early as one might expect, inasmuch as black infantry regiments such as the 62nd, the 116th, the 125th, the 38th, and the 41st were represented in Texas, Kansas, and New Mexico prior to 1869. (On the other hand, unless the author intended to do more than refer to a secondary work, it was ill advised to carry the story beyond 1891 to include the grisly and tragic Houston mutiny in 1917 by a battalion of the Twenty-fourth.)

The Negro in Texas is a depressing narrative. The political elimination of the Negro was achieved by measures ranging from economic pressure and the poll tax to expulsion, whipping, and murder. Not until 1966 did a Negro again sit in the Texas legislature. "Jim Crow" coaches were introduced as early as 1866. Although "Texas made greater progress in reducing Negro illiteracy than any other southern state," other cultural and economic developments were not impressive. The discussion of the Negro press might, however, have included mention of Emmett J. Scott, editor of the Texas Freeman, 1894-97, and later Booker T. Washington's confidential secretary. Rice's book contains no illustrations and, inexplicably, no map.

Fowler's volume on the two black infantry regiments, the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth, supplements W. H. Leckie's study of the Negro cavalry in the West (1967). Their role was unspectacular but indispensable. While the dashing Ninth and Tenth Cavalries rode to the relief of beleaguered white troops and struck unexpected blows at hostile camps, the black footsloggers built roads, guarded wagon trains, and garrisoned posts; when they did see action, however, they demonstrated their worth. Their enemies were not merely Indians and outlaws but also "racial prejudice and discrimination." Ironically, it was after the Twenty-fifth was transferred from Texas to the North that it lost two soldiers by lynching. On the other hand, it enjoyed heart-warmingly friendly relations with the people of Missoula, Montana, achieved largely although not entirely through its magnificent regimental band. Two generations later, old-time Missoulians still remember this black regiment with affection and respect.

As contributions to a historical field—the Negro in the West—in which until recently little has been done, both these volumes will prove highly useful. The Rice volume, in particular, also points up how much still remains to be done.

KENNETH WIGGINS PORTER
University of Oregon

KENNETH S. LYNN. William Dean Howells: An American Life. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich. 1971. Pp. 372. $13.95.

A major reason for Professor Lynn's new biography of Howells is to refute the conventional view of Howells as a complacent author writing about the complacent society of late nineteenth-century America. Taking "Leslie Fiedler's scornful characterization of Howells. . . as 'resolutely cheerful, progressive, and sane'" as representative of this critical perspective, Lynn attempts to establish the contradictory view that "actually Howells was suffering . . . from a personal and artistic despair that was every inch as profound as the more celebrated glooms that gripped Henry Adams, Henry James, and Mark Twain. . . . As it did to his three most gifted literary contemporaries, the fin de siècle sometimes seemed to Howells like the end of the world."

But Professor Lynn goes beyond the suggestion that Howells suffered from the despair of his literary contemporaries. He links Howells with the existential despair of all modern men. "Howells," he writes, "was a man of modern sensibility, whose awareness of life was rooted in radical doubt and anxiety. All his life he was afflicted by a sense of aloneness, emptiness, and the precariousness of his personal being. . . . In the climactic psychological breakdown he suffered in the mid-1880's, he was overcome by the feeling that all his life he had been playing roles, and that as an influential man of letters in Boston he was fulfilling an outlander's ferocious ambitions at the cost of cutting himself off from his deepest emotional needs."

Professor Lynn is persuasive in his argument that Howells suffered from "radical doubt and anxiety." His book examines Howells's youth in great detail. He uses this biographical context to illuminate Howells's first great novel of social realism, A Modern Instance. Published in 1881, it revealed Howells's profound sense of alienation as the central American experience. Howells had become a compulsive worker by the time he was an adolescent. He was willing to sacrifice friendships and the family he loved in order to fulfill his ambitions. He made this ruthless search for success the controlling motivation of Bartley Hubbard, the young hero of the novel, who abandons his wife Marcia to become a free man without responsibility in the West. Professor Lynn feels that Howells uses the figure of Marcia to express his insights into the sexual inhibitions and repressions of his America and the peculiar father-daughter relationships that developed out of this sexual situation. For Howells the setting of the novel, the New England town Equity, is representative of the absence of social identity in America that dooms Bartley and Marcia to a life without meaning other than their own selfish instincts.

By the middle of the 1880s Howells was searching for some new sense of social meaning, and he was attracted to the utopianism of Tolstoy. But Lynn finds that while Howells was able to borrow the broad social realism of Tolstoy's War and Peace for his great novel of 1890, A Hazard of New Fortunes, he could not imitate Tolstoy's commitment to peasant life.

For the historian of ideas, the methodological problem of Professor Lynn's book is that while he succeeds in relating the 'ideas in Howells's writings to his biography, he does not relate Howells's biography to American or modern society. Professor Lynn has described Howells's as one of modern existential despair. But Lynn has not defined what he means by modern. Is there a peculiar relationship of the artist to society in the nineteenth century that leads most artists to a sense of existential despair? Does the middle-class family in the nineteenth century tend to create unhealthy personal relationships? Is Howells's sense of a national identity crisis in the 1880s representative of much of the American middle class at that time? Is the American national identity crisis part of a larger crisis of middle-class identity everywhere in modern civilization? The traditional form of the literary biography does not make it possible for the intellectual historian to address himself to questions like these.

DAVID W. NOBLE
University of Minnesota,
Minneapolis

RICHARD W. SCHWARZ. John Harvey Kellogg, M.D. Nashville: Southern Publishing Association. 1970. Pp. 256. $5.95.

This is a straightforward and thorough study of the public life of John Harvey Kellogg (1852-1943), a man of unbelievable talents and energies and a man of tremendous influence on American life. A power in the Seventh Day Adventist Church for about half a century, Kellogg was a well-known and skillful surgeon, a prodigious and popular writer on religious, medical, and popular health topics in journals and books, an innovator and educator in the health fields, a successful public speaker well known in the Chautauqua circuit, a big business man, a philanthropist, and more.

The central theme of his life was what he called "biologic living." This was a tenet that came right out of the Seventh Day Adventist movement, and the movement became the fulcrum from which Kellogg launched his many enterprises. Biologic living entailed a vegetarian diet and abstinence from alcohol, tea, coffee, and cocoa. It included also fresh air, exercise, and cleanliness. The Battle Creek Sanitarium was his monument to these ideas. But most important in the pursuit of his many ideas and fads in the dietary field, Kellogg developed the process of flaking cereal and thus not only was the dry cereal industry of Battle Creek begun (the Kellogg involved in the tremendous expansion of the industry, however, was John's brother, William), but the breakfast habits of the American population were changed. John Kellogg, too, was the inventor of peanut butter and, it is also worth noting, of a mechanical exercise horse.

All of the details are to be found in Dr. Schwarz's book, which, unfortunately, does not provide the student with documentation. Instead he is referred to the dissertation at the University of Michigan upon which this book is based. The reader might find much more convenient the comprehensive list of sources given in Gerald Carson's Cornflake Crusade (1957).

More important, however, is the fact that one does not come away from this book with any sense of understanding the personality of its hero or of the intellectual forces that turned him from a fundamentalist into something of a pantheist and a believer in organic evolution. We are never quite sure how much of Kellogg was showmanship, egotism, and avarice for money or for power and how much was genuine Christianity and humanitarianism, although it must be admitted that such profiles would be difficult to draw. The Kellogg story is, moreover, too often isolated from the main-streams of American life. In short, like Dr. Kellogg's "Protose"—a meat-like vegetable protein food he developed—the book is substantial, interesting, filling, but somehow not quite satisfying.

DAVID L. COWEN
Rutgers University,
New Brunswick

RICHARD D. WALTER. S. Weir Mitchell, M.D.—Neurologist: A Medical Biography. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas. 1970. Pp. viii, 232. $9.75.

Dr. Walter, himself a neurologist on the staff of the UCLA Center for Health Sciences, has written a fourth biography of S. Weir Mitchell, who was certainly the most celebrated and perhaps the most important neurologist and psychiatrist practicing in late nineteenth-century America. The subtitle of this book, "A Medical Biography," helps to clarify its relationship with Anna Burr's Weir Mitchell: His Life and Letters (1929), Ernest Earnest's S. Weir Mitchell: Novelist and Physician (1950), and David Rein's S. Weir Mitchell as a Psychiatric Novelist (1952).

Dr. Walter's introductory statement, which amounts to a description of his biographical methods and purpose, clarifies even further: "the present 'biography' resembles in many respects a volume of collected works. The biographer has served more as an editor, and the frequent quotations and excerpts from the original make this apparent. It is hoped that this direct exposure to Weir Mitchell will prove more interesting and helpful to those training in the fields of neurology, psychiatry, and neurosurgery than the more traditional strategy of paraphrase and pontification." Presumably this "biography" takes its place in a series including Sir William Osler: Aphorisms from His Bedside Teachings and Writings, The Unique Legacy of Doctor Hughlings Jackson, Early Days in the Mayo Clinic, and Garrison's History of Neurology.

Weir Mitchell's reputation was established in 1864 with the publication of Gunshot Wounds and Other Injuries of Nerves, which grew out of his hospital service as a Civil War surgeon. His fame came with the "Rest Cure" in the mid-1870s, and his celebrity was consummated in 1897 with the publication of Hugh Wynne, which Thomas Bailey Aldrich put in tandem with The Scarlet Letter with his pronouncement that they were the "two great American novels."

Mitchell was a strikingly accomplished and versatile man in whom many of the currents and tensions of Victorian America are vividly illustrated. Women's liberation polemicists could have a field day with him (but only by side-stepping the paradox created by the obvious fact that he was eminently successful with his women patients); his series of medical handbooks written for laymen—which are, among other things, commentaries on the social bases of psychic disorder in America—are worthy of monographic study themselves; his test of William Osler with the cherry pits raises intriguing questions about the interrelationship between etiquette and professional performance at a time during which the professionalization of the professions was occurring. That merely begins a list of rich possibilities in Mitchell's life awaiting exploitation by a biographer who wishes to make some splendid triangulations between a man, his milieu, and post-Civil War American society. Should such a biography be written, quite likely it will be as much a study of social ideas and values as an account of medical and literary achievements.

PETER F. WALKER

*University of North Carolina,
Chapel Hill*

- THOMAS PARKE HUGHES. Elmer Sperry: Inventor and Engineer. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press. 1971. Pp. xvii, 348. $15.00.

Professor Hughes's Sperry is not only an intensely interesting study of a highly competent and inventive American engineer, it is also a model of the publisher's art. Both Hughes and the Johns Hopkins Press are to be congratulated upon the excellent way in which both the textual and graphical materials have been presented. The use of a large format with wide margins that have allowed the presentation of notebook pages, patent drawings, letterheads, and other memorabilia illustrating the points being made in the text is a boon to the reader. One of the advantages of the person Sperry was and of the business in which he was engaged, which required tremendous documentation in order to fight patent interference suits, was that he left thousands of letters, sketches, notebooks, and the like. Thus it would be assumed that it would be easy to document his career as inventor, scientist, entrepreneur, and maker of machines, processes, and systems. Even so, Hughes quite often has to use terms such as "about" and "around" in reference even to years because he has not been able to find exact dates.

Elmer Sperry is one of the cluster of Americans produced by the Industrial Revolution who made their names as individuals before specialization and corporate group research and development usurped the field. Sperry lacked a college education, though he attended some lectures at Cornell. But he had an intuitive genius for seeing where the weaknesses in others' ideas lay, for examining patents to see what they did not cover, and for the conception and engineering development to production of his own solutions.

Sperry had one great inherent advantage over his rivals in that he learned early the necessity for feedback, and whether he was controlling electric current for arc lights in the 1880s or auto pilots in the 1920s, many of the same principles were applied. More than this, Sperry was a practical entrepreneur. He developed those ideas for which he could get capital and sold them, taking royalties and consultancies when they were developed. In general his interest in a field lasted about five years, and he moved out as soon as big business moved in.

Students of American history, whether they are in economic, technological, or general history, should read this book for an intimate understanding of the position of the inventor-entrepreneur from 1880 to 1930. They will find that the reason Sperry teamed up with the navy in the development of gyro-stabilizing was not that he was or wanted to be a warmonger, but rather that since the merchant marine was not willing to capitalize research and development, he followed his natural instinct for going where money could be obtained to further the work in which he was interested.

If one can suggest any criticisms of Sperry, they lie in the failure to integrate the story more fully into the general trend of developments in the United States and elsewhere and that the aeronautical terminology is weak, perhaps from being too close to Sperry's notes.

ROBIN HIGHAM

Kansas State University

GLENDON SCHUBERT. The Constitutional Polity. (The Gaspar G. Bacon Lecture on the Constitution of the United States, 1968.) Boston: Boston University Press. 1970. Pp. xviii, 195. $6.50.

This book by Glendon Schubert, a distinguished professor of political science long recognized as the dean of the behavioral school of judicial analysis, well illustrates the advantages and the weaknesses of behaviorism as a technique for studying the Supreme Court. Originally prepared as the 1968 Gaspar G. Bacon Lecture on the Constitution (sponsored by Boston University), the book represents Schubert's synthesis of behaviorist findings on the role of the Supreme Court in policy making since 1921. (Conventional analysis is reluctantly accepted by Schubert wherever the behaviorists have not yet trod.) Schubert devotes separate chapters, each covering the 1921 to 1969 time span, to policy "output," ideological "input," and the responses to Court policy. Inevitably there is considerable overlap and much of the material is familiar, but the book still makes absorbing reading.

Perhaps Schubert's most valuable analysis is on the 1930s. Combining simple calculations with sound historical perspective, he underscores the great divide of 1937. He finds the Court at the commencement of the struggle with the president "every bit as devious and dissimulative" (p. 28, referring to the Hot Oil case) as Roosevelt would be two years later. On the switch in 1937, Schubert quite properly refuses to be taken in (unlike other constitutional authorities) by Roberts's "self-serving memorandum" that attributed his change of vote on the minimum wage cases to a legal technicality. Schubert concludes that all nine of the pre-Black justices, including the "Wilsonian-Progressive" liberal bloc, were too conservative for the unfolding New Deal. Roosevelt's attack on longevity thus had real point to it.

Interesting observations abound in the book, usually based on vote counting in conjunction with astute analysis. Two examples are the chance effect of John H. Clarke's premature resignation in 1922, which deprived the Court of its "very first modern liberal," and the odd consequence of the Frankfurter-Harlan desertion of the liberal bloc in 1959, which left freshman Justice Stewart in the crucial middle position until Frankfurter's retirement in 1962. On the Warren era Schubert is highly favorable, especially to the great period from 1963 to 1969, when the Warren Court gave to many and diverse civil libertarian causes a "degree of favorable support" probably unequalled by any other court in the history of the world.

The basic limitation of Schubert's book (and even more so of behaviorist studies in general, which usually lack Schubert's sense of history) lies in its one-dimensional view of the justices and their work on the Court. By derivation the "input" side of Schubert's mix must be taken with considerable skepticism as a satisfactory explanation of change in the role of the Court.

Scorning on the one hand "legalistic doctrine and opinion verbiage" and similarly patronizing, if more respectful, to the nonquantified scholarship of Alpheus T. Mason, Walton Hamilton, and the like, Schubert stays relentlessly with the typical behavioral categories of liberal and conservative, subdivided into economic and political. Within these categories the justices stand emplaced with their "policy preferences" (little more than Pavlovian responses, it would appear from some behaviorists). That a justice may have a constitutional philosophy that will lead him at times contrary to his policy preferences or that a justice, because he accepts settled law, will indeed vote many times (usually on unanimous issues) contrary to his private wishes are seemingly inconsequential alternatives to Schubert and his school. The analysis makes no pretense of even considering the constitutional legitimacy of a justice's position. He is simply scaled on the chart and his "inconsistent" votes labeled deviations.

I would be the last to deny the influence on a justice's decisions of his result preferences (my own work has certainly emphasized judicial attitudes and values). The broad syndrome of judicial conservatism versus judicial liberalism is clear enough in any term of the Court. Nor has my current association with the lawyer's approach particularly endeared me to professional legalism. But it is impossible to explain Frankfurter without serious consideration of his intellectual convictions in regard to judicial self-restraint—constitutionally wrong, pedantically dogmatic, and ultimately oppressive as I believe they were. And can Harlan be dismissed as simply a low-ranker on the liberal-conservative scale when we consider his skillful sensitivity and occasional decisiveness in such opinions as Yates v. United States (emasculating the conspiracy-to-advocate clause of the Smith Act) and N.A.A.C.P. v. Alabama (protecting the NAACP against state harassment and establishing freedom of association as a viable constitutional right)? One would never guess from Schubert's analysis that justices make constitutional law as well as public policy.

Schubert, of course, does not deny the varied institutional functions of the justices but asserts in the preface that his concern is simply with their input on policy. The result, however, is a grossly skewed view of the Court and the individual justices, the more deplorable since behaviorism is so much the fashion in political science departments.

It is in the consideration of Hugo Black's last years on the Court that Schubert's approach really runs aground. On the positive side, he makes effective use of case-vote compilations to drive home what we all sensed—that Black had sharply plummeted on the liberal-conservative scales. In the 1968 term Black became “the Warren Court's anchorman on civil liberties, dissenting forty-one times (twenty-five of these alone) against the sixty-eight split pro-civil liberties decisions in which he participated” (p. 118). To Schubert this precipitous drop bears the mark of “cultural obsolescence” and “psychophysiological senescence” (sic). Refusing to accept Black's strict constitutional literalism at face value, he accuses Black of shifting his “ideology . . . to remain in touch with his explicit conservative policy goals.” In the course of his indictment, Schubert misstates an important Black opinion (p. 189, n. 52), misinterprets the 1964 sit-in decisions, and describes Black as “leader of the die-hard opposition to the Court's expansive policy of racial egalitarianism” (p. 119). To anyone who has noted Black's powerful language in 1969 as Circuit Justice for the Fifth Circuit when he set the groundwork for Alexander v. Holmes (the Burger Court's decision outlawing “all deliberate speed”), Schubert's charges must seem cruelly unfair.

True it is that Black's innate traditionalism, like that of many another liberal gentleman, quickly surfaced in the mid-1960s in reaction to the shock waves of increasingly militant protest, ghetto rioting, and the dramatic polarizing of generations. Yet even then Black's opinions were still grounded in constitutional formalism (even the Vietnam arm band opinion, painful reading though it is) against a backdrop, it must be remembered, of unprecedented judicial activism. At bottom Schubert's accusations are reduced to a complaint that Black's “policy outputs” were too conservative for the times.

I have other quarrels with the book, such as Schubert's prejudicial treatment of radicalism when he contrasts it to conservatism and liberalism, and his casual labeling of Justice Douglas as a “spokesman for radicalism.” There is no index, no bibliography, no table of cases; and the footnotes are at the back without benefit of page references at the top.

Despite these criticisms, The Constitutional Polity is well worth reading. It has much to say, and in compressed space too, about the Supreme Court since World War I. Schubert's writing is smooth, lucid, taut; even his statistics are handled gracefully. What a shame that so perceptive and mature a scholar should feel bound by the thesis that one must make a measurable science out of human (that is, judicial) behavior.

ARNOLD M. PAUL

Stanford Law School

R. ALAN LAWSON. The Failure of Independent Liberalism, 1930-1941. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1971. Pp. 322. $7.95.

The title of this study does not clarify its contents. It is an intellectual history of a diverse collection of social critics of the 1930s who operated somewhere in the unchartable area between the New Deal and doctrinaire Marxism. Lawson calls his thinkers “independent liberals” (there are ten to twelve major ones, but Lawson does not confine himself to them), and his problems begin at once. The men seem independent enough, but they were certainly not all liberals, even in the broad meaning of the term. Note the leading figures: John Dewey, Lewis Mumford, Howard Odum, Horace Kallen, Louis Adamic, George Soule, Stuart Chase, Alfred Bingham, Lewis Lorwin, Herbert Agar, Allen Tate, Archibald MacLeish, and Waldo

Frank. Lawson grapples resourcefully with their diversity. He discerns a group of "pragmatic rationalists" whose guide was experimental reason and who usually favored some sort of collectivist planning. Then there were the "liberal traditionalists," men who would have preferred a society and social policy that strengthened organic social ties; the latter are further subdivided into "regionalists," such as Mumford, Odum, and the Southern agrarians, and "cultural pluralists," such as Kallen and Adamic. Later Lawson adds the "Great Tradition" spokesmen as another subcategory—men such as MacLeish and Waldo Frank.

I do not, it must be clear, find Lawson's organizing categories successful. Categories and labels multiply until they are often a hindrance, not a help. The book is further fragmented by an episodic organization in which men are analyzed in brief sections, often several times, and there are occasional discussions of the appeal of fascism, literature in the 1930s, the cooperative movement, and other subjects whose relation to the argument is not always clear. Even the word failure does not unify these men, for, as the author admits, they failed only to secure their social goals. Actually, he finds of most of them that they "analyzed cogently, often profoundly, and were not discredited by events."

Despite these flaws, the book is valuable. The intellectuals who remained critics of the dominant liberalism of the 1930s have long needed analysis, and Lawson is a perceptive, thoughtful critic. He has given us our first historical study of the careers of Stuart Chase and George Soule, who were not only impressive social commentators but men of some intellectual influence. Lawson's extended treatments of Dewey and Mumford are substantial contributions. The parts of the book add up to more than the whole, for it was impossible in the end to make a whole out of these careers.

There are no startling conclusions here, but students of the 1930s will be interested to note, for example, the shift in mood and focus that came to all the "independent liberals" after 1936 with the popular endorsement of the New Deal and the approach of war between totalitarian states. At the end of the volume Lawson is discussing Paul Goodman, a characteristic diversion in a pleasantly meandering book. But along the way we have had new insights into some familiar and a few unappreciated intellectuals. The Allan Nevins Prize was granted the book not for its organizational mastery, one assumes, or because it is entirely free of opaque phrase, but for the general gracefulness of its style and the balance of its judgments.

OTIS L. GRAHAM, JR.

*University of California,
Santa Barbara*

CHARLES F. O'BRIEN. Sir William Dawson: A Life in Science and Religion. (Memoirs of the American Philosophical Society, Volume 84.) Philadelphia: the Society. 1971. Pp. vii, 207. $3.00.

John William Dawson is a significant nineteenth-century Canadian geologist, educator, and author worthy of a first-rate biography. Charles F. O'Brien's work is basically an intellectual history treating Dawson as a controversialist. Thus the reader should be forewarned that O'Brien's book, despite its title, is not a detailed account of Dawson's career either in science or religion, but of his participation in several nineteenth-century scientific and religious controversies. The disputes considered are geology and Genesis, polygenism, evolution, the Eozoön controversy, and the issue of continental glaciers versus icebergs in accounting for the effects of glaciation. With the exception of the last issue, O'Brien views these disputes as having a rational connection to Dawson's overriding interest in combating evolution and in presenting "his Paleyite approach to science." And O'Brien notes with appropriate insight that "the key to Dawson's career as a controversialist was his use of Canadian materials to enter the mainstream of nineteenth-century controversy." In sum, O'Brien shows an understanding of the complex scientific and religious issues in dispute and traces with care Dawson's and his opponents' views. The result is a contribution to the history of science.

In justifying his study, O'Brien maintains that Dawson's "historical relevance in carrying on the search for a synthesis of the two theologies—natural and revealed—is much greater than his contributions to either education or natural science." One has the feeling that the wish is father to the thought, and the evidence presented or omitted nourishes a skepticism of O'Brien's thesis. While one may portray Dawson as a man applying a keen mind to a losing cause, the resulting portrait is unfinished. To diminish his contributions to geology in general and paleobotany in particular, to slight his administrative abilities and successes in the development of McGill University, and to treat less significantly his share of professional scientific honors—a not unreliable indication of his scientific reputation—requires further reflection upon Dawson's historical importance.

In his "Notes on the Sources," O'Brien wisely recognizes the quality of A. Hunter Dupree's Gray and Edward Lurie's Agassiz; it is to be lamented that he did not follow that tradition in providing a well-defined portrait of Dawson.

WALTER L. BERG

Central Washington State College

DARCY RIBEIRO. The Americas and Civilization. Translated from the Portuguese by LINTON LOMAS BARRETT and MARIE MCDAVID BARRETT. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company. 1971. Pp. 510. $15.75.

Darcy Ribeiro, a Brazilian anthropologist, might better have entitled this book Latin America: Victim of Imperialism. Decked out in the traditional trappings of scholarship (footnotes, bibliography, and scatterings of social science jargon), the work presents a politically partisan attack rather than a scholarly analysis. Using a historical approach within a Marxian ideological framework, the author sets out to investigate the causes of the material progress of the United States and the economic backwardness of Latin America. He concludes that imperialism is the sole cause. Even historians who subscribe to such a simplified view are likely to be disappointed in Ribeiro's ineffectual attempts at historical proof.

The general tone of the study is quickly set in the portrait of Iberian civilization, which is described in the crudest terms of the Black Legend. "Terrorism," "oppression," "torture," "salvationistic fanaticism," and "plunder" are typical of the terms applied by Ribeiro to the Latin American colonial regimes. The author's credibility in the field of history may possibly be measured by his charge that "viruses, bacilli, and germs" were used as "one of the decisive weapons of the conquest."

The wicked empires of Spain and Portugal are contrasted to the benign imperial constructions of the Aztecs and the Incas. The author glosses over the bloody and forceful processes of Indian imperialism and would have us believe that these theocratic empires "crystallized." Slavery and serfdom in Aztec society, so obnoxious to Ribeiro in Europe, are depicted as merely parts of a "stratified social structure." The practice of human sacrifice on a lavish scale is passed off as part of a world conception in which the Aztecs were supporters of "life and prosperity for all." The author's failure to mention the Inca custom of mitima or mitimaes, by which large population groups were uprooted and moved hundreds of miles for the convenience of the empire, is curious in the light of his denunciation of European nations for allegedly using colonists as human cattle. Obviously a double standard is applied in the judgment of European and Indian empires.

The depiction of Anglo-American history in this work is an outlandish caricature that abounds in factual errors and naive interpretations. To cite only a few egregious examples, Ribeiro states that English colonists came to America because they were displaced by the expansion of cattle raising; independence was "won as a project of whites of the north, splitting the nation . . . in the fight to abolish slavery"; and the Founding Fathers, during the American Revolution, sought to monopolize the colonial exploitation of Latin America. Since the early days of nationhood, we are told, the United States has engaged in an international plot to retard the development of the rest of the hemisphere. The current feeble policy of the United States of fostering world population control is seen by Ribeiro as a sinister "power policy aimed at continuing the dependence of Latin America."

Those interested in a serious, scholarly treatment of the negative influences of imperialism on Latin America will be well advised to look elsewhere. The writings of Victor Raúl Haya de la Torre and Manuel Ugarte are more informative in many respects on the subject of imperialism. The chief utility of Ribeiro's study lies in its contemporary presentation of the anti-imperialist views of the political Left in Latin America.

MARK J. VAN AKEN
California State College,
Hayward

NORMAN NEWTON. Thomas Gage in Spanish America. (Great Travellers.) New York: Barnes and Noble. 1969. Pp. 214. $4.75.

Thomas Gage's perceptive but malicious description of life in seventeenth-century Spanish America was, and still is, controversial. To read it judiciously, one must know the author well, and Norman Newton's book is adequate for this purpose. However, it is no substitute for Gage's original The English-American: His Travail by Sea and Land (1648), nor for its scholarly versions edited by Arthur P. Newton (1928) and J. Eric S. Thompson (1958). Rather, this is a popularization, an artful paraphrase and condensation of the original text flavored with a few direct quotations and extended with additional information on Gage and his milieu.

In this treatment the protagonist emerges as something of a scoundrel. Although trained by the Jesuits, Gage became a Dominican; having volunteered for missionary work in the Spanish Philippines, he deserted on reaching Mexico and fled to Guatemala. There, first as a college teacher and then as an Indian village priest, he amassed a tidy fortune in twelve years, but during his unauthorized return to England in 1637, he lost it all to pirates. In troubled England he renounced his Roman Catholic religion and then his Anglican faith. Espousing the Puritan cause and conspiring against his Catholic family and friends, he published his vindictive travel memoirs (as propaganda for Oliver Cromwell's "Western Design"), and served as a chaplain in the English conquest of Spanish Jamaica in 1655. There he died the following year.

Newton makes no attempt to whitewash Gage's unsavory acts, but neither does he accept the persistent allegation that Gage, while serving as a friar in the Spanish colonies, was actually a spy for the English government.

MAX L. MOORHEAD
University of Oklahoma

CELSE FURTADO. Economic Development of Latin America: A Survey from Colonial Times to the Cuban Revolution. Translated by SUZETTE MACEDO. (Cambridge Latin American Studies, Number 8.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 1970. Pp. xvi, 271. Cloth $10.50, paper $2.45.

Celso Furtado is one of a small group of Latin American economists with a substantial academic reputation in and beyond Latin America who have held important policy-making positions and whose writings have been widely circulated in English. His best known monograph—at least to historians—is The Economic Growth of Brazil: A Survey from Colonial to Modern Times (1963). The similarity in the subtitles of this work and the book under review requires comment because in contrast to the Brazilian study, this book is not a survey in any historical sense. The colonial period is disposed of in pages 8–18 and the nineteenth century is covered in the following fifteen pages. The remaining 260 pages of text deal with the twentieth century, effectively with the years since 1929. A sense of the past as an integral part of the present, however, pervades the whole study, and so in introducing topics such as agrarian reform or the Cuban Revolution, Furtado provides succinct and provocative summaries of past events designed to explain why things now happen as they do and how the past conditions present-day political responses to economic pressures.

Furtado is the most prolific and one of the more persuasive proponents of the position that effective analysis of development requires special formulations to fit various historic processes if it is to be precise and pertinent. The past, however, can be viewed differently by economists as well as by historians. His readable expository style as translated by Suzette Macedo makes it possible for the noneconomist to bring Furtado's vision easily into focus. The obvious danger is that such a person might accept his arguments without any awareness of alternative economic approaches to the situation. His is a historically informed and rationally ordered, if somewhat evangelical, mind at work—the founding rock of the church in this instance being the Economic Commission for Latin America.

The gospel of this text is that external forces are primarily responsible for the dependent state of Latin America's economy and that national planning must be in response to this situation. A few of the many examples cited in their specific national and regional historical context are unfavorable terms of trade for agricultural and mineral exports; the extent to which such traditional exports inhibit the capacity for innovation and reduce land ownership to a mechanism for extracting a surplus from an economy with a low level of production rather than serving as a basis for organizing agricultural production; inelasticity of market; import-substitution limited to nondurable goods; the braking effect of the gold standard and the structure of international finance because of the high volume of foreign exchange reserve required; the difficulties in developing technological competence as new industries are simply local subsidiaries of international groups, mainly North American; and a new and complex form of dependence on the outside world through the growing use of international credit agencies such as the World Bank as financial intermediaries for national governments. The variations in national situations are drawn from the cases of Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, and Mexico and after 1950, Venezuela and Peru.

One does not have to accept the theoretical validity of Furtado's position, but one would be ill advised to attempt an understanding of what is taking place in most Latin American nations today without a comprehension of his vision of the "wide process of social change as seen in the context of historical reality." It is more fully available in this book than in any of his earlier essays.

JOHN P. HARRISON
University of Miami,
Coral Gables

FREDERICK C. TURNER. Catholicism and Political Development in Latin America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1971. Pp. xv, 272. $8.75.

Since Fidel Castro came to power, the social and economic crises that afflict most of Latin America have aroused expressions of concern among some of the region's lay and clerical Catholic leaders. Professor Turner's book examines and vigorously applauds these newly emerging patterns of Catholic thought. According to Turner, who has assembled an impressive array of interviews, pastoral messages, and periodical articles to buttress his case, increasingly numerous and influential elements within the laity and the clergy have reoriented their goals and are calling for an activist, socially concerned Church that encourages participation in reformist political movements. Although he admits that powerful traditionalist elements oppose the reformers, he hypothesizes that already between one-fifth and one-third of the clergy is "progressive," and he is cautiously optimistic that reform trends will continue. Eduardo Frei, Christian Democratic president of Chile between 1964 and 1970, becomes for Turner a model of what concerned Catholic laymen can achieve. United States foreign policy, we are advised, ought discreetly to throw strong support to progressive Catholic political groups that achieve power.

The book is packed with worthwhile anecdotes and interesting information, much of it new. Career sketches of reform leaders like Father Camilo Torres and Archbishop Hélder Câmara, along with illuminating analyses of the Church's accommodations with authoritarian political leaders ranging from Stroessner in Paraguay to Castro in Cuba, make for lively reading. The book may achieve one of the author's goals, to stimulate public attention in the United States to the changes taking place within Latin American Catholicism. But Turner, in my judgment, does not prove his case that the reformers represent the wave of the future. The book unfortunately avoids studying the exercise of power within the hierarchical and bureaucratized Latin Churches. The seemingly endless quotes from progressive Catholic intellectuals that the author employs hardly add up to a convincing argument that the hierarchy in most countries is willing to make basic policy changes. Turner apparently hopes that an aroused laity will eventually force the leadership to change course, but the book's lack of empirical evidence as well as its strong reliance on the probably unique Chilean case weaken the argument. As Turner himself admits, we need much empirical research on Latin American Catholicism.

CARL SOLBERG
University of Washington

HUGH THOMAS. Cuba: The Pursuit of Freedom. New York: Harper and Row. 1971. Pp. xxiv, 1696. $20.00.

This is a remarkable book—all 1,700 pages, 116 chapters, and 14 appendixes, 11 “books,” an epilogue, and five and a half pounds of it. It is not simply that it is monumental, virtually encyclopedic; it can also be fairly described as balanced, thoroughly researched, and insightful. For the narrative of the decade from 1952 to 1962 it might be considered definitive.

The author characterizes his own study: “Half of it, plainly, is history; but in the second half I enter upon contemporary politics, and by the time the Revolution of 1959 is reached I am in a no-man’s-land between history, politics, sociology and journalism.” In a more Orthodox way Thomas has set himself the task of presenting the two centuries between the British capture of Havana in 1762 and the missile crisis of 1962. The post-1962 years are treated more summarily in the epilogue, and narrative is secondary to analysis.

The initial date of 1762 is more defensible than the terminal one of 1962. Prior to 1762 Cuba had been largely stagnant; after the British withdrawal in 1763 as part of the general settlements of that year, conditions in Cuba were never really the same, even during the next century of seemingly solid Spanish control. But to end the study, in effect, with the resolution of the missile crisis is unfortunate. Granted that October 1962 was a crisis point, the author’s sources for the next half dozen years must have been virtually as good as for the preceding half dozen and, recognizing the author’s wariness of trying to write “recent history,” it still would have been most useful to have his same detailed treatment of the rest of the 1960s.

Professor Thomas (of the University of Reading) has consulted an amazingly wide variety of sources; much of the account of the 1960s is drawn from personal contacts made on a number of trips to Cuba. In very skillful fashion he weaves together, on an almost day-to-day basis for critical periods, the tangled skein of developments.

Thomas rigorously excludes incidental value judgments, so often introduced even unconsciously by writers on controversial topics in their choice of adjectives, their introduction of casual laudatory or critical phrases, and in other ways. In certain chapters or parts of chapters, of course, he designedly enters into analysis and evaluation and in them he does not hesitate to speak his mind. Perhaps one of the severest tests of the objectivity of any writer on contemporary Cuba is how he deals with Fidel Castro. In general Thomas goes right down the middle, viewing the líder máximo neither through the rose-tinted glasses usually worn by Herbert Matthews nor with the passionate and pathetic hostility of, for example, Manuel Urrutia. His stance as an Englishman adds to his objectivity.

For the most part the study is oriented toward political developments, but occasional chapters digress to deal with social organization (in both a broad and a narrow sense), economic problems and activities, the cultural and literary scene, and other matters. The appendixes introduce a wide variety of materials of genealogical, ethnological, statistical, anecdotal, and other sorts. Useful capsule biographical information about some of the lesser actors in the marathon unfolding is occasionally included in the meticulous footnoting.

In not too obtrusive fashion Thomas deals from time to time with the problem of his volume subtitle, the Cuban pursuit of freedom. In his concluding pages, for example, he says: “Yet the obsession with freedom creates its own bondage, and is there not doubt whether in any real sense even Castro is a free man? He imposes his personality on Cuba but, like all Cuban rulers, he is at the mercy of the sugar markets as of the twenty-year relative stagnation in the Cuban economy which he has not arrested. In part, too, he is the creation of the dreams of Cubans for a revolutionary leader of epic stature, just as he is the articulate expression of a nation whose ‘authentic qualities’ include what is usually known as ‘gaiety.’ . . . The long shadows of past habits stretch across the most radical reforms, either blacking them out or giving them quite different colours.”

This study goes far toward clarifying the colors in the confused kaleidoscope that is contemporary Cuba.

RUSSELL H. FITZGIBBON
University of California,
Santa Barbara

FRANKLIN W. KNIGHT. Slave Society in Cuba during the Nineteenth Century. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press. 1970. Pp. xxi, 228. $10.00.

The hypothesis that slavery in the Iberian colonies was more humane than that of the Anglo-Saxon colonies and countries was given scholarly repute by Frank Tannenbaum in his book, Slave and Citizen: The Negro in the Americas (1946). Later writers developed the Tannenbaum thesis, including Herbert S. Klein who produced a book, Slavery in the Americas: A Comparative Study of Virginia and Cuba (1967). Contrasted with the arbitrary power of slaveowners in Virginia, Klein contends that Cuban master-slave relations were tempered by the intervention of priests and public officials. Moreover, he points to urbanization and agrarian diversification as factors influencing the lighter work load of slaves in Cuba compared with those in Virginia.

Franklin Knight has marshaled literary and statistical evidence that clearly modifies the Tannenbaum-Klein thesis as it pertains to Cuba in the nineteenth century. He finds that a high proportion of the slaves were rural and attached to sugar plantations, that a new slave-owning class emerged that was hostile toward the humanitarian attitude of Church and state, that the practice of manumission declined as the demand for labor increased, and that slave codes were not enforced. Overwork and underfeeding made the slaves susceptible to disease and premature death. Most damning to the myth of humane treatment was the net rate of slave population decrease, which ranged from three to five per cent per annum in the middle decades of the nineteenth century.

Sugar and slavery have had a centuries-long relationship whereby great wealth has accrued to Europeans and North Americans who combined their skills and capital with imported labor on tropical plantations. On successive frontiers the factories and cane fields have used up the labor of millions of Africans who were often cheaper to buy from the slavers than to breed by means of humane treatment by their masters. As a West Indian himself, Franklin Knight rightly contends that comparative study of slave systems should consider both the nature of the slave society and the fact of the sugar revolution. Moreover, he faults earlier writers whose comparative studies of slavery neglect equivalent stages of economic and social growth and exaggerate the influence of metropolitan institutional differences.

I find a few faults in the book, though they are minor in the light of the important contribution it makes. Plantation agriculture in Cuba was not distinctive with respect to technical innovation. While it is true that Cuban planters invested in railroads and steam factories, planters elsewhere in the Caribbean had earlier been technologically progressive in adopting windmills, watermills, and irrigation systems. Since the mechanization of sugar processing coexisted with hand labor in cane cultivation and harvesting, it is difficult to follow Knight in his contention that the demise of slavery was caused in large part by the revolution in the manufacture of sugar. More important to the demise was the substitution of cheap indentured laborers from China and India.

RICHARD B. SHERIDAN
University of Kansas

D. A. BRADING. Miners and Merchants in Bourbon Mexico, 1763-1810. (Cambridge Latin American Studies, Number 10.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 1971. Pp. xvii, 382. $16.50.

Armed with the methodology of the social scientist, many young scholars of late have revisited colonial Hispanic America with profit. Dr. Brading is one of them. His book on Bourbon Mexico is an exhaustive effort based almost entirely upon Spanish and Mexican documentation.

The author's purpose was to define this crucial period in both human and economic terms. As his vehicle he chose three autonomous studies: first, "Revolution in Government," in which he presents the background and evaluates such factors as the visitation of José de Gálvez (1765-71), the expulsion of the Jesuits (1767), and the Bourbon reforms; second, "Miners and Merchants," in which he analyzes their origins, activities, and institutions; and third, a detailed examination of the prosperous Guanajuato mines and community. He expertly uses notary records, petitions, genealogy, production figures, and numerous tables and graphs, many of which are reproduced and discussed in the text. His conclusions are sound and convincing.

Guanajuato's remarkable productivity resulted from the Bourbon reforms and incentives, the availability of merchant capital in the late 1780s, the miners guild (1783), and the investment skills of the entrepreneurs. Dr. Brading's analysis of Mexican society is another rewarding feature of this work as he traces the emergence of a new, aggressive elite consisting of immigrants from northern Spain. Favored by the government and relatives in Mexico, these moral and hard-working Spaniards soon reached the top of the economic structure and consolidated their position in society by marriages to Creole women, by purchases of haciendas that they entailed, and by securing titles of nobility. Unable to compete, Creole men suffered accordingly. The situation worsened in the days before independence.

The Guanajuato study is unquestionably an outstanding contribution. The earlier sections, however, are merely exploratory. By opting to concentrate on structures rather than the operational aspects of reform, the author limited the validity of his conclusions. Moreover, the emphasis upon central Mexico and the neglect of outlying zones—the Consulados of Guadalajara and Vera Cruz, for example—ignored a comparative element in what was also Bourbon Mexico. Considering the importance of contraband elsewhere in Spanish America, it is likewise difficult to believe that it played no substantial role in New Spain. Let us hope that Dr. Brading will continue to develop the first two themes so that they may reach the level of his excellent work on the mining community of Guanajuato.

MARIO RODRÍGUEZ

George Washington University

JAN BAZANT. Los bienes de la Iglesia en México (1856-1875): Aspectos económicos y sociales de la Revolución liberal. (Centro de Estudios Históricos, New Series, Number 13.) [México, D. F.:] Colegio de México. 1971. Pp. xiii, 364.

JAN BAZANT. Alienation of Church Wealth in Mexico: Social and Economic Aspects of the Liberal Revolution, 1856-1875. Edited and translated by MICHAEL P. COSTELOE. (Cambridge Latin American Studies, Number 11.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 1971. Pp. xvi, 332. $17.50.

Serious work on the material resources of the Catholic Church in nineteenth-century Mexico is now well under way. The present study is so far the most ambitious and adds significantly to the research of Michael Costeloe (Bazant's English translator), Charles Berry, and Robert Knowlton. Bazant has not, however, written the definitive study on Church wealth, as he readily admits. His investigation did not encompass the whole of Mexico, and he did not utilize all the major resources available, for example, the diocesan archives in the areas covered. Furthermore his economic analysis is open to question because he fails to establish a solid basis for computing the market value of property. Finally, his acceptance of certain statistics—for example, that there were 3,066 houses in Puebla for a population of 70,000 and 4,000 in Mexico City for a population of 200,000—casts doubt upon the conclusion that the Church controlled about half the real estate in these two cities. Some questions, of course, may never be answered with any precision either because of the destruction of relevant records or because of inaccurate or incomplete data from the beginning.

Bazant has settled in a general way some of the arguments raised in the bitter polemics that have raged for over a century between clericals and anticlericals. First, his best estimate of the value of all Church real estate and mortgages is between seventy and eighty million pesos (in contemporary not present-day currency). This is a far cry from the oft-repeated claim that the Church owned one-half of the wealth in Mexico, even if we accept the extraordinarily low estimate of 340 million pesos as the value of all real estate in Mexico in 1870. On the other hand the official method of computing the value of Church holdings by capitalizing the rents and the interest payments on mortgages at five per cent may well under-value the properties. Whatever their value Church holdings were divided approximately five-sixths in urban property and only one-sixth in rural.

Second, the Ley Lerdo of 1856, which required the Church to sell its real estate but permitted it to hold the mortgages, and the expropriation law of 1859 had their roots in Mexican history both in the colonial and the national periods. In a sense the laws on Church property of the Reforma period are a culmination of historical precedents, not a sharp break with the past. Conservative as well as Liberal governments sought to acquire Church property to pay their debts in the years prior to the nationalization in 1859. The primary difference was that the Church parted cautiously but willingly with its property to the Conservatives and most unwillingly to the Liberals; but part with it she did. Ironically Conservatives (as well as Liberals) acquired Church properties during the 1850s and 1860s, became committed to the changes, and refused to consider returning the properties to the Church under any circumstance.

Finally, while vast amounts of property fell into relatively few hands (businessmen, professionals, government officials, and landowners), a substantial number of modest-income families did gain possession of their residences. Rural property largely fell to the already wealthy, and while foreigners got possession of a substantial amount of urban property they obtained almost no haciendas. Certainly a rural middle class was not created as the Liberals hoped it would be. The national treasury profited only marginally from the expropriations, largely because the government of Juárez was hard pressed for funds to fight first a civil war against domestic enemies and then against the French invaders. Under these difficult circumstances, property was at times sold off for less than three per cent of its assessed value.

The English version is a faithful translation of the original and basically parallels it except for some minor alterations. Appendix 1 in the original is included in the introduction of the English translation and four other appendixes are omitted since they have already appeared in English. There are also a fair number of changes in the bibliography and some rather substantial alterations in the English preface, which, however, is signed by Bazant.

This is a major work. It is not easy to read, especially for laymen unversed in banking, finance, and mortgage contracts. Its organization and style leave much to be desired, but its findings are often fascinating and its conclusions provocative.

KARL M. SCHMITT
University of Texas,
Austin

PAUL FRIEDRICH. Agrarian Revolt in a Mexican Village. (Anthropology of Modern Societies Series.) Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall. 1970. Pp. xvi, 158. Cloth $5.95, paper $3.25.

ROGER D. HANSEN. The Politics of Mexican Development. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press. 1971. Pp. xiii, 267. $11.00.

CLARK W. REYNOLDS. The Mexican Economy: Twentieth-Century Structure and Growth. (Publication of the Economic Growth Center, Yale University.) New Haven: Yale University Press. 1970. Pp. xxiv, 468. $13.50.

The three books under review admirably demonstrate the improvement of social science research on Latin American topics that took place during the 1960s. The professional backgrounds of the authors are varied: Friedrich is an anthropologist, Hansen is (presumably) a political scientist, and Reynolds is an economist. Yet, all contribute in ways appropriate to their disciplines to a more sophisticated understanding of twentieth-century Mexican history.

Professor Friedrich's work is surely innovative among anthropological studies of Mexico. Departing from the tradition of community studies (engendered decades ago by the Chicago school of urban sociology) he explores the making of a revolutionary, Primo Tapia. In the process he calls attention to the peculiar importance of living in the United States for the returned Mexican immigrant and the exigencies of race and class conflict in the making of a revolution.

Primo Tapia led the agrarian revolt in his native village in the 1920s and achieved the goal of returning a Spanish-owned hacienda to community control in 1926—not long before his assassination by government troops. Two aspects of his personal experience were of major importance in his preparation for revolutionary leadership: his attitude toward authority and his experience with anarcho-sindicalism and the Wobblies in the U.S. As Friedrich puts it, "Primo had strong hatreds. The positive struggle for the fertile black soil was complemented by unmitigated hostility against the Catholic clergy, the Spanish landlords, and the entire network of exploiters, that is, against all who were not impoverished peasants, industrial workers, or their representatives. . . . His hostility toward authority and his learning of anarchist theory partly meshed with the vigorous local autonomy for which the Tarascans are renowned and for which the Naranjeños are particularly conspicuous" (pp. 74-75). Tapia imbibed anarcho-syndicalism among the Wobblies of California and in 1920 even led a strike against a beet sugar refinery in the state of Nebraska. His training for revolution thus came in the U.S. During the agrarian revolt itself he succeeded in uniting poor mestizos in the neighborhood to the cause of his fellow Tarascans. He was then instrumental in turning a race conflict between mestizos and Indians into a class conflict between the large landholders and the landless, Indian or white. These aspects alone of Friedrich's study should encourage historians of the United States to examine his findings. This book should prove useful to those who seek to learn more (and to convey to their students) a better sense of the relationship between the U.S. and Mexicans.

More topical perhaps is Hansen's study of policy making for economic development. It seems an excellent summary and critique of the extant literature on the subject, and it correctly emphasizes the central problem of Mexico's economic success story: who gets (or got) what? One of his chapters is appropriately titled "The PRI and Mexican Politics: La Cosa Nuestra." Some readers will be disappointed by Hansen's reliance on already well-known secondary sources and may well ask what, if anything, is new in his book. However, they also serve who only synthesize.

Perhaps the more striking synthesis (as well as much more) is that achieved by Reynolds in his investigation of Mexican economic history in the twentieth century. It is difficult to imagine a major development problem that this author has not treated in his work. Thus one attaches considerable weight to his conclusion that "it is difficult to see how an alternative mixture of public policies could have increased the rate of growth or substantially improved the level of income of all sectors of the population since 1940, and it is easy to imagine how more extreme measures might have retarded the growth rate" (p. 310). The agrarian revolution of the pre-1940 period and, more important, the creation of the ethos of revolution were a necessary prelude to the rapid growth of urban activities and the highly efficient plantation agriculture of the North and Northwest.

Reynolds suggests that this "attitudinal" factor may explain up to forty-five per cent of Mexican economic growth in the years between 1925 and 1960 (p. 56). Agrarian reform returned some land to the tiller, moderated the rate of cityward migration, and turned the attention of the poor away from the growing wealth of the rich. The extraordinary economic growth of the past quarter century (exceeded only by Japan and some European countries) may not have been possible had the fruits of growth been more equally distributed.

WILLIAM P. MCGREEVEY
Washington, D. C.

ISAAC S. and SUZANNE A. EMMANUEL. History of the Jews of the Netherlands Antilles. Volume 1, History; Volume 2, Appendices. Cincinnati: American Jewish Archives; distrib. by Ktav Publishing House, New York. 1970. Pp. 533; 539-1165. $35.00 the set.

Curaçao, captured by Holland in 1634, became the New World haven for Sephardic Jews. Jewish merchants aided the island's development, achieving prominence in the eighteenth century when their 280 families comprised half of the white population. The "Portuguese Jewish Nation" of Curaçao functioned as a separate estate controlled by wealthy congregation trustees. Since their decisions were enforceable by civil authorities, trustee authoritarianism often aggravated intra-Jewish tensions and, after equal civil status had been obtained, finally resulted in the schism of 1864. Since then Curaçao Jewry has declined in importance and religious zeal. Such is the focus of History of the Jews of the Netherlands Antilles, which, belying its title, is actually a study of Curaçao's Sephardic Congregation Mikveh Israel, the oldest in the Western Hemisphere.

Dr. Isaac S. Emmanuel served as rabbi in Curaçao where he wrote Precious Stones of the Jews of Curaçao (1957), a masterful study of twenty-five hundred tombstones patterned after his genealogical research in Salonika. His latest handsomely illustrated effort is based on exhaustive archival research in Curaçao and Holland that provides an insight into the problems faced by small Jewish enclaves everywhere. Its wealth of detail would do justice to many larger Jewish communities. Some of the appendixes—marriages and Curaçao expatriates, for example—furnish extremely useful data. Yet Emmanuel's work suffers in historical craftsmanship, probably because he attempts to narrate general as well as institutional history in the setting of a reference work. His inclusive approach to history emphasizes documentation over interpretation, cases rather than trends. The result is uneven and haphazard, with disjointed chapter development and blurred criteria in the selection of materials for the two separate volumes. Critical relationships, such as that of climate to occupation or invasion to foreign policy, are drawn sketchily if at all. Also missing are useful maps, population charts, and coinage tables. The index (4,400 items) concentrates on family names, while the bibliography unfortunately foregoes secondary sources. Emmanuel mistakenly assumes his reader's knowledge of Curaçao and Judaism. Several introductory chapters to provide that kind of background would have greatly enhanced the significance and clarity of this history.

Dr. Emmanuel's book is uncommonly candid for ethnic history. The various altercations he describes furnish the most readable sections. However, contradictions concerning the importance of the Jews to Curaçao or their relationships with Gentiles do appear. Furthermore the author is not entirely forthright with regard to mulattoes descended from Jews, who did have an advantaged position. Censorship by the trustees may have been responsible for some omissions, particularly where the 1964 merger of the reform and traditional communities are concerned. Emmanuel was visibly saddened when "the elegant, lucid Sephardic rite" was replaced by "irrelevant Reconstructionism," a substitution that, he maintains, will not stem the tide of Jewish assimilation in Curaçao.

BERNARD D. ANSEL
State University College,
Buffalo

GERMÁN COLMENARES. La provincia de Tunja en el Nuevo Reino de Granada: Ensayo de historia social (1539-1800). Appendices transcribed by MARÍA CRISTINA MURILLO. Bogotá: Universidad de los Andes, Facultad de Artes y Ciencias, Departamento de Historia. 1970. Pp. 283.

This is one of a series of archivally based monographs on colonial New Granada now being produced by a small number of able young Colombian historians of modern orientation. The emergence of this new generation represents an important development in Colombian historiography. Previous Colombian scholars had toiled through the archives, but the work now being done is more fruitfully informed by the concerns, methods, and interpretive insights of the most sophisticated and innovative social historians now working on colonial Spanish America.

Colmenares's monograph on Tunja is a preliminary exploration, more of a report from the archives than a finished work. It has interesting ideas throughout but lacks an integrating structure. Some material that may be useful to future historians is not placed at the service of an interpretive point. The work is not pulled together even in a formal sense: the chapters lack unifying introductory and concluding paragraphs; nor is there a general conclusion at the end. This is in contrast with Colmenares's sprightly book on mid-nineteenth century politics, Partidos políticos y clases sociales (1969), a work more in the traditional literary mode but one of structure and confidently asserted interpretation. While less satisfying esthetically, Colmenares's current tentativeness does reflect a greater sobriety in confronting the complexities of social analysis in a field in which data is still very sparse.

The Tunja monograph discusses sketchily aspects of Indian social, economic, and religious organization before and immediately after the Spanish Conquest. Later sections provide a more substantial treatment of Indian demographic decline and the process of mestizaje, the evolution of Indian tribute and other forms of colonial labor exploitation, and the constriction of Indian community lands. On each of these subjects Colmenares's findings correspond closely to those of his acknowledged mentors working on other parts of Spanish America—most notably those of Woodrow W. Borah, Charles Gibson, Rolando Mellafe, and James Lockhart. But while Colmenares incorporates perceptions from the better works on colonial society, he also displays his own very active historical imagination. He follows Lockhart, for example, in emphasizing the urban centeredness of the European population in the sixteenth century. To this he adds the point that mestizaje is primarily an urban phenomenon, with mestizos forced out of the urban centers by Creole exclusivism, thereby coming to dominate the rural world of the Indian.

In the tricky field of historical demography, Colmenares is suitably cautious. He is sensibly skeptical of the reliability of visita figures, and he entirely avoids the problem of the size of the pre-Conquest population, considering it insoluble. Following the Colombian examples of Jaime Jaramillo Uribe and Juan Friede, he discriminates among tribute data from different regions and time periods. In his analysis of demographic decline, Colmenares emphasizes the role of Spanish labor requirements in limiting sexual contacts among the Indian population. He follows Mellafe in noting a decreasing proportion of tributaries in the Indian population, which he sees as indicating a disintegration of the family as adult males migrated to escape tribute obligations.

While this monograph does not tie all of its material into neat interpretive bundles, it is a useful and informative effort in an area in which very little research has been done.

FRANK R. SAFFORD
Northwestern University

E. BRADFORD BURNS. A History of Brazil. (Institute of Latin American Studies, Columbia University.) New York: Columbia University Press. 1970. Pp. xii, 449. $11.95.

This substantial text on Brazilian history joins two previous works by the author, A Documentary History of Brazil (1966) and Perspectives on Brazilian History (1967), to form a teacher's trilogy on that insufficiently studied giant of the Americas. In his introductory remarks Professor Burns promises a new approach to Brazil by means of thematic studies emphasizing the role of the masses. Readers will discover, however, that A History of Brazil provides them instead with a traditional political chronology into which intellectual, economic, and social threads frequently and effectively are woven. As a result this work will serve admirably as a useful reference work on Brazilian history or as a textbook for Brazilian history courses; it is unlikely to engage or arouse the casual reader or the uncommitted student.

Unfortunately the first chapter lacks the occasional drama and skillful organization the author brings to subsequent sections. An effective sketch of Indian and European backgrounds makes up somewhat for an uninspired geographical description, but as a whole this chapter seems lost under a mass of detail. Such an impression only receives reinforcement from two unimaginative and amateurish maps on states and rivers that reflect little credit on Columbia University Press designers.

Professor Burns displays his considerable knowledge of Brazilian history in a far more attractive and convincing fashion in the remaining six chapters. The colonial experience emerges against the backdrop of world events and shows the mutually self-reinforcing nature of Brazilian and Portuguese development. The independence section starts with the ideas of the Enlightenment, although too soon it turns to political narrative. The description of Brazil's nineteenth-century transformation reaches high points with the detailed explanation of the impact of coffee, the communication-transportation revolution, the parallel intellectual changes, and the abolition movement. A chapter on the new Brazil, 1888-1922, examines the coffee boom of the early twentieth century, the rise of the cities, and the myriad and often confusing political events of the Old Republic. Professor Burns then advances the thesis of a conscious restructuring of society, emphasized by the 1922 Modernist movement and the rise of Getulio Vargas. The confusing events since 1945 are neatly summarized in a final chapter on reform, radicalization, and reaction.

In each chapter Professor Burns attempts to link literary and artistic movements to political and economic trends. He clearly attributes key roles to intellectual movements and changes in attitudes. Two major periods, the independence of Brazil and the Vargas era, are seen as conscious efforts involving not only the leaders but also sizable sectors of the population. Such deliberate redressing of the balance toward intellectual history richly deserves commendation and perhaps emulation by other students of Latin American history who tend to lose sight of intellectual currents in their pursuit of political or economic forces.

The book's supporting aids do not seem to reach the level achieved by the text. The first two maps, as mentioned above, are deficient; the third, regions of Brazil, shows current imbalances in population and national income in an unimaginative format. Scattered throughout the text are several well-constructed tables, and a cluster of twenty-seven photographs near the end of the book provides a visual glimpse into the variety and richness of Brazil's past. Less useful are the appendixes containing a confusing list of chiefs of state, excerpts from the five Institutional Acts of the post-1964 governments, selections from the 1967 Constitution, and a list of significant political dates. The book closes with a clearly organized list of further readings emphasizing available literature in English.

A History of Brazil deserves a place on the shelf of any student of Latin American history. In this useful reference work, Professor Burns has collected and organized a wealth of data, marshaled themes in chronological format, and dressed the narrative in an attractive style of writing.

JAMES R. SCOBIE
Indiana University

GEORGE WOODCOCK. Henry Walter Bates: Naturalist of the Amazons. (Great Travellers.) New York: Barnes and Noble. 1969. Pp. 269. $5.50.

- Henry Walter Bates discovered eight thousand new species, mostly insects, during eleven years in Brazil (1848-59). That should qualify him for historical mention, especially since establishment scientists of the British Museum did not believe him and had to be proven wrong. Lacking a university degree he could never land a job that would employ his entomological knowledge, and he ended his career as assistant secretary of the Royal Geographical Society.

He had long since won public approval for his superb account of the Amazon experience, and it is this unsponsored trip, which Bates began at age twenty-three in the company of Alfred Russel Wallace, that forms the core of this work. Woodcock's study is part of the Great Travellers series designed to revive popular interest in "important but neglected wanderers." That Woodcock does, but for four-fifths of the book one inevitably gets little more than rehashed Bates, albeit nicely done, interspersed fortunately with numerous quotes in the delightful prose of Bates himself. Woodcock tries to interweave other material, but the pickings are scarce. Let the reader turn to Woodcock for introduction and conclusion, but for the trip itself there is no substitute for Bates's own account.

Woodcock sees Bates as a potential peer of Wallace and Darwin in the development of evolutionary theory. Bates let his opportunity slip by because of his compulsion to seek more data. His career never again reached the peak of his Brazilian years, and we should perhaps be grateful to Mr. Woodcock for reminding us to relive that peak through the words of Bates himself.

ARTHUR R. STEELE
University of Toledo

JOSEPH L. LOVE. Rio Grande do Sul and Brazilian Regionalism, 1882-1930. Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1971. Pp. xv, 311. $10.00.

Mr. Love presents an excellent study that is much broader in scope than the title suggests. The basic theme is the pivotal role played by the Gauchos in the decline of the Old Republic. The participation of Rio Grande do Sul in national politics is divided into four phases: dependence on military presidents, Deodoro and Floriano, 1889-94; autonomy and relative isolation under Governor Castilhos following the civil war, 1895-1903; gradual emergence as a major political force under Pinheiro Machado and Borges de Medeiros, 1904-08; and full-scale participation in national politics, 1909-30.

The era of the Old Republic (chapters two through ten) is the heart of the work. In it the author notes and provides numerous examples but does not always stress the sellout of democracy by the republicans, the failure of the republican parties to transfer power to a younger generation on the national level, the ability of São Paulo and Minas Gerais to prevail in the presidential elections if they act in concert and possibly face a revolution every four years (a revolution that the other states could only hope to win with the support of the armed forces), and the will to power of the military in conjunction with the ambitions and aims of the leaders of Rio Grande do Sul—ultimately those of the generation of 1907, as the author aptly dubs Getúlio Vargas and his contemporaries.

The work is solidly based on the personal archives of many of the leading figures. But it is curious to note that Borges de Medeiros, who provides the thread for most of the book, never emerges as a sharply defined character and is summarily dismissed in a sentence in the last chapter. This chapter, number twelve, along with the introductory chapter are the weakest parts of the work. This book, in spite of the author's occasionally guarded style, is a capital contribution to our understanding of regionalism and the Old Republic.

LEWIS A. TAMBS
Arizona State University

RONALD M. SCHNEIDER. The Political System of Brazil: Emergence of a "Modernizing" Authoritarian Regime, 1964-1970. (Institute of Latin American Studies, Columbia University.) New York: Columbia University Press. 1971. Pp. xviii, 431. $13.50.

The army leaders who took over Brazil in April 1964 hoped that the "exceptional powers" necessary for fighting "subversion, corruption, and inflation" would be few and short-lived. However, as Professor Ronald H. Schneider shows, in the years following the 1964 takeover the military leaders responded to challenges of the antimilitary opposition by abandoning all limits on dictatorship. The abandonment was done in a "legalistic" flurry of Institutional Acts, "complementary acts," and decree laws. Rules were forever being changed, often under pressure reportedly exerted by the antidemocratic "hard line" wing in the military.

As a background for this story of crises and cancellations (cancellations of the political rights of individuals), Schneider supplies "a selective summary" of his forthcoming book about Brazil, 1889-1964—a book that he has delayed publishing in favor of his present volume because, as he explains, already Thomas E. Skidmore has contributed greatly and Vladimir Reisky de Dubnic to a lesser extent to our understanding of the events leading up to 1964, whereas significant analytical literature on the post-1964 regime has been lacking.

Five chapters, consisting of 222 pages, make up the "chronological narrative," 1964-70, or "body" of Schneider's new book. This meticulous, accurate, and well-organized account of political and military matters is a tremendous achievement—splendidly written and so complete that it is indispensable for anyone interested in learning the details of what happened. In guiding the reader from the "manipulated democracy" of the early part of Castelo Branco's regime to the "descent into dictatorship" of the last part of Costa e Silva's regime, and on through the first year of Garrastazú Médici's regime, Schneider supplies copious comments of Brazilian observers and a useful section on military education.

The book is stimulating. While political scientists can argue whether or not Schneider's final chapter is a valuable contribution to systematic political science, other scholars have the opportunity of agreeing or disagreeing with the author's pessimism. At the outset Schneider declares that "Brazil is, among the nations of the world, an adolescent giant in severe trouble." Later, pondering dicta formulated by Samuel P. Huntington, a fellow political scientist, Schneider concludes that the Médici administration fails to appreciate "the need" of developing peasant support and political institutions. Apparently writing late in December 1970, Schneider finds that "from December, 1968, on, the decay of military unity has been painfully evident," and that Médici's "prospects for serving out his full presidential term would seem to be no better than the average for the Brazilian Republic—less than a fifty-fifty proposition."

JOHN W. F. DULLES
University of Texas,
Austin

J. R. FISHER. Government and Society in Colonial Peru: The Intendant System, 1784-1814. (University of London Historical Studies, Number 29.) [London:] University of London, Athlone Press; distrib. by Oxford University Press, New York. 1970. Pp. ix, 289. $12.00.

A comprehensive evaluation of the functioning of the intendency in the Spanish Empire is long overdue. The neglect is difficult to explain, since the administrative innovation represents the paramount political reform of the Bourbons. The present volume by a lecturer at the University of Liverpool is a solid contribution to our knowledge of the role of this official in the viceroyalty of Peru.

Preceding its Mexican counterpart, the Peruvian intendancy marked another stage in the realization of the twin Bourbon goals of administrative centralization and absolutism. To the second visitor-general Jorge Escobedo was assigned the arduous task of introducing the new system, which meant in large measure overcoming the stubborn resistance of the bureaucratic establishment headed by the viceroy. There has been perhaps no more vigorous individual than Escobedo in the last fifty years of the kingdom of Peru. His career emphasizes once again the interrelationship of institutional evolution and personality. Did the adoption of the intendancy revitalize colonial government? The author's answer is a carefully qualified affirmative. The intendants managed to increase revenue for at least a decade through meticulous collection of taxes and elimination of fraud and corruption. Public administration was improved by the construction of roads, bridges, and government buildings and through the regulation of food supplies. While commercial activities were stimulated, it proved impossible to increase agricultural production. Probably the intendancy found its greatest success in the realm of municipal affairs. Moribund cabildos came to life by appointment of new councilors, expansion of revenues, and a program of public works. Did this mean royal oppression? The cabildos thought so, at any rate. That any significant alleviation of the exploitation of the Indians—dramatically disclosed earlier in the rebellion of Tupac Amaru—took place is seriously debatable.

For the most part the author's conclusions confirm the present view of the place of the intendancy in the colonial administrative system, but studies of a similar nature will be necessary to complete the picture. Generally speaking his treatment follows that of Professor Lynch, whose excellent account of the intendancy in the viceroyalty of Buenos Aires initiated scholarly investigation of this feature of government. The abundance of archival sources consulted in Spain and Peru is commendable. Undoubtedly this study will be a valuable supplement to the growing institutional literature of the Spanish Empire.

J. P. MOORE
Louisiana State University

JAMES M. MALLOY. Bolivia: The Uncompleted Revolution. [Pittsburgh:] University of Pittsburgh Press. 1970. Pp. x, 396. $11.95.

JAMES M. MALLOY and RICHARD S. THORN, editors. Beyond the Revolution: Bolivia since 1952. [Pittsburgh:] University of Pittsburgh Press. 1971. Pp. xvii, 402. $11.95.

Writing about unfolding social and economic revolutions poses occupational hazards because research may become outdated or need revising immediately after publication. In the Bolivian revolution, launched in 1952 and controlled or wracked by military factions since 1964, recent events cast doubt upon some of the assertions presented here. The successful revolt led by Colonel Hugo Banzer in 1971 against the radical regime of General Juan José Torres caused the most violent resistance since the Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario (MNR) seized power in 1952. But this party, which began the transformation of Bolivian society, joined forces with its fascist opponent for three decades, the Falange Socialista Boliviana, to back the Banzer putsch. Thus, Víctor Paz Estenssoro, major architect of the MNR who was beginning his third term in 1964, became a pathetic figure hungry for power at any price. Where is the revolution now?

The scholars who have tended to apologize for the totalitarian origins of the MNR should re-examine the historical record. Cole Blasier states that "many of these charges [of Nazi influence in 1941] were misleading, exaggerated, or false." Yet the newspaper La Calle, published by the MNR, conducted a vicious anti-Semitic campaign during debate on the 1942 immigration bill, in which deputies Paz and Siles both voted for the exclusion of Jews, Negroes, and Asians from Bolivia. James M. Malloy also glosses over the totalitarian aspects of the regime of Major Gualberto Villarroel (1943-46), which the MNR supported. For example, MNR journalist Roberto Hinojosa, among those whose corpses were strung up from lamp posts in 1946, had published pamphlets glorifying the "life and passion" of Adolf Hitler.

In his book Malloy writes that the depression of the early 1930s widened the chasms in Bolivian life later exposed by the disastrous Chaco defeat. He thinks the 1952 revolt occurred partly because economic stagnation had dimmed the expectations of the younger and later more deeply disillusioned men of the middle sector, both civil and military, who thus became "reluctant revolutionaries." (Richard Patch earlier called Bolivia's experience a "restrained" revolution.) Malloy believes that not only was agrarian reform thrust upon these leaders, but also nationalization of the Big Three tin mines. This is inaccurate because only minor MNR figures resisted nationalization as the major goal of the MNR since Carlos Montenegro's Nacionalismo y coloniaje won the national literary prize in 1943.

Malloy more clearly sees the pragmatism of central MNR leaders who were forced to meet haphazardly demands of both the mine workers of the Left led by Juan Lechín (elected president of the presidium of the Popular Assembly in 1971) and the job-seeking, increasingly alienated men of the middle sector who also fought for the movement. The enfranchised Indian masses became an uncertain base of support, eventually requiring the fatal reconstruction of the Bolivian military establishment by the United States.

Political backlash exploited during the Torres regime obtained more in aid agreements from the Soviet bloc in ten months than Bolivia received from the United States in twelve years. Both Blasier and Richard S. Thorn predicted the staggering price paid in August 1971 by Bolivia for this aid. Some Bolivian writers feared that the country might become the scene of the "Spanish civil war of the Americas."

The second volume embraces a rich collection of viewpoints from various disciplines. Both books are riddled with errors in repeatedly misspelled names and improperly accented words, although Malloy uses less jargon in his contribution. Thorn gives an optimistic account of economic gains made by the revolution, the first socioeconomic one that the United States has ever supported. James W. Wilkie indicates that Bolivian control of expenditure should have been centralized and extended over the entire public sector of the economy.

Herbert S. Klein summarizes his work on Bolivian history to 1952, also presenting the most balanced statement of the fascist aspects of the Villarroel period. The late Carter Goodrich recalls his experiences in La Paz during the 1952 insurrection and the beginning of United Nations technical assistance, replaced later by the American efforts during the Eisenhower and Kennedy administrations.

On agrarian reform William E. Carter estimates that about one-third of Bolivia's agricultural land has been redistributed. Madeline Barbara Léons and William Léons find the impact of land reform in the Yungas area beneficial, although they emphasize that "the position of the campesino [Indian farmer] has [not] changed much in relation to other segments of the society." Melvin Burke compares the production of four former haciendas on the Bolivian side of Lake Titicaca with their Peruvian counterparts, finding more favorable results for the Bolivians. He thus reminds us that fragmentation of larger, possibly more economic land units is valid since the former owners did not use much of their vast acreages.

Finally, there is an excellent discussion by Murdo J. MacLeod of long-neglected Bolivian novels of social protest. He wonders if there is "something basically wrong with the Bolivian Revolution" because of the decline in quality of such literature after 1952, and his question goes to the heart of the matter. Has the transformation of Bolivian society been as profound as claimed by most scholars? The resurgence of great Mexican literature since 1910 and that of Cuba since 1959 goes without saying. Augusto Céspedes, one of three Latin American writers invited to the Soviet Union in 1971, decided to stop competing in Bolivia's literary contest in 1961 in order to encourage younger writers. But the genius of Céspedes seems lost. Who among Bolivian youth can sustain his work? They are disenchanted with the reformist trend and corruption of the MNR and its frequently repressive successors. Witness the Teoponte foco of 1970 and the resistance at the University of San Andrés a year later. Perhaps beyond the Bolivian Revolution lies the continued agony of Guatemala.

JERRY KNUDSON

South Dakota State University

---

Communications

---

A communication will be considered only if it relates to an article or review published in this journal; publication of such a communication or of any part of it is solely at the editors' discretion. Limitations of space require that a communication concerning a review be no longer than the review to which it refers and in no case longer than 500 words. Communications concerning articles or review articles may be no more than 1,000 words, and the editors reserve the right to impose a lower limit. The schedule of publication and the time needed to send a communication to the author of the article or review in question for such reply as he may care to make virtually preclude the possibility of publication in the issue following that in which the original article or review appeared. Unless, in the editors' judgment, some major scholarly purpose is served, rejoinders will not be published.

TO THE EDITOR:

You published a review of the first two volumes of Histoire générale de la presse française (AHR, 76 [1971]: 510-11) of which we are the editors. Somewhat surprised at its tenor, we would ask that you permit us to bring to your readers' attention the following remarks. They seem to us an indispensable corrective to the evident bias coloring the verdict returned by Professor Elizabeth L. Eisenstein on a work that has, in general, been given a better reception by other historians than by your reviewer.

Professor Eisenstein is quite entitled not to like this work but one may question the grounds on which she bases her criticism. According to her these two volumes fail "even as a coffee table showpiece," and she "cannot imagine what group of purchasers they will please." Can your readers accept this summary dismissal without asking themselves how it was that a distinguished group of French academics could have written a work of such little interest or how a famous French publisher could have agreed to publish in several volumes so bad a piece of work? The claim that the reference apparatus of notes, index, and bibliography is very complete but that it aims to "impress the reader without much concern for actual use" will put your readers on their guard. Can they accept the opinion underlying the entire review that this history, appearing in 1969, is so out of date as to contribute nothing more than the old and learned study by Hatin written during the Second Empire? Can they believe that the authors and the publisher are so lacking in good sense that they have "chosen at random" illustrations that "rarely instruct or even entertain"?

In her more detailed comments Professor Eisenstein is still more relentless. Even without discussing all her comments, we must nonetheless reply to some so that your readers may better judge their value. Concerning the episodes in the life of the Gazette during the Fronde, the evidence adduced by M.-N. Grand-Mesnil is not as conclusive as Professor Eisenstein wishes to believe, and one cannot reproach M. Louis Trenard for not accepting it entirely. The numerous references the latter makes to Hatin in discussing the press of the ancien régime are not proof that he has merely re-copied it; rather, they should serve as a proof of intellectual exactitude and as an indication, in the many sections where it is not quoted, of the originality of the text.

An attentive reader will find no major con-tradition between the allusions to the extent of illiteracy at the beginning (p. 159) and end of the eighteenth century (p. 402). It is difficult to understand why Louis Trenard is reproached for having adopted a very clear-cut plan that classifies, for the eighteenth century, titles of journals by category (provincial press, specialized press, and so on) and—above all—by the chronological divisions 1631–1724 and 1724–88 (which, be it noted, apply independently of the “classical” divisions of political chronology) on the pretext that “political history under the ancien régime is not helpful in ordering journalistic developments.”

To mention, in conclusion, only one of the criticisms made of the second volume (1814–71), it is surprising to see regrets expressed that the attitude of the Catholic Church toward the press is not discussed when, on the contrary, the book has much to say on this point both when presenting Catholic papers (pp. 70, 104–06, 128, 175, 213–15, 245, 267–69, 277, 325–26, 349) and when discussing religious problems (pp. 82–84, 295–97, 337–38).

To sum up, we consider it regrettable that readers of a periodical as highly regarded as yours must judge a work as important as this—whose next volumes (1871–1940 and 1940–70) will be appearing in the coming months—on the basis of a review that is more polemical than reasoned.

CLAUDE BELLANGER
JACQUES GODECHOT
PIERRE GUIRAL
FERNAND TERROU
*The French Press Institute,
Paris*

PROFESSOR EISENSTEIN REPLIES:

I regret that it was not possible to please the editors and, at the same time, give an accurate report of their work to readers of the American Historical Review. I did try to balance the defects of volume 1 against the merits of volume 2 but saw no reason to conceal my disappointment that the project as a whole was modeled along the same lines as its predecessor, a hundred years ago.

There is no need to take up space with a detailed refutation of the specific objections posed by the editors. After comparing my comments with the editors' complaints, interested readers may judge for themselves whether the latter are well founded or not. Prospective purchasers also would be well advised to ignore appeals to their credulity concerning illustrations and reference apparatus. Those interested in buying these volumes ought to look them over first.

To forestall misunderstanding I am not denying that some scholars may find it useful to own this work. I am suggesting that blurbs, prefaces, and packaging are misleading, and I think purchasers will be less dissatisfied if they have been forewarned.

ELIZABETH L. EISENSTEIN
American University

TO THE EDITOR:

Robert Dallek's review of my Roosevelt: The Soldier of Freedom (AHR, 76 [1971]: 1503–13), strikes me as the very model of a scholarly critique: he has fairly summarized the theme and subthemes of the book, indicated the relevance of a large number of other studies, and clearly stated his own views and assumptions as well as my own. I value both his tributes to my study and his own sharply different evaluation of Roosevelt as a world leader.

Both Professor Dallek and I judge Franklin Roosevelt on the basis of our clearly stated criteria. It may be useful to note, however, that the criteria of presidential leadership in World War II that I advance are not only mine; they are also Roosevelt's. It was Roosevelt who favored and promised—and whose generals planned and pressed for—an early second front; it was Roosevelt who advocated a strong post-war role for China; it was Roosevelt who knew the weaknesses of the League of Nations and wanted a strong United Nations; it was Roosevelt who opposed colonialism; it was Roosevelt who talked about ending the old system of power politics and spheres of interest. While Roosevelt acted by and large in the fashion in which Professor Dallek wants presidents to act, he generally spoke for the kind of presidential leadership I favor, and it seems fair to evaluate Roosevelt's actions by his own precepts.

Even so, I believe that the historian has a right, if not a duty, to evaluate presidential leadership by clearly defined standards of his own, which both Professor Dallek and I have tried to do.

JAMES MACGREGOR BURNS
Williams College

TO THE EDITOR:

I learned much from the two reviews of my Gandhi's Truth (Joan V. Bondurant, Margaret W. Fisher, J. D. Sutherland, "Gandhi: A Psychoanalytic View," AHR, 76 [1971]: 1104-15). If I respond to one criticism common to both it is only because this may help to correct a widespread misunderstanding obviously caused by lack of clarity on my part.

Throughout my book I refer to the Ahmedabad strike as the Event with a capital E. Although I nowhere say so, this has been interpreted as a claim that I have found the key event in Gandhi's life and in the history of satyagraha. Actually, the capitalization of the word event was meant to be a literary device which would remind the reader that all the theoretical and factual strands pursued throughout the book would eventually converge on the story of the strike. This strike had become the event for my book and for me because industrial Ahmedabad is the Indian city I learned to know the best and some of the old men and women I met there had played significant roles in the strike and, thus, were true witnesses to it. As to the place of this event in Gandhi's life, I do claim that it was more important than has been generally recognized because it was the prophet's first nonviolent campaign in his homeland and, in fact, in his province and language area. Such a claim, after all, causes historical books to be written. But I was not so enamored with my experience and with my role that I would believe I had discovered the key event in Gandhi's long and adventurous life.

ERIK H. ERIKSON
Harvard University

TO THE EDITOR:

Although I appreciate the difficulties involved in reviewing responsibly the many works that come to the attention of the American Historical Review, I must still protest the treatment accorded my The Social Responsibilities of Business: Company and Community, 1900-1960 (AHR, 76 [1971]: 1615-16).

In his pursuit of what must have been remarkably few grammatical lapses the reviewer seems to have substantially misunderstood the title and subject matter of the study, despite the fact that they were quite clearly elaborated in the preface. There it was explained, for example, that the field of labor relations was specifically excluded in order to concentrate on community relations (as the title indicated). One may question the wisdom of that decision, but I cannot accept criticism for overlooking a topic that I deliberately chose to exclude.

On the charge of having shown excessive sympathy for business leadership I am prepared to accept criticism—provided it is substantive and not merely assertive. I suspect myself that this charge may not be without foundation, although it should be noted that the book has been criticized elsewhere for being too unfriendly to business. My endeavor was to approach the material from the point of view of the executives themselves (as explained in the preface) in order to understand the factors that influenced their thought and behavior. This demands a modicum, at least, of sympathy; and it can hardly be argued that my assessment was uncritical.

I should have welcomed, finally, your reviewer's suggestions as to how I might have treated Ralph Nader in a volume whose time span (indicated in the title) ends about 1960. There is a difference between historical scholarship and contemporary polemics (referred to in the preface) that seems to have escaped him.

MORRELL HEALD
Case Western Reserve University

PROFESSOR DIBACCO REPLIES:

I had no difficulty in reviewing fairly Professor Heald's book. My review was designed to convey both the merits and shortcomings of his research and writing. That the latter outweighed the former, in my opinion, is naturally disturbing to Professor Heald, but my evaluation does not constitute irresponsibility any more than reciting the Rotary motto each morning ("He profits most who serves the best") constitutes business responsibility.

Grammatical and stylistic deficiencies, unlike wild game, need not be pursued; they have a way of making themselves known to readers. Professor Heald establishes for himself the same wide margin for error that he sets for his business spokesmen—and I am critical of such low standards.

The problem with the title is no big thing. I simply feel that a book title should not confuse the reader. The Social Responsibilities of Business infers that business units and their noneconomic relations with the outside world are under consideration. Professor Heald's addition of a subtitle (exclusive of dates) does not, in my opinion, convey the precision of meaning that was intended.

In my allotted four hundred-word review I did give what I believed to be substantive criticisms. Alas, Professor Heald has interpreted these as reflective of my unhistorical, contemporary viewpoint. I did not expect Professor Heald to include Ralph Nader in his study, but I do expect that a historian writing in 1970 would show more discrimination in examining the business record than Calvin Coolidge or Émile Coué.

THOMAS V. DIBACCO
American University

TO THE EDITOR:

I very much agree with the tenor of Felix E. Hirsch's review of the memoirs of Heinrich Brüning (AHR, 76 [1971]: 1560–62), but I differ from his opinion in one important point, and I think a few aspects need stressing that Professor Hirsch has not mentioned.

Hirsch's review, though generally very fair to Brüning, implies an accusation when he mentions Brüning's intention to replace "his own moderate government . . . by a rightist coalition headed by Carl Goerdeler." This was not a matter of free choice for Brüning: he was aware that President Hindenburg would not indefinitely support the Brüning cabinet, which was based on toleration by the Social Democrats and which conducted a policy making such toleration possible. Under these circumstances Brüning wanted to make sure that the chancellorship would not be handed over to any rightist who might stage a coup d'état. In spite of Goerdeler's very great limitations, it would be hard to fault Brüning's judgment that among those whom Hindenburg might conceivably be persuaded to appoint, Goerdeler was the least objectionable.

Hirsch mentions Brüning's intention to re-introduce the monarchy, but he does not draw the reader's attention to the new light thrown by the memoirs on this plan, which itself has been known for a long time. Most historians, I think, have up to now assumed that Brüning, although always a monarchist in the abstract, formed a concrete plan of restoring a Hohenzollern to the throne only as a desperate means to keep Hitler out of power (the same reason a number of Bavarian politicians in 1933 considered the restoration of the Wittelsbach monarchy), believing that the Social Democrats and other nonmonarchists would accept the restoration because, from their point of view, a Hohenzollern king was still preferable to the Nazis. Although the latter point was incontestable, even such a plan would have been unrealizable. But according to his memoirs Brüning did not think of the restoration as a crisis solution; rather, he wanted the monarch to come in after the crisis, when he himself would have found a solution for the foreign policy problems and would thereby have achieved economic recovery, abatement of civil commotion, and especially a waning of the power of the Nazis. The restoration should by no means be effected through counterrevolution but in a constitutional manner with the acclaim of the public and especially with at least the tacit consent of the working class. If a restoration of the monarchy as a crisis solution was unrealistic, this idea of a post-crisis restoration was sheer fantasy. Why should the great majority of Germans, who were not monarchists, voluntarily accept a change of regime after the most pressing problems had been solved—a change desired merely by conservative bureaucrats, big landowners, some industrialists, army officers, and a few political romanticists like Brüning himself?

The restoration plan reveals a deep contradiction in Brüning's mind. Not only his foreign policy (at least in parts) but also important aspects of his handling of domestic affairs—the way he established tolerably good relations with the moderate Left, which he had first driven into opposition in 1930—show Brüning as a leader of statesmanlike qualities; for example, his assessment of Pius XII and his rejection of the idea of a federal concordat show a remarkable degree of realism. On the other hand, there was this absurd restoration plan and the over-estimation of the consolidating effect that would come not only from a reparations agreement but also from German equality in armament, which could satisfy only nationalistic emotions but had no bearing on Germany's practical problems. In the same category belongs Brüning's belief that his government by emergency decrees, which was acceptable to public opinion only as long as desperate conditions prevailed, amounted to a constitutional reform that would permanently give the president the position of a monarch, limited only by the purse-string powers of parliament. All this offers evidence that in addition to Brüning's world of realistic political labors, in which he acted with an admirable combination of shrewdness and honesty, he also cultivated a romantic dream world in which he had no ground under his feet.

The heavy mortgage romantic emotionalism placed on Brüning's statesmanship may provide an answer to another question. The memoirs contain nothing about Brüning's activities in the United States. He was the only one among German refugees from Hitlerism who had any chance at all to be listened to by people in the American government. Did he never try to exert some influence in opposition to the Morgenthau tendencies? The lack of evidence for

- any such attempt seems to indicate that there was none; correspondences I had with Brüning in 1941 and 1943 support the same assumption. Still there is no proof one way or the other, but what we know makes it likely that Brüning did not try to influence American foreign policy. Most probably even Brüning would have achieved nothing; yet he might have tried to reach the seats of power through Catholic circles with some influence in Washington. Surely a number of German refugees (Albert Grzesinski, Gerhart Seger, and others) would have made such an attempt if that channel had been open to them. Assuming that Brüning really kept aloof, my guess is that he realized the hopelessness of any plea for a non-Carthaginian peace for Germany, unless such a plea was combined with proposals like German disarmament and reparations for the nations victimized by Hitler, and that it was emotionally impossible for Brüning to advocate such conditions, although under challenge he would surely not have denied their justification.

CARL LANDAUER
University of California,
Berkeley

PROFESSOR HIRSCH REPLIES:

I am glad that Carl Landauer and I agree fundamentally in our appraisals of Heinrich Brüning as we know him now from his Memoiren. Some differences of opinion that Landauer presents deserve a brief reply, however.

Professor Landauer is correct in saying that, if there was to be a rightist coalition government in June 1932, Carl Goerdeler would have been perhaps the least objectionable politician to head it. But this is a very limited compliment. As his biographer Gerhard Ritter told, Goerdeler wanted to negotiate at that point with Hitler and to offer him two or three seats in the incoming cabinet. If the Reichstag were to cause trouble, Goerdeler suggested dissolving it and having new elections two years later only. While Goerdeler was certainly a much more honorable man than Herr von Papen, I maintain he, too, would have been a very dubious chancellor for a democratic republic at such a critical juncture. Brüning, by the way, later realized Goerdeler's great shortcomings as a statesman.

I would have said more about Brüning's disastrous ideas concerning a restoration of the monarchy had the space allotted to my review permitted it. We knew from Sir John Wheeler-Bennett's Wooden Titan (1936), the still unsurpassed Hindenburg biography, that Brüning had seriously thought of this restoration when his regime began to falter in November 1931. But Brüning admits in his Memoiren (p. 146) that he had not raised fundamental objections to a restoration of the Hohenzollern rule in a discussion with General von Schleicher as early as Easter 1929, that is, long before he took office, when the Weimar Republic had not yet entered the crisis stage and when Hermann Müller's cabinet of the Grand Coalition seemed fairly stable. Later, as chancellor, it was usually Brüning, rather than Hindenburg or Schleicher, who brought the topic of restoration up for an exchange of views. Hindenburg's disloyalty to the republic is a matter of record, but Brüning, until now, seemed to have been its faithful servant. Had those of us who publicly supported Brüning's campaign for Hindenburg's re-election in 1932, in spite of serious doubts about the old field marshal, known that neither of them intended to protect the Weimar Constitution, we might have hesitated to follow the chancellor's leadership. He certainly withheld his true intentions then from the German people. Most reluctantly, we may have to accept the opinion of the German historian Karl Otmar Freiherr von Aretin (Frankfurter Hefte, 26 [1971]: 931-39) that the real historical significance of Brüning rests in the fact that by his Verfassungs-Untreue he made the most important constitutional institutions of the republic ready for their destruction by Hitler.

Finally, Professor Landauer raises the question of Brüning's political role while he was in this country. He seemed rather aloof to many of his Harvard colleagues, even to a man as sympathetic to German culture as Sidney Fay. From understandable motives, the former chancellor did not choose to become an American citizen, a fact that hampered his activities in wartime. Nevertheless, he did remain deeply concerned about Germany's future. George N. Shuster, former president of Hunter College, has eloquently described Brüning's American years in his contribution to the Brüning Festschrift entitled Staat, Wirtschaft und Politik in der Weimarer Republik (Berlin, 1967). I can perhaps throw some additional light on the subject. What few people knew was that he had contacts with certain political exiles from Nazi Germany. While he disliked many refugee intellectuals, he trusted a few former Social Democratic statesmen and writers. Among them was William Sollmann, the former SPD leader in the Rhineland and minister of the interior in the Stresemann cabinet. Sollmann, a close friend of mine (see my essays on him in the South Atlantic Quarterly, 52 [1953]: 207-27, and in the American-German Review, 19 [1953]: 14-16, now supplemented by Eugene Kist's article in Quaker History, 60 [1971]: 88-119) had told me repeatedly of his extensive contacts with Brüning. We have a record of them in Sollmann's papers, now deposited in the Swarthmore College Peace Collection. They confirm that Brüning made serious, if unsuccessful efforts to save Socialist leaders like the former minister Rudolf Hilferding from falling into the hands of the Nazis. Brüning refers repeatedly to wartime visits paid to him by a prominent emissary of the State Department and the OSS. He made it amply clear in his letters that he did not believe that refugees like himself could return to office after the war. In 1944, however, he suggested for an Allied occupation of Germany the formation of a small advisory committee of emigrants who had become citizens of Allied or neutral countries. Among them he named Sollmann, Friedrich Stampfer, Max Brauer, and Gerhart Seger, four moderate Social Democrats. Also a few Democrats should be included, but he reiterated that he could not belong to it himself, since he was not a U.S. citizen. He described his own frustrations during the American years to Sollmann in a letter of December 16, 1946: "In spite of my avoidance of Washington after my experience in 1939 with President Roosevelt and the intrigue in the summer of 1944 to prevent very influential people from discussing the Morgenthau proposals with me before the Quebec conference, people are alarmed even now by the possibility of my returning into politics." A few years later Brüning went back to Germany, but most of his countrymen cared but little for his advice, and he ended his days, a discouraged old man, in a little village in Vermont.

FELIX E. HIRSCH

Trenton State College

TO THE EDITOR:

I have only just seen the review by Robin Higham of Documents Relating to the Naval Air Service, volume 1 (AHR, 76 [1971]: 508-09), which I edited for the Navy Records Society's series. I welcome constructive criticism of my published work from any well-informed person. But I take strong exception to Mr. Higham's remarks, which are in some cases quite inaccurate and in others totally unjustified. An author or an editor of original papers is entitled to expect reasonable care and knowledge on the part of a reviewer and that he should have read the work he is discussing. Mr. Higham obviously has not fulfilled those expectations.

As to the date of the formation of the Royal Naval Air Service Mr. Higham has evidently repeated a mistake made by several writers. A Royal Warrant is not an executive order, as he seems to suppose. It is merely an authorization. To quote the definition in the Oxford English Dictionary, a warrant is "a document conveying authority or security. A writing issued by the Sovereign, an officer of state or an administrative body authorizing those to whom it is addressed to perform some Act." The Admiralty, which was the body concerned with the Royal Warrant of July 1, 1914, did not act on it until thirteen months later. Indeed on July 1, 1914, the Admiralty issued a statement referring to the RNAS as "forming the Naval Wing of the Royal Flying Corps" (see doc. 47 in my book). Obviously then it was not a separate service on the date in question. On July 29, 1915, an Admiralty Weekly Order was issued stating that "the Royal Naval Air Service is to be regarded in all respects as part of the Royal Navy. . . . These instructions will come into effect on 1st August 1915" (italics supplied; see doc. 72 in my book). Hence the effective date of the execution of the Royal Warrant and the establishment of the RNAS is clearly established.

With regard to Rear-Admiral Murray Sueter, as I described him as "brilliantly inventive" (p. xi), which is almost verbatim what Mr. Higham says, and I also quoted Sir Walter Raleigh's tribute to him (p. 57), it is nonsense to suggest that I treated him unfairly. With regard to what Mr. Higham calls his "demise" (presumably meaning his replacement at the Admiralty in 1917), scholars will surely prefer the documents I published (docs. 150, 151) to what Sueter told Mr. Higham in 1959 when Sueter was eighty-eight years of age and within a year of his death. Nor are my remarks on Sueter's conduct undocumented, as Mr. Higham states. Documents 48 and 81, among others, are highly relevant.

For Mr. Higham to pick on my footnote about Pemberton Billing, a quite insignificant character of the period, as inadequate when I gave Billing six lines of small print is petty to the point of absurdity. Mr. Higham may like more and longer footnotes, but the NRS depends entirely on voluntary subscriptions and on its editors' giving their services free. It simply cannot afford the printing costs of long and copious footnotes. That is why I put nearly all my plentiful editorial comments and explanations in the text and indicated them by heavy square brackets—an aspect of this book that Mr. Higham ungenerously but totally ignores.

As to books on the period, I cannot see the relevance of Mr. Higham's remark, unless it is inspired by pique at my failure to mention his work on British airships. If he had troubled to read the inscription on the flyleaf he would see that the NRS is described as existing "for the purpose of printing rare or unpublished works for naval interest"—not to quote from published books.

I will pass over Mr. Higham's concluding remark about my knowledge of the period by merely describing it as a patronizing and gratuitous insult, which should not be made by a reviewer even of a trivial work. Though I would be the last to claim complete knowledge of this or of any other period I very much doubt whether Mr. Higham can teach me much about my subject—as he evidently believes he can.

I hope that the AHR will find a better-informed and more fair-minded reviewer for the second volume of the work in question.

S. W. ROSKILL

Churchill College, Cambridge

PROFESSOR HIGHAM REPLIES:

Let me respond to Captain Roskill's criticisms of my review by first denying his assumptions that I am not qualified to review the work and that I did not read it.

Surely when an editor discovers important evidence, in this case that the establishment of the Royal Naval Air Service was not on the date commonly accepted by the official historians of the First World War, by naval historians, and by myself in The British Rigid Airship (1961), he has some duty to point this out in his introduction rather than making a bald statement and then providing the explanation in a letter to the editor of a journal in which he is faulted by a reviewer.

On the question of Rear-Admiral Sir Murray Sueter's demise at the Admiralty, I would simply respond that in cases of this sort the written record seldom tells the whole story. While it is quite true that at the time I interviewed Sir Murray he was advanced in age, his memory was quite accurate, a fact I could judge by having worked through the documentation then available, which unfortunately excluded much of the Admiralty materials now revealed, before I saw him.

Captain Roskill should well recognize that reviewers have very limited wordage assigned. I drew attention to the footnote on Pemberton Billing simply as an example of the problem, feeling it better to be specific rather than make a sweeping charge. It is unfortunate that the Navy Records Society cannot afford better notes. One can sympathize with them on this. My basic point, however, remains that as the period recedes into the past the reader needs better identification not only of people, but also of expressions, items, and equipment. As to Captain Roskill's brackets in the text, I have rechecked, as a sample, pages 320 to 420 and find these to be simply routine linkages or explanations of the sort editors normally supply. In this respect the notes seemed not to merit special mention in a short review, though undoubtedly they help provide continuity.

Finally, Captain Roskill obviously does not understand that bibliographies should, if they are to be of any use, guide the interested person to the relevant material on the subject. In this sense they reflect within limitations an author's or editor's knowledge of the subject. I certainly did not expect him to quote from my book, which is a monograph (devoting most of the first 229 pages to the naval airship program) and not a collection of documents. For my part, I am perfectly aware of the work of the NRS and have supported it with a standing order from our library.

ROBIN HIGHAM
Kansas State University

---

Recent Deaths

---

On September 19, 1971, WILLIAM FOXWELL ALBRIGHT, one of the great scholars of this century, died in Baltimore, Maryland. A giant in the field of Near Eastern and Biblical studies, his productivity was immense: in the six decades following the publication of his first article in 1911, the total number of his books, articles, and reviews exceeded one thousand. Universally acclaimed for his contributions to knowledge, he was the recipient of countless honors from academic institutions and societies, both foreign and domestic.

W. F. Albright, whose parents were Christian missionaries, was born in Coquimbo, Chile, on May 24, 1891. Educated in the United States, he received his B.A. from Upper Iowa University at Fayette in 1912 and his Ph.D. from Johns Hopkins University in 1916. The year 1919 found him in Jerusalem, a fellow of the American School of Oriental Research; by 1920 he was acting director of the school and subsequently its director (1921-29). Professor of Semitic languages at Johns Hopkins from 1929 until his retirement in 1958, his association with the American School in Jerusalem continued, and he served a second term as director (1933-36). Albright remained active in teaching, research, and lecturing after retirement until struck down by the massive stroke in July 1971 that carried him off two months later.

An archeologist, a historian, a paleographer, an epigrapher, and a profound student of ancient languages, Professor Albright was no narrow specialist; it should also be emphasized that he was the master rather than the jack of all these trades. His publication of the results of the excavations at Tell Beit Mirsim (3 vols., 1932-43) established the fundamental chronology for Palestinian archeology. A more popular treatment of the subject, which became for many students their first introduction to the field, was his Archaeology of Palestine, which appeared as a Penguin paperback in 1949. Among his other well-known works one might cite Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1942) or Yahweh and the Gods of Canaan (1968), but the true measure of the man as historian and synthesist must be his magnificent, stimulating From the Stone Age to Christianity (1940).

A great teacher, Professor Albright had scores of students, many of whom attained scholarly distinction of their own; certainly not the least of these was the late Nelson Glueck who began his study of archeology with Albright in Palestine in 1928. Not only those formally enrolled as his students but also many young scholars who came in contact with Professor Albright were the beneficiaries of his generous advice and encouragement. His kindness and consideration will never be forgotten.

It is good to know that the attainments of this great man were fully recognized before his death: a volume of essays in his honor signaled his retirement and another volume his eightieth birthday; the American School in Jerusalem was renamed the Albright Institute of Archeological Research. Since his death there have been numerous memorials: the most moving of these was conducted at St. George's Cathedral in Jerusalem on September 23, and the testimonials are printed in the American Schools of Oriental Research Newsletter (1971-72).

William Foxwell Albright was more than an Orientalist or an ornament to Biblical studies. He was a man to admire; genuine, honest, and fine. He wished to be known as a Christian humanist, and he was truly that.

TOM B. JONES

*University of Minnesota,
Minneapolis*

PHILIP E. MOSELY, Adlai E. Stevenson Professor of International Relations, director of the European Institute, and associate dean of the School of International Affairs at Columbia University, died after a long illness at his home in New York City on January 13, 1972.

Professor Mosely was born September 21, 1905, in Westfield, Massachusetts. He received his B.A. from Harvard University in 1926 and his Ph.D. in 1933, benefiting from the guidance of men such as Archibald Cary Coolidge and William L. Langer in diplomatic history and Michael Karpovich in Russian history. He spent from 1930 to 1932 in the Soviet Union, beginning then the acquisition of his unsurpassed knowledge of the Soviet land and peoples. The opportunity to spend 1935-36 in the Balkans and other summer travels throughout Eastern Europe helped give him the extraordinary fluency in Romanian, Russian, and Bulgarian, which, together with equal mastery of the West European languages, helped to increase his understanding and his ability to communicate.

Professor Mosely's formal academic appointments were all with Eastern institutions: Princeton, Union College, Cornell, Columbia, and the Council on Foreign Relations. From 1942 to 1946 he occupied important positions in the Department of State, serving as adviser to Secretaries of State Cordell Hull and James Byrnes. His participation in the World War II settlements, notably those at Moscow and Potsdam, increased his insight and interest in Soviet foreign policy and Soviet-American relations. It also drew him from his earlier interest in nineteenth-century diplomatic history and Balkan social history into a prominent role in helping to shape American foreign policy, because he remained an important adviser to the Department of State after 1946. Thus the exciting "open skies" proposal of President Eisenhower was his suggestion. The relationships Professor Mosely maintained with Soviet and East European scholars and diplomats were sustained throughout the crises of the past quarter century. This unusual feat reflected the respect in which they held his knowledge, understanding, judgment, candor, and integrity. He would have served with distinction as our ambassador in Moscow or in any of the East European capitals if he had not committed himself to academic work after 1946.

As a scholar Professor Mosely was remarkably prolific. His works reflect high quality in spite of their variety and his numerous activities. His first book, Russian Diplomacy and the Opening of the Eastern Question in 1838 and 1839 (1934), was a model of diplomatic history. His translation and editing of Victor Chernov's The Great Russian Revolution (1936) made available a significant interpretation of the Russian Revolution that might otherwise have been ignored. Professor Mosely excelled, however, as an author of articles, publishing more than two hundred of originality and insight on subjects that reflected his wide interests and vast learning, articles ranging from Bulgarian village life in the nineteenth century to the history of Slavic studies. In the last year of his life he planned to return to study of the zadruga or communal joint-family in the Balkans, an interest of his since the early 1930s, and to transform a half dozen articles into the first full study of this central but little-known social institution of Southeast Europe.

Professor Mosely was not an outstanding lecturer but he will be remembered as a great teacher. His graduate seminars were entirely dedicated to passing on the skills of the craft. His work on dissertations, those which he directed and those which were the basic responsibility of colleagues, was prompt and extraordinarily careful. Indeed, he devoted the spring of 1971, his first sabbatical and one taken to help him recover from several painful operations, to his usual careful analysis of theses. Mosely also made counseling his own students and others an art. He always found time and energy to give advice and help, when asked, to students and colleagues who needed technical assistance, advice concerning fellowships or positions, or simple solace. His concern for all students, his almost intuitive understanding of them, and his devotion to the academic community all help explain the fruitful role he was able to play when Columbia was torn by dissension and troubles in 1968.

Professor Mosely was also one of the first to recognize that teaching is not limited to the classroom. He was very active with businessmen's groups interested in international politics. He felt an especial obligation to meet foreign scholars of all political persuasions in international conferences, and he was eager to consult with scholars from other countries, especially in Eastern and Western Europe and in Asia, concerning means of improving higher education and international understanding.

Professor Mosely's greatest contribution, however, was in expanding and improving research and instruction concerning Russia and Eastern Europe and in promoting multidisciplinary study. He was one of the original members of the famed Joint Committee on Slavic Studies, established by the Social Science Research Council and the American Council of Learned Societies in 1937, which has served as the principal planning and coordinating body for American study of Russia and Eastern Europe. This group not only brought major scholars together in a cooperative program, but it created a spirit of joint endeavor that helped the Russian field to spread easily into new centers of study and to avoid the shattering conflicts that divided Chinese studies so bitterly in the 1950s.

Professor Mosely was one of the founders of Columbia's Russian Institute, which since 1946 has been the model for training scholar-teachers in all non-Western areas. He served as director of the institute from 1951 to 1955, when he left Columbia for eight years to become director of studies at the Council on Foreign Relations, where his work at a more advanced level helped to stimulate research and the publication of a series of volumes on China and Western Europe.

His services extended far beyond the usual confines of even a great university. Impressed by our need for more information and by the plight of refugees from the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, he helped to organize and administer the Research Program on the USSR and the East European Fund, which from 1951 through 1961 and 1952 through 1961, respectively, enabled hundreds of refugee scholars to continue their studies and to make the transfer to American academic life. He helped establish the Chekhov Publishing Company, which published the works of refugee scholars as well as Russian classics then unavailable in Soviet editions. Professor Mosely somehow found time to establish a Russian archive at Columbia University, which has already become an important repository for manuscripts and memoirs, both written and recorded on tape. He served as a consultant for both the Ford and the Rockefeller Foundations and on the boards of trustees of organizations such as the Foreign Policy Corporation and the RAND Corporation.

In short, Professor Mosely enjoyed a full, successful, and satisfying life of service. He was acknowledged for his labors by honorary degrees from the University of Notre Dame, Union College, and Middlebury College. Above all, he won the respect and affection of hundreds and even thousands of American and foreign scholars for the immense learning and understanding he carried so lightly, for his keen, analytical intelligence, for his warm interest and compassion, and for his absolute integrity and decency.

ROBERT F. BYRNES
Indiana University

WILLIAM L. NEUMANN, professor of history and chairman of the American Studies program at Goucher College, died on September 30, 1971, at the age of fifty-six.

Born in Buffalo, New York, he earned a bachelor's degree from the State Teachers College in Buffalo and then a master's degree and a doctorate from the University of Michigan. A pacifist and conscientious objector during World War II, he served in lieu of military service as a forest ranger in California and Massachusetts, as a lumberman in northern Michigan and Oregon, and then for a year as a human guinea pig at the University of Pennsylvania Medical School. At the end of the war he joined the faculty of the University of Hawaii, leaving there in 1949. That year he became executive secretary of the Foundation for Foreign Affairs and editor of American Perspective, a quarterly journal of foreign affairs. He first came to Goucher in 1952 while serving as staff consultant on foreign affairs for the U.S. Senate Republican Policy Committee. By 1958 he was a full professor at Goucher. He also taught at Howard University, the University of Virginia, the University of Maryland, the University of Wisconsin, Temple University, and Morgan State College.

His distaste for war carried over into his scholarly work. A revisionist historian in the tradition of Charles Beard, he was a constant critic of U.S. foreign policy. His role as critic took him into several fields of endeavor: speaking before various organizations, radio and television appearances, and membership in organizations such as the Society for a Sane Nuclear Policy, the Conference on Peace Research, the Society for Historians of American Foreign Policy, the American Civil Liberties Union, the American Historical Association, and the American Association of University Professors.

Author of many scholarly articles he also wrote two books: America Encounters Japan: From Perry to MacArthur (1963) and After Victory: Churchill, Roosevelt, Stalin and the Making of the Peace (1967). A popular and dynamic teacher, his sudden death saddened a host of friends.

GEORGE A. FOOTE
Goucher College

ALLAN NEVINS, former president of the American Historical Association, died on March 5, 1971, after a varied and distinguished career of some sixty years in journalism, teaching, writing, scholarship, and academic and public service. Born May 20, 1890, on a farm outside Camp Point, Illinois, of Scottish and German forebears, Allan Nevins learned early the cardinal virtues of duty, industry, thrift, perseverance, and probity—qualities he displayed in exemplary form the rest of his life. In 1908 he entered the University of Illinois where he studied English literature and edited the college paper. He stayed on for a year after graduation to study under the brilliant Stuart Sherman and to write the first of his many books, a biography of Robert Rogers. Professor Sherman recommended the young literary critic to friends in New York City; in 1914 Nevins moved to that city, which remained thereafter his spiritual and intellectual home, and took a job as editorial writer on the Evening Post—whose history he promptly wrote. He was now fairly launched on that editorial career which was to command his lifelong allegiance, serving successively as editor on the Post, literary editor on the New York Sun, and editorial writer under Walter Lippmann on the Morning World. Nevins's abiding interest in journalism was attested by his history of the Post, a collection of American Press Opinion from Washington to Coolidge (1928), several volumes of collected editorials by Walter Lippmann, and contributions to the Dictionary of American Biography on newspapermen and journalists, which together constitute a compendious volume. Somehow amid the exacting demands of editorial work Nevins found time to produce, in 1924, a history of the American States during and after the American Revolution, which was awarded the first of many prizes he was to receive in his long literary life and which remained, for almost half a century, a standard and almost a classic work in its field. Next year came the first of several versions of a biography of John C. Frémont, and in 1927 he wrote a volume in the new History of Social Life series, The Emergence of Modern America, which foreshadowed a lifelong interest in the Reconstruction era of American history.

Now fully—though not exclusively—committed to a life of scholarship, editor Nevins became, in 1927, Professor Nevins of Cornell University. Within one year, however, he had returned to New York City to join the faculty of Columbia University, an institution to which he was married and faithful for the rest of his long life.

Professor Nevins was now fairly launched on what proved to be the most productive scholarly and teaching career of any American historian, for none other of this century produced so many major books and so many major students and disciples as this unassuming scholar who was himself innocent of any academic study of history and who so conspicuously lacked the imprimatur of the Ph.D. Now that he could devote full time to scholarship, Nevins turned his cascading energies to the rewriting of much of American history; what was perhaps most remarkable is that he managed to write equally well for a scholarly and a popular audience; his scholarly works were written in vigorous graceful prose and his popular articles, essays, and reviews with a scrupulous regard to scholarly standards. He did not confine himself to any one specialty or area of history but was equally at home in—and productive in—biography and political, diplomatic, military, economic, social, and cultural history. His study of Frémont was followed by major biographies of Henry White (1930), Grover Cleveland (1932), Abram Hewitt (1933), Hamilton Fish (1936), and Herbert Lehman (1963). Three biographical studies proclaimed Mr. Nevins's abiding interest in the history of business—a two-volume biography of John D. Rockefeller (1940), which was in effect a history of the Standard Oil Company and the Rockefeller Foundation; an essay (written with Jeanette Mirsky) on The World of Eli Whitney (1952); and three volumes (written with Frank E. Hill) on Henry Ford: the Time, the Man, the Company (1954–63), a full-scale history of the Ford Motor Company and even of the automobile industry in America. Two volumes in the new Yale Chronicles of America series—in addition to innumerable articles—attested a lifelong concern with foreign policy. The Gateway to History (1938), designed to invite amateurs as well as to instruct professionals, remains perhaps the most luminous introduction to the study of historiography; and a small study, State Universities and Democracy (1962), managed to say something original about American higher education.

In 1945 Professor Nevins decided to concentrate his major energies—for he could never resist the temptation of forays into other interesting fields—on a rewriting of James Ford Rhodes's history of the United States in the Civil War era. To this work, which he planned to span a period of roughly thirty years and which he expected would require twelve volumes, he gave the felicitous name The Ordeal of the Union (1947–71). He lived to complete eight of the volumes, carrying the story from the close of the Mexican War to Appomattox. The Ordeal of the Union provided a bridge from the old to the new history. Narrative in form, based on exhaustive research in newspapers, manuscript, and archival materials, rich in original interpretations, and presented in a style always vigorous and lucid and often eloquent, The Ordeal of the Union was closer to the great narrative histories of the nineteenth century—those by Parkman, Henry Adams, and Rhodes—or to those English models Mr. Nevins so admired—those by Macaulay, Lecky, Churchill, and the two Trevelyan—than it was to the new technical history that (with his encouragement) many of his own students were already writing. Allan Nevins was in many ways a stout traditionalist, but he was also—witness his sponsorship of oral history—an innovator, and one of his last articles celebrated the new techniques

- which were even then transforming much of the conventional history that he had written.

Not content with this prodigious output of original work, Professor Nevins undertook editorial activities sufficient to occupy the full time of most scholars. While still editor on the World he wrote a minor classic of social history—American Social History as Recorded by British Travelers (1923). In 1927 he began to make available some of the more famous diaries of American history: that of the New York City social leader, Philip Hone, in two volumes; those of Presidents Polk and John Quincy Adams in single volumes; two volumes of the journals of Toledo's Brand Whitlock; and, most valuable of all, the massive four-volume diary of George Templeton Strong. Alongside these stand a dozen or so other collections of letters and public papers—the previously mentioned volumes of Walter Lippmann's editorials, the letters of Grover Cleveland and Abram Hewitt, and a selection from the public papers of John F. Kennedy. And during the whole of Nevins's academic life he exercised close editorial supervision over several major series: the American Political Leaders series, the new Chronicles of America series, the Nations of the Modern World series, Heath's College and University History series, and, in the last decade of his life, the fifteen-volume Civil War Centennial series.

This most industrious of scholars was also the most dedicated of teachers. For thirty years he lectured to large classes of graduate students and, in his overcrowded seminars, guided literally scores of others through dissertations and into scholarly careers—dissertations which he supervised and edited with meticulous care, careers which he encouraged with ceaseless benevolence, for his relationship with his graduate students was always in loco parentis. His teaching was not confined to Columbia University. He lectured widely, taught for one year in the universities of Australia, and twice held the Harmsworth Chair of American History at Oxford University, where he managed to penetrate the formidable barriers of traditionalism and introduce some long-needed reforms.

Professor Nevins had a third career, which might be characterized—in no pejorative sense—as entrepreneurial. Ceaselessly concerned for the reputation and well-being of Clio, he turned much of his energy to celebrating her virtues, protecting her from those he thought her enemies, and advancing her cause. There was a Napoleonic quality about Nevins's combination of grand strategy and tactics in these undertakings. We can recall him looking out from his eyrie on the sixth floor of Fayerweather Hall—that vast book-lined and paper-strewn room where the very air vibrated with his energetic presence—looking out not merely over the campus of Columbia University but over the whole broad realm of history and planning forays and excursions to assure its prosperity and its triumph. Thus he launched a campaign to build up the history collections of the University library and brought it to a fortunate conclusion by obtaining for the University the munificent Frederic Bancroft Fund. Thus he campaigned to introduce more American history into the high schools, and he succeeded in influencing legislation everywhere in the nation. Thus he championed the potentialities and the dignity of business history; in his own voluminous writing and those of his associates and students and in the creation of business archives, he did much to give respectability to that heretofore neglected enterprise. Thus he worked long to establish a popular journal that would present American history as Harper's, the Century, and Scribner's of the late Victorian era had done; though he had little help here from his professional colleagues, he succeeded in founding the Society of American Historians and launching the now widely read American Heritage, whose counselor he remained to the end of his life.

Doubtless most important of all was Nevins's role in creating—or reviving—modernizing, systematizing, and institutionalizing oral history. Oral history itself was as old as Homer and the Icelandic sagas; what Professor Nevins envisioned was a systematic and professional exploitation of personal recollections of men and women who had played public roles. What would we not give, he used to ask, for Washington's account of his services in the Revolution, for Lincoln's detailed observations on his presidency. It was an argument that persuaded President Truman, and scores of others, to provide thousands of pages of oral history to eager tape recorders. The Bancroft Fund enabled Mr. Nevins to inaugurate this project at Columbia University; soon he had worked out an effective technique and trained a corps of younger scholars in that technique; soon the oral history project developed into a formidable and invaluable archive. The idea spread from academy to academy, to private associations like the medical associations and the Red Cross, to government bureaus, and to corporation offices until within two decades oral history became a new dimension of historical research at home and abroad.

In 1958 Mr. Nevins retired, formally, from Columbia University and took the post of senior research associate at the Huntington Library. There he devoted his still abounding energies to building up the library and manuscript collections of that institution, helping to make it pre-eminent in many fields of history and literature, and to his own writing. He was, by long training, a bookman and a book collector; his private library, much of which he disposed of in his own lifetime, numbered well over twenty-five thousand volumes.

Allan Nevins had a distinguished public as well as scholarly and academic career. During the Great War he served as cultural attaché to the United States Embassy in London, and later was a kind of cultural ambassador to Australia. He was an adviser to presidents and statesmen—General Eisenhower, Cordell Hull, Herbert Lehman, John G. Winant, Adlai Stevenson, and John F. Kennedy among them. He rescued the Civil War Centennial Commission from the hands of antiquarians and party hacks. He served, at various times, as president of the Society of American Historians, president of the American Academy of Arts and Letters, fellow of the New-York Historical Society, and historical adviser to the Sixth Fleet. Nor should we fail to recall that shortly after his retirement from Columbia University he gave that institution, out of his literary earnings, half a million dollars to endow a chair of American economic history—a chair that now bears his name.

In all this Allan Nevins sounds like an institution and, indeed, had he not been so ebullient and so dynamic, observers might have mistaken him for that. No mere formal account of his career does justice to his affluent personality—to that enthusiasm for learning so contagious that few could resist its importunities; to that single-minded practicality which had no time for academic dalliance but concentrated on getting results; to that tireless tenacity which overcame obstacles of nature and of human nature and brought his own enterprises and those of his students to fulfillment; to that generosity, moral and intellectual even more than material, which left no room for envy or malice (in almost forty years of intimacy I never heard Allan make a malicious remark about a fellow scholar); to that homespun simplicity and unpretentiousness which permitted him to take on whatever tasks came to hand that he thought worth doing, to accept old and young with equal fellowship, to extend help to amateurs as readily as to fellow scholars; to a capacity for friendship and affection which brought him the devotion of friends in almost every segment of society—academic, journalistic, political, business, military, and merely neighborly. Somehow Nevins found time, too, for an immense correspondence, not only with fellow scholars and graduate students, but with the exalted world of statesmen, with the fluctuating world of business, with editors, novelists, poets, social workers, and old friends. A collection of some fifty thousand of these letters now awaits the student of American cultural history in the archives of his beloved university.

The pattern of Allan Nevins's private, social, professional, and public life was ever harmonious. That same harmony will be found in the historical monument he left behind him—a monument that will, for many years, cast its long shadow across the historical landscape which he surveyed, explored, cultivated, and embellished with such devotion and passion.

HENRY STEELE COMMAGER
Amherst College

WALTER M. SIMON died unexpectedly at his home in Ashley, Staffordshire, early in June of last year. Professor of history and head of the department at Keele University, he was also prominent in the affairs of that university, serving on many committees as well as being one of three regular advisers of the vice-chancellor.

Although born in Germany, on May 29, 1922, Walter Simon spent his formative years in England. He attended Repton School where, along with a sound education, he acquired his enthusiasm for cricket. His undergraduate training was at Wesleyan University, where he received the B.A. in 1943. From then until 1946 he served in the United States Army. Following the war he studied at Yale under the late Professor Hajo Holborn; he received his M.A. in 1948 and his Ph.D. in 1949. His first teaching assignment was at Stanford University, where he remained until he moved to Cornell in 1953. In 1965 he accepted the position at Keele.

Although Simon's original field of specialization was modern Germany, his interest early began to shift to intellectual history, particularly to Auguste Comte and the Positivists. His dissertation was published by the Cornell University Press in 1955 under the title The Failure of the Prussian Reform Movement, and was followed by articles that eventually were incorporated in his European Positivism in the Nineteenth Century (1963). By the time he moved to Keele he seemed to have hit his stride, with volumes appearing every other year: Germany: A Brief History (1966), Germany in the Age of Bismarck (1968), and French Liberalism 1789-1848, which was in the press at the time of his death and is being published by Wiley. In addition, he was at work on a major book on the Enlightenment, had made several contributions to the forthcoming Dictionary of the History of Ideas, and was hoping to return to his first love, the French Revolution.

No one who knew him could doubt Walter Simon's dedication to scholarship and teaching, although some, including not a few students, found his standards idiosyncratic as well as exceptionally high. His concept of discipline, intellectual and personal, was exacting, but students willing to work with him on his own terms clearly profited from his influence. As a colleague, in the United States, he was correct, courteous, and reserved—qualities that earned more respect than close friendship, though there were striking exceptions, notably his association with the late Theodor Mommsen.

To many who had known him in the United States he seemed more in his proper element after his return to England where his work flourished and his qualities were at once recognized and appreciated.

E. W. FOX
Cornell University

Other members of the association who have died recently include John Askling of Malaga, New Jersey, and Herbert C. Cohen of C. W. Post College, Greenvale, New York.

Other Books Received

Books listed were received by the AHR between December 1, 1971, and February 1, 1972. Books that will be reviewed are not listed, but listing does not preclude subsequent review.

GENERAL

APTER, DAVID E., and ANDRAIN, CHARLES F. (eds.). Contemporary Analytical Theory. Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall. 1972. Pp. x, 688. $12.50.

BAIROCH, PAUL. Le Tiers-Monde dans l'impasse: Le démarrage économique du XVIII<sup>e</sup> au XX<sup>e</sup> siècle. Collection Idées. [Paris:] Gallimard. 1971. Pp. 372.

BAKKE, E. WIGHT, and BAKKE, MARY S. Campus Challenge: Student Activism in Perspective. [Hamden, Conn.:] Archon Books. 1971. Pp. x, 573. $14.50.

BARON, SALO WITTMAYER. Steeled by Adversity: Essays and Addresses on American Jewish Life. Ed. by JEANNETTE MEISEL BARON. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America. 1971. Pp. xi, 729. $9.00.

BECKFORD, GEORGE L. Persistent Poverty: Underdevelopment in Plantation Economies of the Third World. New York: Oxford University Press. 1972. Pp. xxvii, 303. Cloth $7.50, paper $2.95.

Bibliographie internationale de l'Humanisme et de la Renaissance. Vol. 5, Travaux parus en 1969. Fédération internationale des Sociétés et Instituts pour l'étude de la Renaissance. Ouvrage publié sur la recommandation du Conseil International de la Philosophie et des Sciences Humaines, avec le concours du C.N.R.S. et de l'U.N.E.S.C.O. Geneva: Librairie Droz. 1971. Pp. x, 614.

CHERNIAVSKY, MICHAEL, et al. Social Textures of Western Civilization: The Lower Depths. In 2 vols. Waltham, Mass.: Xerox College Publishing. 1972. Pp. xvii, 411; xv, 302.

COLLIER, BOYD. Measurement and Environmental Deterioration. Research Monograph No. 34. Austin: Bureau of Business Research, University of Texas. 1971. Pp. xi, 100. $3.00.

CORVISIER, ANDRÉ. Précis d'histoire moderne. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France. 1971. Pp. 477. 59 fr.

DECONDE, ALEXANDER (ed.). Student Activism: Town and Gown in Historical Perspective. New York:

Charles Scribner's Sons. 1971. Pp. viii, 342. Cloth $10.00, paper $3.65.

DIESING, PAUL. Patterns of Discovery in the Social Sciences. Observations. Chicago: Aldine-Atherton. 1971. Pp. x, 350. $11.75.

DOLGOFF, SAM (ed., tr. and with an introd.). Bakunin on Anarchy: Selected Works by the Activist-Founder of World Anarchism. Preface by PAUL AVRICH. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1972. Pp. xxvii, 405, vii. $10.00.

GATZKE, HANS W. (ed. with an introd.). European Diplomacy between Two Wars, 1919-1939. Modern Scholarship on European History. Chicago: Quadrangle Books. 1972. Pp. 277. $3.45.

GILBERT, ARTHUR N. (ed.). In Search of a Meaningful Past. New Perspectives in History. Boston: Houghton Mifflin. 1972. Pp. x, 233. $3.95.

GLAZIER, KENNETH M., and HOBSON, JAMES R. International and English-Language Collections: A Survey of Holdings at the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace. Hoover Institution Survey of Holdings: 3. Stanford: Hoover Institution, Stanford University. 1971. Pp. iv, 20. $2.00.

GOLDMAN, EMMA. Red Emma Speaks: Selected Writings and Speeches. Comp. and ed. by ALIX KATES SHULMAN. New York: Random House. 1972. Pp. x, 413. Cloth $10.00, paper $2.45.

GRANT, CHARLES. The War Game. New York: St. Martin's Press. 1971. Pp. 191. $8.95.

GREER, THOMAS H. A Brief History of Western Man. 2d ed.; New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich. 1972. Pp. xii, 546.

GUNST, PÉTER (ed.). Bibliographia Historiae Rerum Rusticarum Internationalis, 1967-1968. Budapest: Museum Rerum Rusticarum Hungariae. 1971. Pp. 355.

MARQUIS, ROGER. English-French, French-English Vocabulary of Prehistoric Archaeology: Vocabulaire français-anglais, anglais-français d'archéologie préhistorique. Foreword by ALEXIS KLIMOV. Montreal: Presses de l'Université du Québec. 1972. Pp. xii, 42, xii, 43. $5.00.

MICHELS, ROBERT. Les partis politiques: Essai sur les tendances oligarchiques des démocraties. Tr. by S.

JANKELEVITCH. Preface by RENÉ RÉMOND. Science. [Paris:] Flammarion. 1971. Pp. 309.

MICHOFF, NICOLAS V. Contribution à l'histoire du commerce de la Turquie et de la Bulgarie. Vol. 6, Auteurs français, allemands et anglais. Bulgarska Akademiia na Naukite, Tsentralna Biblioteka. Sofia: Izdatelstvo na Bulgarskata Akademiia na Naukite. 1970. Pp. 573. 5.42 Lv.

MOUSNIER, ROLAND. Le gerarchie sociali dal 1450 ai nostri giorni. Ed. by ETTORE ROTELLI. Cultura e storia, No. 7. [Milan:] Editrice Vita e Pensiero. 1971. Pp. 1, 165. L. 3,200.

OECD Economic Outlook. No. 10. [Washington:] Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. 1971. Pp. 99. $3.80.

OLSON, RICHARD (ed.). Science as Metaphor: The Historical Role of Scientific Theories in Forming Western Culture. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth Publishing Co. 1971. Pp. ix, 321.

PETERSON, AGNES F. Western Europe: A Survey of Holdings at the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace. Hoover Institution Survey of Holdings: 1. Stanford: Hoover Institution, Stanford University. 1970. Pp. iv, 60. $3.00.

REDLICH, FRITZ. Steeped in Two Cultures: A Selection of Essays. Torchbook Library Ed. New York: Harper and Row. 1971. Pp. xviii, 430. $9.00.

ROTELLI, ETTORE, and SCHIERA, PIERANGELO (eds.). Lo Stato moderno. Vol. 1, Dal Medioevo all'età moderna. Bologna: Società Editrice il Mulino. [1971.] Pp. 294. L. 3,000.

SALPER, ROBERTA (ed., with introds.). Female Liberation: History and Current Politics. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1972. Pp. xi, 246.

SCHNEIR, MIRIAM (ed. and with an introd. and commentaries). Feminism: The Essential Historical Writings. New York: Random House. 1972. Pp. xxi, 360. Cloth $7.95, paper $2.45.

STAMMER, OTTO (ed.). Max Weber and Sociology Today. Tr. by KATHLEEN MORRIS. Explorations in Interpretative Sociology. Torch Book Library Ed. New York: Harper and Row. 1971. Pp. viii, 256. $7.50.

STEARNS, PETER N. (ed.). The Impact of the Industrial Revolution: Protest and Alienation. Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall. 1972. Pp. vi, 186. Cloth $5.95, paper $2.45.

STERN, B. E., and LEWIS, D. X-Rays. [London:] Pitman Publishing; distrib. by Harper and Row, New York. 1971. Pp. viii, 305. $11.00.

SUSSMAN, IRVING. As Others See Us: A Look at the Rabbi, Priest and Minister through the Eyes of Literature. New York: Sheed and Ward. 1971. Pp. vi, 266. $7.50.

SUTMAN, FRANCIS X. (ed.). What Kind of Environment Will Our Children Have? Proceedings of the AACTE/OAS Conference on Education and the Environment in the Americas. Sponsored by American Association of Colleges for Teacher Education and the Organization of American States. Held in Washington, D. C. October 19-22, 1970. [Washington:] American Association of Colleges for Teacher Education. 1971. Pp. x, 92.

TELFORD, SHIRLEY. Economic and Political Peace. 2d ed.; Portland, Ore.: William and Richards. 1972. Pp. xiv, 236. $5.95.

TOMPKINS, E. BERKELEY (ed. with an introd.). Peaceful Change in Modern Society. Hoover Institutions Publications 101. Stanford: Hoover Institution Press, Stanford University. 1971. Pp. xi, 158. Cloth $6.50, paper $3.95.

Trotsky, Leon, Writings of (1934-35). New York: Pathfinder Press. 1971. Pp. 364. Cloth $8.95, paper $3.45.

WOODWARD, HERBERT N. The Human Dilemma. New York: Brookdale Press. 1971. Pp. x, 198. $5.95.

ANCIENT

HANSEN, ESTHER V. The Attalids of Pergamon. Cornell Studies in Classical Philology, Vol. 36. 2d rev. ed.; Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1971. Pp. xx, 531. $27.50. See rev. of 1st ed. (1947), AHR, 53 (1947-48): 526.

HERBERT, KEVIN. Greek and Latin Inscriptions in the Brooklyn Museum. Brooklyn: Brooklyn Museum. 1972. Pp. xvii, 93, 28 plates. $8.00.

PINGREE, DAVID. Census of the Exact Sciences in Sanskrit. Ser. A, Vol. 2. Memoirs of the American Philosophical Society, Vol. 86. Philadelphia: the Society. 1971. Pp. vii, 147. $6.00.

MEDIEVAL

BACHRACH, BERNARD S. (ed.). The Medieval Church: Success or Failure? European Problem Studies. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 1972. Pp. 120.

DOMMANGET, MAURICE. La Jacquerie. Petite Collection Maspero 95. Paris: François Maspero. 1971. Pp. 125.

ERGANG, ROBERT. Emergence of the National State. Anvil Original. New York: Van Nostrand Reinhold. 1971. Pp. vi, 249. $3.50.

FÉDOU, RENÉ. L'État au Moyen Âge. Collection SUP, "L'historien," No. 8. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France. 1971. Pp. 212.

HUNT, NOREEN (ed.). Clunian Monasticism in the Central Middle Ages. [Hamden, Conn.:] Archon Books. 1971. Pp. x, 248. $15.00.

JOHN OF PARIS. On Royal and Papal Power. Tr. with an introd. by J. A. WATT. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies. 1971. Pp. 261.

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH AND IRELAND

CAMERON, WILLIAM J. (ed.). Poems on Affairs of State: Augustan Satirical Verse, 1660-1714. Vol. 5, 1688-1697. New Haven: Yale University Press. 1971. Pp. xliii, 650. $25.00.

Canada. OECD Economic Surveys. [Washington:] Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. 1971. Pp. 65. $1.00.

GARDINER, LESLIE. The Royal Oaks Courts Martial. Annapolis: United States Naval Institute. 1965. Pp. xi, 258. $4.75.

GRAYSON, L. M., and BLISS, MICHAEL (eds., with an introd.). The Wretched of Canada: Letters to R. B. Bennett 1930-1935. The Social History of Canada. [Toronto:] University of Toronto Press. 1971. Pp. xxvii, 199. Cloth $12.50, paper $3.95.

HIGHAM, ROBIN (ed.). A Guide to the Sources of British Military History. Sponsored by the Conference on British Studies. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1971. Pp. xxi, 630. $22.50.

HUSSEY, W. D. British History, 1815-1939. New York: Cambridge University Press. 1971. Pp. 367. $6.95.

List of Gifts and Deposits in the Scottish Record Office. Vol. 1. Edinburgh: H. M. Stationery Office. 1971. Pp. vi, 123. £2.75.

MOODY, T. W. (ed.). Irish Historiography, 1936-70. Dublin: Irish Committee of Historical Sciences. 1971. Pp. viii, 155. £1.00.

NEW, JOHN F. H. (ed.). Oliver Cromwell: Pretender, Puritan, Statesman, Paradox? European Problem Studies. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 1972. Pp. 124.

PUBLIC ARCHIVES OF CANADA. Report, 1959-1969. [Ottawa: the Archives.] 1971. Pp. 92, 96.

SCHULTZ, HAROLD J. (ed. and with an introd.). English Liberalism and the State: Individualism or Collectivism? Problems in European Civilization. Lexington, Mass.: D. C. Heath. 1972. Pp. xxiv, 152.

SEELEY, J. R. The Expansion of England. Ed. and with an introd. by JOHN CROSS. Classics of British Historical Literature. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1971. Pp. xxvii, 248. $9.50.

United Kingdom. OECD Economic Surveys. [Washington:] Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. 1971. Pp. 43. $1.00.

WALVIN, JAMES. The Black Presence: A Documentary History of the Negro in England, 1555-1860. Sourcebooks in Negro History. New York: Schocken Books. 1972. Pp. 222. $8.50.

ZIMANSKY, CURT A. (ed.). The Eighteenth Century: A Current Bibliography for 1970. Philological Quarterly, Vol. 50, No. 3. Iowa City: University of Iowa. 1971. Pp. 321-531. Cloth $6.50, paper $4.50.

FRANCE

FRAGHER, RICHARD. Life and Letters in France: The Eighteenth Century. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. [1972.] Pp. xxvi, 235. Cloth $7.95, paper $3.95.

HOWARTH, W. D. Life and Letters in France: The Seventeenth Century. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. [1972.] Pp. xxvi, 237. Cloth $7.95, paper $3.95.

KNAPTON, ERNEST JOHN. Revolutionary and Imperial France, 1750-1815. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1972. Pp. xi, 147. $6.95.

MOUSNIER, ROLAND. La vénalité des offices sous Henri

IV et Louis XIII. "Collection Hier." 2d rev. ed.; Paris: Presses Universitaires de France. 1971. Pp. 724. 95 fr. See rev. of 1st ed. (1946), AHR, 52 (1946-47): 113.

RAITT, A. W. Life and Letters in France: The Nineteenth Century. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. [1972.] Pp. xxx, 177. Cloth $7.95, paper $3.95.

WEISS, LOUISE. Le sacrifice du chevalier, 3 septembre 1939-9 juin 1940. Mémoires d'une Européenne, new ser. Paris: Albin Michel. 1971. Pp. 318. 24 fr.

GERMANY, AUSTRIA, AND SWITZERLAND

ADAMS, MARION (ed.). The German Tradition: Aspects of Art and Thought in the German-Speaking Countries. New York: John Wiley and Sons. 1971. Pp. xi, 220. $5.95.

BARKER, THOMAS M. (ed.). Frederick the Great and the Making of Prussia. European Problem Studies. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 1972. Pp. 103.

RÖHL, JOHN C. G. Zwei deutsche Fürsten zur Kriegsschuldfrage: Lichnowsky und Eulenburg und der Ausbruch des Ersten Weltkriegs. Eine Dokumentation. Düsseldorf: Droste Verlag. 1971. Pp. 80. DM 14.

ROTH, ERNST. A Tale of Three Cities. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1971. Pp. ix, 178. $6.95.

STERN, FRITZ. The Failure of Illiberalism: Essays on the Political Culture of Modern Germany. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1972. Pp. xlv, 233, xii. $7.95.

ITALY

BESUTTI, GIUSEPPE M., O.S.M. Bibliografia dell'Ordine dei Servi. Vol. 1, Repertori e sussidi generali; Edizioni del secolo XV (1476-1500). Aristide M. Serra O.S.M. Memoria di Fra Paolo Attavanti. Bibliotheca Servorum Romandiolae, No. 4. Bologna: Centro di Studi O.S.M. 1971. Pp. 266.

CAMPANELLA, ANTHONY P. (comp. with introd. and notes). Giuseppe Garibaldi e la tradizione garibaldina: Una bibliografia dal 1807 al 1970. In 2 vols. Geneva: Comitato dell'Istituto Internazionale di Studi Garibaldini. 1971. Pp. xxvii, 595; vi, 600-1311. $22.00 the set.

CARLO PISACANE and GIUSEPPE LA MASA. La guerra del 1848-49 in Italia. Ed. by SALVATORE SECHI. Classici della cultura italiana. Section: Storica. Naples: Casa Editrice Fulvio Rossi. 1969. Pp. 593. L. 7,000.

GUNN, PETER. A Concise History of Italy. Studio Book. New York: Viking Press. 1971. Pp. 224. $10.00.

EASTERN EUROPE

FISCHER-GALAJI, STEPHEN (ed.). Man, State, and Society in East European History. Man, State, and Society. New York: Praeger. 1970. Pp. xiii, 343. Cloth $11.00, paper $4.95.

KODOV, KHR. Opis na slavianskite rukopisi v

bibliotekata na Bulgarskata Akademiia na Naukite [Catalog of Slavic Manuscripts in the Library of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences]. Bulgarskata Akademiia na Naukite, Tsentralna Biblioteka. Sofia: Izdatelstvo na Bulgarskata Akademiia na Naukite. 1969. Pp. 294, 52 plates. 5.24 L.

LUPU, IOAN, et al. (comps.). Bibliografia analitică a periodicelor românești [Analytical Bibliography of Romanian Periodicals]. Vol. 2, 1851-1858. Pt. II-a. Biblioteca Academiei Republicii Socialiste România și Institutul de Istorie "Nicolae Iorga" al Academiei de Științe Sociale și Politice. Bucharest: Editura Academiei Republicii Socialiste România. 1971. Pp. 451-955. Lei 64.

MADUROWICZ-URBAŃSKA, HELENA (ed.). Lustracja województwa sandomierskiego, 1789 [Inspection of the Sandomier Voivodeship, 1789]. Pt. 4, Indeksy [Index]. Instytut Historii Polskiej Akademii Nauk, Lustracje dóbr królewskich XVI-XVIII wieku, Małopolska. Polska Akademia Nauk, Oddział w Krakowie. Materiały Komisji Nauk Historycznych, No. 19. Cracow: Zakład Narodowy Imienia Ossolińskich Wydawnictwo Polskiej Akademii Nauk. 1971. Pp. 141. Zł. 35.

PRODAN, D. Supplex Libellus Valachorum: Or the Political Struggle of the Romanians in Transylvania during the 18th Century. Tr. by MARY LĂZĂRESCU. Bibliotheca Historica Romaniae, Monographs, 8. Bucharest: Publishing House of the Academy of the Socialist Republic of Romania. 1971. Pp. 476. Lei 33. See rev. of Romanian ed. (1967): AHR, 74 (1968-69), 662.

SOVIET UNION

FISHER, RAYMOND H. Records of the Russian-American Company, 1802, 1817-1867. National Archives Microfilm Publications, Pamphlet describing M11. Washington: National Archives, National Archives and Records Service, General Services Administration. 1971. Pp. v, 195.

KISH, GEORGE, with the assistance of IAN M. MATLEY et al. Economic Atlas of the Soviet Union. 2d rev. ed.; Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. 1971. Pp. 90. $12.50.

LENSEN, GEORGE ALEXANDER (tr. and ed.). War and Revolution: Excerpts from the Letters and Diaries of the Countess Olga Poutiatine. Tallahassee, Fla.: Diplomatic Press. n.d. Pp. 111. $12.50.

TROTSKY, LEON. 1905. Tr. by Anya Bostock. New York: Random House. 1971. Pp. xxi, 488. Cloth $15.00, paper $2.45.

ASIA

EMBREE, AINSLIE T. India's Search for National Identity. Studies in World Civilization. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1972. Pp. xiv, 138, v.

MAJUMDAR, R. C. History of the Hindu Colonization & Hindu Culture in South-East Asia. [Jubalpur:] University of Jubalpur. 1970. Pp. 39. Rs. 15.

VAN DYKE, JON M. North Vietnam's Strategy for Survival. With a foreword by EDWIN O. REISCHAUER.

Palo Alto, Calif.: Pacific Books. 1972. Pp. 336. $10.95.

WEST, F. J., JR. The Village. New York: Harper and Row. 1972. Pp. xi, 288. $7.95

WORCESTER, G. R. G. The Junks & Sampanns of the Yangtze. Annapolis: Naval Institute Press. 1971. Pp. 626. $45.00.

UNITED STATES

ABRAMS, RICHARD M., and LEVINE, LAWRENCE W. (eds. and with commentary). The Shaping of Twentieth-Century America: Interpretive Essays. 2d ed.; Boston: Little, Brown. 1971. Pp. xiii, 737. $6.95.

ANASTAPLO, GEORGE. The Constitutionalist: Notes on the First Amendment. Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press. 1971. Pp. xiii, 826. $20.00.

BARONE, MICHAEL, et al. The Almanac of American Politics: The Senators, the Representatives—Their Records, States and Districts. 1972. [Boston:] Gambit. 1972. Pp. xxv, 1030. Cloth $12.95, paper $4.95.

BILLINGTON, RAY ALLEN. The American Frontier Thesis: Attack and Defense. AHA Pamphlets 101. Washington: American Historical Association. 1971. Pp. 58. $1.00.

BLAKE, NELSON MANFRED. A History of American Life and Thought. 2d ed.; New York: McGraw-Hill. 1972. Pp. xix, 764. $10.95.

BOOTH, SALLY SMITH. Hung, Strung, & Potted: A History of Eating in Colonial America. New York: Clarkson N. Potter; distrib. by Crown Publishers, New York. 1971. Pp. xii, 238. $7.95.

BREWSTER, DOROTHY. William Brewster of the Mayflower: Portrait of a Pilgrim. New York: New York University Press. 1970. Pp. xiii, 116. $5.00.

CARROLL, JOHN M. Buffalo Soldiers West. Fort Collins, Col.: Old Army Press. 1971. Pp. 64. $7.00.

CASH, JOSEPH H., and HOOVER, HERBERT T. (eds.). To Be an Indian: An Oral History. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 1971. Pp. xii, 239.

CHAVIS, JOHN M. T., and MCNITT, WILLIAM. A Brief History of the Detroit Urban League and Description of the League's Papers in the Michigan Historical Collections. Bulletin No. 20. Ann Arbor: Michigan Historical Collections, University of Michigan. 1971. Pp. 22.

CLUBB, JEROME M., and ALLEN, HOWARD W. (eds.). Electoral Change and Stability in American Political History. New York: Free Press. 1971. Pp. xix, 267. $8.95.

Cochise, Niño, The First Hundred Years of: The Untold Story of an Apache Chief. As told by Ciyé "Niño" Cochise to A. Kinney Griffith. New York: Abelard-Schuman. 1971. Pp. 346. $9.95.

COMPTON, JAMES V. (ed.). America and the Origins of the Cold War. New Perspectives in History. Boston: Houghton Mifflin. 1972. Pp. xvi, 192. $3.95.

G. & D. Cook & Co.'s Illustrated Catalogue of

Carriages and Special Business Advertiser. With a new foreword by PAUL H. DOWNING. Dover Pictorial Archive Ser. Reprint; New York: Dover Publications. 1970. Pp. 226. $4.00.

CORLISS, WILLIAM R. NASA Sounding Rockets, 1958-1968: A Historical Summary. NASA Historical Report Ser. Washington: Scientific and Technical Information Office, National Aeronautics and Space Administration. 1971. Pp. vii, 158. $1.75.

CRUNDEN, ROBERT M. From Self to Society, 1919-1941. Transitions in American Thought Ser. Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall. 1972. Pp. xii, 212. Cloth $6.95, paper $2.95.

DANIELS, ROGER. Concentration Camps USA: Japanese Americans and World War II. Berkshire Studies in Minority History. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 1971. Pp. xiv, 188.

DAVIS, RONALD L. (ed.). The Social and Cultural Life of the 1920s. American Problem Studies. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 1972. Pp. 133.

DIBACCO, THOMAS V. Moorefield: Home of Early Baptist Preacher Jeremiah Moore. Fairfax, Va.: Fairfax County Division of Planning under the direction of the County Board of Supervisors, in cooperation with the County History Commission. 1971. Pp. vi, 52. $1.50.

DUBOFSKY, MELVYN (ed. with an introd.). American Labor since the New Deal. New York Times Book. Chicago: Quadrangle Books. 1971. Pp. viii, 322. Cloth $8.95, paper $2.95.

Federal Statistics: Report of the President's Commission, 1971. In 2 vols. [Washington:] President's Commission on Federal Statistics. 1971. Pp. viii, 267; vii, 555. $4.00 the set.

FELDSTEIN, STANLEY (ed.). The Poisoned Tongue: A Documentary History of American Racism and Prejudice. New York: William Morrow. 1972. Pp. 330. Cloth $10.00, paper $3.95.

FONER, ERIC (ed.). Nat Turner. Great Lives Observed. Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall. 1971. Pp. viii, 184. Cloth $5.95, paper $2.45.

FOX, LYNN H., and HURD, GORDON E. Finances of Large-City School Systems: A Comparative Analysis. DHEW Publication No. (OE) 72-29. [Washington:] U. S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Office of Education, National Center for Educational Statistics. 1971. Pp. vi, 85. $1.00.

GAINES, PIERCE W. William Cobbett and the United States, 1792-1835: A Bibliography with Notes and Extracts. Worcester, Mass.: American Antiquarian Society. 1971. Pp. xxi, 249. $17.50.

GARLAND, JOSEPH E. Eastern Point: A Nautical, Rustical, and Social Chronicle of Gloucester's Outer Shield and Inner Sanctum, 1606-1950. Peterborough, N. H.: Noone House. 1971. Pp. xiv, 424. $12.50.

GROB, GERALD N., and BILLIAS, GEORGE ATHAN. Interpretations of American History: Patterns and Perspectives. Vol. 1, To 1877; vol. 2, Since 1865. 2d ed.; New York: Free Press. 1972. Pp. xii, 530; xii, 529. $4.95 each.

HACKNEY, SHELDON (ed.). Populism: The Critical Issues. Critical Issues in American History Ser. Boston: Little, Brown. 1971. Pp. xxii, 168. $2.95.

HEFFER, JEAN. Les origines de la guerre de Sécession. Dossiers Clio. [Paris:] Presses Universitaires de France. 1971. Pp. 90.

HOLT, GLEN E. (ed.). An American in the Army and YMCA, 1917-1920: The Diary of David Lee Shillinglaw. [Chicago: University of Chicago.] 1971. Pp. xiv, 219.

JACKSON, KENNETH T., and SCHULTZ, STANLEY K. (eds., with intros.). Cities in American History. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1972. Pp. xi, 508. $12.50.

JACOBS, WILBUR R. (ed.). Benjamin Franklin: Statesman-Philosopher or Materialist? American Problem Studies. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 1972. Pp. 114.

JONES, WALLY, and WASHINGTON, JIM. Black Champions Challenge American Sports. New York: David McKay. 1972. Pp. vii, 180. $5.95.

LEONARD, IRA M., and PARMET, ROBERT D. American Nativism, 1830-1860. Anvil Original. New York: Van Nostrand Reinhold. 1971. Pp. vi, 185. $3.50.

LEVINE, LAWRENCE W., and MIDDLEKAUFF, ROBERT (eds.). The National Temper: Readings in American Culture and Society. 2d ed.; New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich. 1972. Pp. viii, 436.

LEVY, FRANK. Northern Schools and Civil Rights: The Racial Imbalance Act of Massachusetts. Markham Ser. in Public Policy Analysis. Chicago: Markham Publishing Co. 1971. Pp. xii, 190.

LORA, RONALD. Conservative Minds in America. The Rand McNally Ser. on the History of American Thought and Culture. Chicago: Rand McNally. 1971. Pp. xiii, 274. $2.95.

LORD, PRISCILLA SAWYER, and GAMAGE, VIRGINIA CLEGG. • Marblehead: The Spirit of '76 Lives Here. Philadelphia: Chilton Book Co. 1972. Pp. xii, 395. $13.95.

LUBOVE, ROY (ed.). Poverty and Social Welfare in the United States. American Problem Studies. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 1972. Pp. 122.

MASON, ALPHEUS THOMAS (ed.). The States Rights Debate: Antifederalism and the Constitution. 2d ed.; New York: Oxford University Press. 1972. Pp. ix, 210. $1.95.

MOULTON, PHILLIPS P. (ed.). The Journal and Major Essays of John Woolman. Library of Protestant Thought. New York: Oxford University Press. 1971. Pp. xviii, 336. $10.50.

The National Union Catalog of Manuscript Collections, 1970; Index 1970. Compiled by the Library of Congress from reports provided by American repositories, with assistance from the Council on Library Resources. The Library of Congress Catalogs. Washington: Library of Congress. 1971. Pp. xxvii, 636. $50.00.

NEUBECK, DEBORAH K. Guide to a Microfilm Edition of the Mexican Mission Papers of John Lind. St. Paul: Minnesota Historical Society. 1971. Pp. v, 22. $2.00.

OLMSTEAD, FREDERICK LAW. The Cotton Kingdom: A Selection. Ed. by DAVID FREEMAN HAWKE. American History Landmarks. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill. 1971. Pp. xvi, 208. $7.50.

PHILLIPS, JAMES W. Washington State Place Names. Seattle: University of Washington Press. 1971. Pp. xv, 167. $6.95.

PINKNEY, ALPHONSO. The American Way of Violence. New York: Random House. 1972. Pp. xiv, 235. Cloth $7.95, paper $1.95.

PRATT, JULIUS W. A History of United States Foreign Policy. 3d ed.; Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall. 1972. Pp. xvii, 621.

RODGERS, AVA D. The Housing of Oglethorpe County, Georgia, 1790-1860. Tallahassee: Florida State University Press. 1971. Pp. xi, 79. $12.00.

SALISBURY, RUTH (ed.). Pennsylvania Newspapers: A Bibliography and Union List. Pittsburgh: Pennsylvania Library Association. 1969. Pp. xiii, 179. $5.00.

SCHULTZ, JOHN. Motion Will Be Denied: A New Report on the Chicago Conspiracy Trial. New York: William Morrow. 1972. Pp. 376. Cloth $11.95, paper $3.95.

SIMS, CAROLYN. Labor Unions in the United States. A First Book. New York: Franklin Watts. 1971. Pp. vi, 85. $3.75. Grades 4-6.

SOBEL, ROBERT (ed.). Biographical Directory of the United States Executive Branch, 1774-1971. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood. 1971. Pp. x, 491. $27.50.

STERN, CLARENCE A. Protectionist Republicanism: Republican Tariff Policy in the McKinley Period. [Oshkosh, Wis.: the Author.] 1971. Pp. xiii, 138. $1.50 postpaid.

TANSELLE, G. THOMAS. Guide to the Study of United States Imprints. In 2 vols. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 1971. Pp. lxiv, 403; 405-1050. $40.00 the set.

TAYLOR, PAUL S. Slave to Freedman. Southern Economic History Project, Working Paper No. 7. Berkeley: Institute of Business and Economic Research, University of California. 1970. Pp. 94. $3.50.

TURNER, MARTHA ANNE. The Yellow Rose of Texas: The Story of a Song. Southwestern Studies, Monograph No. 31. El Paso: Texas Western Press, University of Texas at El Paso. 1971. Pp. 19. $2.00.

VALLET, EMILE. An Icarian Communist in Nauvoo: Commentary. With an introd. and notes by H. ROGER GRANT. Pamphlet Ser., No. 6. Springfield: Illinois State Historical Society. 1971. Pp. 79.

WATTERS, PAT. Down to Now: Reflections on the Southern Civil Rights Movement. New York: Pantheon Books. 1971. Pp. x, 426. $8.95.

WELTER, RUSH. American Writings on Popular Education: The Nineteenth Century. The American Heritage Ser. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill. 1971. Pp. lxvii, 469. Cloth $8.50, paper $4.25.

WORTHLEY, HAROLD FIELD. An Inventory of the Records of the Particular (Congregational) Churches of Massachusetts Gathered 1620-1805. Harvard Theological Studies, Vol. 25; Proceedings of the Unitarian Historical Society, Vol. 16, pts. 1 and 2. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1970. Pp. xiv, 716.

WRENN, TONY P. Huntley: A Mason Family Country House. Fairfax, Va.: Fairfax County Division of Planning under the direction of the County Board of Supervisors, in cooperation with the County History Commission. 1971. Pp. viii, 56. $1.50.

LATIN AMERICA

HANDLER, JEROME S. A Guide to Source Materials for the Study of Barbados History, 1627-1834. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press. 1971. Pp. xvi, 205. $12.50.

Latin American Research and Publications at the University of Texas at Austin, 1893-1969. Guides and Bibliographies Ser., 3. Austin: Institute of Latin American Studies at the University of Texas at Austin. 1971. Pp. viii, 187. Cloth $7.50, paper $3.75.

Ofícios dos Vice-Reis do Brasil: Índice da correspondência dirigida à Corte de Portugal de 1763 a 1808. Publicações, vol. 2. 2d ed.; Rio de Janeiro: Ministério da Justiça, Arquivo Nacional. 1970. Pp. 301.

Recently Published Articles

GENERAL

- ABRAMSON, HAROLD J. Ethnic Diversity Within Catholicism: A Comparative Analysis of Contemporary and Historical Religion. J. Soc. Hist., Summer 1971. [4144]
- AHMAD, KHURSHID. The Third World's Dilemma of Development. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [4145]
- BAIROCH, PAUL. Structure de la population active mondiale de 1700 à 1970. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4146]
- BALL, GENE V. Two Epidemics of Gout. Bull. Hist. Medicine, Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4147]
- BARZUN, JACQUES. History: The Muse and Her Doctors. AHR, Feb. 1972. [4148]
- BLAINEY, GEOFFREY. The Scapegoat Theory of International War. Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4149]
- BOWLES, EDMUND A. Towards a Computer Curriculum for the Humanities. Computers and Humanities, Sept. 1971. [4150]
- BYLEBYL, JEROME J. Galen on the Non-Natural Causes of Variation in the Pulse [note]. Bull. Hist. Medicine, Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4151]
- CHARPENTRAT, PIERRE. Pierre Francastel. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4152]
- DONALD, DAVID HERBERT. Between Science and Art [r. art.]. AHR, Apr. 1972. [4153]
- FRENCH, CARL B. Voluntary Health Programs. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [4154]
- FRIEDMANN, GEORGES. Veblen: un précurseur. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4155]
- GELLNER, ERNEST. The Historian between the Anthropologist and the Futurologist: Our Current Sense of History. Survey, Summer 1971. [4156]
- GRANT, JAMES P. Marginal Men: The Global Unemployment Crisis. For. Aff., Oct. 1971. [4157]
- Gunnar Myrdal: A Bibliography. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [4158]
- Gunnar Myrdal: International Prophet [an interview]. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [4159]
- GUNTER, P. A. Y. Bergson's Theory of Matter and Modern Cosmology. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [4160]
- HAAGERUP, NIELS JØRGEN. Europas sikkerhed—en skindebat eller alvor? [Europe's Security—A False Debate or Reality?]. Mil. tids., July-Aug. 1971. [4161]
- HOBART, MICHAEL. History and Religion in the Thought of Herbert Butterfield. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [4162]
- JESSUP, PHILIP C. The Berlin Blockade and the Use of the United Nations. For. Aff., Oct. 1971. [4163]
- KOSTKA, STEFAN M. Recent Developments in Computer-Assisted Musical Scholarship. Computers and Humanities, Sept. 1971. [4164]
- LA PORTE, ROBERT, JR.; PETRAS, JAMES F.; and RINEHART, JEFFREY C. The Concept of Agrarian Reform and its Role in Development: Some Notes on Societal Cause and Effect. Comp. Stud. Soc. Hist., Oct. 1971. [4165]
- MAGFIE, ALEC. The Invisible Hand of Jupiter [note]. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [4166]
- MAZLISH, BRUCE. What is Psycho-History? Trans. Roy. Hist. Soc., 21, 1971. [4167]
- MOLLER, HERBERT. The Social Causation of Affective Mysticism. J. Soc. Hist., Summer 1971. [4168]
- NIEBYL, PETER H. The Non-Naturals [causes of disease; note]. Bull. Hist. Medicine, Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4169]
- O'BRIEN, GEORGE DENNIS. Does Hegel Have a Philosophy of History? Hist. and Theory, no. 3, 1971. [4170]
- OLESEN, JØRN. Efterkrigsårenes strategier [Postwar Strategies]. Mil. tids., July-Aug. 1971. [4171]
- PHILLIPS, D. C. James, Dewey, and the Reflex Arc. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [4172]
- PIPES, RICHARD. "Intelligentsia" from the German "Intelligenz" [note]? Slavic R., Sept. 1971. [4173]
- ROGERS, EARL M. Books on Agricultural History Published in 1969. Agric. Hist., Oct. 1971. [4174]
- ROSEN, LAWRENCE. Language, History, and the Logic of Inquiry in Lévi-Strauss and Sartre. Hist. and Theory, no. 3, 1971. [4175]
- ROTH, GÜNTER D. Internationale Bibliographie zur vorindustriellen Handels- und Verkehrsgeschichte. Scripta Mercaturae, no. 1, 1971. [4176]
- ROTHFELS, HANS. Die Zeit, die dem Historiker zu nahe liegt. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [4177]

ROUCHE, MICHEL. La recherche historique sur la femme, l'amour et le mariage: essai de bibliographie critique. R. Nord, Apr.-June 1971. [4178]

SCHIEDER, THEODOR. Unterschiede zwischen historischer und sozialwissenschaftlicher Methode. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [4179]

SCHNEIDER, BEN R. The Production of Machine-Readable Text: Some of the Variables. Computers and Humanities, Sept. 1971. [4180]

SCHOFIELD, R. S. Historical Demography: Some Possibilities and Some Limitations. Trans. Roy. Hist. Soc., 21, 1971. [4181]

TIGGES, LINDA. The College History Survey Course: A Developmental Model. Soc. Stud., Dec. 1971. [4182]

TREVOR-ROPER, HUGH. The Historian between the Anthropologist and the Futurologist: Historical Knowledge. Survey, Summer 1971. [4183]

WELLS, GEORGE A. Goethe's Qualitative Optics [note]. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [4184]

WIDMANN, R. L. Computers and Literary Scholarship. Computers and Humanities, Sept. 1971. [4185]

WILSON, B. R. Sociological Methods in the Study of History. Trans. Roy. Hist. Soc., 21, 1971. [4186]

YOUNG, ELIZABETH. To Guard the Sea. For. Aff., Oct. 1971. [4187]

ANCIENT

George W. Houston, University of North Carolina

GENERAL

BICHIR, GH. Les Carpes dans l'historiographie roumaine et étrangère [in Romanian; Fr. summary]. Stud. Cercet. Ist. Veche (Bucharest), no. 2, 1971. [4188]

BIE, FREDRIK. Fragmenter av håndskrifter i polsk oversettelse av Sulpicius Severus krønike [Fragments of Manuscripts in Polish Translation of Sulpicius Severus' Chronicle]. Nord. tids. bok-och biblioteksväsen, no. 3, 1970. [4189]

Lead in the Wines of Antiquity. Bull. Hist. Medicine, Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4190]

MALONEY, ROBERT P. Usury in Greek, Roman and Rabbinic Thought. Traditio, XXVII, 1971. [4191]

WAITE, STEPHEN V. F. Computers and Classical Literature: 1970-1971. Computers and Humanities, Sept. 1971. [4192]

WOOD, JAMES E., JR. Jewish-Christian Relations in Historical Perspective. J. Church and State, Spring 1971. [4193]

ANCIENT NEAR EAST

ALTENMÜLLER, HARTWIG. Die Stellung der Königsmutter Chentkaus beim Übergang von der 4. zur 5. Dynastie. Chron. Egypte, July 1970. [4194]

BIANCHI, UGO. Seth, Osiris et l'ethnographie. R. Hist. Relig., no. 2, 1971. [4195]

BINGEN, JEAN. Les épistatèges de Thèbaïde sous les derniers Ptolémées. Chron. Egypte, July 1970. [4196]

BIVAR, A. D. H. A Hoard of Ingot-Currency of the Median Period from Nūsh-i Jan, near Malayir. Iran, IX, 1971. [4197]

CLARK, W. M. The Flood and the Structure of the Pre-patriarchal History. Z. Alttest. Wiss., no. 2, 1971. [4198]

COOPER, JERROLD S. Bilinguals from Boghazköi. I. Z. Assyriol., Aug. 1971. [4199]

DERRETT, J. DUNCAN M. Law in the New Testament: The Parable of the Unjust Judge. New Test. Stud., Jan. 1972. [4200]

DERRICOURT, ROBIN M. Radiocarbon Chronology for Egypt and North Africa. J. Near E. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4201]

DOSSIN, GEORGES. Deux listes nominatives du règne de Sûmu-lamam. R. Assyriol., no. 1, 1971. [4202]

DUMBRELL, WILLIAM J. The Tell el-Maskhuta Bowls and the "Kingdom" of Qedar in the Persian Period. Bull. Am. School Orient. Res., Oct. 1971. [4203]

EIFLER, RUDOLF. Die Ideologie Jesajas und ihre objektive Funktion. Das Altertum, no. 1, 1971. [4204]

ELLIS, ROWLAND. Egypt's Antiquities. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [4205]

FRICK, FRANK S. The Rechabites Reconsidered. J. Biblical Lit., Sept. 1971. [4206]

HAUPTMANN, HARALD. Norşun-Tepe. Historische Geographie und Ergebnisse der Grabungen 1968/69. Mitt. Deutsch. Archäol. Inst., Istanbul. Abt., XIX-XX, 1969-70. [4207]

HOFFNER, HARRY A., JR. Hittite ega- and egan-. J. Cuneiform Stud., no. 1-2, 1971. [4208]

HOWARD, GEORGE E. The Letter of Aristeas and Diaspora Judaism. J. Theol. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4209]

IN DER SMITTEN, WILHELM TH. Vordeuteronomischer Jahwismus in Elephantine? Bibl. orient., no. 3-4, 1971. [4210]

IRVING, T. B. Architecture and Craftsmanship: The Islamic Aspect. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [4211]

KAPLAN, J. Mesopotamian Elements in the Middle Bronze II Culture of Palestine. J. Near E. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4212]

KEALL, EDWARD. Partho-Sassanian Archaeology: A New Phase. Expedition, no. 3-4, 1971. [4213]

KLEISS, WOLFRAM. Zur Ausbreitung Urartus nach Osten. Mitt. Deutsch. Archäol. Inst., Istanbul. Abt., XIX-XX, 1969-70. [4214]

LAMBERG-KARLOVSKY, C. C. The Proto-Elamite Settlement at Tepe Yahya. Iran, IX, 1971. [4215]

LAMBERG-KARLOVSKY, C. C., and KOHL, PHILIP L. The Early Bronze Age as Seen from Tepe Yahya. Expedition, no. 3-4, 1971. [4216]

- LEVINE, LOUIS D. The Iron Age Revealed. Expedition, no. 3-4, 1971. [4217]
- LIMET, HENRI. Au début du règne de Šulgi. R. Assyriol., no. 1, 1971. [4218]
- LOEWENSTAMM, SAMUEL E. The Divine Grants of Land to the Patriarchs. J. Am. Orient. Soc., no. 4, 1971. [4219]
- LUKE, J. TRACY. Observations on ARMT XIII 39. J. Cuneiform Stud., no. 1-2, 1971. [4220]
- MASSON, V. M. The First Farmers of Mesopotamia [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vest. drev. ist., no. 3, 1971. [4221]
- MERIGGI, PIERO. Zu den neuen Inschriften in proto-aramaischer Prunkschrift. Bibl. orient., no. 3-4, 1971. [4222]
- MEYERS, ERIC M. The Theological Implications of an Ancient Jewish Burial Custom. Jewish Q. R., Oct. 1971. [4223]
- MILLARD, A. R. Fragments of Historical Texts from Nineveh: Middle Assyrian and Later Kings. Iraq, Autumn 1970. [4224]
- NAVEH, JOSEPH. Hebrew Texts in Aramaic Script in the Persian Period? Bull. Am. School Orient. Res., Oct. 1971. [4225]
- NEATE, GEOFFREY. A Fragment from Kish with the Name of Aššur-Nādin-Šumi. Iraq, Spring 1971. [4226]
- NEUGEBAUER, O. An Arabic version of Ptolemy's Parapegma from the "Phaseis." J. Am. Orient. Soc., no. 4, 1971. [4227]
- NYLANDER, CARL. The Achaemenid Empire. Expedition, no. 3-4, 1971. [4228]
- O'CONNOR, DAVID. Ancient Egypt and Black Africa—Early Contacts. Expedition, no. 3-4, 1971. [4229]
- OWEN, DAVID I. Incomplete Year Formulae of Iddin-Dagān Again. J. Cuneiform Stud., no. 1-2, 1971. [4230]
- PRITCHARD, JAMES B. The Phoenicians in Their Homeland. Expedition, no. 3-4, 1971. [4231]
- PYANKOV, I. V. Ancient Sources on the Struggle of Cyrus II against Astyages [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vest. drev. ist., no. 3, 1971. [4232]
- QUAEGBEUR, JAN. Documents Concerning a Cult of Arsinoe Philadelphos at Memphis. J. Near E. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4233]
- RENGER, JOHANNES. Notes on the Goldsmiths, Jewelers and Carpenters of Neobabylonian Eanna. J. Am. Orient. Soc., no. 4, 1971. [4234]
- SCHLUMBERGER, DANIEL. Les quatre tribus de Palmyre. Syria, no. 1-2, 1971. [4235]
- SEYRIG, HENRI. Antiquités Syriennes. 93. Bêl de Palmyre. Syria, no. 1-2, 1971. [4236]
- SMITH, PHILIP E. L. Iran, 9000-4000 B.C.: the Neolithic. Expedition, no. 3-4, 1971. [4237]
- STAGER, LAWRENCE E. Appendix: Climatic Conditions and Grain Storage in the Persian Period. Biblical Archaeologist, no. 3, 1971. [4238]
- VYCICH, WERNER. Lag das Land Punt am Meer oder im Sudan? [r. art.] Chron. Egypte, July 1970. [4239]
- WARD, WILLIAM A. The Origin of Egyptian Design-Amulets ('Button Seals'). J. Egypt. Archaeol., LVI, 1970. [4240]
- WRIGHT, G. ERNEST. A Problem of Ancient Topography: Lachish and Eglon. Biblical Archaeologist, no. 3, 1971. [4241]
- YOUNG, T. CUYLER, JR. The Search for Understanding: Excavating the Second Millennium. Expedition, no. 3-4, 1971. [4242]

ANCIENT GREECE

- ADRADOS, FRANCISCO R. Te-re-ta wa-na-ka-te-ro y los [anaktotelestai]. [On the continuity of Greek agrarian religion.] Minos, no. 2, 1969. [4243]
- BADIAN, E. Alexander The Great, 1948-67 [survey art.; 2 pts.]. Class. World, Oct., Nov. 1971. [4244]
- BILLIGMEIER, JON C. An Inquiry into the non-Greek Names on the Linear B Tablets from Knossos and their Relationship to Languages of Asia Minor. Minos, no. 2, 1969. [4245]
- BISSET, K. A. Who Were the Amazons? Greece and Rome, Oct. 1971. [4246]
- BORZA, EUGENE N. The End of Agis' Revolt. Class. Philol., Oct. 1971. [4247]
- BREEBAART, A. B. Plutarch and the Political Development of Pericles. Mnemosyne, no. 3, 1971. [4248]
- BRUCE, I. A. F. The Corcyraean Civil War of 427 B.C. Phoenix, no. 2, 1971. [4249]
- BUCKLER, JOHN. Theban Treaty Obligations in IG II 2 40: A Postscript. Historia, no. 3, 1971. [4250]
- CARTER, JOHN M. Athens, Euboea, and Olynthus. Historia, no. 3, 1971. [4251]
- CASSON, LIONEL. The Origin of the Lateen. Am. Neptune, Jan. 1971. [4252]
- CHERNICK, STEVEN. Historical Manipulation in Thucydides? Class. World, Dec. 1971. [4253]
- DAUX, GEORGES. Sur une clause du traité conclu entre le roi Attale I<sup>er</sup> de Pergame et la cité de Malla (Crète). R. hist. droit fr. étranger, no. 3, 1971. [4254]
- DAVIES, COLIN. Empedocles of Acragas. Hist. Today, Oct. 1971. [4255]
- DOVATUR, A. I. Theognis and Megara [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vest. drev. ist., no. 3, 1971. [4256]
- EATOUGH, GEOFFREY. The Use of [Hosios] and Kindred Words in Thucydides. Am. J. Philol., Apr. 1971. [4257]
- FILLION-LAHILLE, JANINE. La colère chez Aristote. R. Et. anc., Jan.-June 1970. [4258]
- FORNARA, CHARLES W. The Cult of Harmodius and Aristogeiton. Philologus, no. 3-4, 1970. [4259]
- FORNARA, CHARLES W. The Date of the "Regulations for Miletus." Am. J. Philol., July 1971. [4260]
- FROLOV, E. D. First Steps and Accession to Power of Dionysius the Elder [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vest. drev. ist., no. 3, 1971. [4261]
- GILLIARD, FRANK W. Teleological Development in the Athenaion Politeia. Historia, no. 3, 1971. [4262]

GILLIS, DANIEL. Isocrates' Panegyricus: The Rhetorical Texture. Wiener Stud., LXXXIV, 1971. [4263]

GRANT, J. R. Thucydides 2.37.1. Phoenix, no. 2, 1971. [4264]

JOST, MADELEINE. Les grandes déesses d'Arcadie [r. art.]. R. Et. anc., Jan.-June 1970. [4265]

KUKLINA, I. V. Anacharsis [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vest. drev. ist., no. 3, 1971. [4266]

LONG, J. BRUCE. Śiva and Dionysos—visions of terror and bliss. Numen, Dec. 1971. [4267]

LUPPE, WOLFGANG. Zur Datierung einiger Dramatiker in der Eusebios/Hieronymus-Chronik. Philologus, no. 1-2, 1970. [4268]

MEILLIER, CLAUDE. La chouette et Athéna. R. Et. anc., Jan.-June 1970. [4269]

MICHEL, HENRI. Une clepsydre grecque antique. Physis, no. 4, 1970. [4270]

MOSLEY, D. J. Athens' Alliance with Thebes 339 B.C. Historia, no. 3, 1971. [4271]

MOSLEY, D. J. Diplomacy by conference: almost a spartan contribution to democracy? Emerita, no. 1, 1971. [4272]

MUHL, JAMES D. Homer and the Phoenicians. The Relations between Greece and the Near East in the Late Bronze and Early Iron Ages. Berytus, XIX, 1970. [4273]

MURRAY, OSWYN. Hecataeus of Abdera and Pharaonic Kingship. J. Egypt. Archaeol., LVI, 1970. [4274]

OOST, STEWART IRVIN. Cypselus the Bacchiad. Class. Philol., Jan. 1972. [4275]

PÉDECH, PAUL. Un historien nommé Cratippe. R. Et. anc., Jan.-June 1970. [4276]

PERCIVAL, JOHN. Thucydides and the Uses of History. Greece and Rome, Oct. 1971. [4277]

- PIKUS, N. N. "Planned" Sowing in Hellenistic Egypt [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vest. drev. ist., no. 3, 1971. [4278]

POMERANCE, LEON. The Need for Guide Lines in Interdisciplinary Meetings [à propos des Santorini volcano]. Am. J. Archaeol., Oct. 1971. [4279]

QUINN, T. J. Political Groups in Lesbos during the Peloponnesian War. Historia, no. 3, 1971. [4280]

RHODES, P. J. [Trittis tōn prytaneōn.] Historia, no. 4, 1971. [4281]

SCHÄUBLIN, CHRISTOPH. Wieder einmal [prophasis]. Mus. Helvet., no. 3, 1971. [4282]

SEGAL, CHARLES. Croesus on the Pyre: Herodotus and Bacchylides. Wiener Stud., LXXXIV, 1971. [4283]

STROGETSKY, V. M. The African and Sicilian Expeditions of Dorieus [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vest. drev. ist., no. 3, 1971. [4284]

THOMPSON, WESLEY E. The Deme in Kleisthenes' Reforms. Symbolae Osloenses, XLVI, 1971. [4285]

THOMPSON, WESLEY E. The Prytaneion Decree. Am. J. Philol., Apr. 1971. [4286]

- ZAMPELLI, M. Per la storia di Argo nella prima metà del V secolo a. C. R. Filol. Istruz. Class., no. 2, 1971. [4287]

ANCIENT ROME

AFRICA, THOMAS W. Urban Violence in Imperial Rome. J. Interdisc. Hist., Summer 1971. [4288]

ALFONSI, LUIGI. Sant'Agostino e i metodi educativi dell'antichità. Stud. Romani, July-Sept. 1971. [4289]

ARNOTT, GEOFFREY. The Praenomen of Archias. Hermes, no. 2, 1971. [4290]

BADIAN, E. Two More Roman Non-Entities. Phoenix, no. 2, 1971. [4291]

BAILEY, D. R. SHACKLETON. On Cicero Ad familiares (II). Philologus, no. 1-2, 1970. [4292]

BECHER, ILSE. Antike Heilgötter und die römische Staatsreligion. Philologus, no. 3-4, 1970. [4293]

BERCHEM, DENIS VAN. Jumeaux [some significant Roman names]. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4294]

BERNSTEIN, ALVIN H. Prosopography and the Career of Publius Mucius Scaevola. Class. Philol., Jan. 1972. [4295]

BESCHAUOCH, AZEDINE. Encore un Gaulois en Afrique: le Lyonnais M. Licinius Fidelis! Bull. Archéol., V, 1969. [4296]

BINGEN, JEAN. Note sur l'éphébie en Egypte romaine. Chron. Égypte, July 1970. [4297]

BIRD, H. W. Suetonian Influence in the Later Lives of the Historia Augusta. Hermes, no. 2, 1971. [4298]

BISCARDI, ARNALDO. "Testes estote." Contribution à l'étude du témoignage en droit romain. R. hist. droit fr. étranger, no. 3, 1971. [4299]

BLOCH, RAYMOND. Un casque celtique au corbeau et le combat mythique de Valérius Corvus. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4300]

BLOCKLEY, R. C. Dexippus of Athens and Eunapius of Sardis. Latomus, July-Sept. 1971. [4301]

BORG, MARC. The Currency of the Term "Zealot." J. Theol. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4302]

BOWIE, E. L. The "Temple of Hadrian" at Ephesus. Z. Papyrol. Epig., 8, no. 2, 1971. [4303]

BRABANT, OVILA. Classes et professions "maudites" chez saint Augustin, d'après les Enarrationes in Psalmos. R. Et. Augustiniennes, no. 1-2, 1971. [4304]

BRADLEY, RICHARD. Stock Raising and the Origins of the Hill Fort on the South Downs [pastoralism in pre-Roman Britain]. Antiquaries J., no. 1, 1971. [4305]

BRINGMANN, KLAUS. Senecas Apocolocyntosis und die politische Satire in Rom. Antike u. Abendland, no. 1, 1971. [4306]

BROUGHTON, T. R. S. The territory of Carthage. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4307]

BURCK, ERICH. Kampf und Tod des Cyzicus bei Valerius Festus. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4308]

CHRISTOL, MICHEL. Remarques sur les naviculaires d'Arles. Latomus, July-Sept. 1971. [4309]

DALY, LAWRENCE J. Themistius' Plea for Religious Tolerance. Greek, Roman, Byz. Stud., no. 1, 1971. [4310]

DAVIES, R. W. Medicine in Ancient Rome. Hist. Today, Nov. 1971. [4311]

- DEMANDT, A. Die Konsuln der Jahre 381 und 382 Namens Syagrius. Byz. Z., July 1971. [4312]
- DEVELIN, R. The Army Pay Rises under Severus and Caracalla, and the Question of Annona militaris. Latomus, July–Sept. 1971. [4313]
- DUNKLE, J. ROGER. The Rhetorical Tyrant in Roman Historiography: Sallust, Livy and Tacitus. Class. World, Sept. 1971. [4314]
- DURRY, MARCEL. Autocritique et mise au point. [On the age at which Roman girls married.] R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4315]
- DURRY, MARCEL. Juvénal et les prétoriens. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4316]
- DURRY, MARCEL. Le mariage des filles impubères à Rome. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4317]
- DURRY, MARCEL. Pessimus princeps. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4318]
- DURRY, MARCEL. Réhabilitation des "funerariae." R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4319]
- ECK, WERNER. Prosopographische Bemerkungen zum XII. Supplementband der Real-Encyclopädie. Z. Papyrol. Epig., 8, no. 1, 1971. [4320]
- ECK, WERNER. Zum Rechtsstatus von Sardinien im 2. Jh. n. Chr. Historia, no. 3, 1971. [4321]
- ECK, WERNER. Zur Verwaltungsgeschichte Italiens unter Mark Aurel—ein Iuridicus per Flaminiam et Transpadanam. Z. Papyrol. Epig., 8, no. 1, 1971. [4322]
- EUZENAT, MAURICE. Grecs et orientaux en Maurétanie tingitane. Antiq. Afric., V, 1971. [4323]
- EVANS, D. ELLIS. Nomina Celtica II: Duratius, Tincorix, ?Celt. *Baïdo—. W. Aladur. Et. Celtiques, no. 2, 1970–71. [4324]
- EVANS, J. A. S. Christianity and Paganism in Procopius of Caesarea. Greek, Roman, Byz. Stud., no. 1, 1971. [4325]
- FISHWICK, DUNCAN. The Annexation of Mauretania. Historia, no. 3, 1971. [4326]
- FONTAINE, JACQUES. La femme dans la poésie de Prudence. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4327]
- FRAZER, R. M. Nero the Singing Animal. Arethusa, no. 2, 1971. [4328]
- GABBA, EMILIO. Lo svolgimento militare della guerra di Perugia (41–40 a.c.). R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4329]
- GAGÉ, JEAN. Ascension et disgrâce d'un cavalier Dalmate sous Marc-Aurèle et L. Vêrus. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4330]
- GAYRAUD, MICHEL. Le proconsulat de Narbonnaise sous le Haut-Empire. R. Et. anc., July–Dec. 1970. [4331]
- GIGLI, STEFANIA QUILICI. La valle del Sacco nel quadro delle comunicazioni tra Etruria e Magna Grecia. Stud. Etruschi, XXXVIII, 1970. [4332]
- GIOVANNINI, ADALBERTO, and MÜLLER, HELMUT. Die Beziehungen zwischen Rom und den Juden im 2. Jh. v. Chr. Mus. Helvet., no. 3, 1971. [4333]
- GRANT, MICHAEL. Cleopatra. Hist. Today, Aug. 1971. [4334]
- GRIMAL, PIERRE. A propos du Truculentus. L'antiféminisme de Plaute. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4335]
- HARBISON, PETER. The old Irish "chariot." Antiquity, Sept. 1971. [4336]
- HARRIS, W. V. On War and Greed in the Second Century B.C. AHR, Dec. 1971. [4337]
- HENDRICKX, BENJAMIN. Marcus Aurelius' Keizersidee. Hermeneus, Sept.–Oct. 1971. [4338]
- HEURGON, JACQUES. Pline le Jeune tenté par l'histoire. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4339]
- HIND, J. G. F. The Middle Years of Nero's Reign. Historia, no. 3, 1971. [4340]
- HOLLEMAN, A. W. J. Ovid and Politics. Historia, no. 3, 1971. [4341]
- ILIESCU, VALDIMIR. L'évacuation de la Dacie à la lumière des sources littéraires [in Romanian; Fr. summary]. Stud. Cercet. Ist. Veche (Bucharest), no. 3, 1971. [4342]
- JOCELYN, H. D. Vrbs Augurio Augusto Condita: Ennius ap. Cic. Div. I. 107 (= Ann. 77–96 V<sup>2</sup>). Proc. Cambridge Philol. Soc., no. 197, 1971. [4343]
- JONES, B. W. Fabricius Viento Again. Am. J. Philol., July 1971. [4344]
- JONES, C. P. A New Letter of Marcus Aurelius to the Athenians. Z. Papyrol. Epig., 8, no. 2, 1971. [4345]
- JONES, C. P. The Levy at Thespieae under Marcus Aurelius. Greek, Roman, Byz. Stud., no. 1, 1971. [4346]
- JONES, DAVID. The Emperor Theodosius. Hist. Today, Sept. 1971. [4347]
- JUNG, EDMOND. Les noms du Tibre et de Rome. Matériaux et questions. R. Int. Onomastique, July 1971. [4348]
- KADEYEV, V. I. The Composition of the Chersonese Council [Boulê] in the First Centuries A.D. [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vest. drev. ist., no. 3, 1971. [4349]
- KAJANTO, IIRO. On divorce among the common people of Rome. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4350]
- KASTEN, HELMUT. Zu Ciceros Atticus-Briefen. Hermes, no. 2, 1971. [4351]
- KERESZTES, PAUL. The Emperor Antoninus Pius and the Christians. J. Eccles. Hist., no. 1, 1971. [4352]
- KYRIELEIS, HELMUT. Zu einem Kameo in Wien. Archäol. Anz., no. 4, 1970. [4353]
- LAMACCHIA, ROSA. Due noterelle a Bruto. Atene e Roma, no. 1, 1971. [4354]
- LAVERY, GERARD B. Cicero's Philarchia and Marius. Greece and Rome, Oct. 1971. [4355]
- LE BONNIEC, HENRI. Sur deux vers énigmatiques de Prudence (Contra Symmaque, II, 1107–1108). R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4356]
- LE GALL, JOËL. Métiers de femmes au Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4357]
- LE GLAY, MARCEL. La vie religieuse à Lambèse d'après de nouveaux documents. Antiq. Afric., V, 1971. [4358]
- LEGROS, ROGER. Ordre romain et techniques celtes au service de la production agricole chez les Rèmes. Latomus, July–Sept. 1971. [4359]

LEJEUNE, MICHEL. Documents gaulois et para-gaulois de Cisalpine. Et. Celtiques, no. 2, 1970-71. [4360]

LEJEUNE, MICHEL. Phonologie osque et graphie grecque. R. Et. anc., July-Dec. 1970. [4361]

LIEBMANN-FRANKFORT, THÉRÈSE. Du traité de l'Ebre à la paix de Dardanos. Variations romaines sur le respect dû à la parole donnée. Latomus, July-Sept. 1971. [4362]

MCDERMOTT, WILLIAM G. Pliny the Younger and Inscriptions. Class. World, Nov. 1971. [4363]

MAIER, PAUL L. The Fate of Pontius Pilate. Hermes, no. 2, 1971. [4364]

MASON, H. J. Lucius at Corinth. Phoenix, no. 2, 1971. [4365]

MICHEL, ALAIN. De Socrate à Maxime de Tyr: les problèmes sociaux de l'armée dans l'idéologie romaine. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4366]

MOMIGLIANO, ARNALDO. Ammiano Marcellino e la Historia Augusta (A proposito del libro di Ronald Syme). At. Accad. Sci. Torino, no. 2, 1969. [4367]

MUHR, OTON. Die Konstruktion der Ortsnamen bei Sallust. Symbolae Osloenses, XLVI, 1971. [4368]

NELSON, C. A. The Prefecture of Flavius Piso [A.D. 181]. Chron. Egypte, July 1970. [4369]

NICOLET, CLAUDE. Le livre III des "Res Rusticae" de Varro et les allusions au déroulement des comices tributes. R. Et. anc., Jan.-June 1970. [4370]

PAGET, R. F. From Baiae to Misenum. Vergilius, XVII, 1971. [4371]

PAINTER, K. S. Villas and Christianity in Roman Britain. Brit. Mus. Q., Spring 1971. [4372]

PERRET, JACQUES. Le serment d'Enée (Aen. XII, 189-194) et les événements politiques de janvier 27. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4373]

- PETOLESCU, CONSTANTIN C. L'étendue de la province de Dacia inferior [in Romanian; Fr. summary]. Stud. Cercet. Ist. Veche (Bucharest), no. 3, 1971. [4374]

PFLAUM, H.-G. La carrière de l'affranchi impérial Saturninus. Sous-procureurs provinciaux équestres et procureurs provinciaux d'extraction affranchie. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4375]

PHILLIPS, E. J. Cicero, Ad Atticum I 2. Philologus, no. 3-4, 1970. [4376]

PIPPIDI, D. M. Gouverneur inconnue de la Mésie inférieure dans une dédicace de Callatis. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4377]

POINSSOT, CLAUDE. M. Licinius Rufus, patronus pagi et civitatis Thuggensis. Bull. Archéol., V, 1969. [4378]

POUCET, JACQUES. Les Sabins aux origines de Rome: légende ou histoire? [pt. II]. Et. Class., July 1971. [4379]

RAWSON, ELIZABETH. Lucius Crassus and Cicero: the Formation of a Statesman. Proc. Cambridge Philol. Soc., no. 197, 1971. [4380]

REYNIERS, F. L'obolonna de la Table de Peutinger [and the Roman organization of Gaul]. R. Int. Onomastique, Oct. 1971. [4381]

- RICHARDSON, JOHN S. The "Commentariolum Petitionis." Historia, no. 3, 1971. [4382]

ROSSI, LINO. Dacian Fortifications on Trajan's Column. Antiquaries J., no. 1, 1971. [4383]

ROSSI, R. F. Tracce di lotta politica nel senato di Caligola. R. Filol. Istruz. Class., no. 2, 1971. [4384]

RUSSU, I. I. Sur la société et la romanisation en Mésie supérieure [in Romanian; Fr. summary]. Stud. Cercet. Ist. Veche (Bucharest), no. 2, 1971. [4385]

SALMON, E. T. The resurgence of the Roman patricians ca. 100 B.C. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4386]

SALMON, PIERRE. La préfecture du prétoire de Julius Paullus. Latomus, July-Sept. 1971. [4387]

SAYLOR, CHARLES F. The Emperor as Insula: Pliny Epist. 6. 31. Class. Philol., Jan. 1972. [4388]

SCHULZ-FALKENTHAL, HEINZ. Die Magistratswahlen in Pompeji und die Kollegien. Das Altertum, no. 1, 1971. [4389]

SCHWARTZ, JACQUES. L'empereur Probus et l'Égypte. Chron. Egypte, July 1970. [4390]

SEGUIN, ROGER. Sacerdotes et magistratures chez les Mucii Scaevolae. R. Et. anc., Jan.-June 1970. [4391]

SHAW-SMITH, R. A Letter from Augustus to Tiberius. Greece and Rome, Oct. 1971. [4392]

SHORE, A. F. A drinking-cup with Demotic inscription. Brit. Mus. Q., Autumn 1971. [4393]

SHOTTER, D. C. A. Tiberius and Asinius Gallus. Historia, no. 3, 1971. [4394]

SJFESTEIJN, P. J. Edict of C. Calvisius Statianus. Z. Papyrol. Epig., 8, no. 2, 1971. [4395]

SULLIVAN, J. P. Petronius and His Modern Critics. Bucknell R., Fall 1971. [4396]

SZEMLER, GEORGE J. Religio, Priesthoods and Magistracies in the Roman Republic. Numen, Aug. 1971. [4397]

VESSEY, D. W. T. C. Thoughts on Tacitus' Portrayal of Claudius. Am. J. Philol., July 1971. [4398]

WAGENVORST, H. Nehalennia and the Souls of the Dead. Mnemosyne, no. 3, 1971. [4399]

WEINRIE, E. J. The Prosecution of Magistrates-Designate. Phoenix, no. 2, 1971. [4400]

WUILLEUMIER, P. Une virgule chez Tacite [on Historiae I.1]. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4401]

EARLY CHRISTIAN

BAMMEL, E. The Baptist in Early Christian Tradition. New Test. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4402]

CALVERT, D. G. A. An Examination of the Criteria for Distinguishing the Authentic Words of Jesus. New Test. Stud., Jan. 1972. [4403]

ČEŠKA, JOSEF. Logia Jesu—Aussprüche einer literarisch geschilderten Persönlichkeit. Das Altertum, no. 1, 1971. [4404]

DEMAROLLE, JEANNE-MARIE. La Chrétienté à la fin du III<sup>e</sup> s. et Porphyre. Greek, Roman, Byz. Stud., no. 1, 1971. [4405]

ENSLIN, MORTON S. Once Again, Luke and Paul. Z. Neutest. Wiss., no. 3-4, 1970. [4406]

FRANK, KARL SUSO. Vita Apostolica. Ansätze zur apostolischen Lebensform in der alten Kirche. Z. Kirchengesch., no. 2, 1971. [4407]

GREEN, MALCOLM R. The Supporters of the Antipope Ursinus. J. Theol. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4408]

HENGEL, MARTIN. Die Ursprünge der Christlichen Mission. New Test. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4409]

KEMLER, HERBERT. Hegesipps römische Bischofsliste. Vigiliae Christianae, no. 3, 1971. [4410]

KOTTJE, RAYMOND. Das Aufkommen der täglichen Eucharistiefeier in der Westkirche und die Zölibatsforderung. Z. Kirchengesch., no. 2, 1971. [4411]

KRIKORIAN, MESROB K. The First Three Ecumenical Councils and their Significance for the Armenian Church. Greek Orthodox Theol. R., no. 1-2, 1971. [4412]

LOHSE, EDUARD. Apokalyptik und Christologie. Z. Neutest. Wiss., no. 1-2, 1971. [4413]

MACDONALD, JOHN, and HIGGINS, A. J. B. The Beginnings of Christianity according to the Samaritans: Introduction, Text, Translation, Notes, and Commentary. New Test. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4414]

OGG, GEORGE. The Central Section of the Gospel According to St. Luke. New Test. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4415]

RATCLIFF, E. C. The Eucharistic Institution Narrative of Justin Martyr's First Apology. J. Eccles. Hist., no. 2, 1971. [4416]

RUYSCHAERT, JOSÉ. Pierre et Paul à Rome. Textes et contextes d'une inscription damasienne. Pontificia Acc. Romana Archeol., Rend., XLII, 1969-70. [4417]

WISSE, FREDERIK. The Nag Hammadi Library and the Heresiologists. Vigiliae Christianae, no. 3, 1971. [4418]

ZELZER, KLAUS. Zu den lateinischen Fassungen der Thomasakten. Wiener Stud., LXXXIV, 1971. [4419]

ARCHEOLOGY

ALLAIS, YVONNE. Le quartier occidental de Djemila (Cuicul). Antiq. Afric., V, 1971. [4420]

BÖRKER-KLÄHN, JUTTA. Das sogenannte Bâtiment I in Byblos. Z. Assyriol., Aug. 1971. [4421]

BOUCHER, STÉPHANIE. Importations étrusques en Gaule à la fin du VII<sup>e</sup> siècle avant J.-C. Gallia, no. 2, 1970. [4422]

BREWER, COLIN W. Copper Mining in the Arabah. Buried Hist., Sept. 1971. [4423]

CANBY, JEANNY VORYS. Decorated Garments in Ashurnasirpal's Sculpture. Iraq, Spring 1971. [4424]

Chronique Archéologique [on work in Palestine]. R. biblique, July 1971. [4425]

CLUTTON-BROCK, JULIET. The Primary Food Animals of the Jericho Tell from the Proto-Neolithic to the Byzantine Period. Levant, III, 1971. [4426]

CRİŞAN, I. H. Contributions au problème des Celtes en Transylvanie [in Romanian; Fr. summary]. Stud. Cercet. Ist. Veche (Bucharest), no. 2, 1971. [4427]

CULIGAN, W. Almuñécar, Assur and Phoenician Penetration of the Western Mediterranean. Levant, II, 1970. [4428]

DIPLOCK, P. RUSSELL. The Date of Askalon's Sculptured Panels and an Identification of the Caesarea Statues. Palestine Explor. Q., Jan.-June 1971. [4429]

DÖRNER, FRIEDRICH KARL. Kommagene. Forschungsarbeiten von 1967 bis 1969. Mitt. Deutsch. Archäol. Inst., Istanbul. Abt., XIX-XX, 1969-70. [4430]

FOUCHER, LOUIS. A propos des cirques africains. Bull. Archéol., V, 1969. [4431]

GUARDUCCI, MARGHERITA. L'epigramma greco di Fausto e le nuove scoperte in Campo Marzio. Pontificia Acc. Romana Archeol., Rend., XLII, 1969-70. [4432]

HANFMANN, GEORGE M. A., and THOMAS, RUTH S. The Thirteenth Campaign at Sardis (1970). Bull. Am. School Orient. Res., Oct. 1971. [4433]

HENNESSY, J. B. Preliminary Report on Excavations at the Damascus Gate Jerusalem, 1964-6. Levant, II, 1970. [4434]

HYSLOP, K. R. MAXWELL. An Illustration to a Mari Inventory? Iraq, Autumn 1970. [4435]

KLEINER, FRED S. The Flamen of the Ara Pietatis. Am. J. Archaeol., Oct. 1971. [4436]

KLEINER, GERHARD. Stand der Forschung von Alt-Milet. Mitt. Deutsch. Archäol. Inst., Istanbul. Abt., XIX-XX, 1969-70. [4437]

MANSUELLI, GUIDO A. La necropoli orvietana di Crocifisso del Tufo: un documento di urbanistica etrusca. Stud. Etruschi, XXXVIII, 1970. [4438]

MERRILLEES, R. S. The Early History of Late Cypriote I. Levant, III, 1971. [4439]

MOOREY, P. R. S. Cemetery A at Kish: Grave Groups and Chronology. Iraq, Autumn 1970. [4440]

NUBAR, H. Contributions à la topographie de la cité d'Histria à l'époque romano-byzantine [in Romanian; Fr. summary]. Stud. Cercet. Ist. Veche (Bucharest), no. 2, 1971. [4441]

OLTEANU, ȘT. Les plus anciens vestiges archéologiques concernant l'extraction et la réduction du minerai de fer sur le territoire de la Dobroudja [in Romanian; Fr. summary]. Stud. Cercet. Ist. Veche (Bucharest), no. 2, 1971. [4442]

ONURKAN, SOMAY. Artemis Pergaia. Mitt. Deutsch. Archäol. Inst., Istanbul. Abt., XIX-XX, 1969-70. [4443]

PRAG, KAY. The 1959 Deep Sounding at Harran in Turkey. Levant, II, 1970. [4444]

RADT, WOLFGANG. Kuyruklu Kalesi. Fluchtburg und Tyrannenfestung von Mylasa in Karien. Mitt. Deutsch. Archäol. Inst., Istanbul. Abt., XIX-XX, 1969-70. [4445]

SHEAR, T. LESLIE, JR. The Athenian Agora: Excavations of 1970. Hesperia, no. 3, 1971. [4446]

SPYROPOULOS, THEODORE G. Royal Mycenaean Tombs in Thebes [in Greek; Eng. summary]. Athens An. Archaeol., no. 2, 1971. [4447]

STANFORD, S. C. Credenhill Camp, Herefordshire: An Iron Age Hill-Fort Capital. Archaeol. J., CXXVII, 1970. [4448]

TUCHELT, KLAUS. Pan und Pankult in Kleinasien. Mitt. Deutsch. Archäol. Inst., Istanbul. Abt., XIX-XX, 1969-70. [4449]

TURNER, GEOFFREY. The State Apartments of Late Assyrian Palaces. Iraq, Autumn 1970. [4450]

VUILLEMOT, G. Siga [in Africa] et son port fluvial. Antiq. Afric., V, 1971. [4451]

WESTERN, A. CECILIA. The Ecological Interpretation of Ancient Charcoals from Jericho. Levant, III, 1971. [4452]

WINTER, F. E. The Indented Trace in Later Greek Fortifications. Am. J. Archaeol., Oct. 1971. [4453]

WRIGHT, G. R. H. Pre-Israelite Temples in the Land of Canaan. Palestine Explor. Q., Jan.-June 1971. [4454]

ZANKER, PAUL. Das Trajansforum in Rom. Archäol. Anz., no. 4, 1970. [4455]

ZEVI, FAUSTO. Tre iscrizioni con firme di artisti greci. Saggi nel tempio dell'ara rotonda a Ostia. Pontificia Acc. Romana Archeol., Rend., XLII, 1969-70. [4456]

ZOLTÁN, SZÉKELY. Nouvelles données sur l'âge du bronze dans le Sud-Est de la Transylvanie [in Romanian; Fr. summary]. Stud. Cercet. Ist. Veche (Bucharest), no. 3, 1971. [4457]

INSCRIPTIONS, COINS, PAPYRI

ADRADOS, JESÚS VÍCTOR RODRÍGUEZ. Usos de la I longa en CIL II. Emerita, no. 1, 1971. [4458]

BARBIERI, GUIDO. Revisioni di epigrafi [of Rome and Ostia]. Pontificia Acc. Romana Archeol., Rend., XLII, 1969-70. [4459]

BETZ, ARTUR. Die griechischen Inschriften aus Österreich. Ein Nachtrag zu Band 79 (1966) 597ff. Wiener Stud., LXXXIV, 1971. [4460]

BILLORET, R. Circonscription de Lorraine. Meurthe-et-Moselle [milestones of Hadrian and Postumus]. Gallia, no. 2, 1970. [4461]

BORDEA, GH. POENARU. Notes concernant les timbres d'amphore [in Romanian; Fr. summary]. Stud. Cercet. Ist. Veche (Bucharest), no. 3, 1971. [4462]

BORKOWSKI, ZBIGNIEW. Reçu d'octroi provenant de l'Arsinoïte. Chron. Egypte, July 1970. [4463]

BOYAVAL, BERNARD. Tablettes du Louvre en Provenance d'Égypte. R. Archéol., no. 1, 1971. [4464]

BULL, ROBERT J. Towards a "Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum Britannicarum in Palestina." Palestine Explor. Q., July-Dec. 1970. [4465]

CAMP, JOHN MCK., II. Greek Inscriptions, Tragedies Presented at the Lenaia of 364/3 B.C. Hesperia, no. 3, 1971. [4466]

CHADWICK, JOHN. Linear B Tablets from Thebes. Minos, no. 2, 1969. [4467]

CHAUMONT, MARIE-LOUISE. Études d'histoire parthe. I. Documents royaux à Nisa. Syria, no. 1-2, 1971. [4468]

CHITESCU, M. Dépôts de monnaies romaines d'Antonin le Pieux découverts en Dacie [in Romanian; Fr. summary]. Stud. Cercet. Ist. Veche (Bucharest), no. 3, 1971. [4469]

CULICĂ, VASILE. Estampilles sur mortaria découvertes dans le S-O de la Dobroudja [in Romanian; Fr. summary]. Stud. Cercet. Ist. Veche (Bucharest), no. 2, 1971. [4470]

DEGRASSI, NEVIO. Le iscrizioni di Brescia con una serie di nomi di imperatori. Pontificia Acc. Romana Archeol., Rend., XLII, 1969-70. [4471]

DOSSIN, GEORGES. Documents de Mari. 1. Un projet de stèle de victoire de Zimri-Lim. 2. Une capture de lion, au Habur. Syria, no. 1-2, 1971. [4472]

DURRY, MARCEL. Iunia Baccula, une inscription du Constantinien. R. Et. lat., XLVII bis, 1970. [4473]

FINGARETTE, ANN. A New Look at the Wall of Nikomakhos. Hesperia, no. 3, 1971. [4474]

GAWLIKOWSKI, MICHEL. Palmyrena. Berytus, XIX, 1970. [4475]

GODART, LOUIS; KILLEN, JOHN T.; and OLIVIER, JEAN-PIERRE. 123 raccords de fragments dans les tablettes de Cnossos. Minos, no. 2, 1969. [4476]

GRAKOV, B. N. Once More on Arrow-Coins [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vest. drev. ist., no. 3, 1971. [4477]

GÜNTHER, WOLFGANG. Eine neue didymeische Bauinschrift. Mitt. Deutsch. Archäol. Inst., Istanbul. Abt., XIX-XX, 1969-70. [4478]

HABICHT, CHRISTIAN. Ein neuer Meilenstein des A. Larcus Macedo für Kaiser Hadrian aus Galatien. Z. Papyrol. Epig., 8, no. 1, 1971. [4479]

HANSON, ANN E. Memorandum and speech of an advocate [ca. A.D. 325]. Z. Papyrol. Epig., 8, no. 1, 1971. [4480]

HAUBEN, HANS, and VAN'T DACK, EDMOND. A propos de quelques inscriptions de la Cyrénaïque. Z. Papyrol. Epig., 8, no. 1, 1971. [4481]

HELLY, B. Une inscription de Kierion en Thessalie. R. Archéol., no. 1, 1971. [4482]

JEFFERY, LILIAN H., and MORPURGO-DAVIES, ANNA. An archaic Greek inscription from Crete. Brit. Mus. Q., Autumn 1971. [4483]

KOZLOVSKAYA, V. I. The Earliest Iberian Writing and its Mediterranean Connection [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vest. drev. ist., no. 3, 1971. [4484]

LA BAUME, PETER. Auffindung des Publius-Grabmonuments in Köln. Gymnasium, no. 4, 1971. [4485]

LAROCHE, EMMANUEL. Liste des documents hiéroglyphiques [hittites]. R. Hittite Asiatique, no. 84-85, 1969. [4486]

LUPPE, WOLFGANG. Zu den griechischen didaskalischen Inschriften in Rom. Z. Papyrol. Epig., 8, no. 2, 1971. [4487]

MASSON, EMILIA. La plus ancienne tablette chyprienne (Enkomi, 1955). Minos, no. 1, 1969. [4488]

MELIKISHVILI, G. A. Urartian Cuneiform Inscriptions. II. Findings and Publications of 1954-1970 [in Russian]. Vest. drev. ist., no. 3, 1971. [4489]

MERKELBACH, R. Inschrift von Magnesia 59. 8. Z. Papyrol. Epig., 8, no. 2, 1971. [4490]

MITREA, BUCUR. Le problème des monnaies posthumes du type Philippe II, trouvées en Dacie [in Romanian; Fr. summary]. Stud. Cercet. Ist. Veche (Bucharest), no. 2, 1971. [4491]

NEGEV, AVRAHAM. Inscriptions hébraïques, grecques et latines de Césarée Maritime. R. biblique, Apr. 1971. [4492]

- OLIVER, JAMES H. Epaminondas of Acraephia. Greek, Roman, Byz. Stud., no. 2, 1971. [4493]
- OLIVIER, JEAN-PIERRE. Notes épigraphiques sur les tablettes en linéaire B de la série Ug de Thèbes. Athens An. Archaeol., no. 2, 1971. [4494]
- POSTGATE, J. N. More "Assyrian Deeds and Documents." Iraq, Autumn 1970. [4495]
- REA, JOHN R. Two Christian Letters: PSI VII 831 and VIII 972. Chron. Egypte, July 1970. [4496]
- STROUD, RONALD S. Greek Inscriptions, Theozotides and the Athenian Orphans. Hesperia, no. 3, 1971. [4497]
- TOURATSOGLU, J. Corrections on Inscriptions from Veroia [Macedonia]. Athens An. Archaeol., no. 2, 1971. [4498]
- TRAILL, JOHN S. Greek Inscriptions Honoring Prytaneis. Hesperia, no. 3, 1971. [4499]
- VALLAT, FRANÇOIS. Deux nouvelles "chartes de fondation" d'un palais de Darius I<sup>er</sup> à Suse. Syria, no. 1-2, 1971. [4500]
- VAN LESSEN, MICHAEL. The Coinage Pattern of Palestine in the First and Second Centuries A.D. Numis. Circ., no. 6, 1971. [4501]
- WORTMANN, D. Griechische ostraka aus Abu Mena. Z. Papyrol. Epig., 8, no. 1, 1971. [4502]

MEDIEVAL

Bernard J. Holm, Wartburg Theological Seminary

- ABRAHAM, ULRICH. Zur Frage nach der Abwanderung westdeutscher Bevölkerung in den ostelbischen Siedlungsraum. Gesch. Wiss. Unter., Dec. 1971. [4503]
- ALCOCK, LESLIE. Excavations at South Cadbury Castle, 1970: A Summary Report. Antiquaries J., no. 1, 1971. [4504]
- ALEXANDER, PAUL J. Foreign and Military Relations in the Cambridge and Soviet Histories of the Byzantine Empire [r. art.]. Slavic R., Sept. 1971. [4505]
- ALLMAND, CHRISTOPHER. La Normandie devant l'opinion anglaise à la fin de la guerre de Cent ans. Bibl. Ecole chartes, July-Dec. 1970. [4506]
- AMALRIC, JEAN-PIERRE. Une ville en avance sur l'histoire: Valladolid au siècle d'or. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4507]
- ANTIN, P. Mots "vulgaires" dans Saint Jérôme. Latomus, July-Sept. 1971. [4508]
- ATKINSON, JAMES. Luther Studies [r. art.]. J. Eccles. Hist., Jan. 1972. [4509]
- AUTENRIETH, JOHANNE. Eine zweite Überlieferung der Cronica Boemorum Heinrichs von Heimburg. Deutsches Arch., no. 2, 1970. [4510]
- AVONDS, P. Het Tribunal de la Paix van Luik in de stadsrekeningen van Leuven (1345-1355). R. belge, no. 4, 1970. [4511]
- BACHRACH, BERNARD S. Procopius and the Chronology of Clovis's Reign. Viator, I, 1970. [4512]
- BAGBY, ALBERT L., JR. The Jew in the Cántigas of Alfonso X, El Sabio. Speculum, Oct. 1971. [4513]
- BAGLEY, C. P. Robert de Clari's La Conquête de Constantinople. Medium Aevum, no. 2, 1971. [4514]
- BARNETT, M. J. Porpaillart in the "Cycle de Guillaume d'Orange." Mod. Lang. R., Oct. 1971. [4515]
- BATANY, J. Tayon de Saragosse et la nomenclature sociale de Grégoire le Grand. Bull. Du Cange, XXXVII, 1970. [4516]
- BAYLÉ, JEANNE. Mise en défense du château de Montaillois au début du XV<sup>e</sup> siècle [with Latin text]. Bibl. Ecole chartes, Jan.-June 1971. [4517]
- BECKER, HANS-JÜRGEN. Das Mandat "Fidem catholicam" Ludwigs des Bayern von 1338. Deutsches Arch., no. 2, 1970. [4518]
- BELL, ALEXANDER. Notes on Gaimar's Military Vocabulary. Medium Aevum, no. 2, 1971. [4519]
- BERLOW, ROSALIND KENT. The Development of Business Techniques Used at the Fairs of Champagne from the End of the Twelfth Century to the Middle of the Thirteenth Century. Stud. Med. Renaissance Hist., VIII, 1971. [4520]
- BERNDT, DAVID E. Monastic Acedia and Chaucer's Characterization of Daun Piers. Stud. Philol., Oct. 1971. [4521]
- BIDDLE, MARTIN, and HILL, DAVID. Late Saxon Planned Towns. Antiquaries J., no. 1, 1971. [4522]
- BISHKO, CHARLES JULIAN. Fernando I y los orígenes de la alianza castellano-leonesa con Cluny [to be cont.]. Cuad. hist. España, XLVII-XLVIII, 1968. [4523]
- BLOMQUIST, THOMAS W. Commercial Association in Thirteenth-Century Lucca. Bus. Hist. R., Summer 1971. [4524]
- BLUM, JEROME. The European Village as Community: Origins and Functions. Agric. Hist., July 1971. [4525]
- BONEBAKKER, S. A. Aspects of the History of Literary Rhetoric and Poetics in Arabic Literature. Viator, I, 1970. [4526]
- BONNEY, FRANÇOISE. Autour de Jean Gerson. Opinions de théologiens sur les superstitions et la sorcellerie au début du XV<sup>e</sup> siècle. Moyen Age, no. 1, 1971. [4527]
- BORST, ARNO. Herbert Grundmann [long appreciation]. Deutsches Arch., no. 2, 1970. [4528]
- BOULAKIA, JEAN DAVID C. Ibn Khaldûn: A Fourteenth-Century Economist. J. Pol. Ec., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4529]
- BOUSSARD, J. Actes inédits de Louis VII et Philippe Auguste, rois de France. Bibl. Ecole chartes, July-Dec. 1970. [4530]
- BOYLE, J. A. Marco Polo and his Description of the World. Hist. Today, Nov. 1971. [4531]
- BRANDON, S. G. J. The Portrait of Christ: Its Origin and Evolution [in hist. of art]. Hist. Today, July 1971. [4532]

- BREWSTER, T. C. M. The Garton Slack Chariot Burial, East Yorkshire. Antiquity, Dec. 1971. [4533]
- BRINCKEN, ANNA-DOROTHEA VON DEN. Eine christliche Weltchronik von Qara Qorum: Wilhelm von Rubruck OFM und der Nestorianismus. Arch. Kulturgesch., no. 1, 1971. [4534]
- BROUETTE, E. Les abbés de Gembloux au XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. R. Bénédicte, no. 1-2, 1971. [4535]
- BROWN, ELIZABETH A. R. Gascon Subsidies and the Finances of the English Dominions, 1315-1324. Stud. Med. Renaissance Hist., VIII, 1971. [4536]
- BRÜHL, C. Die Finanzpolitik Friedrich Barbarossas in Italien. Hist. Z., Aug. 1971. [4537]
- BRÜLS, A. L'évolution de la doctrine sur Dieu chez le jeune Mélancthon (1518-1535). R. Hist. Eccles., no. 1, 1971. [4538]
- BRUNDAGE, JAMES A. Some Canonistic Quaestiones in Barcelona. Manuscripta, July 1971. [4539]
- BRUSIN, G. I sermoni di Cromazio vescovo di Aquileia (388-407/8). Arch. veneto, LXXXIX, 1970. [4540]
- BUCK, AUGUST. Italienischer Humanismus: Forschungsbericht. Arch. Kulturgesch., no. 1, 1970. [4541]
- BURKE, JAMES F. The Libro del Cavallero Zifar and the Medieval Sermon. Viator, I, 1970. [4542]
- BURNS, CHARLES. The Second Draft of "Fasti [Ecclesiae Scoticae]." Innes R., Spring 1971. [4543]
- BURNS, ROBERT I., S.J. Christian-Islamic Confrontation in the West: The Thirteenth-Century Dream of Conversion. AHR, Dec. 1971. [4544]
- BURR, DAVID. The Apocalyptic Element in Olivi's Critique of Aristotle. Church Hist., Mar. 1971. [4545]
- BYNUM, C. W. Stephen of Paris and His Commentary on the Benedictine Rule. R. Bénédicte, no. 1-2, 1971. [4546]
- CAMERON, KENNETH. Scandinavian Settlement in the Territory of the Five Boroughs: The Place-Name Evidence, Part II, Place-Names in Thorp. Med. Scand., 3, 1970. [4547]
- CASALDUERO, JOAQUÍN GIMENO. Castilla en "Los doce triunfos" del Cartujano. Hisp. R., Oct. 1971. [4548]
- CHALON, LOUIS. De quelques vocables utilisés par la Primera Crónica General de España. Moyen Age, no. 1, 1971. [4549]
- CHAMBERS, J. D. The Tawney Tradition. Ec. Hist. R., Aug. 1971. [4550]
- CHAMPAGNE, J., and SZRAMKIEWICZ, R. Recherches sur les conciles des temps mérovingiens. R. hist. droit fr. étranger, Jan.-Mar. 1971. [4551]
- CHESNUTT, MICHAEL. Norse-Celtic Bibliographical Survey. First Report. Med. Scand., 3, 1970. [4552]
- CHODOROW, STANLEY A. Ecclesiastical Politics and the Ending of the Investiture Contest. Speculum, Oct. 1971. [4553]
- CHRISTIANSON, GERALD. G. G. Coulton: The Medieval Historian as Controversialist. Cath. Hist. R., Oct. 1971. [4554]
- CLARKE, G. W. Barbarian Disturbances in North Africa in the Mid-Third Century. Antichthon, 4, 1970. [4555]
- CLASSEN, PETER. Zur kritischen Edition der Schriften Ruperts von Deutz. Deutsches Arch., no. 2, 1970. [4556]
- COBBAN, ALAN B. Medieval Student Power. Past & Present, Nov. 1971. [4557]
- COLES, JOHN, and TAYLOR, JOAN. The Wessex Culture: A Minimal View. Antiquity, Mar. 1971. [4558]
- COLKER, M. L. A Discussion of Cryptography in a Late Medieval Codex [note]. Manuscripta, July 1971. [4559]
- COMITO, TERRY. Renaissance Gardens and the Discovery of Paradise. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [4560]
- CONANT, K. J. Medieval Cluny. Renewed Study of the Monastery's Buildings. R. Bénédicte, no. 1-2, 1971. [4561]
- COURTENAY, WILLIAM J. A Revised Text of Robert Holcot's Quodlibetal Dispute on Whether God Is Able to Know More Than He Knows. Arch. Gesch. Phil., no. 1, 1971. [4562]
- COWAN, IAN B. Two Early Scottish Taxation Rolls. Innes R., Spring 1971. [4563]
- D'ACCONNE, FRANK A. Some Neglected Composers in the Florentine Chapels, ca. 1475-1525. Viator, I, 1970. [4564]
- D'ALAUZIER, L. Un procès pour "collaboration" au XV<sup>e</sup> siècle. An. Midi, July-Sept. 1971. [4565]
- DAMSHÖLT, NANNA. Kingship in the Arengas of Danish Royal Diplomas 1140-1223. Med. Scand., 3, 1970. [4566]
- D'ANDREA, GIOACCHINO. Il culto di Giovanni Duns Scotus in Campania (Diocesi di Nola esclusa). Arch. francisc. hist., Jan.-June 1970. [4567]
- DAVIS, I. M. The Weardale Campaign, 1327. Hist. Today, Dec. 1971. [4568]
- DE CALUWÉ, JACQUES. La conception de l'amour dans le lai d'Eliduc de Marie de France. Moyen Age, no. 1, 1971. [4569]
- DEDIEU, HUGUES. Les incunables de la Bibliothèque provinciale des Franciscains d'Aquitaine à Toulouse. Arch. francisc. hist., Jan.-June 1970. [4570]
- DEREINE, CH. Une nouvelle biographie d'Urban II [A. Becker, Papst Urban II, 1964]. R. Hist. Eccles., no. 1, 1971. [4571]
- DE SIANO, FRANK. Of God and Man: Consequences of Abelard's Ethic. Thomist, Oct. 1971. [4572]
- DESPY, A., and DESPY, G. Les premières années de l'abbaye cistercienne de Clairefontaine. R. belge, no. 4, 1970. [4573]
- DETWILER, DONALD S. Percy Ernst Schramm, 1894-1970. Central Eur. Hist., Mar. 1971. [4574]
- DEVEREUX, E. J. Tudor Uses of Erasmus on the Eucharist. Arch. Reformation Hist., no. 1, 1971. [4575]
- DEVINE, T. M., and LYTHER, S. G. E. The Economy of Scotland under James VI: A Revision Article. Scottish Hist. R., Oct. 1971. [4576]
- DE VOOHT, P. Obscurités anciennes autour de Jean Huss. R. Hist. Eccles., no. 1, 1971. [4577]
- DEYRES, MARCEL. Le local à usage de sacristie à Sainte-Foy de Conques. An. Midi, July-Sept. 1971. [4578]
- DHONDT, J., et al. Bibliographie de l'histoire de Belgique, 1969. R. belge, no. 4, 1970. [4579]

- DIN, GILBERT C. The Cid Campeador [Rodrigo Díaz de Vivar] as a Historical Figure. Rocky Mt. Soc. Sci. J., Apr. 1971. [4580]
- DONOHUE, JOSEPH I., JR. Ambivalence and Anger, The Human Center of the Chanson de Roland. Romanic R., Dec. 1971. [4581]
- DYKMANS, MARC. Le dernier sermon de Guillaume d'Alnwick. Arch. francisc. hist., July-Dec. 1970. [4582]
- ECCLES, MARK. Ludus Coventriae: Lincoln or Norfolk? Medium Aevum, no. 2, 1971. [4583]
- ECKENRODE, THOMAS R. Venerable Bede as a Scientist. Am. Benedictine R., Dec. 1971. [4584]
- ESCUDIER, DENIS. Des notations musicales dans les manuscrits non liturgiques antérieurs au XII<sup>e</sup> siècle. Bibl. Ecole chartes, Jan.-June 1971. [4585]
- EVANS, ANGELA CARE, and FENWICK, VALERIE H. The Graveney Boat. Antiquity, June 1971. [4586]
- FAULKNER, P. A. Some Medieval Archiepiscopal Palaces. Archaeol. J., CXXVII, 1970. [4587]
- FIERRO, ALFRED. Un cycle démographique: Dauphiné et Faucigny du XIV<sup>e</sup> au XIX<sup>e</sup> siècle. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4588]
- FLOECK, WILFRIED. Die Gestalt des Günstlings in der spanischen Comedia des Goldenen Zeitalters. Arch. Stud. neueren Sprachen u. Lit., Sept. 1971. [4589]
- FOURNIER, G. La Terre et les Hommes en Picardie jusqu'à la fin du XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. Moyen Age, no. 2, 1971. [4590]
- FOURNIER, P.-F. Clermont-Ferrand au VI<sup>e</sup> siècle. Recherches sur la topographie de la ville. Bibl. Ecole chartes, July-Dec. 1970. [4591]
- FOWLER, DAVID C. More about John Trevisa. Mod. Lang. Q., Sept. 1971. [4592]
- FRANCE, JOHN. The Departure of Tatikios from the Crusader Army. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [4593]
- FRANK, DONALD K. Abelard as Imitator of Christ. Viator, I, 1970. [4594]
- FRANK, ROBERTA. Onomastic Play in Kormakr's Verse: The Name Steinger[d]r. Med. Scand., 3, 1970. [4595]
- FRANSEN, G. Principes d'édition des collections canoniques. R. Hist. Eccles., no. 1, 1971. [4596]
- FRANSEN, I. Fragments éparés du Commentaire perdu d'Alcuin sur l'Épître aux Ephésiens. R. Bénédictine, no. 1-2, 1971. [4597]
- FREEMAN, ANN. Further Studies in the Libri Carolini, III. Speculum, Oct. 1971. [4598]
- FRENCH, T. W. Observations on Some Medieval Glass in York Minster. Antiquaries J., no. 1, 1971. [4599]
- FRITZ, BIRGITTA. Jarladömet—sveahertigdömet (Das Jarl- und Herzogtum in Schweden im Mittelalter). Hist. tids. (Sw.), no. 3, 1971. [4600]
- FRY, DONALD F. Chaucer's Zanzis [wise old ancient] and a Possible Source for Troilus and Criseyde, IV, 407-413. Eng. Lang. Notes, Dec. 1971. [4601]
- FRYDE, NATALIE M. John Stratford, Bishop of Winchester, and the Crown, 1323-30. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [4602]
- FULLER, SARAH. Hidden Polyphony [Aquitanian music and verse, eleventh century source]—A Reappraisal. J. Am. Musicological Soc., Summer 1971. [4603]
- FUNKENSTEIN, AMOS. Gesetz und Geschichte: Zur historisierenden Hermeneutik bei Moses Maimonides und Thomas von Aquin. Viator, I, 1970. [4604]
- GAUNA, S. M. De genio Pantagruelii: An Examination of Rabelaisian Demonology. Bibl. Humanisme Renaissance, no. 3, 1971. [4605]
- GEM, R. D. H. The Anglo-Saxon Cathedral Church at Canterbury: A Further Contribution. Archaeol. J., CXXVII, 1970. [4606]
- GEORGE, C. H. The Making of the English Bourgeoisie, 1500-1750. Sci. and Soc., Winter 1971. [4607]
- GIBSON, MARGARET. Lanfranc's Notes on Patristic Texts. J. Theol. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4608]
- GIDZIUNAS, VICTOR. De initiis Fratrum Minorum de Observantia in Lituania (1468-1600). Arch. francisc. hist., Jan.-June 1970. [4609]
- GILBERT, E. C. The Date of the Late Saxon Chapel at Canterbury. Archaeol. J., CXXVII, 1970. [4610]
- GIORDANENGO, GÉRARD. Consultations juridiques de la région dauphinoise (XIII<sup>e</sup>-XIV<sup>e</sup> siècles). Bibl. Ecole chartes, Jan.-June 1971. [4611]
- GLÉNISON, JEAN. L'enquête pontificale de 1373 sur les possessions des Hospitaliers de Saint-Jean de Jérusalem. Bibl. Ecole chartes, Jan.-June 1971. [4612]
- GOFFART, WALTER. Zosimus, The First Historian of Rome's Fall. AHR, Apr. 1971. [4613]
- GORING, J. J. The General Proscription of 1522. EHR, Oct. 1971. [4614]
- GRANT, EDWARD. Henricus Aristippus, William of Moerbeke and Two Alleged Mediaeval Translations of Hero's Pneumatica. Speculum, Oct. 1971. [4615]
- GREENHILL, BASIL. The Graveney Boat. Antiquity, Mar. 1971. [4616]
- GRISLIS, EGIL. Calvin's Use of Cicero in the Institutes I: 1—A Case Study in Theological Method. Arch. Reformation Hist., no. 1, 1971. [4617]
- GROH, DENNIS E. Tertullian's Polemic against Social Co-optation. Church Hist., Mar. 1971. [4618]
- GUERIN, R. The Shipman's Tale: The Italian Analogues. Eng. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4619]
- GUNAWARDANA, R. A. L. H. Irrigation and Hydraulic Society in Early Medieval Ceylon. Past & Present, Nov. 1971. [4620]
- HAACKE, RHABAN. Nachlese zur Überlieferung der Schriften Ruperts von Deutz. Deutsches Arch., no. 2, 1970. [4621]
- HAINES, ROY M. Adam Orleton and the Diocese of Winchester. J. Eccles. Hist., Jan. 1972. [4622]
- HANHAM, ALISON. A Medieval Scots Merchant's Handbook. Scottish Hist. R., Oct. 1971. [4623]
- HARRIS, JULIAN. How Old Was Charlemagne in the Chanson de Roland? Romance Philol., Nov. 1971. [4624]
- HARRIS, RICHARD L. The Lion-Knight Legend in Iceland and the Val[th]jófssta[d]ir Door. Viator, I, 1970. [4625]

HARRISON, GORDON SCOTT. The Hanseatic League in Historical Interpretation. Historian, May 1971. [4626]

HART, CYRIL. The Tribal Hidage. Trans. Roy. Hist. Soc., 21, 1971. [4627]

HARVEY, SALLY. Domesday Book and Its Predecessors. EHR, Oct. 1971. [4628]

HASSALL, J. M., and HILL, DAVID. Pont de l'Arche: Frankish Influence on the West Saxon Burh. Archaeol. J., CXXVII, 1970. [4629]

HEERS, JACQUES. La mode et les marchés des draps de laine: Gènes et la Montagne à la fin du Moyen Age. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4630]

HOFFMANN, RICHARD G., and JOHNSON, H. B. Un village portugais en mutation: Povoá del Rey à la fin du XIV<sup>e</sup> siècle. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4631]

HUDSON, ANNE. The Expurgation of a Lollard Sermon-Cycle. J. Theol. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4632]

HUDSON, ANNE. A Lollard Quaternion. R. Eng. Stud., Nov. 1971. [4633]

HUDSON, ANNE. A Lollard Sermon-Cycle and Its Implications. Medium Aevum, no. 2, 1971. [4634]

HÜRTEN, HEINZ. Die Verbindung von geistlicher und weltlicher Gewalt als Problem in der Amtsführung des mittelalterlichen deutschen Bischofs. Z. Kirchengesch., no. 1, 1971. [4635]

INSTINSKY, HANS ULRICH. Offene Fragen um Bischofsstuhl und Kaiserthron. Römische Quartalschr., no. 1-2, 1971. [4636]

Johannes von Nepomuk: Bericht über eine Ausstellung. Sudeten Land, no. 3, 1971. [4637]

JOHNSEN, ARNE ODD. The Earliest Provincial Statute of the Norwegian Church. Med. Scand., 3, 1970. [4638]

JOHNSON, ROBBIN S. The Argument for Reform in Utopia. Moreana, Nov. 1971. [4639]

JONES, DAVID. The Emperor Theodosius. Hist. Today, Sept. 1971. [4640]

JONES, DAVID E. H. The Alexandrian Museum, Part II: Final Creative Gasp and Fall. Smithsonian, Jan. 1972. [4641]

JONES, W. R. The Image of the Barbarian in Medieval Europe. Comp. Stud. Soc. Hist., Oct. 1971. [4642]

JONES, W. R. Abracadabra—Sorcery and Witchcraft in European History. Hist. Teacher, Nov. 1971. [4643]

JORGENSEN, PAUL A. Foreign Sources for the Elizabethan Notion of the Spaniard. Viator, I, 1970. [4644]

KAMINSKY, HOWARD. The Politics of France's Subtraction of Obedience from Pope Benedict XIII, 27 July, 1398. Proc. Am. Phil. Soc., no. 5, 1971. [4645]

KARLEN, ARNO. The Homosexual Heresy [charge in Middle Ages]. Chaucer R., Summer 1971. [4646]

KELLER, ALEX. Archimedean Hydrostatic Theorems and Salvage Operations in Sixteenth-Century Venice. Technol. Cult., Oct. 1971. [4647]

KELLY, DOUGLAS. The Source and Meaning of Conjointure in Chrétien's Erec 14. Viator, I, 1970. [4648]

KERKKONEN, GUNVOR. Skattmarker och markskatter [medieval colonization]. Hist. tids. Finl., no. 2, 1971. [4649]

KINKADE, RICHARD P. A New Latin Source for Berceo's Milagros. Romance Philol., Nov. 1971. [4650]

KISTNER, A. L., and KISTNER, M. K. The Fine Balance of Imposture in John Ford's Perkin Warbeck. Eng. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4651]

KNAPP, PEGGY ANN. John Wyclif as Bible Translator: The Texts for the English Sermons. Speculum, Oct. 1971. [4652]

KOLAKOWSKI, LESZEK. The Philosophical Role of the Reformation. Tri-Quarterly, Fall 1971. [4653]

KREILKAMP, HERMES. Rome and Constantinople in the Fifth Century—A Study in the Relationships of Patriarchal Churches. Jurist, no. 2, 1971. [4654]

KRIEGER, KARL-FRIEDRICH. Die königliche Lehngerichtsbarkeit im Zeitalter der Staufer. Deutsches Arch., no. 2, 1970. [4655]

KUSTAS, GEORGE L. The Function and Evolution of Byzantine Rhetoric. Viator, I, 1970. [4656]

LACUESTA, RAMÓN SANTIAGO. Sobre los manuscritos y la traducción de la "Eneida" de Virgilio, hecha por Enrique de Villena. Filologia mod., June 1971. [4657]

LAURIE, HELEN C. R. Toward an Interpretation of the "Conte du Graal." Mod. Lang. R., Oct. 1971. [4658]

LEAS, SUSAN E. Richard III, Shakespeare, and History. Eng. J., Dec. 1971. [4659]

LE MERRER-FALSE, MADELEINE. Contribution à une étude du "Chevalier au Barisel." Moyen Age, no. 2, 1971. [4660]

LENTZEN, MANFRED. Wann beginnt die italienische Literatur? Arch. Stud. neueren Sprachen u. Lit., June 1971. [4661]

LE PATOUREL, JOHN. The Norman Conquest of Yorkshire. N. Hist., VI, 1971. [4662]

LENER, ROBERT E. The Thought of Mixed Liquids in Late Medieval Mystical Thought. Church Hist., Dec. 1971. [4663]

LIETZMANN, HILDA. Bibliographie Herbert Grundmann. Deutsches Arch., no. 2, 1970. [4664]

LOPEZ, ROBERT S. Agenda for Medieval Studies. J. Ec. Hist., Mar. 1971. [4665]

LÜCKERATH, CARL AUGUST. Zu den Rekonziliationsverhandlungen Ludwigs des Bayern. Deutsches Arch., no. 2, 1970. [4666]

LUTZ, CORA E. Letaldus, a Wit of the Tenth Century. Viator, I, 1970. [4667]

MABILLE, MADELEINE. Les manuscrits de Gérard d'Utrecht conservés à la Bibliothèque nationale de Paris. Bibl. Ecole chartes, Jan.-June 1971. [4668]

MACEK, JOSEF. "La Fortuna" chez Machiavel (à suivre). Moyen Age, no. 2, 1971. [4669]

MCGINN, BERNARD. The Abbot and the Doctors: Scholastic Reactions to the Radical Eschatology of Joachim of Fiore. Church Hist., Mar. 1971. [4670]

MCGOVERN, JOHN F. The Meaning of "gesette land" in Anglo-Saxon Land Tenure. Speculum, Oct. 1971. [4671]

- MAHONEY, EDWARD P. Agostino Nifo's De Sensu Agente. Arch. Gesch. Phil., no. 2, 1971. [4672]
- MAIER, ANNELIESE. Eine unbeachtete Quaestio aus dem Visio-Streit unter Johann XXII. Arch. francisc. hist., July-Dec. 1970. [4673]
- MANDEL, JEROME. Contrast in Old English Poetry. Chaucer R., Summer 1971. [4674]
- MASI, MICHAEL. Manuscripts Containing the De Musica of Boethius [note]. Manuscripta, July 1971. [4675]
- MATTHEWS, WILLIAM. The Egyptians in Scotland: The Political History of a Myth. Viator, I, 1970. [4676]
- MAYER, HANS EBERHARD. Zwei Kommunen in Akkon? Deutsches Arch., no. 2, 1970. [4677]
- MELITZ, JACQUES. Some Further Reassessment of the Scholastic Doctrine of Usury. Kyklos, no. 3, 1971. [4678]
- MENKES, FRED. Une communauté juive en Provence au XIV<sup>e</sup> siècle: étude d'un groupe social. Moyen Age, no. 2, 1971. [4679]
- MEYENDORFF, JOHN. Religious History and Theology in the Cambridge and Soviet Histories of the Byzantine Empire [r. art.]. Slavic R., Sept. 1971. [4680]
- MILLER, EDWARD. England in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries: An Economic Contrast? Ec. Hist. R., Feb. 1971. [4681]
- MORRIS, COLIN. Letheringsett: the Early History of a Parish Church [doc.]. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., May 1971. [4682]
- MORRISON, JOHN L. Augustine's Two Theories of Time. New Scholasticism, Autumn 1971. [4683]
- MURPHY, JAMES J. Alberic of Monte Cassino: Father of the Medieval Ars Dictaminis. Am. Benedictine R., June 1971. [4684]
- NICHOLAS, DAVID M. Crime and Punishment in Fourteenth-Century Ghent, Part II. R. belge, no. 4, 1970. [4685]
- NIELSEN, NIELS ÅGE. Notes on Early Runic Poetry. Med. Scand., 3, 1970. [4686]
- NOAKES, AUBREY. Lord Curzon on the Utopia [Arnold Prize Essay 1884]. Moreana, Nov. 1971. [4687]
- NORTH, DOUGLAS C., and THOMAS, ROBERT PAUL. The Rise and Fall of the Manorial System: A Theoretical Model. J. Ec. Hist., Dec. 1971. [4688]
- NORTIER, MICHEL. Trois actes inédits relatifs au progrès de l'affranchissement dans les campagnes gâtinaises au XII<sup>e</sup> siècle. Bibl. Ecole chartes, July-Dec. 1970. [4689]
- NUGENT, DONALD. The Renaissance and/of Witchcraft. Church Hist., Mar. 1971. [4690]
- O'NEIL, YNEZ VIOLÉ. Another Look at the Anatomia porci. Viator, I, 1970. [4691]
- ORRMAN, ELJAS. De senmedeltida ödesmålen i sydvästra Finland. Hist. tids. Finl., no. 3, 1971. [4692]
- OVERFIELD, JAMES H. A New Look at the Reuchlin Affair. Stud. Med. Renaissance Hist., VIII, 1971. [4693]
- PÁL, ENDRE. A Hungarian Gothic Chalice. Hungarian R., no. 10, 1971. [4694]
- PARTÉE, MORRIS HENRY. Sir Thomas Elyot on Plato's Aesthetics. Viator, I, 1970. [4695]
- PAYEN, J. C. Structure et sens du "Chevalier au Barisel." Moyen Age, no. 2, 1971. [4696]
- PAYEN, JEAN CHARLES. Notes sur l'ironie romanesque au Moyen Age. Moyen Age, no. 1, 1971. [4697]
- PEACHEY, PAUL. Today's Counter Culture: The Radical Reformation as Analogue? (Preliminary Abstract.) Church Hist., Mar. 1971. [4698]
- PÉANO, PIERRE. Documents sur les Observants de Provence (1435-1527). Arch. francisc. hist., July-Dec. 1970. [4699]
- PETERS, ROBERT. The Utopia and More's Orthodoxy. Moreana, Nov. 1971. [4700]
- PETERSEN, E. LADEWIG. Preaching in Medieval Denmark. Med. Scand., 3, 1970. [4701]
- PETERSOHN, JÜRGEN. Normannische Bildungsreform im hochmittelalterlichen England. Hist. Z., Oct. 1971. [4702]
- PLESCIA, J. On the Persecution of Christians in the Roman Empire. Latomus, Jan.-Mar. 1971. [4703]
- POWERS, JAMES F. Townsmen and Soldiers: The Interaction of Urban and Military Organization in the Militias of Mediaeval Castile. Speculum, Oct. 1971. [4704]
- PRESTWICH, MICHAEL. Isabella de Vescy and the Custody of Bamburgh Castle. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [4705]
- QUATTROCKI, ED. Injustice, not Councilorship: The Theme of Book One of the Utopia. Moreana, Nov. 1971. [4706]
- RAE, T. I. A List of Articles on Scottish History Published during the Year 1970. Scottish Hist. R., Oct. 1971. [4707]
- RAHTZ, PHILIP. Excavations on Glastonbury Tor, Somerset. Archaeol. J., CXXVII, 1970. [4708]
- REDEKOP, CALVIN. Church History and the Contrasytem: A Case Study. Church Hist., Mar. 1971. [4709]
- REYNOLDS, E. E. Three [19th century] Views of Utopia. Moreana, Nov. 1971. [4710]
- RILEY-SMITH, JONATHAN. A Note on Confraternities in the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem [note]. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [4711]
- ROBERTSON, IAN. The Signoria of Girolamo Riario in Imola. Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4712]
- ROBINSON, M. Beckett: at another impasse [r. art.]. J. Eur. Stud., Dec. 1971. [4713]
- ROGERS, ALAN. Three Early Maps of the Isle of Axholme. Midland Hist., Spring, Autumn 1971. [4714]
- ROLOFF, HANS-GERT. Thomas Naogeorgs Judas—Ein Drama der Reformationszeit. Arch. Stud. neueren Sprachen u. Lit., Sept. 1971. [4715]
- ROSEN, EDWARD. Copernicus' Alleged Priesthood. Arch. Reformation Hist., no. 1, 1971. [4716]
- ROSS, MARGARET CLUNIES. A Note on Atlakvi[d]a, Strophe 16, Lines 9-10. Med. Scand., 3, 1970. [4717]
- ROUSSEAU, PHILIP. The Spiritual Authority of the "Monk-Bishop": Eastern Elements in Some Western Hagiography of the Fourth and Fifth Centuries. J. Theol. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4718]
- RUNCIMAN, STEVEN. The Decline of the Crusading Ideal. Sewanee R., Autumn 1971. [4719]

SANJIAN, AVEDIS K. Two Contemporary Armenian Elegies on the Fall of Constantinople, 1453. Viator, I, 1970. [4720]

SAUNDERS, J. J. Rashid al-Din, the First Universal Historian. Hist. Today, July 1971. [4721]

SCHENDA, RUDOLF. Die protestantisch-katholische Legendenpolemik im 16. Jahrhundert. Arch. Kulturgesch., no. 1, 1970. [4722]

SCHOURER, REMY. Nicole Gilles et Antoine Vêrard. Bibl. Ecole chartes, July-Dec. 1970. [4723]

SCHLESINGER, WALTER. Heinrich Büttner, 1908-1970. Hist. Z., Aug. 1971. [4724]

SCOTT, W. W. Fordun's Description of the Inauguration of Alexander II. Scottish Hist. R., Oct. 1971. [4725]

SEVČENKO, IHOŘ. Intellectual History in the Cambridge and Soviet Histories of the Byzantine Empire [r. art.]. Slavic R., Sept. 1971. [4726]

SEWARD, DESMOND. Dissolution of the Templars. Hist. Today, Sept. 1971. [4727]

SHEPARD, ROBERT F. Cranmer's Prayer Books and the Redemptive Process: Introductory Note to a Psychological Approach. Anglican Theol. R., July 1971. [4728]

SHRIVER, GEORGE H. A Summary of "Images of Catharism and the Historian's Task." Church Hist., Mar. 1971. [4729]

SIEBEN, HERMANN JOSEF. Zur Entwicklung der Konzilsidee, III [Vincent of Lerins]. Theol. u. Phil., no. 3, 1971. [4730]

SIMON, ECKEHARD. The Rustic Muse: Neidhart-schwänke in Murals, Stone Carvings, and Woodcuts. Germanic R., Nov. 1971. [4731]

SLAVIN, ARTHUR J. Profitable Studies: Humanists and Government in Early Tudor England. Viator, I, 1970. [4732]

- SLIM, H. COLIN. Gian and Gian Maria: Some Fifteenth- and Sixteenth-Century Namesakes. Musical Q., Oct. 1971. [4733]

SOMERVILLE, ROBERT. The French Councils of Pope Urban II: Some Basic Considerations. An. hist. conciliorum, no. 1, 1970. [4734]

SOUTHERN, R. W. Aspects of the European Tradition of Historical Writing: 2. Hugh of St Victor and the Idea of Historical Development. Presidential Address. Trans. Roy. Hist. Soc., 21, 1971. [4735]

SPIEGEL, GABRIELLE M. The Reditus Regni ad Stirpem Karoli Magni: A New Look. Fr. Hist. Stud., Fall 1971. [4736]

STARK, WALTER. Der Utrechter Frieden von 1474 zwischen der Hanse und England. Z. Geschichtswiss., no. 7, 1971. [4737]

ST. JOSEPH, J. K. Air Reconnaissance: Recent Results [deserted medieval village]. Antiquity, Dec. 1971. [4738]

SZOMLAISKI, LEIF. Rigslovgivning og indenrigspolitik under Valdemar Atterdag, 1354-1360. Historie (Århus U.), no. 2, 1971. [4739]

TAYLOR, J. J. Eastern Appeals to Rome in the Early Church: A Little-Known Witness. Downside R., Apr. 1971. [4740]

THOMAS, HEINZ. Erzbischof Siegfried I. von Mainz und die Tradition seiner Kirche. Ein Beitrag zur Wahl Rudolfs von Rheinfelden. Deutsches Arch., no. 2, 1970. [4741]

THOMPSON, CLAIBORNE W. A Swedish Runographer and a Headless Bishop. Med. Scand., 3, 1970. [4742]

THOMPSON, DAVID. Dante and Bernard Silvestris. Viator, I, 1970. [4743]

THOMSON, KENNETH JOHN. A Comparison of the Consultations of Marsilius of Padua and William of Ockham to the Tyrolean Marriage of 1341-1342. Arch. francisc. hist., Jan.-June 1970. [4744]

TUCK, J. A. Northumbrian Society in the Fourteenth Century. N. Hist., VI, 1971. [4745]

VAN LUYN, P. Les milites dans la France du XI<sup>e</sup> siècle. Moyen Age, nos. 1-2, 1971. [4746]

VERGER, J. Le rôle social de l'Université d'Avignon au XV<sup>e</sup> siècle. Bibl. Humanisme Renaissance, no. 3, 1971. [4747]

VRYONIS, SPEROS, JR. Byzantine Attitudes toward Islam during the Late Middle Ages. Greek, Roman, Byz. Stud., Summer 1971. [4748]

WAGNER, FRITZ. Herbert Grundmann, 1902-1970. Arch. Kulturgesch., no. 1, 1970. [4749]

WALL, SISTER CAROLYN. York Pageant XLVI and Its Music (with A Note on the Transcriptions by Ruth Steiner). Speculum, Oct. 1971. [4750]

WATT, D. E. R. The Minority of Alexander III of Scotland. Trans. Roy. Hist. Soc., 21, 1971. [4751]

WEISS, BARDO. "Gott ist anders" nach Meister Eckhart. Theol. u. Phil., no. 3, 1971. [4752]

WEISS, RAYMOND L. Language and Ethics: Reflections on Maimonides' "Ethics." J. Hist. Phil., Oct. 1971. [4753]

WERNER, THEOD. GUSTAV. Unternehmerwerkstätten im europäischen Textilgewerbe des späten Mittelalters und der frühen Neuzeit—Vorstufen des Fabrikwesens. Scripta Mercaturae, no. 1, 1971. [4754]

WHITE, DONALD A. Changing Views on the Adventus Saxonum in Nineteenth and Twentieth Century English Scholarship. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [4755]

WILSON, ROBERT RAWDON. The Deformation of Narrative Time in the Faerie Queene. U. Toronto Q., Autumn 1971. [4756]

WINSLOW, DONALD F. Christology and Exegesis in the Cappadocians. Church Hist., Dec. 1971. [4757]

WIRTH, PETER. Zur Kenntnis heliosatellitischer Planetentheorien im griechischen Mittelalter. Hist. Z., Apr. 1971. [4758]

WOLFRAM, HERWIG. The Shaping of the Early Medieval Kingdom. Viator, I, 1970. [4759]

WOODY, KENNERLY M. Sagena piscatoris: Peter Damiani and the Papal Election Decree of 1059. Viator, I, 1970. [4760]

YATES, W. NIGEL. Bishop Peter de Aquablanca (1240-1268): a Reconsideration. J. Eccles. Hist., Oct. 1971. [4761]

YOUTIE, HERBERT C. "Bradeōn graphōn": Between Literacy and Illiteracy [big deliberate letters do not always prove ability to write]. Greek, Roman, Byz. Stud., Summer 1971. [4762]

YULE, GEORGE. In What Way Should We Understand the Causes of the Reformation? Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4763]

ZAHLTEN, JOHANNES. Die "Hippiatria" des Jordanus Ruffus: Ein Beitrag zur Naturwissenschaft am Hof Kaiser Friedrichs II. Arch. Kulturgesch., no. 1, 1971. [4764]

ZIMMERMANN, MICHEL. L'évêque élu. A propos d'un livre récent [Robert L. Benson, The Bishop Elect, 1968]. Moyen Age, no. 1, 1971. [4765]

ZINN, GROVER. Hugh of St. Victor and the Ark of Noah: A New Look. Church Hist., Sept. 1971. [4766]

MODERN EUROPE GENERAL

BARK, DENNIS L. Changing East-West Relations in Europe: The Bonn-Moscow Treaty of August 1970. Orbis, Summer 1971. [4767]

BLACKWOOD, BRIAN. The Black Notebook of Serge Diaghilev. Bull. N.Y. Public Lib., Oct. 1971. [4768]

BROWN, IRENE QUENZLER. The Renaissance in Education. Part I: William Harrison Woodward and Humanistic Education [r. art.]. Hist. Ed. Q., Fall 1971. [4769]

CHAMBERS, J. D. The Tawney Tradition. Ec. Hist. R., Aug. 1971. [4770]

COMITO, TERRY. Renaissance Gardens and the Discovery of Paradise. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [4771]

DOEBLER, J. Donatello's enigmatic David. J. Eur. Stud., Dec. 1971. [4772]

DOUGHERTY, CHARLES T. Manning, Ollivier and Papal Infallibility [note]. Manuscripta, July 1971. [4773]

DUCHÊNE, FRANÇOIS. A New European Defense Community. For. Aff., Oct. 1971. [4774]

FEHRENBACH, ELISABETH. Über die Bedeutung der politischen Symbole im Nationalstaat. Hist. Z., Oct. 1971. [4775]

GRIERSON, P. The Monetary Pattern of Sixteenth-Century Coinage. Trans. Roy. Hist. Soc., 21, 1971. [4776]

HAINES, NICOLAS. Politics and Protest: Hegel and Social Criticism. PSQ, Sept. 1971. [4777]

HARDY-HEMERY, ODETTE. Le Nazisme: passé et actualité. R. Nord, Apr.-June 1971. [4778]

HAYMAN, JOHN G. Notions on National Characters in the Eighteenth Century. Huntington Lib. Q., Nov. 1971. [4779]

JONES, W. R. Abracadabra—Sorcery And Witchcraft In European History. Hist. Teacher, Nov. 1971. [4780]

MASON, H. T. De l'état actuel des lumières: the third international Congress on the Enlightenment, Nancy 1971. J. Eur. Stud., Dec. 1971. [4781]

MORRISSEY, THOMAS E. A. G. Dickens and the Men of the Sixteenth Century [r. art.]. AHR, Apr. 1972. [4782]

NOVIČEV, A. D. Der Einfall der Franzosen in Ägypten und der französisch-türkische Krieg 1798-1802. Z. Geschichtswiss., no. 9, 1971. [4783]

NÜRNBERGER, RICHARD. Die chinesische Frage auf der Pariser Friedenskonferenz 1919. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [4784]

PECKHAM, MORSE. The Historian between the Anthropologist and the Futurologist: The Function of History in 19th-Century European Culture. Survey, Summer 1971. [4785]

PINDER, JOHN. Foreign Policy East and West: An Ostpolitik for the European Community. Survey, Summer 1971. [4786]

PROBST, CHRISTIAN. Ärztliche Forschung am Krankenbett im Zeitalter der Aufklärung: Gezeigt am Beispiel der Leydener und Wiener Schule. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [4787]

RAUCH, GEORG VON. Politische Voraussetzungen für westöstliche Kulturbeziehungen im 18. Jahrhundert. Deutsche Stud., Sept. 1971. [4788]

REMAK, JOACHIM. 1914—The Third Balkan War: Origins Reconsidered. J. Mod. Hist., Sept. 1971. [4789]

RUSSELL, JOYCELYNE G. The Search for Universal Peace: the Conferences at Calais and Bruges in 1521. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [4790]

SCHOTTENLOHER, OTTO. Zur humanitas legum bei Erasmus. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [4791]

STEINBERG, J. The Novelle of 1908: Necessities and Choices in the Anglo-German Naval Arms Race. Trans. Roy. Hist. Soc., 21, 1971. [4792]

TURNAU, IRENA. La bonneterie en Europe du XVI<sup>e</sup> au XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4793]

YULE, GEORGE. In what way should we understand the causes of the Reformation? Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4794]

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH AND IRELAND

Leland H. Carlson, University of Southern California

Frederic A. Youngs, Jr., California State College, Long Beach

GENERAL

SNELL, LAWRENCE S. Accessions to Archives 1969. Midland Hist., Spring 1971. [4795]

SNELL, LAWRENCE S. Accessions to Archives 1970. Midland Hist., Autumn 1971. [4796]

TUDORS AND STUARTS

AARSLEFF, HANS. Locke's Reputation in Nineteenth-Century England. Monist, July 1971. [4797]

Additions to A List of Books Printed in the British Isles and of English Books Printed Abroad before 1701, in Guildhall Library. Guildhall Misc., Oct. 1969. [4798]

- ASHCRAFT, RICHARD. Hobbes's Natural Man: A Study in Ideology Formation. J. Pol., Nov. 1971. [4799]
- BACHRACH, A. G. H. 'Mon fils Ludovicq passant en Angleterre' [Lodewyck Huygens in England—Journal, 1651–52]. Proc. Huguenot Soc. London, 1, 1971. [4800]
- BAKER, J. H. New Light on Slade's Case. Cambridge Law J., Nov. 1971. [4801]
- BAKSHIAN, ARAM, JR. Prince Rupert. Hist. Today, Oct. 1971. [4802]
- BARRY, P. C. The Sheriff's Inventory of the Goods of Ven. Marmaduke Bowes. Recusant Hist., Oct. 1970. [4803]
- BAUMBER, M. L. The Navy and Civil War in Ireland 1641–1643. Mariner's Mirror, Nov. 1971. [4804]
- BEDDARD, ROBERT. A Relic of Stuart Popery. Prayers for Queen Beatrice, Anno 1688. Bodleian Lib. Rec., June 1971. [4805]
- BEDDARD, ROBERT A. "The Violent Party": The Guildhall Revolutionaries and the Growth of Opposition to James II. Guildhall Misc., Apr. 1970. [4806]
- BERGERON, DAVID M. Charles I's Royal Entries into London. Guildhall Misc., Apr. 1970. [4807]
- BETTERIDGE, ALAN. Asterby and Donington-on-Bain, Lincolnshire. Baptist Q., Jan. 1971. [4808]
- BOKENHAM, T. D. Trithemius, the Rosicrucians and "Shakespeare." Baconiana, Sept. 1969. [4809]
- BONNER, A. R., and JAMES, P. Two Letters in Hebrew Addressed to Sir Thomas Bodley. Bodleian Lib. Rec., June 1971. [4810]
- BRINK, ANDREW W. William Riley Parker's Milton and Friends. J. Friends' Hist. Soc., 3, 1970. [4811]
- BROWN, MARK N. The Printer's Text of Halifax's Observations upon a Late Libel (1681). Library, Sept. 1971. [4812]
- BURCH, BRIAN. The Parish of St. Anne's Blackfriars, London, to 1665. With a List of the Clergy. Guildhall Misc., Oct. 1969. [4813]
- BUSH, M. L. The Problem of the Far North: A Study of the Crisis of 1537 and Its Consequences. N. Hist., VI, 1971. [4814]
- CADBURY, HENRY J. More First Publishers of Truth [Early Quaker Records]. J. Friends' Hist. Soc., 3, 1970. [4815]
- CAMPBELL, BLAIR. Prescription and Description in Political Thought. The Case for Hobbes. Am. Pol. Sci. R., June 1971. [4816]
- CAMPBELL, JOHN. The Quarrel over the Communion Table [1616–41]. Hist. Mag. Prot. Epis. Church, June 1971. [4817]
- CAPP, BERNARD. Godly Rule and English Millenarianism [r. art.]. Past & Present, Aug. 1971. [4818]
- CHITTY, ERIC. The Whately and Wheatley Family of Banbury. Cake and Cockhorse, Spring 1969. [4819]
- CLIFTON, ROBIN. The Popular Fear of Catholics during the English Revolution. Past & Present, Aug. 1971. [4820]
- COBB, RONALD LEE. George Fox and Quaker-Baptist Controversy. Foundations, July–Sept. 1971. [4821]
- COOGAN, ROBERT. Petrarch's Latin Prose and the English Renaissance. Stud. Philol., July 1971. [4822]
- COPE, ESTHER S. Sir Edward Coke and Proclamations, 1610. Am. J. Legal Hist., July 1971. [4823]
- COWARD, B. Disputed Inheritances: Some Difficulties of the Nobility in the Late Sixteenth and Early Seventeenth Centuries. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [4824]
- DANNER, DAN G. Anthony Gilby: Puritan in Exile—A Biographical Approach. Church Hist., Dec. 1971. [4825]
- DAVIDSON, ALAN. Catholics and Bodley. Bodleian Lib. Rec., June 1971. [4826]
- DAWSON, ALEXIS. Master Apis Lapis [Nashe]. Shakespearean Authorship R., Summer 1970. [4827]
- DETWEILER, ROBERT. Was Richard Hakluyt a Negative Influence in the Colonization of Virginia? N. C. Hist. R., Autumn 1971. [4828]
- DICKINSON, H. T. The Correspondence of Henry St. John and Thomas Erle, 1705–8. Pt. II. J. Soc. Army Hist. Res., Summer 1971. [4829]
- DOMARCHI, JEAN. L'Angleterre des Tudors et des Stuarts: Notes bibliographiques [r. art.]. An. Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.–Oct. 1971. [4830]
- DONOVAN, DENNIS G. Recent Studies in Burton and Walton. Eng. Lit. Renaissance, Autumn 1971. [4831]
- DOWLEY, T. Baptists and Discipline in the 17th Century. Baptist Q., Oct. 1971. [4832]
- DURKAN, JOHN. Notes on Scots in Italy—I. George Strachan. Innes R., Spring 1971. [4833]
- Early Books and Manuscripts on Navigation from the Collection of Henry C. Taylor. Gaz. Grolier Club, June 1970. [4834]
- EDIE, CAROLYN ANDERVONT. New Buildings, New Taxes, and Old Interests: An Urban Problem of the 1670s. J. Brit. Stud., May 1967. [4835]
- EISENSTEIN, ELIZABETH L. A Reply [to Theodore K. Rabb]. Past & Present, Aug. 1971. [4836]
- ELTON, G. R. Studying the History of Parliament. Brit. Stud. Monitor, Summer 1971. [4837]
- ENGLAND, MARTHA WINBURN. Sir Philip Sidney and François Perrot de Mézières: Their Verse Versions of the Psalms. Part II, Conclusion. Bull. N.Y. Public Lib., Feb. 1971. [4838]
- FERGUSON, ARTHUR B. The Historical Thought of Samuel Daniel: A Study in Renaissance Ambivalence. J. Hist. Ideas, Apr.–June 1971. [4839]
- FISH, STANLEY EUGENE. Progress in The Pilgrim's Progress. Eng. Lit. Renaissance, Autumn 1971. [4840]
- FLETCHER, A. J. Sir Thomas Wentworth and the Restoration of Pontefract as a Parliamentary Borough. N. Hist., VI, 1971. [4841]
- FORSTER, ANN M. C. The Maire Family of County Durham. Recusant Hist., Oct. 1970. [4842]
- FROST, WILLIAM. Dryden and "Satire." Stud. Eng. Lit., 1500–1900, Summer 1971. [4843]
- GEORGE, C. H. The Making of the English Bourgeoisie, 1500–1750. Sci. and Soc., Winter 1971. [4844]

- GILKES, R. K. Banbury—the Pattern of Local Government, 1554–1835. Cake and Cockhorse, Autumn 1971. [4845]
- GILL, ROMA, and KRUEGER, ROBERT. The Early Editions of Marlowe's Elegies and Davies's Epigrams: Sequence and Authority. Library, Sept. 1971. [4846]
- GOKHALE, B. G. Merchants and Adventurers in India. Hist. Today, Aug. 1971. [4847]
- GORING, J. J. The General Proscription of 1522. EHR, Oct. 1971. [4848]
- GREAVES, RICHARD L. Francis Bampfield (1615–1684): Eccentric Hebraist and Humanitarian. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [4849]
- GWYNN, ROBIN D. Louis Hérault and His 'Advis.' Proc. Huguenot Soc. London, 1, 1971. [4850]
- HABENICHT, RUDOLPH E., et al. Shakespeare: An Annotated World Bibliography for 1970. Shakespeare Q., Summer 1971. [4851]
- HALE, J. R. Sixteenth-Century Explanations of War and Violence. Past & Present, May 1971. [4852]
- HARDACRE, PAUL H. Sir Edward Hyde and the Idea of Liberty to Tender Consciences, 1641–1656. J. Church and State, Winter 1971. [4853]
- HAYNES, ALAN. Dr Julius Caesar: A Stately Measure of Advancement. Hist. Today, Nov. 1971. [4854]
- HERTZLER, JAMES R. The Abuse and Outlawing of Sanctuary for Debt in Seventeenth-Century England. Hist. J., Sept. 1971. [4855]
- HILL, B. W. The Change of Government and the "Loss of the City," 1710–1711. Ec. Hist. R., Aug. 1971. [4856]
- HILL, L. M. The Admiralty Circuit of 1591: Some Comments on the Relations between Central Government and Local Interests. Hist. J., Mar. 1971. [4857]
- HUTTENBACH, HENRY R. New Archival Material on the Anglo-Russian Treaty of Queen Elizabeth I and Tsar Ivan IV. Slavonic E. Eur. R., Oct. 1971. [4858]
- JOHNSON, ROBERT C. Bibliographical Aids to Research. XXII.—Parliamentary Diaries of the Early Stuart Period. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [4859]
- JOHNSTON, J. A. Parliament and the Protection of Trade 1689–1694. Mariner's Mirror, Nov. 1971. [4860]
- JONES, WILLIAM M. Reformers from Wittenberg, Strasbourg, Zurich, and Geneva in England: 1547–1549. Iliff R., Spring 1970. [4861]
- JONES, W. R. Abracadabra—Sorcery and Witchcraft in European History. Hist. Teacher, Nov. 1971. [4862]
- KAPLAN, LAWRENCE. The 'Plot' to Depose Charles I in 1644. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [4863]
- KARGON, ROBERT H. The Testimony of Nature: Boyle, Hooke and Experimental Philosophy. Albion, Summer 1971. [4864]
- KAUL, R. K. Milton and Spinoza: Forerunners of the Enlightenment. Enlightenment Essays, Spring 1971. [4865]
- KENYON, J. P. The Acquittal of Sir George Wakeman: 18 July 1679. Hist. J., Dec. 1971. [4866]
- KINDER, A. GORDON. Two Unpublished Letters of Jean Cousin, Minister of the Threadneedle Street Church concerning the Affair of Cassiodora De Reina. Proc. Huguenot Soc. London, 1, 1971. [4867]
- KING, A. HYATT. The Significance of John Rastell in Early Music Printing. Library, Sept. 1971. [4868]
- KIRBY, DAVID A. The Radicals of St. Stephen's, Coleman Street, London, 1624–1642. Guildhall Misc., Apr. 1970. [4869]
- KITCHING, CHRISTOPHER J. Alchemy in the Reign of Edward VI: an Episode in the Careers of Richard Whalley and Richard Eden [note]. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [4870]
- LANG, ROBERT G. London's Aldermen in Business: 1600–1625. Guildhall Misc., Apr. 1971. [4871]
- L'Angleterre, XVI<sup>e</sup>–XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.–Oct. 1971. [4872]
- LAVIN, J. A. The First Two Printers of Sidney's Astrophil and Stella. Library, Sept. 1971. [4873]
- LEE, PATRICIA-ANN. Some English Academies: An Experiment in the Education of Renaissance Gentlemen. Hist. Ed. Q., Fall 1970. [4874]
- LEGOUIS, PIERRE. Une biographie de Sir John Denham (avec un supplément). Et. anglaises, July–Sept. 1971. [4875]
- LLOYD, HOWELL A. Wales and Star Chamber: A Rejoinder. Welsh Hist. R., June 1971. [4876]
- LOOMIE, ALBERT J. Richard Berry: Gondomar's English Catholic Adviser. Recusant Hist., Jan. 1971. [4877]
- LUNN, MAURUS. Benedictine Opposition to Bishop Richard Smith (1625–1629). Recusant Hist., Jan. 1971. [4878]
- MCAVOY, WILLIAM C. A Review of 1969's Contribution to English Renaissance Textual Studies. Manuscripta, Nov. 1971. [4879]
- MACFARLANE, IRIS. The Insecure World of Oliver Heywood. Hist. Today, Apr. 1971. [4880]
- MCROBERTS, DAVID. The Manse of Stobo in 1542—Part I. Innes R., Spring 1971. [4881]
- MASTERS, BETTY R. The Town Clerk. Guildhall Misc., Oct. 1969. [4882]
- MAY, W. E. The Phoenix in India, 1684–1687. Mariner's Mirror, May 1971. [4883]
- MAYHEW, GEORGE P. Jonathan Swift's "On the Burning of Whitehall in 1697" Re-examined. Harvard Lib. Bull., Oct. 1971. [4884]
- MAYHEW, GEORGE P. Swift's Political "Conversion" and His "Lost" Ballad on the Westminster Election of 1710. Bull. John Rylands Lib., Spring 1971. [4885]
- MILLAR, GILBERT JOHN. The Landsknecht: His Recruitment and Organization, with Some Reference to the Reign of Henry VIII. Mil. Aff., Oct. 1971. [4886]
- MOLLO, BORIS. "Poise Your Musket." Early Drill Books in the National Army Museum. Connoisseur, Nov. 1971. [4887]
- MOORE, JOHN ROBERT. Defoe's Persona as Author: The Quaker's Sermon. Stud. Eng. Lit., 1500–1900, Summer 1971. [4888]

- MUCHMORE, LYNN. The Project Literature: An Elizabethan Example. Bus. Hist. R., Winter 1971. [4889]
- NEWMAN, JOHN. Nicholas Stone's Goldsmiths' Hall: Design and Practice in the 1630s. Architectural Hist., 14, 1971. [4890]
- O'NEEL, MICHAEL C. A Wyatt Bibliography—Part 2. Bull. Bibliogr. Mag. Notes, Oct.–Dec. 1970. [4891]
- PARKER, DOUGLAS H. J. F. Mozley's "The English 'Enchiridion' of Erasmus, 1533": Some Qualifications [Tyndale]. Notes and Queries, June 1971. [4892]
- PARKS, STEPHEN, and CRIST, TIMOTHY. New Letters of King Charles II. Yale U. Lib. Gaz., Oct. 1971. [4893]
- PEARSON, MICHAEL, and BUISSET, DAVID. A Pirate at Port Royal in 1679 [doc.]. Mariner's Mirror, Aug. 1971. [4894]
- POPKIN, RICHARD H. The Philosophy of Bishop Stillingfleet. J. Hist. Phil., July 1971. [4895]
- POWLICK, LEONARD. The Staging of the Chester Cycle: An Alternate Theory. Theatre Survey, Nov. 1971. [4896]
- PRESCOTT, ANNE LAKE. The Reputation of Clément Marot in Renaissance England. Stud. Renaissance, XVIII, 1971. [4897]
- RABB, THEODORE K. The Advent of Printing and the Problem of the Renaissance: A Comment. Past & Present, Aug. 1971. [4898]
- RANSOM, SUSAN. Squire [Richard] Cartwright and Parson Drope. Cake and Cockhorse, Autumn 1969. [4899]
- RATHMELL, J. C. A. Jonson, Lord Lisle, and Penshurst. Eng. Lit. Renaissance, Autumn 1971. [4900]
- ROGERS, ALAN. Three Early Maps of the Isle of Axholme. Midland Hist., Autumn 1971. [4901]
- ROSENFELD, MANUEL C. Holy Trinity, Aldgate, on the Eve of the Dissolution. Guildhall Misc., Oct. 1970. [4902]
- SHAHEEN, NASEEB. Spenser and the New Testament. Am. Notes and Queries, Sept. 1971. [4903]
- SINCLAIR-STEVENSON, CHRISTOPHER. The Jacobite Expedition of 1708. Hist. Today, Apr. 1971. [4904]
- SMITH, JOHN HAZEL. John Foxe on Astrology. Eng. Lit. Renaissance, Autumn 1971. [4905]
- SNOW, VERNON F. A Rejoinder to Mr. Graves's Reassessment of Proctorial Representation. J. Brit. Stud., May 1971. [4906]
- STEWART, J. D. More Drawings by Sir Godfrey Kneller. Connoisseur, Nov. 1971. [4907]
- TEMPESTA, JOSEPH F. Three Pamphlets concerning Father Edmund Campion, S.J. Albion, 2, 1970. [4908]
- TOYNBEE, MARGARET. Joan Carlike: Some Further Attributions. Connoisseur, Nov. 1971. [4909]
- WAGNER, FRITZ. Isaac Newtons Friedenstraum. Saeculum, 1, 1970. [4910]
- WALLACE, KARL R. Francis Bacon on Understanding, Reason, and Rhetoric. Speech Monographs, June 1971. [4911]
- WALTON, CRAIG. Ramus and Bacon on Method. J. Hist. Phil., July 1971. [4912]
- WATTS, S. J. Tenant-Right in Early Seventeenth-Century Northumberland. N. Hist., VI, 1971. [4913]
- WELCH, EDWIN. William Barton, Hymnwriter. Guildhall Misc., Apr. 1971. [4914]
- WHITE, B. R. Samuel Eaton (d. 1639). Particular Baptist Pioneer. Baptist Q., Jan. 1971. [4915]
- WHITE, B. R. Thomas Collier and Gangraena Edwards. Baptist Q., July 1971. [4916]
- WHITE, B. R. Two Early Propagandists for Believer's Baptism [1644]. Baptist Q., Oct. 1971. [4917]
- WIENER, CAROL Z. The Beleaguered Isle. A Study of Elizabethan and Early Jacobean Anti-Catholicism. Past & Present, May 1971. [4918]
- WILLIAMS, C. M. Extremist Tactics in the Long Parliament, 1642–1643. Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4919]
- WORDEN, BLAIR. The Bill for a New Representative: The Dissolution of the Long Parliament, April 1653. EHR, July 1971. [4920]
- YOUNGS, FREDERIC A., JR. Definitions of Treason in an Elizabethan Proclamation. Hist. J., Dec. 1971. [4921]

MODERN BRITAIN SINCE 1714

- ADAIR, P. R. Sergeant Pell in London. Hist. Today, Oct. 1971. [4922]
- ADAMS, NANCY L., and ADAMS, DENNIS M. An Examination of Some Forces Affecting English Educational Policies in India: 1780–1850. Hist. Ed. Q., Summer 1971. [4923]
- ADDLESHAW, G. W. O. Architects, Sculptors, Designers and Craftsmen, 1770–1970, Whose Work Is to Be Seen in Chester Cathedral. Architectural Hist., 14, 1971. [4924]
- ALDERMAN, GEOFFREY. The Victorian Transport Revolution [r. art.]. Hist. J., Sept. 1971. [4925]
- ALDRIDGE, A. OWEN. Thomas Paine, Edmund Burke and Anglo-French Relations in 1787. Stud. Burke Times, Spring 1971. [4926]
- ALLEN, DAVID. Surveys of Records in the British Isles. Aslib Proc., July 1971. [4927]
- AMORY, HUGH. Fielding's Lisbon Letters. Huntington Lib. Q., Nov. 1971. [4928]
- AMORY, HUGH. Henry Fielding and the Criminal Legislation of 1751–2. Philol. Q., Apr. 1971. [4929]
- ANDREWS, STUART. The Wesley Naturalist. Hist. Today, Nov. 1971. [4930]
- ATHERTON, HERBERT M. George Townshend, Caricaturist. Eighteenth-Cent. Stud., Summer 1971. [4931]
- BABINGTON, ANTHONY. Newgate in the Eighteenth Century. Hist. Today, Sept. 1971. [4932]
- BARMANN, LAWRENCE F. The London Times and the St. Louis World's Fair. Mo. Hist. R., Oct. 1971. [4933]
- BARNSBY, GEORGE J. The Standard of Living in the Black Country during the Nineteenth Century. Ec. Hist. R., May 1971. [4934]
- BARTLETT, LAURENCE. Bibliography for William Congreve and Restoration Comedy. Restoration and 18th Cent. Theatre Res., Nov. 1971. [4935]

- BEHRMAN, CYNTHIA F. The After-life of General Gordon. Albion, Summer 1971. [4936]
- BENNETT, GEOFFREY. Admiral Ushakov: Nelson's Russian Ally. Hist. Today, Oct. 1971. [4937]
- BENTMAN, RAYMOND. Satiric Structure and Tone in the Conclusion of Gulliver's Travels. Stud. Eng. Lit., 1500-1900, Summer 1971. [4938]
- BERMAN, DAVID. Berkeley, Clayton, and An Essay on Spirit. J. Hist. Ideas, July-Sept. 1971. [4939]
- BERNEKING, CAROLYN B. The Welsh Settlers of Emporia: A Cultural History. Kan. Hist. Q., Autumn 1971. [4940]
- BRANSON, DOUGLAS M. Some Suggestions from a Comparison of British and American Tender Offer Regulation. Cornell Law R., May 1971. [4941]
- BRAUN, ANNE ROMANIS. Wages in the United Kingdom: Has There Been a Shift in the Phillips Curve? Int. Monetary Fund Staff Pap., Mar. 1971. [4942]
- BREWER, JOHN. Party and the Double Cabinet: Two Facets of Burke's Thoughts. Hist. J., Sept. 1971. [4943]
- BROWN, C. G. Itinerancy and Loyalty. A Study in Eighteenth Century Evangelicalism. J. Relig. Hist., June 1971. [4944]
- BROWN, JOHN. The Poor Law Commission and the 1905 Unemployed Workmen Act [note]. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [4945]
- BROWN, K. D. The Appointment of the 1905 Poor Law Commission—a Rejoinder [note]. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [4946]
- BROWN, KENNETH D. The Labour Party and the Unemployment Question, 1906-1910. Hist. J., Sept. 1971. [4947]
- BROWNE, DON R. The BBC and the Pirates: A Phase in the Life of a Prolonged Monopoly. Journalism Q., Spring 1971. [4948]
- BRYDEN, D. J. A Short Catalogue of the Types Used by John Reid, Printer in Edinburgh, 1761-74. Bibliotheca, 6, no. 1, 1971. [4949]
- BUTLER, DAVID M. The Circulating Yearly-Meeting for the Northern Counties, 1699 to 1798. J. Friends' Hist. Soc., 3, 1970. [4950]
- CAIRD, JAMES B. Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe. Lib. R., Autumn 1971. [4951]
- CAMPBELL, IAN. Carlyle and the Negro Question Again. Criticism, Summer 1971. [4952]
- CAMPBELL, JOHN P. Refighting Britain's Great Patriotic War. Int. J. (Canada), Autumn 1971. [4953]
- CANON, BRADLEY C. British, French and American Systems of Justice Compared. Current Hist., Aug. 1971. [4954]
- CARNOCHAN, W. B. Witch-Hunting and Belief in 1751: The Case of Thomas Colley and Ruth Osborne. J. Soc. Hist., Summer 1971. [4955]
- CARR, WENDELL ROBERT. James Mill's Politics Reconsidered: Parliamentary Reform and the Triumph of Truth. Hist. J., Sept. 1971. [4956]
- CASSELL, FRANK A. Response to Crisis: Baltimore in 1814. Md. Hist. Mag., Fall 1971. [4957]
- CHAMBERS, J. D. The Tawney Tradition. Ec. Hist. R., Aug. 1971. [4958]
- CHAPMAN, STANLEY D. The Cost of Power in the Industrial Revolution in Britain: The Case of the Textile Industry. Midland Hist., Autumn 1971. [4959]
- CHITNIS, ANAND C. The Pursuit of Knowledge in Edinburgh, 1780-1826. Enlightenment Essays, Spring 1971. [4960]
- CHRISTIANSON, GERALD. G. G. Coulton: The Medieval Historian as Controversialist. Cath. Hist. R., Oct. 1971. [4961]
- CHURCH, R. A. The Railway Age: A Re-interpretation [r. art.]. Midland Hist., Autumn 1971. [4962]
- CLARK, GEORGE. Bernard Mandeville, M.D., and Eighteenth-Century Ethics. Bull. Hist. Medicine, Sept.-Oct. 1971. [4963]
- CLARK, MANNING; BURNS, A. L.; STRETTON, HUGH; MULVANEY, D. J.; GREGORY, J. S.; BALL, W. MACMAHON; and HANCOCK, W. K. R. M. Crawford: Some Reminiscences. Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4964]
- COLEMAN, D. C. G. R. Hawke on—What? [rejoinder]. Ec. Hist. R., May 1971. [4965]
- CONOLLY, L. W. A Case of Political Censorship at the Little Theatre in the Haymarket in 1794: John O'Keefe's Jenny's Whim; or, The Roasted Emperor. Restoration and 18th Cent. Theatre Res., Nov. 1971. [4966]
- CONOLLY, L. W. The Censor's Wife at the Theater: The Diary of Anna Margaretta Larpent, 1790-1800. Huntington Lib. Q., Nov. 1971. [4967]
- CORNFORD, F. M. Microcosmographia Academia. Tex. Q., Spring 1971. [4968]
- CORRIGAN, H. S. W. The Channel Tunnel in 1883. Hist. Today, Nov. 1971. [4969]
- CRANGLE, JOHN V. British Reformist and Humanitarian Anti-Imperialism, 1878-1884. NDQ, Autumn 1970. [4970]
- CRAWFORD, R. M. The School of Prudence or Inaccuracy and Incoherence in Describing Chaos? Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [4971]
- CUNNINGHAM, DONALD H. Thomas Babington Macaulay. A Bibliography of Twentieth-Century Periodical Articles and Speeches. Bull. Bibliogr. Mag. Notes, Jan.-Mar. 1971. [4972]
- DAVIDSON, HILDA R. ELLIS. Scandinavian Folklore in Britain. J. Folklore Inst., Aug.-Dec. 1970. [4973]
- DAWNAY, N. P., and TAMPLIN, J. M. A. The Waterloo Banquet at Apsley House, 1836, by William Salter. J. Soc. Army Hist. Res., Summer 1971. [4974]
- DAY, A. E. Sir Winston's Library. Lib. R., Autumn 1971. [4975]
- DAY, ALAN EDWIN. J. B. Priestley: A Checklist. Bull. Bibliogr. Mag. Notes, Apr.-June 1971. [4976]
- DELPECH, L.-J. Un grand historien contemporain, Arnold Toynbee. R. Deux Mondes, June 1971. [4977]
- DINWIDDY, J. R. Christopher Wyvill and Reform 1790-1820. St. Anthony's Hall Publ., Borthwick Pap., 39, 1971. [4978]

- DORSON, RICHARD M. American Folklorists in Britain. J. Folklore Inst., Aug.-Dec. 1970. [4979]
- DRAKE, MICHAEL. The Mid-Victorian Voter. J. Interdisc. Hist., Spring 1971. [4980]
- DUFFY, EAMON. Ecclesiastical Democracy Detected: II (1787-1796). Recusant Hist., Oct. 1970. [4981]
- DURBIN, LINDA M. The Nature of Ordination in Wesley's View of the Ministry. Methodist Hist., Apr. 1971. [4982]
- EDMONDS, DAPHNE B. Mitred Soldiers and the Role of Grenadiers. Connoisseur, Nov. 1971. [4983]
- Education in London before 1870: A Handlist of Selected Items in Guildhall Library. Guildhall Misc., Oct. 1970. [4984]
- ELLEGÅRD, ALVAR. The Readership of the Periodical Press in Mid-Victorian Britain: II. Directory. Victorian Periodicals Newslett., Sept. 1971. [4985]
- ENGERMAN, S. Railways and Economic Growth in England and Wales, 1840-1870. A New Approach to English Railway History. Bus. Hist., July 1971. [4986]
- ERDMAN, DAVID V.; MOLLENAUER, ROBERT R.; and PATTY, JAMES S. The Romantic Movement. A Selective and Critical Bibliography for 1970. Eng. Lang. Notes, Sept. 1971. [4987]
- FAY, PETER W. The Protestant Mission and the Opium War. Pac. Hist. R., May 1971. [4988]
- FIENNES, DAVID. The Owner of Broughton Castle in 1729. Cake and Cockhorse, Autumn 1970. [4989]
- FILBY, P. W. Life under the Golden Bough [Sir James Frazer]. Gaz. Grolier Club, June 1970. [4990]
- FLETCHER, JAMES L. Enlightenment England: The Background and Development of Its Poor Law System. Enlightenment Essays, Spring 1971. [4991]
- FORBES, ERIC G. The Correspondence between Friedrich Gauss and the Rev. Nevil Maskelyne (1802-5). An. Sci., Sept. 1971. [4992]
- FORBES, THOMAS R. Verbal Charms in British Folk Medicine. Proc. Am. Phil. Soc., no. 4, 1971. [4993]
- FORD, A. G. British Investment in Argentina and Long Swings, 1880-1914. J. Ec. Hist., Sept. 1971. [4994]
- FRESE, JOSEPH R. Henry Hulton and the Greenwich Hospital Tax. Am. Neptune, July 1971. [4995]
- FRICK, STEPHEN. The Christian Appeal of 1855: Friends' Public Response to the Crimean War. J. Friends' Hist. Soc., 3, 1970. [4996]
- GALBRAITH, V. H. Sir Frank Stenton (1880-1967) [r. art.]. AHR, Oct. 1971. [4997]
- GENNARD, JOHN, and STEUER, M. D. The Industrial Relations of Foreign Owned Subsidiaries in the United Kingdom. Brit. J. Ind. Relations, July 1971. [4998]
- GHISELIN, MICHAEL T. The Individual in the Darwinian Revolution. New Lit. Hist., Autumn 1971. [4999]
- GILLEY, SHERIDAN. Protestant London, No Popery and the Irish Poor: II (1850-1860). Recusant Hist., Jan. 1971. [5000]
- GOUGH, BARRY M. British Policy in the San Juan Boundary Dispute, 1854-72. Pac. N. W. Q., Apr. 1971. [5001]
- GOWAN, RICHARD. The Religious Imperative: Gordon in the Sudan. Perspective, Winter 1970. [5002]
- GREENWOOD, DAVID. Doctor Samuel Johnson and the Principal of St. Mary Hall. Bodleian Lib. Rec., June 1971. [5003]
- GUPTA, KARUNAKAR. The McMahon Line, 1911-45: The British Legacy. China Q., Sept. 1971. [5004]
- HALE, THOMAS F. The Labour Party and the Monarchy. Contemp. R., Aug. 1971. [5005]
- HAND, WAYLAND D. Anglo-American Folk Belief and Custom: The Old World's Legacy to the New. J. Folklore Inst., Aug.-Dec. 1970. [5006]
- A Handlist of Books in Guildhall Library Relating to Joseph Priestly. Guildhall Misc., Apr. 1971. [5007]
- A Handlist of Some of the 18th Century Broadside in Guildhall Library. Guildhall Misc., Apr. 1970. [5008]
- HARPLEY, F. N. Hume's Probabilism. Australasian J. Phil., Aug. 1971. [5009]
- HARRIS, F. W. Philip Doddridge: Eighteenth-Century Ecumenist. Foundations, July-Sept. 1971. [5010]
- HARRIS, JOHN. C. R. Cockerell's "Ichnographica Domestica." Architectural Hist., 14, 1971. [5011]
- HARRISON, JAMES. Erasmus Darwin's View of Evolution. J. Hist. Ideas, Apr.-June 1971. [5012]
- HARROP, DOROTHY A. George Fisher and the Gregynog Press. Book Collector, Winter 1970. [5013]
- HATTON, P. H. S. Harcourt and Self: the Search for an Anglo-German Understanding through Africa, 1912-14. Eur. Stud. R., Apr. 1971. [5014]
- HAWKE, G. R. D. C. Coleman on the Counterfactual History of the New Draperies [comment]. Ec. Hist. R., May 1971. [5015]
- HEERTJE, ARNOLD. Two Letters from James Mill to Jean-Baptiste Say. Hist. Pol. Ec., Fall 1971. [5016]
- HILL, L. BROOKS. David Lloyd George as Minister of Munitions: A Study of His Speaking Tour of Industrial Centers. S. Speech J., Summer 1971. [5017]
- HOBART, MICHAEL. History and Religion in the Thought of Herbert Butterfield. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [5018]
- HOFFMAN, ROSS J. S. Lord Rockingham: The Inheritance. Stud. Burke Times, Fall 1971. [5019]
- HOLE, CHRISTINA. English Folk Belief and Customs. J. Folklore Inst., Aug.-Dec. 1970. [5020]
- HOLMES, J. DEREK. Some Cases of Conscience, with Particular Reference to the Marriage Act of 1753. Recusant Hist., Oct. 1970. [5021]
- HOWARTH, DAVID. The Man Who Lost Trafalgar [Villeneuve]. Mariner's Mirror, Nov. 1971. [5022]
- HUELIN, GORDON. St. Margaret Pattens: A City Parish in the Nineteenth Century. Guildhall Misc., Apr. 1971. [5023]
- HULCOOP, JOHN F. Virginia Woolf's Diaries: Some Reflections after Reading Them and a Censure of Mr Holroyd. Bull. N. Y. Public Lib., Sept. 1971. [5024]
- ILIASU, A. A. The Cobden-Chevalier Commercial Treaty of 1860. Hist. J., Mar. 1971. [5025]

- IMLAY, ROBERT A. Berkeley on Abstract General Ideas. J. Hist. Phil., July 1971. [5026]
- JACKSON, GORDON. Marine Insurance Frauds in Scotland 1751-1821. Cases of Deliberate Shipwreck Tried in the Scottish Court of Admiralty. Mariner's Mirror, Aug. 1971. [5027]
- JACOB, ALARIC. Chamfort—A Man for Our Time [1741-94]. Hist. Today, June 1971. [5028]
- JANSEN, WM. HUGH. Anglo-American Folk Narrative: A Common Trove. J. Folklore Inst., Aug.-Dec. 1970. [5029]
- JENNINGS, BERNARD. Group Work in Local History: Adult Education and the Study of History. Victorian Stud., Sept. 1971. [5030]
- JEREMY, DAVID J. British and American Yarn Count Systems: An Historical Analysis. Bus. Hist. R., Autumn 1971. [5031]
- JOHNSTON, J. A. The Probate Inventories and Wills of a Worcestershire Parish, 1676-1775 [Powick]. Midland Hist., Spring 1971. [5032]
- KABDEBO, THOMAS. Lord Dudley Stuart and the Hungarian Refugees of 1849. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [5033]
- KAMPF, LOUIS. The Humanist Tradition in Eighteenth-Century England—and Today. New Lit. Hist., Autumn 1971. [5034]
- KENNEDY, F. M. Imperial Cable Communications and Strategy, 1870-1914. EHR, Oct. 1971. [5035]
- KENWOOD, A. G. Capital Investment in Docks, Harbours, and River Improvements in North-Eastern England 1825-1850. J. Transport Hist., Sept. 1971. [5036]
- KIDD, JAMES, and CARNIE, ROBERT H. Annual Bibliography of Scottish Literature, 1970. Bibliothek, no. 2, 1971, suppl. [5037]
- KIERNAN, COLIN. Swift and Science. Hist. J., Dec. 1971. [5038]
- KINSLEY, WILLIAM. The Dunciad as Mock-Book. Huntington Lib. Q., Nov. 1971. [5039]
- KITZAN, LAURENCE. The London Missionary Society and the Problem of Authority in India, 1790-1833. Church Hist., Dec. 1971. [5040]
- KOON, HELENE. Pope's First Editors. Huntington Lib. Q., Nov. 1971. [5041]
- KORNBERG, ALLAN, and FRASURE, ROBERT C. Policy Differences in British Parliamentary Parties. Am. Pol. Sci. R., Sept. 1971. [5042]
- KORSHIN, PAUL J. Allen T. Hazen and Eighteenth-Century Bibliography: An Appraisal of His Achievements. Stud. Burke Times, Spring 1971. [5043]
- LAMONT, CLAIRE. James Boswell and Alexander Fraser Tytler. Bibliothek, 6, no. 1, 1971. [5044]
- LEE, H. I. Mediterranean Strategy and Anglo-French Relations 1908-1912. Mariner's Mirror, Aug. 1971. [5045]
- LEED, JACOB. Johnson, Chesterfield, and Patronage: A Response to Paul Korshin. Stud. Burke Times, Fall 1971. [5046]
- LEICESTER, H. M., JR. The Dialectic of Romantic Historiography. Prospect and Retrospect in "The French Revolution" [Carlyle]. Victorian Stud., Sept. 1971. [5047]
- LINDWALL, ÅKE. The Kempenfelt Family. Mariner's Mirror, Nov. 1971. [5048]
- LIVINGSTON, JAMES C. Henry Dodwell's Christianity Not Founded on Argument, 1742—Revisited. J. Theol. Stud., Oct. 1971. [5049]
- LOOME, THOMAS MICHAEL. 'Revelation as Experience': An Unpublished Lecture of George Tyrrell. Heythrop J., Apr. 1971. [5050]
- LUCAS, REX A. A Specification of the Weber Thesis: Plymouth Colony. Hist. and Theory, 3, 1971. [5051]
- MCCLOSKEY, DONALD N., and SANDBERG, LARS G. From Damnation to Redemption: Judgments on the Late Victorian Entrepreneur. EEH, Fall 1971. [5052]
- MCCUSKER, JOHN J. The Current Value of English Exports, 1697 to 1800. WMQ, Oct. 1971. [5053]
- MCCUTCHEON, JAMES M. "Tremblingly Obey": British and Other Western Responses to China and the Chinese Kotow. Historian, Aug. 1971. [5054]
- MCGILL, WILLIAM J. Herbert Butterfield and the Idea of Liberty. S. Atl. Q., Winter 1971. [5055]
- MCKENDRICK, NEIL. The Victorian View of Midland History: A Historiographical Study of the Potteries [r. art.]. Midland Hist., Spring 1971. [5056]
- MACMASTER, RICHARD K. News of the Yorktown Campaign: The Journal of Dr. Robert Honynman, April 17-November 25, 1781. Va. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [5057]
- MCQUISTON, JULIAN R. Rose and Canning in Opposition, 1806-1807. Hist. J., Sept. 1971. [5058]
- MARVIN, CHARLES A. The Author's Status in the United Kingdom and France: Common Law and the Moral Right Doctrine. Int. Comp. Law Q., Oct. 1971. [5059]
- MARWICK, W. H. A Bibliography of Scottish Economic History during the Last Decade: 1963-1970. Essays in Bibliography and Criticism, LXVIII. Ec. Hist. R., Aug. 1971. [5060]
- MARWICK, WILLIAM H. Quakers in Early Twentieth-Century Scotland. J. Friends' Hist. Soc., 3, 1970. [5061]
- MAST, DANIEL DEE. Philosophical Speculatists: Representatives of the Age of Enlightenment. Enlightenment Essays, Spring 1971. [5062]
- MATHIESON, M., and WHITESIDE, M. T. The Secondary Modern School in Fiction. Brit. J. Ed. Stud., Oct. 1971. [5063]
- MEADE, M. K. Plans of the New Town of Edinburgh. Architectural Hist., 14, 1971. [5064]
- MEGAW, BASIL. An Ayrshire Gentleman's Farmhouse: A Drawing of Mossiel. Scottish Stud., 15, pt. 1, 1971. [5065]
- MELDRUM, RONALD M. Charles Dickens as Artist and Reformer. Albion, Summer 1971. [5066]
- MENHENNET, DAVID. Erskine May's Private Journal, 1857-1882: Diary of a Great Parliamentarian. Contemp. R., Oct. 1971. [5067]
- MICKLEWRIGHT, F. A. AMPHLETT. Clerical Delinquency in the Early Nineteenth Century: The Case of Dr. Free. Notes and Queries, May 1971. [5068]
- MILLER, PETER JOHN. Eighteenth-Century Periodicals for Women [note]. Hist. Ed. Q., Fall 1971. [5069]

- MINGAY, G. E. The Contribution of a Regional Historian: J. D. Chambers, 1898-1970. Stud. Burke Times, Fall 1971. [5070]
- MONEY, J. Birmingham and the West Midlands, 1760-1793: Politics and Regional Identity in the English Provinces in the Later Eighteenth Century. Midland Hist., Spring 1971. [5071]
- MONEY, JOHN. The West Midlands, 1760-1793: Politics, Public Opinion and Regional Identity in the English Provinces during the Late Eighteenth Century. Albion, 2, 1970. [5072]
- MOON, NORMAN S. Caleb Evans, Founder of the Bristol Education Society. Baptist Q., Oct. 1971. [5073]
- MORRIS, A. J. A. The English Radicals' Campaign for Disarmament and the Hague Conference of 1907. J. Mod. Hist., Sept. 1971. [5074]
- MULLETT, CHARLES F. Headlong into Gryll Grange, or Peacock Alley Revisited. Albion, 2, 1970. [5075]
- MYERS, FRANK E. Civil Disobedience and Organizational Change: The British Committee of 100. PSQ, Mar. 1971. [5076]
- NAPIERALSKI, EDMUND A. Restoration and 18th Century Theatre Research Bibliography for 1970. Restoration and 18th Cent. Theatre Res., Nov. 1971. [5077]
- NAYLOR, JOHN F. The Establishment of the Cabinet Secretariat. Hist. J., Dec. 1971. [5078]
- NEAVILL, GORDON BARRICK. Victor Gollancz and the Left Book Club. Lib. Q., July 1971. [5079]
- NEWTON, J. A. Bishop [Edward] King and Nonconformity. Theology, Aug. 1971. [5080]
- NORTON, MARY BETH. The Loyalists' Image of England. Ideal and Reality. Albion, Summer 1971. [5081]
- Notices of Periodical and Occasional Publications, Mainly of 1970. ELH, July 1971. [5082]
- NUTTALL, GEOFFREY F. The Letter-Book of John Davis (1731-1795) of Waltham Abbey. Baptist Q., Apr. 1971. [5083]
- OAKESHOTT, A. M. D'I. The Education Inquiry Papers of Christopher Wase. Brit. J. Ed. Stud., Oct. 1971. [5084]
- O'FLAHERTY, PATRICK. Johnson in the Hebrides: Philosopher Becalmed. Stud. Burke Times, Fall 1971. [5085]
- O'FLAHERTY, PATRICK. The Rambler's Rebuff to Juvenal: Johnson's Pessimism Reconsidered. Eng. Stud., Dec. 1970. [5086]
- O'HIGGINS, J. Hume and the Deists: A Contrast in Religious Approaches. J. Theol. Stud., Oct. 1971. [5087]
- OTTLEY, GEORGE. Transport Bibliography. J. Transport Hist., Sept. 1971. [5088]
- PATERSON, D. G. "Spin-Off" and the Armaments Industry [comment]. Ec. Hist. R., Aug. 1971. [5089]
- PATRICK, MICHAEL D. Oliver Goldsmith's Citizen of the World: A Rational Accommodation of Human Existence. Enlightenment Essays, Summer 1971. [5090]
- PEARSON, GEOFFREY. Leonard Beaton: Journalist, Scholar, Strategist. Int. J. (Canada), Autumn 1971. [5091]
- PENIGAULT-DUHET, P. M. Du nouveau sur Mary Wollstonecraft: l'oeuvre littéraire de George Imlay. Et. anglaises, July-Sept. 1971. [5092]
- PERREN, RICHARD. The North American Beef and Cattle Trade with Great Britain, 1870-1914. Ec. Hist. R., Aug. 1971. [5093]
- PERRY, NORMA. Voltaire in England: A Quarrel with Some Huguenot Connexions. Proc. Huguenot Soc. London, 1, 1971. [5094]
- PETERS, MARIE. The 'Monitor' on the Constitution, 1755-1765: New Light on the Ideological Origins of English Radicalism. EHR, Oct. 1971. [5095]
- PETRUS, JOSEPH A. Marx and Engels on the National Question. J. Pol., Aug. 1971. [5096]
- POLLIN, BURTON R. Mary Hays on Women's Rights in the Monthly Magazine [1796-7]. Et. anglaises, July-Sept. 1971. [5097]
- POSNER, RUSSELL M. The Lord and the Drayman: James Bryce vs. Denis Kearney. Calif. Hist. Q., Sept. 1971. [5098]
- PRONAY, NICHOLAS. British Newsreels in the 1930s. I. Audience and Producers. History, Oct. 1971. [5099]
- PUGH, RALPH B. The Victoria County History. Brit. Stud. Monitor, Summer 1971. [5100]
- REED, WALTER L. The Pattern of Conversion in Sartor Resartus. ELH, Sept. 1971. [5101]
- REES, GARETH. Copper Sheathing: An Example of Technological Diffusion in the English Merchant Fleet. J. Transport Hist., Sept. 1971. [5102]
- REID, WILLIAM. The Cumberland Tankard Commemorating a Significant Military Event [1746]. Connoisseur, Nov. 1971. [5103]
- RICE, DANIEL F. Natural Theology and the Scottish Philosophy in the Thought of Thomas Chalmers. Scottish J. Theol., Feb. 1971. [5104]
- RICHARDS, ERIC. The Mind of Patrick Sellar (1780-1851). Scottish Stud., 15, pt. 1, 1971. [5105]
- RICHARDSON, JOANNA. William IV: A Portrait. Hist. Today, Sept. 1971. [5106]
- RICHMAN, JORDAN. Subjectivity in the Art of Eighteenth Century Biography: Johnson's Portrait of Swift. Enlightenment Essays, Summer 1971. [5107]
- RICHTER, DONALD. The Role of Mob Riot in Victorian Elections, 1865-1885. Victorian Stud., Sept. 1971. [5108]
- R. M. Crawford: A Bibliography. Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [5109]
- ROACH, JOHN. 'The Rudiments of Faith and Religion': Religious Controversy at Oxford, 1860-1865. J. Eccles. Hist., Oct. 1971. [5110]
- ROBBINS, KEITH. British Diplomacy and Bulgaria 1914-1915. Slavonic E. Eur. R., Oct. 1971. [5111]
- ROBINSON, OLIN C. The Legacy of John Gill. Baptist Q., July 1971. [5112]
- ROGAL, SAMUEL J. The Wesleys. A Checklist of Critical Commentary. Bull. Bibliogr. Mag. Notes, Jan.-Mar. 1971. [5113]

- ROGERS, PAT. The Authorship of Four Letters to a Friend in North Britain and Other Pamphlets Attributed to Robert Walpole. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [5114]
- ROSE, RICHARD. The Making of Cabinet Ministers. Brit. J. Pol. Sci., Oct. 1971. [5115]
- ROSS, GARY M. British Peace-Keeping in the Crisis of 1895 [Venezuela]. Res. Stud., Sept. 1971. [5116]
- ROUSSEAU, G. S. Colossus on the Hill [Horace Walpole] [r. art.]. Stud. Burke Times, Spring 1971. [5117]
- ROUSSEAU, G. S. Namier on Namier [r. art.]. Stud. Burke Times, Fall 1971. [5118]
- ROWE, D. J. The Economy of the North-East in the Nineteenth Century: A Survey with a Bibliography of Works Published since 1945. N. Hist., VI, 1971. [5119]
- ROWLEY, GWYN. Central Places in Rural Wales. An. Assn. Am. Geographers, Sept. 1971. [5120]
- ROWSE, A. L. Holywell Cemetery: Victorian Oxford. Contemp. R., Aug. 1971. [5121]
- ROXBURGH, RONALD. Miss Clough, Miss Nightingale and the Highland Brigade. Victorian Stud., Sept. 1971. [5122]
- ROY, R. H. The Memoirs of Private James Gunn. J. Soc. Army Hist. Res., Summer 1971. [5123]
- SANDERSON, S. F. Towards an Atlas of British Folk Culture. Folklore, Summer 1971. [5124]
- SANDERSON, STEWART F., and EVANS, E. ESTYN. The Academic Status of Folklore in Britain. J. Folklore Inst., Aug.-Dec. 1970. [5125]
- SCHMIDT, HANS. Francis Parkman als Historiker. Arch. Kulturgesch., 53, pt. 1, 1971. [5126]
- SCHWARZ, JOHN E., and LAMBERT, GEOFFREY. Career Objectives, Group Feeling, and Legislative Party Voting Cohesion: The British Conservatives, 1959-68. J. Pol., May 1971. [5127]
- A Select List of Works in Guildhall Library by, and Relating to, John Wilkes. Guildhall Misc., Oct. 1969. [5128]
- SELLERS, IAN. The Old General Baptists, 1811-1915. Baptist Q., Jan., Apr. 1971. [5129]
- SENELICK, LAURENCE. A Brief Life and Times of the Victorian Music-Hall. Harvard Lib. Bull., Oct. 1971. [5130]
- SHAPIRO, STANLEY. The Great War and Reform: Liberals and Labor, 1917-19. Labor Hist., Summer 1971. [5131]
- SIMMONS, JACK. A Holograph Letter from George Stephenson. J. Transport Hist., Sept. 1971. [5132]
- SIMMS, HELEN. Mr Batson's Yard. Mariner's Mirror, Nov. 1971. [5133]
- SKEMPTON, A. W. Samuel Wyatt and the Albion Mill. Architectural Hist., 14, 1971. [5134]
- SMALLWOOD, FRANK T. Bolingbroke vs. Alexander Pope: The Publication of the Patriot King. Pap. Bibliogr. Soc. Am., Third Quarter 1971. [5135]
- SMITH, F. B. Ethics and Disease in the Later Nineteenth Century: The Contagious Diseases Acts. Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [5136]
- SNYDER, THOMAS S. The Discovery of Bismarck by the British Press, 1862-1866. Gaz.: Int. J. Mass Communication Stud. (Amsterdam), XVII, no. 1-2, 1971. [5137]
- SPEAIGHT, GEORGE. The Toy Theatre. Harvard Lib. Bull., July 1971. [5138]
- SPEAIGHT, ROBERT. The Journal of Sir Walter Scott. Contemp. R., Oct. 1971. [5139]
- STEINKRAUS, WARREN E. A Note on Gladstone and Berkeley. J. Hist. Phil., July 1971. [5140]
- STEPHENSON, ALAN M. G. Some Work on Modern Church History in Great Britain, Written during the Last Decade. Mod. Churchman, Apr. 1971. [5141]
- STIGANT, P. Wesleyan Methodism and Working-Class Radicalism in the North, 1792-1821. N. Hist., VI, 1971. [5142]
- STORM-CLARK, CHRISTOPHER. The Miners, 1870-1970: A Test Case for Oral History. Victorian Stud., Sept. 1971. [5143]
- STRANGE, SUSAN. Sterling and British Policy: A Political View. Int. Aff. (London), Apr. 1971. [5144]
- SZRETER, R. The History of Education in Non-Education Periodicals since 1939: A Bibliography, Part II. Brit. J. Ed. Stud., Oct. 1971. [5145]
- TARASCIO, VINCENT J. Keynes on the Sources of Economic Growth. J. Ec. Hist., June 1971. [5146]
- TAYLOR, G. P. Cecil Rhodes and the Second Home Rule Bill. Hist. J., Dec. 1971. [5147]
- THOLFSEN, TRYGVE R. The Intellectual Origins of Mid-Victorian Stability. PSQ, Mar. 1971. [5148]
- THOMAS, WILLIAM. James Mill's Politics: A Rejoinder. Hist. J., Dec. 1971. [5149]
- THOMAS, WILLIAM. John Stuart Mill and the Use of Autobiography. History, Oct. 1971. [5150]
- THOMAS, WILLIAM. Whigs and Radicals in Westminster. The Election of 1819. Guildhall Misc., Oct. 1970. [5151]
- THOMPSON, PATRICIA. Some Factors in Upward Social Mobility in England. Sociol. Soc. Res., Jan. 1971. [5152]
- THOMS, DAVID W. Joseph Travers and Sons and the London Wholesale Grocery Market, 1824-1861. Guildhall Misc., Apr. 1970. [5153]
- THORNE, CHRISTOPHER. Viscount Cecil, the Government and the Far Eastern Crisis of 1931. Hist. J., Dec. 1971. [5154]
- TREBILCOCK, CLIVE. Rejoinder [to "Spin-Off" and the Armaments Industry]. Ec. Hist. R., Aug. 1971. [5155]
- TROWBRIDGE, HOYT. Edward Gibbon, Literary Critic. Eighteenth-Cent. Stud., Summer 1971. [5156]
- VALE, BRIAN. Lord Cochrane in Brazil. I. The Naval War of Independence, 1823. Mariner's Mirror, Nov. 1971. [5157]
- VANARSDEL, ROSEMARY T. Recent Developments in Victorian Periodical Research. Albion, 2, 1970. [5158]
- VANDIVER, FRANK E. Haig, Nivelles, and Third Ypres. Rice U. Stud., Winter 1971. [5159]

VAN METER, JAN R. On Peterson on Swift. PMLA, Oct. 1971. [5160]

VICKERS, JOHN A. Lambeth Palace Library. Some Items of Methodist Interest from the Fulham Papers. Methodist Hist., July 1971. [5161]

WAGNER, FREDERICK J. J. H. Shorthouse (1834-1903): A Bibliography. Bull. Bibliogr. Mag. Notes, Apr.-June 1971. [5162]

WALKER, DAVID. The Welsh Church and Disestablishment. Mod. Churchman, Jan. 1971. [5163]

WALTON, GARY M. Obstacles to Technical Diffusion in Ocean Shipping, 1675-1775. EEH, Winter 1970-71. [5164]

WARD, WILLIAM S. Contemporary Reviews of the Major Poems of Sir Walter Scott: A Supplementary List for the Years 1805-1817. Bull. Bibliogr. Mag. Notes, Apr.-June 1971. [5165]

WEISSER, HENRY. Chartist Internationalism, 1845-1848. Hist. J., Mar. 1971. [5166]

WELLS, ROBERT D. A Great Port of the World: The Port of London Authority. U.S. Naval Inst. Proc., Sept. 1971. [5167]

WHITE, GAVIN. Newman's Missionary Dream. Mod. Churchman, July 1971. [5168]

WILGUS, D. K. A Type Index of Anglo-American Traditional Songs. J. Folklore Inst., Aug.-Dec. 1970. [5169]

WILLIAMS, GLANMOR. Local History in Wales: A Bibliographical Note. Brit. Stud. Monitor, Winter 1971. [5170]

WILLIAMS, SHIRLEY. The Welfare State in Europe and the United Kingdom. Contemp. R., Aug. 1971. [5171]

WILLIS, RICHARD E. William Pitt's Resignation in 1801: Re-examination and Document. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971. [5172]

WILSON, DAVID B. The Thought of Late Victorian Physicists: Oliver Lodge's Ethereal Body. Victorian Stud., Sept. 1971. [5173]

WOEHRMANN, PAUL. National Response to the Sack of Washington. Md. Hist. Mag., Fall 1971. [5174]

WOLFF, MICHAEL. Charting the Golden Stream: Thoughts on a Directory of Victorian Periodicals. Victorian Periodicals Newslett., Sept. 1971. [5175]

WOOD, ANTHONY C. Sanderson Miller of Radway. Cake and Cockhorse, Winter 1969. [5176]

WOOD, J. D. "Regulating the Settlers, and Establishing Industry." Planning Intentions for a Nineteenth-Century Scottish Estate Village. Scottish Stud., 15, pt. 1, 1971. [5177]

WOOD, R. DEREK. The Involvement of Sir John Herschel in the Photographic Patent Case, Talbot v. Henderson, 1854. An. Sci., Sept. 1971. [5178]

WOODWARD, DAVID R. Britain's "Brass-Hats" and the Question of a Compromise Peace, 1916-1918. Mil. Aff., Apr. 1971. [5179]

WRIGHT, D. G. English Opinion on Secession [1861]: A Note. J. Am. Stud., Aug. 1971. [5180]

ZAVADSHII, K. M.; GEORGIEVSKII, A. B.; and MOZELOV, A. P. Engels and Darwinism. Soviet Stud. Phil., Summer 1971. [5181]

ZIMANSKY, CURT A., et al. The Eighteenth Century: A Current Bibliography Incorporating English Literature, 1660-1800. Philol. Q., July 1971. [5182]

ZIMMERMAN, EVERETT. Defoe and Crusoe. ELH, Sept. 1971. [5183]

COMMONWEALTH AND IRELAND

APPEL, JOHN J. From Shanties to Lace Curtains: The Irish Image in Puck, 1876-1910. Comp. Stud. Soc. Hist., Oct. 1971. [5184]

ARTHUR, ÉLIZABETH. Le Père Frémot à Thunder Bay, de 1848 à 1852. R. Hist. Am. fr., Sept. 1971. [5185]

BEAUDIN, FRANÇOIS. L'influence de La Mennais sur Mgr Lartigue, premier évêque de Montréal. R. Hist. Am. fr., Sept. 1971. [5186]

BERNARD, JEAN-PAUL. Définition du libéralisme et de l'ultramontanisme comme idéologies [note]. R. Hist. Am. fr., Sept. 1971. [5187]

BREWSTER, HAVELOCK. Caribbean Economic Integration—Problems and Perspectives. J. Common Market Stud., June 1971. [5188]

Britain, The Commonwealth and Europe [entire issue]. Round Table, Oct. 1971. [5189]

BRYNN, EDWARD. A Church of Ireland Diocese in The Age of Catholic Emancipation [Clogher, 1800-1900]. Hist. Mag. Prot. Epis. Church, June 1971. [5190]

CARMAN, W. Y. The Storming of Bangalore and the Death of Colonel Moorhouse. Connoisseur, Nov. 1971. [5191]

CATHERALL, G. A. The Native Baptist Church [Jamaica]. Baptist Q., Apr. 1971. [5192]

CHEVRETTE, LOUIS. Aspects de la psychologie du groupe de pression ultramontain canadien-français (1870-1890). R. Hist. Am. fr., Sept. 1971. [5193]

CHRISTOPHER, A. J. Colonial Land Policy in Natal. An. Assn. Am. Geographers, Sept. 1971. [5194]

CLARKSON, STEPHEN. Barriers to Entry of Parties into Toronto's Civil Politics: Towards a Theory of Party Penetration. Can. J. Pol. Sci., June 1971. [5195]

CONROY, GRAHAM P. George Berkeley and the Jacobite Heresy: Some Comments on Irish Augustan Politics. Albion, Summer 1971. [5196]

COOKE, RAYMOND M. The Historian as Underdog: Eric Williams and the British Empire. Historian, Aug. 1970. [5197]

CRAWFORD, R. M. 'The Itch of Writing' [Arnold Wood, The Discovery of Australia; r. art.]. Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [5198]

CROSS, MICHAEL S. Stony Monday, 1849: The Rebellion Losses Riots in Bytown. Ontario Hist., Sept. 1971. [5199]

DOERN, G. BRUCE. Recent Changes in the Philosophy of Policy-making in Canada. Can. J. Pol. Sci., June 1971. [5200]

DOW, GWYNETH M. Political Factions and Education in Victoria, 1857-8. J. Relig. Hist., June 1971. [5201]

- DUNLOP, P. R. G. Economic Importance of Moonta to South Australia. S. Australiana, Mar. 1971. [5202]
- EADIE, JAMES A. Edward Wilkes Rathbun and the Napanee Tamworth and Quebec Railway. Ontario Hist., June 1971. [5203]
- EDWARDS, MALDWIN L. Adam Clarke, the Man. Methodist Hist., July 1971. [5204]
- EHRlich, ALLEN S. History, Ecology, and Demography in the British Caribbean: An Analysis of East Indian Ethnicity. S. W. J. Anthropol., Summer 1971. [5205]
- ELKINS, W. F. Suppression of the Negro World in the British West Indies. Sci. and Soc., Fall 1971. [5206]
- ELY, M. J. The Management of Schools in New South Wales, 1848-1880: Local Initiative Suppressed? J. Ed. Adm., May 1971. [5207]
- GORMAN, MEL. Sir William O'Shaughnessy, Lord Dalhousie, and the Establishment of the Telegraph System in India. Technol. Cult., Oct. 1971. [5208]
- HARDY, RENÉ. Libéralisme catholique et ultramontanisme au Québec: éléments de définitions [note]. R. Hist. Am. fr., Sept. 1971. [5209]
- HAWKINS, CLIFFORD W. An Introduction to European Shipbuilding in the South West Pacific. Mariner's Mirror, Aug. 1971. [5210]
- HAY, A. M. The Development of Road Transport in Nigeria 1900-1940. J. Transport Hist., Sept. 1971. [5211]
- HEAD, IVAN L. The Foreign Policy of the New Canada. For. Aff., Jan. 1972. [5212]
- HEINTZMAN, RALPH. The Spirit of Confederation: Professor Creighton, Biculturalism, and the Use of History. Can. Hist. R., Sept. 1971. [5213]
- HOLSTI, K. J. Retreat from Utopia: International Relations Theory, 1945-70. Can. J. Pol. Sci., June 1971. [5214]
- HUNTER, ROBERT J. Dublin to Boston, 1719. Eire-Ireland, Summer 1971. [5215]
- JACOBS, WILBUR R. The Fatal Confrontation: Early Native-White Relations on the Frontiers of Australia, New Guinea, and America—A Comparative Study. Pac. Hist. R., Aug. 1971. [5216]
- JOHNSTON, HUGH. Stratford and Goderich in the Days of the Canada Company. Ontario Hist., June 1971. [5217]
- KANE, JOHN J. Civil Rights in Northern Ireland. R. Pol., Jan. 1971. [5218]
- KARAMA, ABA. The Origin of the West Indies Regiments. Sci. and Soc., Spring 1971. [5219]
- KAY, BARRY J. Voting Patterns in a Non-partisan Legislature: A Study of Toronto City Council. Can. J. Pol. Sci., June 1971. [5220]
- KELLY, KENNETH. The Transfer of British Ideas on Improved Farming to Ontario during the First Half of the Nineteenth Century. Ontario Hist., June 1971. [5221]
- KELLY-ROGERS, J. C. Aviation in Ireland—1784 to 1922. Eire-Ireland, Summer 1971. [5222]
- LAMONDE, YVAN. Bibliographie des bibliographies des historiens canadien-français du Québec. Rech. sociog., May-Aug. 1971. [5223]
- LA NAUZE, J. A. The Name of the Commonwealth of Australia. Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [5224]
- LESSARD, CLAUDE. Le Collège-Séminaire de Nicolet (1803-1863). R. Hist. Am. fr., June 1971. [5225]
- The Light That Probably Failed: University Scholarships in 1858. S. Australiana, Mar. 1971. [5226]
- LLOYD, CHRISTOPHER. Dr Baikie and the Niger. Hist. Today, Oct. 1971. [5227]
- LYNE, DANIEL C. William O'Brien's Canadian Correspondence. Ontario Hist., June 1971. [5228]
- MCCOLLOM, PATRICIA. The French in Acadia. Hist. Today, Jan. 1971. [5229]
- MACLEISH, KENNETH. Quebec: French City in an Anglo-Saxon World. Nat. Geog., Mar. 1971. [5230]
- MADHAVAN, A. India after the Elections. Asian Aff., Oct. 1971. [5231]
- MARRINER, SHEILA. Economic Growth of Australia. Bus. Hist., July 1971. [5232]
- NEALE, R. S. Roebuck's constitution and the Durham proposals. Hist. Stud., Apr. 1971. [5233]
- ORBAN, EDMOND. Le bica-mérisisme québécois: rétrospective comparative. R. Hist. Am. fr., Sept. 1971. [5234]
- Ó SÚILLEABHÁIN, SÉAN. Research Opportunities in the Irish Folklore Commission. J. Folklore Inst., Aug.-Dec. 1970. [5235]
- PAQUET, GILLES, and WALLOT, JEAN-PIERRE. Le Bas-Canada au début du XIX<sup>e</sup> siècle: une hypothèse. R. Hist. Am. fr., June 1971. [5236]
- PERLIN, GEORGE, and PEPPIN, PATTI. Variations in Party Support in Federal and Provincial Elections: Some Hypotheses. Can. J. Pol. Sci., June 1971. [5237]
- QUIGLEY, KATHLEEN. Daniel O'Connell and the Leadership Crisis within the Irish Repeal Party, 1843-1845. Albion, 2, 1970. [5238]
- Recent Publications Relating to Canada. Can. Hist. R., Sept. 1971. [5239]
- RICH, E. E. Canadian History [r. art.]. Hist. J., Dec. 1971. [5240]
- ROE, HENRY, and MILLMAN, T. R. (ed.). Reminiscences of the Earliest Lennoxville Days. J. Can. Church Hist. Soc., Sept. 1971. [5241]
- RUTAN, GERARD F. Two Views of the Concept of Sovereignty: Canadian-Canadian. W. Pol. Q., Sept. 1971. [5242]
- RUTHERFORD, P. F. W. The Western Press and Regionalism, 1870-96. Can. Hist. R., Sept. 1971. [5243]
- SCHON, D. O. L. The Handlogger: Unique British Columbia Pioneer. Forest Hist., Jan. 1971. [5244]
- SERLE, GEOFFREY. A Survey of Honours Graduates of the University of Melbourne School of History, 1937-1966. Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [5245]
- SHERIDAN, R. B. Simon Taylor, Sugar Tycoon of Jamaica, 1740-1813. Agric. Hist., Oct. 1971. [5246]
- SHERIDAN, RICHARD B. Planters and Merchants: The Oliver Family of Antigua and London, 1716-1784. Bus. Hist., July 1971. [5247]

SMITH, DONALD B. "Grey Owl" [Archie Belaney]. Ontario Hist., Sept. 1971. [5248]

STANNAGE, C. T. Bishops Gibney and Salvado and Western Australian Politics, 1889-97. J. Relig. Hist., June 1971. [5249]

STERN, MALCOLM H. A Successful Caribbean Restoration: The Nevis Story. Am. Jewish Hist. Q., Sept. 1971. [5250]

SWEENEY, JOSEPH. Why "Sinn Féin"? Eire-Ireland, Summer 1971. [5251]

SYLVAIN, PHILIPPE. Quelques aspects de l'ultramontanisme canadien-français [note]. R. Hist. Am. fr., Sept. 1971. [5252]

TEICHROEW, ALLAN. World War I and the Mennonite Migration to Canada to Avoid the Draft. Mennonite Q. R., July 1971. [5253]

TOOGOOD, ALEX. The Canadian Broadcasting System: Search for a Definition. Journalism Q., Summer 1971. [5254]

TOWNSEND, DECLAN F. The Origins and Early History of the Irish Jig. Eire-Ireland, Summer 1971. [5255]

TRIGGER, BRUCE G. The Mohawk—Mahican War (1624-28): The Establishment of a Pattern. Can. Hist. R., Sept. 1971. [5256]

TYLER, W. B. Sir George Grey, South Africa and the Imperial Military Burden, 1855-1860. Hist. J., Sept. 1971. [5257]

WEBER, RALPH E. Riot in Victoria, 1860 [doc.]. J. Negro Hist., Apr. 1971. [5258]

WHITE, GAVIN D. Through Darkest Canada in 1924 [Arthur C. Headlam, Bishop of Gloucester]. J. Can. Church Hist. Soc., June 1971. [5259]

WOODCOCK, GEORGE. Far Western Outposts: Vancouver Island and British Columbia. Hist. Today, Sept. 1971. [5260]

FRANCE

Beatrice Hyslop, Hunter College

GENERAL

ARGENT, FRANÇOIS D'. Marianne. Historia, Sept. 1971. [5261]

AYMARD, MAURICE. Production, commerce et consommation des draps de laine du XII<sup>e</sup> au XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle (Prato, 10-16 avril 1970). R. hist. (Paris), July-Sept. 1971. [5262]

BERTHOUBE, J.-P. Etude historique et sociologique d'une paroisse réformée rurale: Châtillon-en-Diois, des origines à nos jours [pt. II]. Bull. Soc. Hist. Prot. fr., Apr.-June 1971. [5263]

BIRN, DONALD S. Open Diplomacy at the Washington Conference of 1921-2: The British and French Experience. Comp. Stud. Soc. Hist., July 1970. [5264]

BOISDEFRE, PIERRE DE. La "révolution culturelle," a-t-elle déjà sa littérature? An. r. mensuelle Lit. fr., Oct. 1970. [5265]

BRADLEY, J. F. N. France, Lenin and the Bolsheviks in 1917-1918. EHR, Oct. 1971. [5266]

BROCHEUX, P. Grands propriétaires et fermiers dans l'ouest de la Cochinchine pendant la période coloniale. R. hist. (Paris), July-Sept. 1971. [5267]

CHATELAIN, ABEL. Les migrations temporaires de détente et de loisirs des Parisiens, XVII<sup>e</sup>-XX<sup>e</sup> siècles. Et. région parisienne, Oct. 1970, Jan. 1971. [5268]

DEBIEN, G. Les Antilles françaises (1968-1969). R. fr. Hist. outre-mer, Third Quarter 1970. [5269]

DECAUX, ALAIN. Ce que femmes veut. Historia, Sept. 1971. [5270]

DUBOSQ, GUY. Chronique des archives départementales, année 1967. Bull. philol. hist., II, 1967. [5271]

ERLANGER, PHILIPPE. 9 femmes qui ont fait la France. Historia, Sept. 1971. [5272]

FAVRET, JEANNE. Le malheur biologique et sa répétition [on sorcery]. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., May-Aug. 1971. [5273]

FELKAY, NICOLE. Chronique archivistique [archives for demography]. An. hist. Rév. fr., July-Sept. 1971. [5274]

FIERRO, ALFRED. Un cycle démographique: Dauphiné et Faucigny, du XIV<sup>e</sup> au XIX<sup>e</sup> siècle. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [5275]

FIRESTONE, YA'AKOV. The Doctrine of Integration with France among the Europeans of Algeria, 1955-1960. Comp. Pol. Stud., July 1971. [5276]

FITZGERALD, E. P. Le Centre d'histoire du Syndicalisme de l'Université de Paris. Fr. Hist. Stud., Fall 1971. [5277]

FRÊCHE, G. La population de Castres et du Tarn de 1665 à 1968. An. Midi, Apr.-June 1971. [5278]

GILLET, M., and BOUVIER, J. Orientation bibliographique sur l'histoire économique et sociale de la région du Nord aux XIX<sup>e</sup> et XX<sup>e</sup> siècles. R. Nord, Apr.-June 1967. [5279]

HUBERT, GÉRARD. Le château de Malmaison. Médecine France, no. 224, 1971. [5280]

HUBERT, JEAN-PAUL. Les possibilités de la recherche et les Archives au Ministère de l'Economie et des Finances. R. Hist. éc. soc., no. 2, 1971. [5281]

HUMPHREYS, S. C. The Work of Louis Gernet. Hist. and Theory, no. 2, 1971. [5282]

MAISONROUGE, JACQUES. Stratégie de l'entreprise en France et aux Etats-Unis. R. Défense nat., June 1971. [5283]

OSTROM, NICKI N. The Papers of Gabriel Astruc (1864-1938): A Register. Bull. N.Y. Public Lib., Oct. 1971. [5284]

RIQUET, MICHEL, S.J. Eglise et francmaçonnerie, de l'anathème au dialogue. R. Deux Mondes, Aug. 1971. [5285]

ROBIN, R. Vers une histoire des idéologies. An. hist. Rév. fr., Apr.-June 1971. [5286]

ROMANE-MUSCULUS, PAUL. Généalogie des Caffarel, devenus Caffarelli. An. Midi, Apr.-June 1971. [5287]

SHORTER, EDWARD, and TILLY, CHARLES. The Shape of Strikes in France, 1830-1960. Comp. Stud. Soc. Hist., Jan. 1971. [5288]

TILLY, LOUISE A. The Food Riot as a Form of Political Conflict in France. J. Interdisc. Hist., Summer 1971. [5289]

TOUSSAINT, AUGUSTE. Franconesia, A Little Known Quarter of the Indian Ocean. [Secheyelles, etc.] Am. Neptune, Apr. 1971. [5290]

TRIBOUT DE MOREMBERT, HENRI. La maison des Antonins de Strasbourg, 1277-1777. Bull. philol. hist., I, 1967. [5291]

VOVELLE, MICHEL. Pénitents et Francs-maçons dans l'ancienne Provence [r. art.]. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Mar.-Apr. 1971. [5292]

FRANCE: 1500 TO 1715

ADAM, PAUL. L'école humaniste de Sélestat. Bull. philol. hist., II, 1967. [5293]

ARMOGATE, J.-R. Quelques réflexions sur la Confession de foi de La Rochelle. Bull. Soc. Hist. Prot. fr., Apr.-June 1971. [5294]

AVIGDOR, H. Les Juifs d'Avignon et Madame de Sévigné. R. Et. juives, no. 2-3, 1969. [5295]

BAILLET, LINA. La guerre des paysans: un cas de conscience dans la famille de Ribeaupierre. Bull. philol. hist., I, 1967. [5296]

BILICH, ANDRÉ. Le commerce du vin de la Haute Alsace avec la Suisse avant 1648. Bull. philol. hist., I, 1967. [5297]

BURG, ANDRÉ-MARCEL. Le Droit de glandée et l'élevage du porc en forêt de Haguenau au début du XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle. Bull. philol. hist., I, 1967. [5298]

CHALUMEAU, R. P. L'assistance aux malades pauvres au XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle. XVII<sup>e</sup> Siècle, no. 90-91, 1971. [5299]

DARRICAU, RAYMOND. L'action charitable d'une reine de France: Anne d'Autriche. XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle, no. 90-91, 1971. [5300]

DAVIS, NATALIE ZEMON. The Reasons of Misrule: Youth Groups and Charivaris in Sixteenth-Century France. Past & Present, Feb. 1971. [5301]

DELUMEAU, JEAN. Démographie d'un port français sous l'ancien régime: Saint Malo (1651-1750). XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle, no. 86-87, 1970. [5302]

DETHAN, GEORGES. Recherches nouvelles sur la personnalité de Mazarin. R. Trav. Acad. Sci. morales pol., no. 1, 1969. [5303]

DEVÈZE, MICHEL. Le pâturage au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle dans la moitié nord de la France d'après les "coutumes." Bull. philol. hist., I, 1967. [5304]

DEYON, SOLANGE. La résistance protestante et la symbolique du désert. R. Hist. mod. contemp., Apr.-June 1971. [5305]

DURBEC, JOSEPH-ANTOINE. L'élevage dans la région de Grasse avant 1610. Bull. philol. hist., I, 1967. [5306]

FAILLE, RENÉ. Les phares et la signalisation au XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle. XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle, no. 86-87, 1970. [5307]

FORGET, MIREILLE. Des prisons au bagne de Marseille: La Charité à l'égard des condamnés au XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle. XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle, no. 90-91, 1971. [5308]

FRÊCHE, GEORGES. Compoix, propriété foncière, fiscalité et démographie historique en pays de taille réelle (XVI<sup>e</sup>-XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècles). R. Hist. mod. contemp., July-Sept. 1971. [5309]

HATTON, R. M. Translated History: the Reign of Louis XIV [r. art.]. Eur. Stud. R., Apr. 1971. [5310]

INGRAM, S. J., and ROTHROCK, G. A. Papa and his Brood [about Henry IV]. Hist. Today, Jan. 1971. [5311]

JEANNIN, PIERRE. Note sur l'abbaye de Lure au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle. Aspects économiques et sociaux de la géographie historique. Bull. philol. hist., II, 1967. [5312]

JENNY, JEAN. L'imprimerie à Bourges jusqu'en 1562 environ. État provisoire de la question. Bull. philol. hist., II, 1967. [5313]

KRAUS, MICHAEL J. Patronage and Reform in the France of the Prereforme: the Case of Clichon [15th century]. Can. J. Hist., Mar. 1971. [5314]

LACHIVER, MARCEL. Prix des grains à Paris et à Meulan dans la seconde moitié du XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle (1573-1586). An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Jan.-Feb. 1971. [5315]

LE CLÈRE, MARCEL. "La Police face à l'histoire." Ses origines: les polices privées [ancient through 16th century]. Historia, Feb. 1971. [5316]

LÉVIS-MIREPOIX, DUC DE. Henri II: Un style nouveau pour une France nouvelle. Historia, Feb. 1971. [5317]

MALLET, DONALD. Le Nôtre, jardinier de l'Europe. Médecine France, no. 219, 1971. [5318]

MILOT, JEAN. Un problème opérationnel du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle illustré par un cas régional. R. Nord, Apr.-June 1971. [5319]

MORINEAU, MICHEL. Flottes de commerce et trafics français en Méditerranée au XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle (jusqu'en 1669). XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle, no. 86-87, 1971. [5320]

PARKER, DAVID. The Social Foundation of French Absolutism, 1610-1630. Past & Present, Nov. 1971. [5321]

POUTET, YVES. L'Enseignement des pauvres dans la France du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle. XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle, no. 90-91, 1971. [5322]

RAPP, FRANCIS. L'aristocratie paysanne du Kochersberg à la fin du Moyen Age et au début des Temps modernes. Bull. philol. hist., I, 1967. [5323]

RICHARD, JEAN. Éleveurs du Morvan et bouchers de Troyes devant la justice consulaire d'Auxonne. Bull. philol. hist., I, 1967. [5324]

ROTT, JEAN. Nouveaux documents sur Jean Sleidan: historien de la Réforme (1506-1556). Bull. philol. hist., II, 1967. [5325]

SAINT-GERMAIN, JACQUES. "La Police face à l'histoire." Naissance de la police d'Etat [17th century]. Historia, Feb. 1971. [5326]

SALMON, J. H. M. Descartes and Pascal. Hist. Today, July 1971. [5327]

SCHMITT, J.-C. Apostolat mendiant et société. Une confrérie dominicaine, à la veille de la Réforme (La Confrérie du Rosaire en Alsace). An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Jan.-Feb. 1971. [5328]

STOKER, CHRISTOPHER. Office as Maintenance in Renaissance France. Can. J. Hist., Mar. 1971. [5329]

TAILLEMITE, ETIENNE. Les problèmes de la marine de guerre au XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle. XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle, no. 86-87, 1971. [5330]

VENARD, MARC. Les oeuvres de Charité en Avignon à l'aube du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle. XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle, no. 90-91, 1971. [5331]

VOGLER, BERNARD. Le berger au Palatinat au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle. Bull. philol. hist., I, 1967. [5332]

VOGT, JEAN. Un nouvel indice de l'intensification des cultures en Alsace à la fin du XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle et au début du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle. Bull. philol. hist., I, 1967. [5333]

VOGT, JEAN. Quelques types de propriétaires fonciers strasbourgeois à la fin du XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle et au début du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle. Bull. philol. hist., I, 1967. [5334]

FRANCE: 1715 TO 1815

AMBROSI, CH. "La Corse à la fin de l'Ancien Régime et sous la Révolution." Les deux annexions de la Corse. An. hist. Rév. fr., Jan.-Mar. 1971. [5335]

ANDERSON, J. LA VERNE. The British Embassy in Paris, 1714-63. Hist. Today, Jan. 1971. [5336]

ANDREWS, RICHARD M. The Justices of the Peace of Revolutionary Paris, Sept. 1792-Nov. 1794 (Frimaire Year III). Past & Present, Aug. 1971. [5337]

APPLEBY, JOYCE. America as a Model for the Radical French Reformers of 1789. WMQ, Apr. 1971. [5338]

BACZKO, B. Lumières et utopie. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Mar.-Apr. 1971. [5339]

BENECH-HOCHDOEFFER, M.-F. "L'Histoire de la Révolution à Toulouse et dans la région toulousaine." Le déclin des corporations toulousaines. An. hist. Rév. fr., July-Sept. 1971. [5340]

BERGERON, LOUIS. A propos des biens nationaux: la signification économique du placement immobilier. [Review and comment on Jean Sentou, La Fortune immobilière des Toulousains et la Révolution française.] Annales, Mar.-Apr. 1971. [5341]

BLIN, LÉON. Sur trois maîtrises des eaux et forêts et la navigation de la Saône (1778-1781). Routes et communications en Bourgogne—XVI. An. Bourgogne, July-Dec. 1970. [5342]

BORINGE, BERNARD. Les hôpitaux sous l'Ancien Régime. Historia, June 1971. [5343]

BOUCHERON, VÉRONIQUE. La montée du flot des errants de 1760 à 1789 dans la généralité d'Alençon. An. Normandie, Mar. 1971. [5344]

BOYER, FERDINAND. Le transfert à Paris des collections du stathouder (1795). An. hist. Rév. fr., July-Sept. 1971. [5345]

BOYER, FERDINAND. Les conquêtes scientifiques de la Convention en Belgique et dans les pays Rhénans (1794-1795). R. Hist. mod. contemp., July-Sept. 1971. [5346]

BRUNET, MICHEL. Les armées de la Révolution et la population roussillonnaise (1791-1794). An. Midi, Apr.-June 1971. [5347]

CHAUMIÉ, JACQUELINE. Les Girondins et les Cent Jours. An. hist. Rév. fr., July-Sept. 1971. [5348]

CHAUSSINAND-NOGARET, GUY; BERGERON, LOUIS; and FORSTER, ROBERT. Les notables du "Grand Empire" en 1810. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [5349]

COLLIS, ALAN. Some Survivors of the Russian Campaign. Hist. Today, Nov. 1971. [5350]

DIMOFF, PAUL. André Chenier: le voyage en Suisse. R. hist. lit. France, July-Aug. 1971. [5351]

DUBIEF, HENRI. Daniel Encontre a été Robespierriiste. Bull. Soc. Hist. Prot. fr., Apr.-June 1971. [5352]

DUPUY, A. Les Cosaques dans l'histoire et la littérature napoléoniennes. R. Hist. mod. contemp., July-Sept. 1971. [5353]

EDELSTEIN, MELVIN. La Feuille villageoise, the Revolutionary Press, and the Question of Rural Political Participation. Fr. Hist. Stud., Fall 1971. [5354]

ETTORI, F. "La Corse à la fin de l'Ancien Régime et sous la Révolution." Paoli, modèle du jeune Bonaparte. An. hist. Rév. fr., Jan.-Mar. 1971. [5355]

FAJN, MAX. La diffusion de la presse révolutionnaire dans le Lot, le Tarn et l'Aveyron, sous la Convention et le Directoire. An. Midi, July-Sept. 1971. [5356]

FAJN, MAX. Le Journal des hommes libres de tous les pays et les relations diplomatiques entre la France et les Etats-Unis de 1792 à 1800. R. Hist. dipl., Apr.-June 1971. [5357]

FERNANDES, RUBEN CESAR. Vision du monde et compréhension historique: Sur le "Rousseau" de Baczkko. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Mar.-Apr. 1971. [5358]

FISHMAN, W. J. Jean-Paul Marat. Hist. Today, May 1971. [5359]

FORIER, PAUL. L'égalité et sa dialectique démocratique chez Montesquieu. R. int. Phil., no. 3, 1971. [5360]

FRÊCHE, GEORGES. Etudes statistiques sur le commerce céréalière de la France méridionale au XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. R. Hist. éc. soc., nos. 1-2, 1971. [5361]

FURET, F. Le catéchisme de la Révolution française. Annales, Mar.-Apr. 1971. [5362]

GARNIER, JEAN-PAUL. Du conflit entre la conception napoléonienne des Rois d'Empire et le comportement de ceux-ci. R. trav. Acad. Sci. morales pol., no. 1, 1969. [5363]

GAYOT, GÉRARD. Les problèmes de la double appartenance: protestants et francs-maçons à Sedan au XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. R. Hist. mod. contemp., July-Sept. 1971. [5364]

GAYOT, GÉRARD, and PÊCHEUX, MICHEL. Recherches sur le discours illuministe au XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle: Louis-Claude de Saint-Martin et les "circonstances." An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., May-Aug. 1971. [5365]

GISCARD D'ESTAING, E. Varennes ou les rendez-vous manqués. Historia, June 1971. [5366]

GLIOZZO, CHARLES A. The Philosophes and Religion: Intellectual Origins of the Dechristianization Movement in the French Revolution. Church Hist., Sept. 1971. [5367]

GODECHOT, JACQUES. Un congrès sur l'époque napoléonienne aux Etats-Unis. An. hist. Rév. fr., July-Sept. 1971. [5368]

GODECHOT, JACQUES. "L'Histoire de la Révolution à Toulouse et dans la région toulousaine." Vingt-cinq ans d'études. An. hist. Rév. fr., Apr.-June 1971. [5369]

GRIFFIN-COLLART, E. L'égalité: condition de l'harmonie sociale pour J.-J. Rousseau. R. int. Phil., no. 3, 1971. [5370]

HAUTERIVE, ERNEST D'. "La Police face à l'histoire." Une police nationale [18th century-1830]. Historia, Feb. 1971. [5371]

HUFTON, OLWEN. Women in Revolution, 1789-1796. Past & Present, Nov. 1971. [5372]

JACOB, ALARIC. Chamfort (1741-93), A Man for Our Time. Hist. Today, June 1971. [5373]

JOVICEVICH, ALEXANDRE. Le royalist La Harpe en vendémiaire an IV. An. hist. Rév. fr., July-Sept. 1971. [5374]

KLAITS, JOSEPH. Men of Letters and Political Reform in France at the End of the Reign of Louis XIV: The Founding of the Académie Politique. J. Mod. Hist., Dec. 1971. [5375]

LAGASQUIÉ, M. T. "L'Histoire de la Révolution à Toulouse et dans la région toulousaine." Le personnel terroriste toulousain. An. hist. Rév. fr., Apr.-June 1971. [5376]

LE GOFF, T. J. A., and MEYER, J. Constructions navales en France au XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Jan.-Feb. 1971. [5377]

LEMÉE, R. "La Corse à la fin de l'Ancien Régime et sous la Révolution." Un dénombrement des Corses en 1770. An. hist. Rév. fr., Jan.-Mar. 1971. [5378]

LICK, R. Les intérieurs domestiques dans la seconde moitié du XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle d'après les inventaires après décès de Coutances. An. Normandie, Dec. 1970. [5379]

MAZLISH, BRUCE. The French Revolution in Comparative Perspective. PSQ, June 1970. [5380]

OZOUF, MONA. Le Cortège et la Ville, les itinéraires parisiens des fêtes révolutionnaires. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [5381]

PETER, JEAN PIERRE. Les mots et les objets de la maladie. Remarques sur les épidémies et la médecine dans la société française de la fin du XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. R. hist. (Paris), July-Sept. 1971. [5382]

POMPONI, F. "La Corse à la fin de l'Ancien Régime et sous la Révolution." Sentiment révolutionnaire et esprit de parti en Corse. An. hist. Rév. fr., Jan.-Mar. 1971. [5383]

RISSE, GUENTER B. The Quest for Certainty in Medicine: John Brown's System of Medicine in France. Bull. Hist. Medicine, Jan.-Feb. 1971. [5384]

ROBERTS, J. M. The Origins of a Mythology: Freemasons, Protestantism and the French Revolution. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., May 1971. [5385]

SABATIÉ, F. "L'Histoire de la Révolution à Toulouse et dans la région toulousaine." Stagnation démographique et réaction seigneuriale à Buzot-sur-Tarn. An. hist. Rév. fr., Apr.-June 1971. [5386]

SCHLUMBERGER, M. "L'Histoire de la Révolution à Toulouse et dans la région toulousaine." La réaction thermidorienne à Toulouse. An. hist. Rév. fr., Apr.-June 1971. [5387]

SLAVIN, MORRIS. Théophile Leclerc: An Anti-Jacobin Terrorist. Historian, May 1971. [5388]

STONE, DANIEL. La révolt fédéraliste à Rennes. An. hist. Rév. fr., July-Sept. 1971. [5389]

THOMAS, G. "L'Histoire de la Révolution à Toulouse et dans la région toulousaine." La jeunesse de Mailhe. An. hist. Rév. fr., Apr.-June 1971. [5390]

THUILLIER, GUY. La réforme monétaire de 1785. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [5391]

WEBER, JEAN. Mon ami Cagliostro: sa vie, son mystère, sa misère. Annales, Sept. 1971. [5392]

WELCH, M. L. Napoleon's Marshalls: Brune. Am. Soc. Legion Honor Mag., no. 1, 1972. [5393]

FRANCE: 1815 TO 1919

ANDERSON, ROBERT. Secondary Education in mid Nineteenth-Century France: Some Social Aspects. Past & Present, Nov. 1971. [5394]

BIDDIS, MICHAEL D. Prophecy and Pragmatism: Gobineau's Confrontation with Tocqueville. Hist. J., no. 4, 1970. [5395]

BIRD, ALAN. Berlioz and the Romantic Revolution. Contemp. R., Jan. 1970. [5396]

BORINGE, BERNARD. 1820. La Vénus de Milo arrive à Paris. Historia, Mar. 1971. [5397]

BULLEN, ROGER. Guizot and the 'Sonderbund' crisis, 1846-1848. EHR, July 1971. [5398]

CARLISLE, ROBERT B. Les Chemins de fer, les Rothschild et les saint-simoniens. Economies et sociétés (Cah. Inst. sci. éc. pol.), July 1971. [5399]

CHASTENET, JACQUES. "Débat, La Commune." La Commune: Le point de vue de Monsieur Thiers. Historia, May 1971. [5400]

DELTEIL, F. La Commune vue à travers les grand journaux protestants de l'époque [pt. 1]. Bull. Soc. Hist. Prot. fr., Apr.-June 1971. [5401]

DOTY, C. STEWART. Parliamentary Boulangism after 1889. Historian, Feb. 1970. [5402]

EDWARDS, E. W. The Origins of British financial co-operation with France in China, 1903-6. EHR, Apr. 1971. [5403]

GUNNARSON, GUNNAR. Pariskommunen—myte og røyndom [The Paris Commune—Myth and Rumor]. Syn og segn, no. 5, 1971. [5404]

HASKELL, FRANCIS. The Past in Nineteenth Century Painting. Past & Present, Nov. 1971. [5405]

HIGGS, D. Politics and Landownership among the French Nobility after the Revolution. Eur. Stud. R., Apr. 1971. [5406]

HOLROYD, RICHARD. The Bourbon Army, 1815-1830. Hist. J., Sept. 1971. [5407]

HUTTON, PATRICK H. The Impact of the Boulangist Crisis upon the Guedist Party at Bordeaux. Fr. Hist. Stud., Fall 1971. [5408]

JACQUEMET, GÉRARD. Les porteurs d'eau de Paris au XIX<sup>e</sup> siècle. Et. région-parisienne, Jan., Apr., July 1971. [5409]

JACQUEMET, GÉRARD. Gambetta et Belleville: l'élection de Trinquet, 1880. R. Hist. mod. contemp., July-Sept. 1971. [5410]

JENNINGS, LAWRENCE C. French Diplomacy and the First Schleswig-Holstein Crisis. Fr. Hist. Stud., Fall 1971. [5411]

JOHNSON, CHRISTOPHER H. Deux lettres inédites de cinq ouvriers lyonnais à Cabet et Dézamy. R. Hist. éc. soc., no. 4, 1970. [5412]

JORDAN, JAMES E. Matrimony and Machiavellianism: The Marriage of Prince Napoleon. Proc. Am. Phil. Soc., no. 4, 1971. [5413]

KENT, SHERMAN. Electoral Lists of France's July Monarchy, 1830-1848 [note]. Fr. Hist. Stud., Spring 1971. [5414]

LANOUX, ARMAND. "Débat, La Commune." Que voulait la Commune? Historia, May 1971. [5415]

LAUNAY, MICHEL. La crise du "Sillon" dans l'été 1905. R. hist. (Paris), Apr.-June 1971. [5416]

LEHMANN, JOHN. The Aftermath of 1871: A Schoolboy's Letters from France. Hist. Today, Sept. 1971. [5417]

MALLEVILLE, GEORGES. Jaurès, l'unificateur. R. soc. (Paris), June 1971. [5418]

MINONZIO, JEAN-FRANÇOIS. Les transports publics de voyageurs en Côte d'Or à la veille de l'ouverture du chemin de fer (1845-1949). An. Bourgogne, July-Dec. 1970. [5419]

RAPHAEL, SYLVIA. Balzac and Social History. Eur. Stud. R., Jan. 1971. [5420]

RICHARDSON, JOANNA. 'Hunting, fishing and cricket': Anglomania under the Second French Empire. Hist. Today, Apr. 1971. [5421]

SMITH, ROBERT J. A Note on Romain Rolland in the Dreyfus Affair [note]. Fr. Hist. Stud., Fall 1971. [5422]

VALYNSEEE, J. Deux personnalités protestantes sous la troisième République: Edgar Raoul-Duval et Léon Say. Bull. Soc. Hist. Prot. fr., Apr.-June 1971. [5423]

WATSON, D. R. The making of French foreign policy during the first Clemenceau ministry, 1906-1909. EHR, Oct. 1971. [5424]

WEBER, EUGEN. Gymnastics and Sports in Fin-de-Siècle France: Opium of the Classes? AHR, Feb. 1971. [5425]

ZENNER, MARIA. Der Begriff der Nation in den politischen Theorien Benjamin Constant's. Hist. Z., Aug. 1971. [5426]

FRANCE: SINCE 1919

ARMAND, LOUIS. "La France dans la compétition économique." Structure, mentalités et efficacité. R. Trav. Acad. Sci. morales pol., no. 1, 1969. [5427]

ARON, RAYMOND. "La France dans la compétition économique." L'économie française en question. R. Trav. Acad. Sci. morales pol., no. 1, 1969. [5428]

BAILLOU, JEAN. La contribution de la France à la formation des élites administratives de l'étranger. R. Trav. Acad. Sci. morales pol., no. 1, 1969. [5429]

BAUMGARTNER, WILFRED. "La France dans la compétition économique." Le souhaitable et le possible. R. Trav. Acad. Sci. morales pol., no. 1, 1969. [5430]

BÉTEILLE, ROGER. Emigration et propriété foncière dans l'Aveyron. R. géog. Pyrénées Sud-Ouest, Dec. 1966. [5431]

BON, FRÉDÉRIC, and RANGER, JEAN. Les élections partielles de l'été 1970. R. fr. Sci. pol., Feb. 1971. [5432]

BROOKS, CHARLES WILLIAM. Jean Renoir's The Rules of the Game. Fr. Hist. Stud., Fall 1971. [5433]

CAU, JEAN. "La Police face à l'histoire." Le fond du problème. Historia, Feb. 1971. [5434]

DAVID, ANDRÉ. Le Mercure de France entre les deux guerres. R. Deux Mondes, Aug. 1971. [5435]

DEJONGHE, ETIENNE. Aspects du régime d'occupation dans le Nord et le Pas-de-Calais durant la seconde guerre mondiale. R. Nord, Apr.-June 1971. [5436]

DERFLER, LESLIE. Unity and the French Left. Some Views of the Popular Front. Sci. and Soc., Spring 1971. [5437]

DOUBLET, MAURICE. Paris et la région parisienne. R. Trav. Acad. Sci. morales pol., no. 1, 1969. [5438]

DROUIN, PIERRE. "France-Angleterre." Les Anglais et le Marché-commun. Historia, Aug. 1971. [5439]

DUBESSET, P. La population tuberculeuse dans l'agglomération lyonnaise. R. géog. Lyon, no. 1, 1971. [5440]

ELLUL, J. Le néo-romantisme moderne. Contrepoint, no. 4, 1971. [5441]

FOSSIER, JEAN-MARIE. Suggestions pour de nouvelles recherches en vue d'une évaluation quantitative de la répression des faits de résistance dans le Nord de la France (de mai 1940 à septembre 1944). R. Nord, Apr.-June 1971. [5442]

FOURASTIÉ, JEAN. "La France dans la compétition économique." Responsabilité et efficacité. R. Trav. Acad. Sci. morales pol., no. 1, 1969. [5443]

GERBOD, PIERRE. Les catholiques et l'enseignement secondaire (1919-1939). R. Hist. mod. contemp., July-Sept. 1971. [5444]

HOISINGTON, WILLIAM A., JR. Class against Class: The French Communist Party and the Comintern. Int. R. Soc. Hist., no. 1, 1970. [5445]

HOISINGTON, WILLIAM A., JR. The Struggle for Economic Influence in Southeastern Europe: The French Failure in Romania, 1940. J. Mod. Hist., Sept. 1971. [5446]

KING, J. H. Philosophy and Experience: French Intellectuals and the Second World War. J. Eur. Stud., Sept. 1971. [5447]

LANGLOIS, WALTER G. André Malraux: Revelations from a Manuscript Collection. Manuscripts, Fall 1971. [5448]

LAPIE, P. O. Les grands familles politiques. Le parti radical. Historia, Oct. 1971. [5449]

LAURENT, DANIEL. Statistique de la répression des faits de collaboration dans le département du Nord 1941-1948. R. Nord, Apr.-June 1971. [5450]

LÉVY, CLAUDE. "La Presse de l'occupation en Europe occidentale." En France. R. Hist. deux. guerre mond., Oct. 1970. [5451]

LUIGARD, M. Les Juifs dans la Loire pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Cah. Hist. . . Clermont . . . Chambéry, no. 2, 1971. [5452]

NOLDE, GÉNÉRAL ANDRÉ. Une mission militaire française auprès de Tchang Kai-Chek en 1939. R. Défense nat., June 1971. [5453]

PARODI, JEAN-LUC. Sur deux courbes de popularité. R. fr. Sci. pol., Feb. 1971. [5454]

PISANI-FERRY, FRESNETTE. "France-Angleterre." Projet de 1940, une troisième manquée: Fusion de la France et de l'Angleterre. Historia, Aug. 1971. [5455]

PUAUX, GABRIEL. La conférence de la paix et le traité de Versailles. Souvenirs d'un collaborateur d'André Tardieu. R. Trav. Acad. Sci. morales pol., no. 1, 1969. [5456]

ROLAND, MAURICE. La libération de Lille (2 et 3 septembre 1944). R. Nord, Oct.-Dec. 1969. [5457]

SAULT, JEAN DU. Les relations diplomatiques entre la France et le Saint-Siège. R. Deux Mondes, Oct. 1971. [5458]

SCHALK, DAVID L. La Trahison des clercs—1927 and Later. Fr. Hist. Stud., Fall 1971. [5459]

WILSON, STEPHEN. Proust's A la Recherche du Temps Perdu as a document of social history. J. Eur. Stud., Sept. 1971. [5460]

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL

C. J. Bishko, University of Virginia

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL: THE MIDDLE AGES

BAGBY, ALBERT I. The Jew in the Cántigas of Alfonso X, El Sabio. Speculum, Oct. 1971. [5461]

BURNS, ROBERT I. Baths and Caravanserais in Crusader Valencia. Speculum, July 1971. [5462]

BURNS, ROBERT I. Christian-Islamic Confrontation in the West: The Thirteenth-Century Dream of Conversion. AHR, Dec. 1971. [5463]

CANTERA BURGOS, FRANCISCO. José Millás Vallicrosa: In memoriam. Sefarad, no. 2, 1971. [5464]

CARZOLIO DE ROSSI, MARÍA INÉS. Formación y desarrollo de los dominios del Monasterio de San Pedro de Cardena. Cuad. hist. España, XLV-XLVI, 1967. [5465]

DUFOURCQ, CHARLES-EMMANUEL, and GAUTIER-DALCHÉ, JEAN. Histoire de l'Espagne au Moyen Age: Publications des années 1948-1969. R. hist. (Paris), Jan.-Mar., Apr.-June 1971. [5466]

FARIA, MARIO. Introdução à bibliografia do Doutor Manuel Paulo Merêa. R. port. hist., XII, 1969. [5467]

FONT RIUS, J. M. Pactos comunitarios en el régimen económico-familiar de la Cataluña medieval. R. port. hist., XII, 1969. [5468]

FOREY, A. J. The Order of Mountjoy. Speculum, Apr. 1971. [5469]

GARCÍA-GALLO, ALFONSO. El Fuero de Llanes. An. hist. derecho español, XL, 1970. [5470]

HOFFMAN, RICHARD C., and JOHNSON, H. B., JR. Un village portugais en mutation: Póvoa d'El Rey à la fin du quatorzième siècle. An.: Ec., Soc., Civil., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [5471]

IGLESIA FERREIRÓS, AQUILINO. Notas en torno a la sucesión al trono en el reino visigodo. An. hist. derecho español, XL, 1970. [5472]

LACARRA, JOSÉ M. Honores y tenencias en Aragón. Siglo XI. Cuad. hist. España, XLV-XLVI, 1967. [5473]

LEROY, B. A propos de la succession de 1328 en Navarre. An. Midi, Apr.-June 1970. [5474]

LOURIE, ELENA. Free Moslems in the Balearics under Christian Rule in the Thirteenth Century. Speculum, Oct. 1970. [5475]

MACHADO MOURET, OSVALDO A. Historia de los Arabes de España por Ibn Jaldūn. Cuad. hist. España, XLV-XLVI, 1967. [5476]

MCVAUGH, MICHAEL. The Experimenta of Arnald of Villanova. J. Med. Renaissance Stud., no. 1, 1971. [5477]

MONCADA, L. CABRAL DE. Manuel Paulo Merêa. Esboço de um perfil. R. port. hist., XII, 1969. [5478]

MUÑOZ DE LA PEÑA, ARSENIO. Los judíos en Extremadura. R. estud. extremeños, no. 2, 1970. [5479]

NELSON, LYNN H. Rotrou of Perche and the Aragonese Reconquest. Traditio, XXVI, 1970. [5480]

PÉREZ DE URBEL, J. El comienzo del reinado de Ramiro II. Arch. leoneses, Jan.-Dec. 1969. [5481]

PORRO, NELLY R. En el ocaso de las behetrías. Cuad. hist. España, XLV-XLVI, 1967. [5482]

POWERS, JAMES F. The Origin and Development of Municipal Military Service in the Leonese and Castilian Reconquest, 800-1250. Traditio, XXVI, 1970. [5483]

POWERS, JAMES F. Townsmen and Soldiers: The Interaction of Urban and Military Organization in the Militias of Mediaeval Castile. Speculum, Oct. 1971. [5484]

PROCTER, EVELYN S. The Interpretation of Clause 3 in the Decrees of León (1188). EHR, Jan. 1970. [5485]

QUINTANA PRIETO, AUGUSTO. Jimena Muñiz, madre de Doña Teresa de Portugal. R. port. hist., XII, 1969. [5486]

REPRESA, AMANDO. Evolución urbana de León en los siglos XI-XIII. Arch. leoneses, Jan.-Dec. 1969. [5487]

RODRÍGUEZ FERNÁNDEZ, J. La Cantabria leonesa. Arch. leoneses, Jan.-Dec. 1969. [5488]

ROMANO, DAVID; VERNET, JUAN; and CANTERA, FRANCISCO. Bibliografía del Dr. Millás [Vallicrosa]. Sefarad, no. 2, 1971. [5489]

ROMEU ALFARO, SYLVIA. Catálogo de Cortes valencianas hasta 1410. An. hist. derecho español, XL, 1970. [5490]

RUIZ ASENCIO, J. MANUEL. Rebeliones leonesas contra Vermudo II. Arch. leoneses, Jan.-Dec. 1969. [5491]

SÁNCHEZ-ALBORNOZ, CLAUDIO. ¿Burgueses en la curia regia de Fernando II de León? R. port. hist., XII, 1969. [5492]

SÁNCHEZ-ALBORNOZ, CLAUDIO. Las campañas del 882 y del 883 que Alfonso III esperó en León. Arch. leoneses, Jan.-Dec. 1969. [5493]

SÁNCHEZ-ALBORNOZ, CLAUDIO. Imperantes y potestantes en el reino astur-leonés (718-1037). Cuad. hist. España, XLV-XLVI, 1967. [5494]

SÁNCHEZ-ALBORNOZ, CLAUDIO. Zarpazos del sensual Abd Al-Rahman de Córdoba al casto Alfonso II de Oviedo. Cuad. hist. España, XLV-XLVI, 1967. [5495]

SCHÄFERDIEK, KNUT. Der adoptianische Streit im Rahmen der spanischen kirchengeschichte II. Z. Kirchengesch., no. 1, 1970. [5496]

SILVEIRA, JOAQUIM DA. Merêa. R. port. hist., XII, 1969. [5497]

SOARES, TORQUATO DE SOUSA. Prof. Doutor Manuel Paulo Merêa, historiador das instituições medievais. R. port. hist., XII, 1969. [5498]

UBIETO ARTETA, ANTONIO. Notas sobre los "tenentes" de Calahorra en los siglos XI y XII. Príncipe Viana, no. 116-117, 1969. [5499]

UDINA MARTORELL, FEDERICO. L'évolution du titre comtal à Barcelone. Cah. Civil. méd., Apr.-June 1971. [5500]

VALDEAVELLANO, LUIS G. DE. Carta de hermandad entre los concejos de la Extremadura castellana y del Arzobispado de Toledo en 1295. R. port. hist., XII, 1969. [5501]*

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL: EARLY MODERN

ALVAREZ SÁENZ DE BURUAGA, JOSÉ. Mérida en el siglo XVII. R. estud. extremeños, nos. 1-3, 1970. [5502]

CABEZUDO ASTRAÍN, JOSÉ. La expulsión de los judíos en Ejea de los Caballeros. Sefarad, no. 2, 1971. [5503]

CAMÓN AZNAR, JOSÉ. La situación militar en Aragón en el siglo XVII. R. hist. mil., no. 28, 1970. [5504]

CARDAILLAC, L. Le passage des Morisques en Languedoc. An. Midi, July-Sept. 1971. [5505]

CARO BAROJA, JULIO. De nuevo sobre la historia de la brujería (1609-1619). Príncipe Viana, no. 116-117, 1969. [5506]

DEMERSON, PAULETTE. Les écoles patriotiques de Madrid entre 1787 et 1808. Caravelle, no. 13, 1969. [5507]

FARINTRA, ANTÓNIO DIAS. História de Mazagão durante o período filipino. Studia, Apr. 1969. [5508]

GRAY, RICHARD. Portuguese Musketeers on the Zambezi. J. Afric. Hist., no. 4, 1971. [5509]

GUERRA GUERRA, ARCADIO. Precios en Badajoz de 1790 a 1820. R. estud. extremeños, no. 1, 1970. [5510]

GUTIÉRREZ, C. Pasaportes españoles para Trento 1561-1563. An. hist. conciliarum, I, 1969. [5511]

IDOATE, FLORENCIO. La primera Diputación de Navarra. An. hist. derecho español, XL, 1970. [5512]

IRIA, ALBERTO. A chegada de Vasco da Gama a Lisboa da sua viagem do descobrimento do caminho marítimo para a Índia. R. Municipal (Lisbon), no. 3-4, 1969. [5513]

IRIA, ALBERTO. A Universidade de Coimbra no Arquivo Histórico Ultramarino. Documentos para a sua história (1591-1942). Studia, Apr. 1969. [5514]

ISAACMAN, ALLAN. The Prazos da Coroa 1752-1830. A Functional Analysis of the Political System. Studia, Apr. 1969. [5515]

IV centenario de la batalla de Lepanto. España hoy, Dec. 1971. [5516]

JIMÉNEZ DE GREGORIO, FERNÁNDO. La población en el señorío de Valdepusa (Toledo). Estud. geog., Feb. 1971. [5517]

LLAMAS MARTÍNEZ, ENRIQUE. Cinco cartas inéditas del teólogo Bartolomé Torres (1512-1568). Contribución al conocimiento de su biografía. R. española teología, no. 1-2, 1970. [5518]

LOOMIE, ALBERT J., S.J. Guy Fawkes in Spain: the 'Spanish Treason' in Spanish Documents. Bull. Inst. Hist. Res., Nov. 1971, suppl. [5519]

LÓPEZ MARTÍNEZ, ANTONIO. Felipe III en Mérida, de paso para Portugal. R. estud. extremeños, no. 1, 1970. [5520]

MARRERO, MANUELA. Acerca de los procuradores de los naturales canarios. R. hist. canaria, no. 157-164, 1968-69. [5521]

MARTÍN GONZÁLEZ, ANGEL. El Cardenal don Pedro Pacheco obispo de Jaén, en la confección del decreto "De iustificatione" del Concilio de Trento (sesión VI<sup>a</sup>). R. española teología, no. 3, 1970. [5522]

MEERSMAN, ACHILLES. Annual Reports of the Portuguese Franciscans in India, 1713-1833. Studia, Apr. 1969. [5523]

MELÓN, AMANDO. Del Reino de Aragón a la provincia de Aragón y provincias aragonesas. Estud. geog., Feb. 1971. [5524]

MESEGUER FERNÁNDEZ, JUAN. Isabel la Católica y los Franciscanos. Arch. Ibero-Am., July-Sept. 1970. [5525]

MURADELL Y MARIMÓN, J.-M. Las treguas del Vizcondado de Castellbó (1538-1544). Pirineos, no. 95, 1970. [5526]

PERAZA DE AYALA, JOSÉ. La Intendencia en Canarias. Notas y documentos para su estudio. An. hist. derecho español, XL, 1970. [5527]

PERAZA DE AYALA, JOSÉ. Las ordenanzas militares para Canarias en 1590. R. hist. canaria, no. 157-164, 1968-69. [5528]

PIKE, RUTH. An Urban Minority: The Moriscos of Seville. Int. J. Mid. E. Stud., Oct. 1971. [5529]

PLAZA BORES, ANGEL DE LA. Exequias por Isabela la Católica y proclamación de Juana la Loca en Valladolid, noviembre de 1504. Arch. Ibero-Am., July-Sept. 1970. [5530]

RUIZ GARCÍA, FÉLIX. Los primeros vicarios castrenses en España. R. hist. mil., no. 30, 1971. [5531]

SANTIAGO-OTERO, HORACIO. Juan de Segovia. Manuscritos de sus obras en la Biblioteca Vaticana. R. española teología, no. 1-2, 1970. [5532]

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL: NINETEENTH AND TWENTIETH CENTURIES

ALVAREZ DELGADO, JUAN. La "Historia de Canarias" de A. J. Benítez. R. hist. canaria, no. 157-164, 1968-69. [5533]

BALLESTER ROS, IGNACIO. La inmigración interior en España según el Padrón municipal de habitantes de 1965. R. estud. vida local, Jan.-Mar. 1970. [5534]

CHEONG, W. E. The Decline of Manila as the Spanish Entrepôt in the Far East, 1785-1826. J. S.E. Asian Stud., Sept. 1971. [5535]

COLOMBÁS, GARCÍA M. Los últimos eremitanos de Montserrat. Yermo, no. 1, 1971. [5536]

DODOLEV, M. A. Russia and the Spanish Revolution of 1820-1823. Soviet Stud. Hist., no. 3, 1969-70. [5537]

GONZALES, ANTONIO E. Las ideas federalistas portuguesas. R. estud. pol., Sept.-Oct. 1970. [5538]

GOULET, DENIS, and WALSHOK, MARCO. Values among Underdeveloped Marginals: the Case of Spanish Gypsies. Comp. Stud. Soc. Hist., Oct. 1971. [5539]

PESET REIG, MARIANO. El plan Pidal de 1845 y la enseñanza en las Facultades de Derecho. An. hist. derecho español, XL, 1970. [5540]

RUIZ, AGUSTÍN S. La comunidad de Silos exclaustrada, en la primera guerra carlista. Yermo, no. 1, 1971. [5541]

SAGÜÉS AZCONA, PÍO. Un memorial a don Carlos María Isidro de Borbón sobre la guerra civil española en 1838. Arch. Ibero-Am., Oct.-Dec. 1970. [5542]

SALAZAR, A. DE OLIVEIRA. Portugal gjennom 60 år [Portugal through 60 Years]. Samtiden, no. 5, 1971. [5543]

STEINEL, JAMES H. [Jaime] Balmes' Ideas on Religious Toleration. J. Church and State, Winter 1971. [5544]

TAPIA, FRANCISCO XAVIER. Las relaciones Iglesia-Estado durante el primer experimento liberal en España (1820-1823). R. estud. pol., Sept.-Oct. 1970. [5545]

THE LOW COUNTRIES

Pierre-Henri Laurent, Tufts University

ATTEN, A. Luxemburger Dorfjustiz in Österreichischer Zeit (III): aufgezeigt an Miszellen aus dem Gericht Erpeldingen. Hémécht, no. 2, 1971. [5546]

BOYER, F. Le Directoire et les musées des départements réunis de la Belgique. R. Hist. dipl., Jan.-Mar. 1971. [5547]

BOYER, F. Les conquêtes historiques de la Convention en Belgique et dans les pays rhénans. R. Hist. mod. contemp., July-Sept. 1971. [5548]

Bulletin d'Histoire de Belgique, 1969-1970. R. Nord, Apr.-June 1971. [5549]

CALBRECHT, J. Belgische expansie in Amerika onder Leopold I. Onuitgegeven stukken (Guatemala, Brazilië, Haiti en California). Bull. Acad. Roy. Sci. Outre-mer, no. 4, 1970. [5550]

COORNAERT, E. Flamand et français dans l'enseignement en Flandre française des annexions au XX<sup>e</sup> siècle. R. Nord, Apr.-June 1971. [5551]

COORNAERT, E. Le naufrage d'une langue: le flamand. L'information hist., no. 4, 1971. [5552]

DEROO, J.-M. Le syndicat C.F.T.C. de l'enseignement libre 1945-1964. R. Nord, Apr.-June 1971. [5553]

FISHMAN, J. S. The London Conference of 1830. Tijd. Gesch., no. 3, 1971. [5554]

GALBRAITH, J. S. Gordon, MacKinnon and Leopold: The Scramble for Africa. Victorian Stud., no. 4, 1971. [5555]

HAFFNER, A. Kriegergräber mit Schleuderkugeln aus Luxemburg und dem trierer land. Hémécht, no. 2, 1971. [5556]

HEGEMAN, J. G. Darwin en onze voorouders. Nederlandse reacties op de evolutieleer 1860-1875: een terreinverkenning. Bijd. Meded. betreffende Geschiedenis Nederlanden, no. 1, 1970. [5557]

HEUERTZ, M. À Propos des "Camp Retranchés" du territoire luxembourgeois. Hémécht, no. 2, 1971. [5558]

MILIS-PROOST, G. and MILIS, L. Libraries and Archives: Belgium. History, June 1971. [5559]

MILMEISTER, J. L'affaire de Strassen de 1838 [pertains to Luxemburg political history]. Hémécht, no. 2, 1971. [5560]

NIEUWENHUYNS, R. De houding van de Nederlanders in Indonesië zoals deze weerspiegeld wordt in de yoenmalige letterkunde. Bijd. Meded. betreffende Geschiedenis Nederlanden, no. 1, 1971. [5561]

PLUVIER, J. M. Internationale aspekten van de Nederlandse expansie. Bijd. Meded. betreffende Geschiedenis Nederlanden, no. 1, 1971. [5562]

POELHEKKE, J. J. Het naamloze vaderland van Erasmus. Bijd. Meded. betreffende Geschiedenis Nederlanden, no. 1, 1971. [5563]

ROCHÉ, L. Paul Claude à l'ambassade de Bruxelles (1933-34). R. Hist. dipl., Jan.-Mar. 1971. [5564]

SIAUW-GIAP, T. Het verzet van de bevolking tegen Nederlandse bestuursmaatregelen, 1870-1914. Bijd. Meded. betreffende Geschiedenis Nederlanden, no. 1, 1971. [5565]

SOLTOW, J. H. Entrepreneurial Strategy in Small Industry: Belgian Metal Fabricators. Proc. Am. Phil. Soc., no. 1, 1971. [5566]

SPRUNCK, A. Les conflits entre le conseil provincial et le Magistrat de la ville de Luxembourg au 18<sup>e</sup> siècle. Hémécht, no. 2, 1971. [5567]

THEIN, J. Die Pfarrbücher als quelle für Lokalgeschichte. Hémécht, no. 2, 1971. [5568]

VAN DER WAL, S. L. De Nederlandse expansie in Indonesië in de tijd van het modern imperialisme: de houding van de Nederlandse regering en de politieke partijen. Bijd. Meded. betreffende Geschiedenis Nederlanden, no. 1, 1971. [5569]

VAN EENOO, R. De initiatieven op persgebied van de westvlaamse bisschoppen, (1834-1852). Tijd. Gesch., no. 2, 1970. [5570]

VAN MARLE, A. De rol van de buitenlandse avonturier. Bijd. Meded. betreffende Geschiedenis Nederlanden, no. 1, 1971. [5571]

VAN RANDWICK, S. C. Enkele opmerkingen over de houding der zending tegenover de expansie van het Nederlands gezag. Bijd. Meded. betreffende Geschiedenis Nederlanden, no. 1, 1971. [5572]

VAN 'T VEER, P. De machthebbers van Indië. Bijd. Meded. betreffende Geschiedenis Nederlanden, no. 1, 1971. [5573]

VAN UYTVEN, R., and BLOCKMANS, W. De noodzaak van een geïntegreerde sociale geschiedenis. Tijd. Gesch., no. 2, 1971. [5574]

VANWELKENHUYZEN, J. Les contacts militaires Franco-Belges pendant la "drôle de guerre." R. Nord., Apr.-June 1971. [5575]

VERBRUGGEN, J.-F. Le grand quartier général belge et la bataille de la lys, (15-28 mai, 1940). R. Nord., Apr.-June 1971. [5576]

WIERSMA, L. R. Het comité van Waakzaamheid van anti-nationaal-socialistische intellectuelen (1936-1940). Bijd. Meded. betreffende Geschiedenis Nederlanden, no. 1, 1971. [5577]

NORTHERN EUROPE

Raymond E. Lindgren, California State College at Long Beach

ÅGREN, KURT. Kunskap eller färdighet. Alternativ inom postgymnasial historie undervisning. Hist. tids. (Sw.), no. 3, 1971. [5578]

ÅKERMAN, SUNE. Who in Fact Did Go? Swed. Pioneer Hist. Q., no. 1, 1972. [5579]

ANDRÉN, NILS. Sverige 1970. Nord. tids., no. 5, 1971. [5580]

BORRITS, P. K., and HANSEN, E. SVERRE. Det socialdemokratiske forslag til lov om forsvarrets organisation. Mil. tids., June 1971. [5581]

BOSTRÖM, RAGNHILD. Några romanska sakristior på Öland. Fornvännen, no. 1, 1971. [5582]

BUSCH, EBBA. Miljøforskning over kniplersker ud fra kirkebøger. Arkiv, no. 3, 1971. [5583]

CAMERON, KENNETH. Scandinavian Settlement in the Territory of the Five Boroughs: The Place-Name Evidence, Part II, Place-Names in Thorp. Med. Scand., 1970. [5584]

CARSTENS, J. L. En Almindelig Beskrivelse om Alle de Danske, Americanske eller West-Indiske Ey-Lande. Danske mag., 1967-70. [5585]

CEDERSTRÖM, HELENA, and TOLLIN, CLAS. Det industriella genombrottet i Stockholm: bild och motbild. Ord och bild, no. 4, 1971. [5586]

CHESTNUT, MICHAEL. Norse-Celtic Bibliographical Survey. First Report. Med. Scand., 1970. [5587]

DAHLERUP, TROELS. Toldregnskaber kritisk belyst. Historie (Århus U.), no. 2, 1971. [5588]

DAHÉN, ERIK. Sverige 1970. Nord. tids., no. 5, 1971. [5589]

DAMSHOLT, NANNA. Kingship in the Arengas of Danish Royal Diplomas 1140-1223. Med. Scand., 1970. [5590]

ELLER, POVL. Arvestykker i Ulfeldt-slaegten. Breve fra Anne Sophie Ulfeldt (1649-1741) til hendes faetters søn Corfitz Anton Ulfeldt (1699-1769) om nogle slaegtsminders skaebne. Danske mag., 1967-70. [5591]

FABER, OLE. Saerpraegede fibler fra Danmarks førromerske jernalder. Aarbøger nord. oldkyndighed hist., 1969. [5592]

FJAERVOLL, KARL. Levemåten og levestandarden i Vesterålen ved hundreårsskiftet. By og bygd, 1970. [5593]

FOSSBERG, JORUNN. Gullsmeder på Moss 1650-1800. By og bygd, 1970. [5594]

FRITZ, BIRGITTA. Jarladömet—sveahertigdömet. Hist. tids. (Sw.), no. 3, 1971. [5595]

FRÖBERG, PAUL. Malla Silfverstolpes memoarer. Samlaren, 1970. [5596]

GAGE, GENE G. Scandinavian Studies in America: The Social Sciences. Scand. Stud., no. 4, 1971. [5597]

GJERDI, TROND JUUL. I Drierens verksted. By og bygd, 1970. [5598]

HÄGG, INGA. Mantel och kjortel i vikingatidens dräkt. Fornvännen, no. 3, 1971. [5599]

HANSEN, ULLA LUND. Kvarmløsefundet—en analyse af Sösdalastilen og dens forudsætninger. Aarbøger nord. oldkyndighed hist., 1969. [5600]

HATCH, LUCILLE. Public Libraries in Finland. J. Lib. Hist., Oct. 1971. [5601]

HATTING, TOVE. Er baeverens taenderbenyttet som redskaber i stenalderen i Danmark. Aarbøger nord. oldkyndighed hist., 1969. [5602]

HAUGEN, HELICK O. Arctic Border. Where NATO and the Soviet Union Meet in the North. The Norseman, no. 5, 1971. [5603]

HØDAL, ODDVAR KARSTEN. Vidkun Quisling's Decline as a Political Figure in Prewar Norway, 1933-1937. J. Mod. Hist., Sept. 1971. [5604]

HOLTZE, BENGT. Sverige i britiska bedömningar under första världskriget. Aktuellt och hist., 1971. [5605]

ILSØE, HARALD. Nogle Arild Huitfeldtiana. Danske mag., 1971. [5606]

JAANUSSON, HILLE. Bronsålderboplatsen vid Hallunda. Fornvännen, no. 3, 1971. [5607]

JAANUSSON, HILLE. Ett estniskt korsformat hänge från Bjurhovda i Västerås. Fornvännen, no. 2, 1971. [5608]

JENSEN, BIRGIT BJERRE. Kilder til belysning af len, stamhuse og fideikommiss. Arkiv, no. 3, 1971. [5609]

JOHNSON, ARNE ODD. The Earliest Provincial Statute of the Norwegian Church. Med. Scand., 1970. [5610]

KALELA, JORMA. Näkökohtia pohjoismaisesta yhteistyöstä Suomen ulkopoliitikassa maailmansotien välisenä aikana. Hist. aikakausk., no. 3, 1971. [5611]

- KERKKONEN, MARTTI. Esihistorialliset Häme ja Suomi. Hist. aikakausk., no. 3, 1971. [5612]
- KIRKINEN, HEIKKI. Historiallinen totuus muuttuvassa maailmassa. Hist. aikakausk., no. 2, 1971. [5613]
- KIRKKONEN, GUNVOR. Skattmarker och markskatter. Hist. tids. Finl., no. 2, 1971. [5614]
- KÖNIGSSON, EBBA STINA; LEPIKSAAR, JOHANNES; and KÖNIGSSON, LARS KÖNIG. Stenåldersboplatsen i Alby på Öland. Fornvännen, no. 1, 1971. [5615]
- KRISTIANSEN, IDAR. Pioneer of the Poles. Double Anniversary of the Great Arctic Explorer Roald Amundsen. The Norseman, no. 5, 1971. [5616]
- LAMM, JAN PEDER. En spegel från Paviken. Fornvännen, no. 1, 1971. [5617]
- LÅNG, HELMER. Moberg, The Emigrant Saga and Reality. Swed. Pioneer Hist. Q., no. 1, 1972. [5618]
- LAURÉN, CHRISTER. Två Vadenstehandskrifter i Uppsala Universitetsbibliotek. Nord. tids. bok-och biblioteksväsen, no. 2, 1971. [5619]
- LEHMANN, JOHANNES. Admiral Andreas du Plessis de Richelieu og regeringsdannelsen i 1909. Historie, no. 2, 1971. [5620]
- LIDEGAARD, MADS. Hans Egede: Missionary and Colonizer of Greenland. Am. Scand. R., Autumn 1971. [5621]
- LIND, C. Politisk kronik [2 pts.] Øk. og pol., nos. 1–2, 1971. [5622]
- LINDGREN, MERETH. Ett nytt tolkningsförsök av de romanska kalkmålningarna i Vinslöv. Fornvännen, no. 2, 1971. [5623]
- LINDHAGEN, JAN. Arthur Engberg och socialismens mening. Tiden (Sw.), no. 7, 1971. [5624]
- MAGERØY, ELLEN MARIE. Utskärne drikkehorne fra Island. By og bygd, 1970. [5625]
- MANKER, ERNST. Fennoskandias fornsidor, Preliminär rapport från en inventering. Fornvännen, no. 2, 1971. [5626]
- MANNERSTRÅLE, CARL FILIP. Observationer vid omputsningen av Eds kyrka i Uppland. Fornvännen, no. 1, 1971 [5627]
- MAUDE, GEORGE. 'Venäjän integraalinen osa.' Suomi brittiläisestä näkökulmasta 1856–1899. Hist. aikakausk., no. 2, 1971. [5628]
- MIKKELSEN, PALLE. Den danske økonomiske situation [2 pts.]. Øk. og pol., nos. 1–2, 1971. [5629]
- MUNKSGAARD, ELISABETH. To skattefund fra ældre vikingetid Duesminde og Kaerbyholm. Aarbøger nord. oldkyndighed hist., 1969. [5630]
- MUSTELIN, OLOF. Wissenschaftliche Studienreisen von Finnland nach dem Kontinent im 19. Jahrhundert. Germanic Notes, no. 5, 1971. [5631]
- NÄSMAN, ULF; WEGRAEUS, ERIK; HERSCHEND, FRANDS; WEBER, KURT; BLOMKVIST, NILS; and BORG, KAJ. Undersökningen av Eketorps borg på södra Öland. Fornvännen, no. 3, 1971. [5632]
- NERMAN, BIRGER. Kejsarkronor på svenska vikingatidssjöjor. Fornvännen, no. 1, 1971. [5633]
- NIELSEN, KARL MARTIN. Om dateringen af de senurnordiske runeindskrifter, synkopen og 16 tegns futharken. Aarbøger nord. oldkyndighed hist., 1969. [5634]
- NIELSEN, VIGGO. Status for den antikvariske lovgivning. Fortid og nutid, no. 5, 1971. [5635]
- NYBERG, TORE. Skriftfølger og lægg. Undersökningar i C-handskrifter i Uppsala Universitetsbibliotek. Nord. tids. bok-och biblioteksväsen, no. 1, 1971. [5636]
- ØRBERG, PAUL G. Kancelli og brevboeger. Fortid og nutid, no. 5, 1971. [5637]
- OLDBERG, ULF. Händelser 1939–40 och ett modernt forskningsprojekt. Ord och bild, no. 3, 1971. [5638]
- OREDSSON, SVERKER. Argumentanalys, R. A. Levine och de svenska järnvägarna. Hist. tids. (Sw.), no. 3, 1971. [5639]
- ORRMAN, ELJAS. De senmedeltida ödesmålen i sydvästra Finland. Hist. tids. Finl., no. 3, 1971. [5640]
- PATURSSON, ERLENDUR. Quo Vadis—Føroyar? Syn og segn, no. 7, 1971. [5641]
- PECHLIN, FR. V., and HJELHOLT, HOLGER (ed.). Zur Dänischen Politik im Jahr 1850. Danske mag., 1971. [5642]
- PERSONNE, EVABRITTA. Vägra värnplikt—ett vapen för de "losterlandslösa." Aktuellt och hist., 1971. [5643]
- PETERSEN, E. LADEWIG. Preaching in Medieval Denmark. Med. Scand., 1970. [5644]
- PIHKALA, ERKKI. Suomen Venäjän-kaupan puitteet autonomian ajan jälkipuoliskolla. Hist. arkisto, 1970. [5645]
- PIILONEN, JUHANI. Venäläiset esikuvat punaisen Suomen hallinnossa 1918. Hist. arkisto, 1970. [5646]
- PRANGE, KNUD. Fra "Frugtbare herlighed" til herlig frugtbarehed—"en ringe underretning om dansk lokalhistorier gamle og nu værende tilstand." Nord. tids., no. 2, 1971. [5647]
- Quarter's History. Am. Scand. R., Autumn 1971. [5648]
- RAMBUSCH, SIGURD. Bringstrup-Sigersted sogneråds modstand 1885–86 mod kultusministeriets "munk-kuroscirkulaer." Danske mag., 1971. [5649]
- RASCH-ENGH, ROLF. Et soldatvåpen fra Frederik 4's tid. By og bygd, 1970. [5650]
- RASCH-ENGH, ROLF. Brugdebenker med militær-effekter. By og bygd, 1970. [5651]
- RASMUSSEN, KNUD. Om professionelle diplomater i dansk tjenste omkr. 1550. Danske mag., 1971. [5652]
- REDELIUS, GUNNAR. Tensta kyrkas proportionering. Fornvännen, no. 1, 1971. [5653]
- REMGÅRD, ARNE. Läroplan och läroböcker i gymnasiet. Hist. tids. (Sw.), no. 3, 1971. [5654]
- ROMILSON, CHRISTER. Fallet Starkenberg. Ord och bild, no. 3, 1971. [5655]
- ROSENLEW, F. W. Ångsågarnas grundare på 1860-och 1870-talet. Hist. tids. Finl., no. 3, 1971. [5656]
- SCHMID, HERMAN. Den gröna "socialismen": populismen. Ord och bild, no. 4, 1971. [5657]

SEGELBERG, ERIC. Handtvagning och aquamanil. Fornvännen, no. 2, 1971. [5658]

SELIN, RAUNO. Laittomat asevelvollisuuskuksunnat vuonna 1902 Ahvenanmaalla ja Varsinais-Suomessa. Hist. arkisto, 1970. [5659]

SIMONSEN, P., and MUNCH, G. STAMSPØ. Guldfundet fra Kongsvik i Nord-Norge. Aarbøger nord. oldkyndighed hist., 1969. [5660]

SUNDBERG, GUNNAR. Lantpartiet vid riksdagen 1760-62. Hist. tids. (Sw.), no. 3, 1971. [5661]

SUOMI, JUHANI. A. K. Cajanderin "punamultahallituksen" syntyvaiheet. Hist. aikakausk., no. 2, 1971. [5662]

SVÄRDSTRÖM, ELISABETH, and GUSTAVSON, HELMER. Runfynd 1970. Fornvännen, no. 3, 1971. [5663]

SVENNINGSEN, NILS. Nogle bemaerkninger til Henning Poulsens doktordisputats vedrørende besaettelseårene 1940-1945. Historie, no. 2, 1971. [5664]

SVENSSON, ULF. Folkpartiet och EEC. Tiden (Sw.), no. 6, 1971. [5665]

SZOMLAISKI, LEIF. Rigslovgivning og indenrigspolitik under Valdemar Atterdag 1354-60. Historie, no. 2, 1971. [5666]

THESTRUP, ANNA. Kirkebøgernes til—og afgangslister. Fortid og nutid, no. 5, 1971. [5667]

THOLANDER, ERIK. En teknikers funderingar om Norrlands-järn och Tröndelags-salt i förhistoriskt handelsutbyte. Fornvännen, no. 1, 1971. [5668]

THUNMARK, LENA. Spjutspetsen från Mos—ett tillägg. Fornvännen, no. 2, 1971. [5669]

TRAETTEBERG, GUNVOR INGSTAD. National Costumes. The Norseman, no. 4, 1971. [5670]

TRANAAS, MATLE. Kataloger og klassifikasjonssystemer ved det Kongelige Norske Videnskabers Selskabs bibliotek 1768-1968. Nord. tids. bok-och biblioteksäsen, no. 1, 1971. [5671]

TUULSE, ARMIN. Väst och öst i Gotlands romanik. Fornvännen, no. 3, 1971. [5672]

25 Years in the Air. Scandinavian Airlines, an Aviation Pioneer, Celebrates the First Quarter of a Century. The Norseman, no. 5, 1971. [5673]

VAMPLEW, WRAY. The Paraffin Factory at Mandal: A Study in Business Enterprise. Scand. E. Hist. R., no. 2, 1970. [5674]

WÄHLIN, VAGN. 10. Oktoberforeningen 1865-1870. Foreningens politiske og organisatoriske forudsætninger og opbygning—en oversigt. Historie, no. 2, 1971. [5675]

WELINDER, STIG. Några reflexioner kring Barumgraven. Fornvännen, no. 2, 1971. [5676]

YEIKANGAS, HEIKKI. Väikivartarikosten motivaatiopohja 1500—luvulla Suomessa. Hist. arkisto, 1970. [5677]

YRLID, INGER AHLSTEDT. En romansk inskrift i Gualövs kyrka. Fornvännen, no. 3, 1971. [5678]

ZACCHI, OLE, and WILDT, ANDREAS. Nyt lys over det danske kapitalmarked. Øk. og pol., no. 2, 1971. [5679]

GERMANY, AUSTRIA, AND SWITZERLAND

Arnold H. Price, Library of Congress

GERMANY: GENERAL

BEHR, HANS-JOACHIM. Forst und Jagd im Osnabrücker Raum vom 17. Jahrhundert bis zur Gegenwart. Osnabrücker Mitt., LXXVII, 1970. [5680]

CHRIST, KARL. Zur Entwicklung der Alten Geschichte in Deutschland. Gesch. Wiss. Unter., Oct. 1971. [5681]

DIETEL, KARL. Hallerstein, Kreis Münchberg: Schloss, Kirche und Dorf. Arch. Gesch. Oberfranken, L, 1970. [5682]

FISCHER, HORST. Zur Entwicklung Bayreuths nach den Stadtsteuer-Registern 1444-1800. Arch. Gesch. Oberfranken, L, 1970. [5683]

GIERTZ, HORST, and ZEIL, WILHELM. Die DDR-Geschichtsschreibung zur Geschichte Russlands und der deutsch-russischen Beziehungen bis zur Grossen Sozialistischen Oktoberrevolution. Jb. Gesch. sozial. Länder Europas, no. 1, 1971. [5684]

GREIFFENHAGEN, MARTIN. Technokratischer Konservatismus. Parlament, no. 31, 1971. [5685]

HARNISCH, HARTMUT. Quellen zur Agrargeschichte Brandenburgs in der Epoche des Kapitalismus [2 pts.]. Archimitt., nos. 2-3, 1971. [5686]

HARRISON, GORDON S. The Hanseatic League in Historical Interpretation. Historian, May 1971. [5687]

HERZFELD, HANS. Friedrich-Meinecke-Renaissance im Ausland? Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5688]

JAROSCH, GÜNTHER. Forschungen in der DDR zur Geschichte der deutsch-slavischen Wissenschaftsbeziehungen. Jb. Gesch. sozial. Länder Europas, no. 1, 1971. [5689]

KLOCKE, FRIEDRICH VON. Der Freiherrntitel in der Osnabrücker Ritterschaft. Osnabrücker Mitt., LXXVII, 1970. [5690]

MISTLER, JEAN. Beethoven: mythe et réalité. An. R. mensuelle Lit. fr., Dec. 1970. [5691]

POLLER, HERBERT. Erzgebirgische Einflüsse im Bergbau der Markgrafschaft Bayreuth vom 16. bis 19. Jahrhundert. Arch. Gesch. Oberfranken, L, 1970. [5692]

SCHIEDER, THEODOR. Politische Ideengeschichte. Hist. Z., June 1971. [5693]

SCHUBER, FRIEDRICH HERMANN. Volkssouveränität und Heiliges Römisches Reich. Hist. Z., Aug. 1971. [5694]

SCHULTHEISS, WERNER. Quellen zur Wirtschafts- und Sozialgeschichte Nürnbergs vor 1806. Scripta Mercaturae, no. 1, 1971. [5695]

SMID, MENNO. Zur Geschichte und Bedeutung des Ostfriesischen Interessentenwahlrechts. Jb. Ges. niedersächs. Kirchengesch., LXVIII, 1970. [5696]

STASIEWSKI, BERNHARD. Die Dominikaner in Berlin. Wichmann-Jb., XXI-XXIII, 1967-69. [5697]

STÖKL, GÜNTHER. Die deutsch-russischen Beziehungen in der Geschichte. Österr. Osth., Aug. 1971. [5698]

TUCZEK, ALBERT. Das Messwesen der Elisabethkirche in Marburg und der Liebfrauenkirche in Trier. Hess. Jb. Landesgesch., XXI, 1971. [5699]

VADTSCHILD, RENATE. Frankfurter Bibliographie 1957-1966. Arch. Frankfurts Gesch. Kunst, LII, 1970. [5700]

GERMANY: 1500 TO 1648

BADER, KARL SIEGFRIED. Blasius (II.) Münzer, Abt von St. Blasien 1625-1638. Alemann. Jb., 1970. [5701]

BAHR, ERNST. Die Starostei Draheim zwischen 1565 und 1632. Balt. Stud., LVII, 1971. [5702]

BRÜLS, ALPHONSE. L'évolution de la doctrine sur Dieu chez le jeune Mélancthon (1518-1535). R. Hist. Eccles., no. 1, 1971. [5703]

DAVIS, KENNETH R. Evangelical Anabaptism and the Medieval Ascetic Tradition: A Study in Intellectual Origins. Mennonite Q. R., Oct. 1971. [5704]

DELIUS, WALTER. Kurfürst Joachim I. und die Wahl Karls von Spanien zum deutschen König im Jahre 1519. Jb. Berlin-Brandenburg. Kirchengesch., XLVI, 1971. [5705]

ENDRES, RUDOLF. Probleme des Bauernkriegs im Hochstift Bamberg. Jb. fränk. Landesforsch., XXXI, 1971. [5706]

FLASKAMP, FRANZ. Anna Roedes spätere Chronik von Herzebrock: Eine westfälische mundartliche Quelle der Osnabrücker Klostergeschichte. Jb. Ges. niedersächs. Kirchengesch., LXVIII, 1970. [5707]

FUCHS, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH. Une usine de raffinage de cuivre dans la vallée de la Bruche (Alsace). Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5708]

FUCHS, WALTHER PETER. Willibald Pirckheimer. Jb. fränk. Landesforsch., XXXI, 1971. [5709]

GERHARD, DIETRICH. Ständische Vertretungen und Land. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5710]

HAMMER, FRANZ. Die Astrologie des Johannes Kepler. Sudhoffs Arch., no. 2, 1971. [5711]

HEINEMEYER, WALTER. Die Bildungspolitik Landgraf Philipp des Grossmütigen von Hessen. Hess. Jb. Landesgesch., XXI, 1971. [5712]

HEUTGER, NICOLAUS. Die Universität Rinteln als Stätte des konfessionellen Ausgleichs. Jb. Ges. niedersächs. Kirchengesch., LXVIII, 1970. [5713]

IMHOF, ARTHUR. Christian III. von Dänemark, Landgraf Philipp von Hessen und Gustav Wasa: Bemühungen um ein Bündnis der drei evangelischen Staaten 1537-1544 und die Hintergründe ihres Scheiterns. Arch. Reformationsgesch., no. 1, 1971. [5714]

JOCKENHÖVEL, KLAUS. Eine Denkschrift des Lukas Holstenius über die Rekatholisierung Hamburgs. Römische Quartalschr., no. 1-2, 1971. [5715]

JONG, OTTO J. DE. Die Emder Generalsynode vor dem Hintergrund der westeuropäischen Religionsgeschichte. Jb. Ges. niedersächs. Kirchengesch., LXVIII, 1970. [5716]

KAUNZNER, WOLFGANG. Über den Beginn des Rechnens mit Irrationalen in Deutschland. Janus, no. 4, 1970. [5717]

KELLENBENZ, HERMANN. Nürnbergs Wirtschaftsleben im Zeitalter Willibald Pirckheimers. Jb. fränk. Landesforsch., XXXI, 1971. [5718]

KLAASSEN, WALTER. The Nature of Anabaptist Protest. Mennonite Q. R., Oct. 1971. [5719]

KRAUSS, WERNER. Die Reutlinger Frischlin-Chronik. Reutlinger Geschichtsbld., IX, 1971. [5720]

KRUMMWIEDE, HANS-WALTER. Die Wiederentdeckung des Evangeliums durch Luther und die Reformation der Kirche (1515-1520). Jb. Ges. niedersächs. Kirchengesch., LXVIII, 1970. [5721]

LOEWENICH, WALTHER VON. Charitas Pirckheimer. Jb. fränk. Landesforsch., XXXI, 1971. [5722]

LOOZ-CORSWAREM, OTTO GRAF VON. Ein Entwurf zu einer kurtrierischen Erblandsvereinigung von 1547. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5723]

LUTZ, HEINRICH. [Ranke's] "Ursprung der Spaltung der Nation." Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5724]

MAREK, JIRI. Ansätze zu Youngs und Fresnels Versuchen bei Kepler: Die Rolle der Lochkamera in der Entwicklung der physikalischen Optik. Sudhoffs Arch., no. 2, 1971. [5725]

MAURER, WILHELM. Humanismus und Reformation im Nürnberg Pirckheimers und Dürers. Jb. fränk. Landesforsch., XXXI, 1971. [5726]

MILLAR, GILBERT JOHN. The Landsknecht: His Recruitment and Organization, With some Reference to the Reign of Henry VIII. Mil. Aff., Oct. 1971. [5727]

MÜLLER, WALTER. Die Erneuerung der Heiratsgenossame geistlicher Herrschaften des Bodenseeraums im Jahre 1560. Alemann. Jb., 1970. [5728]

NISSEN, WALTER. Die Göttinger Tuchmacher und ihr Einfluss bei der Einführung der Reformation in der Stadt. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5729]

NITSCHKE, AUGUST. Luthers Beziehung zur neuzeitlichen Naturwissenschaft. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5730]

PLÜMACHER, ECKHARD. Die Bibliothek der St. Nikolai-Kirche in Spandau: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des kirchlichen Bibliothekswesens in Berlin-Brandenburg vom 16. bis zum 18. Jahrhundert. Jb. Berlin-Brandenburg. Kirchengesch., XLVI, 1971. [5731]

RACKMANN, OTTO. Die Stadtrolle von Bahn aus dem Jahre 1590. Balt. Stud., LVII, 1971. [5732]

REINHOLD, WOLFGANG. Katholische Reform und Gegenreformation in der Kölner Nuntiatur 1584-1621: Aufgaben und erste Ergebnisse eines Editionsunternehmens der Görres-Gesellschaft (Nuntiaturberichte aus Deutschland. Die Kölner Nuntiatur I-V). Römische Quartalschr., no. 1-2, 1971. [5733]

ROBERG, BURKHARD. Verhandlungen Herzog Philip Sigismunds mit der Kurie und dem Kaiser über seine Anerkennung als Bischof von Osnabrück (1591-98). Osnabrücker Mitt., LXXVII, 1970. [5734]

RÖHRS, HERMANN. Comenius und Universität Heidelberg. Z. Pädagog., no. 2, 1971. [5735]

ROSEN, EDWARD. Copernicus' Alleged Priesthood. Arch. Reformationsgesch., no. 1, 1971. [5736]

SAKRAUSKY, OSKAR. Der Einfluss der deutschen Theologie auf die südslawische Reformation. Südostdeutsch. Arch., XIII, 1970. [5737]

SCHEIB, OTTO. Die Rolle der theologischen Diskussion bei der Einführung der Reformation in den vorpommerschen Hansestädten Stralsund und Greifswald. Wichmann-Jb., XXI-XXIII, 1967-69. [5738]

SCHMITT, HANS-JÜRGEN. Die geistliche und die weltliche Verwaltung der Diözese und des Hochstifts Bamberg zur Zeit des Bischofs Weigand von Redwitz (1522-1556). Ber. Hist. Ver. Bamberg, CVI, 1970. [5739]

SCHMITTER, HELMUT. Soldatenbild und Kriegstechnik im Schaffen Albrecht Dürers. Z. Militärgesch., no. 4, 1971. [5740]

SEILS, ERNST-ALBERT. Die Staatslehre Adam Contzens. Staat, no. 2, 1971. [5741]

SIDER, RONALD J. Karlstadt's Orlamünde Theology: A Theology of Regeneration [2 pts.]. Mennonite Q. R., July, Oct. 1971. [5742]

STAYER, JAMES M. Melchior Hofmann and the Sword. Mennonite Q. R., July 1971. [5743]

STURMBERGER, HANS. Kaiser Maximilian I. Südostdeutsch. Arch., XIII, 1970. [5744]

SYDOW, JÜRGEN. Die Auflösung des Zisterzienserklosters Bebenhausen. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5745]

WANDERSLEB, MARTIN. Luthertum und Bilderfrage im Fürstentum Braunschweig-Wolfenbüttel und in der Stadt Braunschweig im Reformationsjahrhundert [concl.]. Jb. Ges. niedersächs. Kirchengesch., LXVIII, 1970. [5746]

WIEMANN, HARM. Die ostfriesischen Klöster in vorreformatorischer und reformatorischer Zeit. Jb. Ges. niedersächs. Kirchengesch., LXVIII, 1970. [5747]

GERMANY: 1648 TO 1789

BRÄUNING-OKTAVIO, HERMANN. Darmstadts älteste Zeitung: die "Wochentlichen Zeitungen" (1664-1677). Hess. Jb. Landesgesch., XXI, 1971. [5748]

BRÄUNING-OKTAVIO, HERMANN. Die "Wochentlichen Zeitungen" (1664-1677) aus Darmstadt und ihre Drucker. Gutenberg-Jb., 1971. [5749]

BREUER, DIETER. Die Auseinandersetzung mit dem oberdeutschen Literaturprogramm: Zum Verhältnis von sprachlicher und gesellschaftlicher Programmatik. Arch. Kulturgesch., no. 1, 1971. [5750]

BROWNING, ROOD. The Duke of Newcastle and the Financial Management of the Seven Years War in Germany. J. Soc. Army Hist. Res., Spring 1971. [5751]

EBERLEIN, KONRAD. Chronik der Pfarrei Heiligenstadt (Kreis Ebermannstadt) 1656-1706. Arch. Gesch. Oberfranken, L, 1970. [5752]

FORBES, ERIC G. Tobias Mayer. Esslinger Stud., XVI, 1970. [5753]

GERTEIS, KLAUS. Bildung und Revolution: Die deutschen Lesegesellschaften am Ende des 18. Jahrhunderts. Arch. Kulturgesch., no. 1, 1971. [5754]

GILON, MEIR. Eine Rechnungsprüfung in der Berliner jüdischen Gemeinde im 18. Jahrhundert und ihre Folgen. Bull. Leo Baeck Inst., no. 46-47, 1969. [5755]

HEYDEN, HELLMUTH. Die Kirchenpolitik in Pommern von der Teilung des Landes 1648 bis zur Mitte des 19. Jahrhunderts. Balt. Stud., LVII, 1971. [5756]

HOFMANN, WALTER JÜRGEN. Der neue Bau vom Kloster Erbach. Jb. fränk. Landesforsch., XXXI, 1971. [5757]

HOLZAPFEL, HELMUT. Neuanfänge katholischer Seelsorge in Rostock nach der Reformation. Wichmann-Jb., XXI-XXIII, 1967-69. [5758]

HOPPENSTEDT, DIETRICH. Christian Ulrich Gruppen als Jurist und Rechtshistoriker. Hann. Geschichtsbl., no. 1-2, 1971. [5759]

KÄHN, OTTO. Die Bevölkerungs- und Wirtschaftsstruktur der Reichsstadt Offenburg am Anfang des 18. Jahrhunderts. Ortenau, LI, 1971. [5760]

KRAUSEN, EDGAR. Die Beeinträchtigung des Patronats- und Visitationsrechts des Abtes von Salem durch die kurbayerischen Behörden: Ein Beitrag zum Staatskirchentum des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5761]

LANGSCHMIDT, C. F. A. Christian Thomasius en de Duitse taal. Tijd. Gesch., no. 2, 1971. [5762]

LEHMANN, ULF. Johann Friedrich Hartknochs Beitrag zur deutschen Russlandkenntnis im 18. Jahrhundert. Z. Slaw., no. 3, 1970. [5763]

LIEBE, POUL IB. Holsten-Gottorp 1697. Krigshist. tids., Aug. 1971. [5764]

LIEHL, EKKEHARD. Die Glashütte des Freiherrn von Pfirdt in Falkenstein im Hölleental (1759-1765). Alemann. Jb., 1970. [5765]

MAISCHEIN, KARL. Das Schatzungsregister der Stadt Lampertheim aus dem Jahre 1710. Geschichtsbl. Kreis Bergstrasse, III, 1970. [5766]

MARTENS, WOLFGANG. Bürgerlichkeit in der frühen Aufklärung. Esslinger Stud., XVI, 1970. [5767]

MATHY, HELMUT. Zur Mainzer Büchzensur am Ende des 18. Jahrhunderts. Gutenberg-Jb., 1971. [5768]

MÜSSEL, KARL. "Der Spiegel": Eine Bayreuther Moralische Wochenschrift aus dem 18. Jahrhundert. Arch. Gesch. Oberfranken, L, 1970. [5769]

NOËL, JEAN-FRANÇOIS. Der Reichshofrat und das Verfassungsleben der Reichsstädte zur Zeit Josephs II. Esslinger Stud., XVI, 1970. [5770]

OEHME, RUTHARDT. Die Bedeutung der Genealogia diplomatica Augustae gentis Habsburgicae des Marquard Herrgott O.S.B. für die Geschichte der Kartographie und Geographie. Alemann. Jb., 1970. [5771]

RENGER, REINHARD. Justus Möser's amtlicher Wirkungskreis. Osnabrücker Mitt., LXXVII, 1970. [5772]

RIES, W. Lessing und "Der Palast im Feuer": Ein Beitrag zum Verhältnis von Aufklärung und Theologie. Studium gen., Sept. 1971. [5773]

SCHILLY, ERNST. Das fürstlich Nassau-Saarbrückische Postfreitum im 18. Jahrhundert seit der "Pariser Konvention" 1740. Saarbrücker Hefte, no. 28, 1968. [5774]

SCHMELZEISEN, GUSTAF KLEMENS. Staatsrechtliches in den Trauerspielen des Andreas Gryphius. Arch. Kulturgesch., no. 1, 1971. [5775]

SCHULTE-ALBERT, HANS G. Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz and Library Classification. J. Lib. Hist., Apr. 1971. [5776]

SILBERER, GERHARD. Kaiser und Reich aus der Sicht eines kleinen geistlichen Standesherrn zu Ende des 17. Jahrhunderts: Aus dem Tagebuch des Abts Jakob Vogler (1655–1708) von Schuttern. Ortenau, LI, 1971. [5777]

THOMAS, PHILLIP DRENNON. Count Rumford and His Panaceas for the Poor [of Bavaria]. Midwest Q., Spring 1971. [5778]

VANDRÉ, RUDOLF. Der Katechismus des Justus Gesenius in den lutherischen Gemeinden Ostfriedlands. Jb. Ges. niedersächs. Kirchengesch., LXVIII, 1970. [5779]

VEITH, ILZA. The Medical World of Frederick the Great. Calif. Medicine, Sept. 1971. [5780]

GERMANY: 1789 TO 1867

ADAMY, KURT. Ein Soldat der Revolution: Karl Liebknecht. Beitr. Gesch. Arbeiterbewegung, no. 5, 1971. [5781]

ARNETH, GERHARD. Die Zisterzienserabtei Langheide vor der Säkularisation. Ber. Hist. Ver. Bamberg, CVI, 1970. [5782]

BALLIN, GERHARD. Ein Brief Benedikt Schotts an Israel Jacobson. Bull. Leo Baeck Inst., no. 46–47, 1969. [5783]

BAUR, KARL. Der botanische Reiseverein Esslingen. Esslinger Stud., XVI, 1970. [5784]

BIERMANN, KURT-R. Thomas Clausen als Astromom. Janus, no. 4, 1970. [5785]

BIERMANN, KURT-R. Von Goethe zu Gauss. Arch. hist. sci., July–Dec. 1970. [5786]

BISSING, W. M. FRH. V. Die Finanzierung der Kriege von 1864, 1866 und 1870/71 mit Hilfe der Seehandlung. Jb. brandenburg. Landesgesch., XXI, 1970. [5787]

BLAICH, FRITZ. Zinsfreiheit als Problem der deutschen Wirtschaftspolitik zwischen 1857 und 1871. Schmollers Jb., no. 3, 1971. [5788]

DINTER, ELMAR. Albrecht Graf von Room . . . als Marineminister . . . . Marine-Rdsch., Aug. 1971. [5789]

EDGERTON, WILLIAM B. Laying a Legend to Rest: The Poet Kapnist and the Ukraino-German Intrigue. Slavic R., Sept. 1971. [5790]

ELIAV, MORDECHAI. Philippons Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums und Erez Israel. Bull. Leo Baeck Inst., no. 46–47, 1969. [5791]

ELSTER, JON. Den siste filosof. Ved 200-årsdagen for G. W. F. Hegels fødsel. [The Last Philosopher. At the 200th Anniversary of the birth of G. W. F. Hegel.] Samtiden, no. 6, 1971. [5792]

EUCHNER, WALTER. Freiheit, Eigentum und Herrschaft bei Hegel. Pol. Vierteljahresschr., Dec. 1970. [5793]

GOLLWITZER, HEINZ. Zum politischen Germanismus des 19. Jahrhunderts. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5794]

HABACHER, MARIA. Christian Ferdinand Hochstetter und Karl Ludwig von Reichenbach: Zur Naturforschung und Industrialisierung im Vormärz. Esslinger Stud., XVI, 1970. [5795]

HAINES, NICOLAS. Politics and Protest: Hegel Criticism. PSQ, Sept. 1971. [5796]

HARDACH, KARL W. Anglomanie und Anglophobie während der Industriellen Revolution in Deutschland. Schmollers Jb., no. 2, 1971. [5797]

HENNING, FRIEDRICH-WILHELM. Standorte und Spezialisierung des Handels und des Transportwesens in der Mark Brandenburg um 1800. Scripta Mercaturae, no. 1, 1971. [5798]

JEDIN, HUBERT. Gustav Hohenlohe und Augustin Theiner 1850–1870. Römische Quartalschr., no. 3–4, 1971. [5799]

JEDIN, HUBERT. Kirchenhistorikerbriefe an Augustin Theiner. Römische Quartalschr., no. 3–4, 1971. [5800]

KANTZENBACH, FRIEDRICH WILHELM. Leopold und Friedrich Heinrich Ranke in Altenkirchen. Balt. Stud., LVII, 1971. [5801]

KORELLA, GOTTFRIED. Die preussische Feldtelegraphie, insbesondere ihre Zusammenarbeit mit der Staatstelegraphie. Arch. dtsch. Postgesch., no. 2, 1971. [5802]

KUMOR, JOHANNES. Das Recht der konfessionell verschiedenen Ehen im Beuthener Raum um 1800. Mitt. Beuthener Gesch.- u. Museumsver., XXXI–XXXIII, 1969–71. [5803]

LANGE, WOLFGANG. Helmuth von Moltke auf Schloss Briesen 1828. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5804]

MAULITZ, RUSSELL. Schwann's Way: Cells and Crystals. J. Hist. Medicine, Oct. 1971. [5805]

MÜLLER, GERHARD. Die Marburger Theologische Fakultät zwischen Aufklärung und Erweckung: Die Berufung Christian Friedrich Klings nach Marburg 1833. Hess. Jb. Landesgesch., XXI, 1971. [5806]

MÜLLER, WILHELM. Steckbrieflich gesucht: Ein bierbrauender Marschall [d'Erlon]. Von Waterloo nach Bayern. Arch. Gesch. Oberfranken, L, 1970. [5807]

NIPPERDEY, THOMAS. Carl Bernhard Hundshagen: Ein Beitrag zum Verhältnis von Geschichtsschreibung, Theologie und Politik im Vormärz. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5808]

OBENAU, HERBERT. Die Immediatkommission für die ständischen Angelegenheiten als Instrument der preussischen Reaktion im Vormärz. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5809]

OBERMANN, KARL. Zu den Propaganda- und Flugblattaktionen des Bundes der Kommunisten in Deutschland 1850/51. Beitr. Gesch. Arbeiterbewegung, no. 5, 1971. [5810]

O'BRIEN, GEORGE DENNIS. Does Hegel have a Philosophy of History? Hist. and Theory, no. 3, 1971. [5811]

OER, RUDOLFINE FREIIN VON. Zur Beurteilung der Säkularisation von 1803. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5812]

OTRUBA, GUSTAV. Der Deutsche Zollverein und Österreich. Österreich Gesch. Lit., Mar. 1971. [5813]

PELGER, HANS. Der Osnabrücker Arbeiterbildungsverein 1849-1851. Osnabrücker Mitt., LXXVII, 1970. [5814]

PESCHKEN, BERND. Literatur und Politik im Wechselverhältnis: Zu Ferdinands Gregorovius' Goethe-Bild 1849. Jb. Dtsch. Schillerges., XIV, 1970. [5815]

RODEN, GÜNTHER VON. Zur Aufhebung des Zisterzienserinnenklosters Duisern. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5816]

ROSEN, EDGAR R. Zwei Briefe zum Regierungseintritt Franz von Roggenbachs im Mai 1861. Hist. Z., Aug. 1971. [5817]

SHEEL, HEINRICH. Eine Revolutionsschrift Georg Forsters vom November 1792 [doc.]. Z. Geschichtswiss., no. 8, 1971. [5818]

SCHULIN, ERNST. Zeitgeschichtsschreibung im 19. Jahrhundert. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5819]

SCHUMACHER, MARTIN. Wirtschafts- und Sozialverhältnisse der rheinischen Textilindustrie im frühen 19. Jahrhundert: Ein Verzeichnis des "beschäftigten Personals" der Baumwollspinnerei und Weberei Weerth in Bonn 1847. Rhein. Vierteljahrsbl., XXXV, 1971. [5820]

SHEEHAN, JAMES J. Liberalism and the City in Nineteenth-Century Germany. Past & Present, May 1971. [5821]

TOEPFER, HELMUTH. Die Jahrmärkte in der preussischen Rheinprovinz um 1848. Rhein. Vierteljahrsbl., XXXV, 1971. [5822]

TOURY, JACOB. Dokumente zur Juden-Emanzipation im Grossherzogtum Berg (1808). Bull. Leo Baeck Inst., no. 46-47, 1969. [5823]

WAGNER, ANNALISA. Bettina von Arnim und die preussische Zensur. Jb. brandenburg. Landesgesch., XXI, 1970. [5824]

WEITZ, K. R. Die Denkschrift des niederrheinischen und westfälischen Adels vom 26. Februar 1818: Eine Untersuchung zur Verfassungs- und Sozialgeschichte des 19. Jahrhunderts. Rhein. Vierteljahrsbl., XXXV, 1971. [5825]

WELLS, GEORGE A. Goethe's Qualitative Optics. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [5826]

WIRTH, ARTUR. Konsul Johann Heinrich Meinel (1798-1852): Als fränkischer Kaufmann der Biedermeierzeit in Frankreich. Arch. Gesch. Oberfranken, L, 1970. [5827]

WOLFSON, MURRAY. The Day Karl Marx Grew up. J. Pol. Ec., Fall 1971. [5828]

WULFMEYER, REINHARD. Die Einführung der Bezirksräte und die Umbildung der inneren Landesverwaltung in Kurhessen 1821-1848. Hess. Jb. Landesgesch., XXI, 1971. [5829]

ZORN, WOLFGANG, and KRINGS, WILFRIED. Nachtrag zur historischen Wirtschaftskarte um 1820: Die Güterbewegung in der Rheinprovinz. Rhein. Vierteljahrsbl., XXXV, 1971. [5830]

ZUCKER, STANLEY. Ludwig Bamberger and the Rise of Anti-Semitism in Germany, 1848-1893. Central Eur. Hist., Dec. 1970. [5831]

GERMANY: 1867 TO 1918

ADELMANN, GERHARD. Führende Unternehmer im Rheinland und in Westfalen 1850-1914. Rhein. Vierteljahrsbl., XXXV, 1971. [5832]

BALD, DETLEF. Probleme der Imperialismusforschung am Beispiel Deutsch-Ostafrikas. Gesch. Wiss. Unter., Oct. 1971. [5833]

BECKER, JOSEF. Zum Problem der Bismarckschen Politik in der spanischen Thronfrage 1870. Hist. Z., June 1971. [5834]

BLOTH, HUGO GOTTHARD. Bogislav von Bonin (1842-1929): Antisemitengegner und "Kanalrebell." Balt. Stud., LVII, 1971. [5835]

DECKER, HANNAH S. The Medical Reception of Psychoanalysis in Germany, 1894-1907: Three Brief Studies. Bull. Hist. Medicine, Sept.-Oct. 1971. [5836]

DOEPNER, FRIEDRICH. Das Kriegsjahr 1871 [2 pts.]. Wehrkunde, Apr.-May 1971. [5837]

DRÖZ, J. Les thèses de l'historien allemand Fritz Fischer sur la guerre de 1914-1918 et ses contradicteurs. Bull. Soc. Hist. mod., no. 1, 1971. [5838]

EUDE, MICHEL. Les Relations économiques et financières entre la France et l'Allemagne de 1898 à 1914. R. Hist. éc. soc., no. 1, 1971. [5839]

FRICKE, DIETER. Militarismus und sozialistische Arbeiterbewegung im deutschen Kaiserreich. Z. Militärgesch., no. 4, 1971. [5840]

GEHRMANN, KARL HEINZ. Der Stechlin und die klassenlose Gesellschaft: Notizen zur neuesten Fontane-Interpretation [r. art.]. Dtsch. Stud., Sept. 1971. [5841]

HOLZHEY, HELMUT. Zwei Briefe Hermann Cohens an Heinrich von Treitschke. Bull. Leo Baeck Inst., no. 46-47, 1969. [5842]

JUNG, DIETER. SMS GOEBEN und die Ereignisse im Schwarzen Meer 1918. Marine-Rdsch., Feb. 1971. [5843]

KANTZENBACH, FRIEDRICH WILHELM. Theodor Zahns wissenschaftliche Anfänge im Spiegel von Briefen Johannes von Hofmanns. Jb. fränk. Landesforsch., XXXI, 1971. [5844]

KENNEDY, P. M. Anglo German Relations in the Pacific and the Partition of Samoa: 1885-1899. Australian J. Pol. Hist., Apr. 1971. [5845]

KISSINGER, HENRY A. Der weisse Revolutionär: Gedanken über Bismarck [2 pts.]. Merkur, Jan., Feb. 1971. [5846]

KURZWEIL, ZWIERICH. Gustav Wyneken, sein Werk und seine Auseinandersetzung mit Hermann Lietz. Paedagog. hist., no. 1, 1971. [5847]

LASCHITZA, ANNELIES. Karl Liebknecht und Rosa Luxemburg über die Dialektik von Frieden und Sozialismus. Z. Geschichtswiss., no. 9, 1971. [5848]

LASCHITZA, ANNELIES. Rosa Luxemburg und Karl Liebknecht über das Verhältnis von Demokratie und Sozialismus: Zur Sozialismusauffassung der deutschen Linken. Z. Geschichtswiss., no. 7, 1971. [5849]

LIPGENS, WALTER. Zum geschichtlichen Standort der Reichsgründung. Gesch. Wiss. Unter., Sept. 1971. [5850]

LOHS, KARLHEINZ. Fritz Haber und der chemische Krieg. Z. Militärgesch., no. 4, 1971. [5851]

- MITZMAN, ARTHUR. Tönnies and German Society 1887-1914. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [5852]
- MOMMSEN, WOLFGANG J. Die Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika im politischen Denken Max Webers. Hist. Z., Oct. 1971. [5853]
- MOMMSEN, WOLFGANG J. Zur Kriegsschuldfrage 1914. Hist. Z., June 1971. [5854]
- MORSEY, RUDOLF. Georg Kardinal Kopp, Fürstbischof von Breslau (1887-1914). Wichmann-Jb., XXI-XXIII, 1967-69. [5855]
- ORSAGH, THOMAS J. Löhne in Deutschland 1871-1913: Neuere Literatur und weitere Ergebnisse. Z. gesamte Staatswiss., July 1971. [5856]
- PARSONS, EDWARD B. The German-American Crisis of 1902-1903. Historian, May 1971. [5857]
- PFLANZE, OTTO. Toward a Psychoanalytic Interpretation of Bismarck. AHR, Apr. 1972. [5858]
- RABE, HANNS-GERD. Remarque und Osnabrück. Osnabrücker Mitt., LXXVII, 1970. [5859]
- SANDER, JOSEPH. Die Stellung der deutschen Presse zur Annexion Bosniens und der Herzegowina. Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XIII, 1970. [5860]
- SCHMAUDERER, EBERHARD. Der Einfluss der Chemie auf die Entwicklung des Patentwesens in der zweiten Hälfte des 19. Jahrhunderts. Tradition, May-Aug. 1971. [5861]
- SCHOLZE, SIEGFRIED. Karl Liebknecht und die Jenaer Jugendkonferenz Ostern 1916. Z. Geschichtswiss., no. 8, 1971. [5862]
- SIKLÓS-VINCZE, EDIT. Die Solidarität der Sozialisten Ungarns mit den deutschen Arbeitern im Kampf gegen das Sozialistengesetz (1878-1881). Beitr. Gesch. Arbeiterbewegung, no. 5, 1971. [5863]
- STEARNS, PETER N. Adaptation to Industrialization: German Workers as a Test Case. Central Eur. Hist., Dec. 1970. [5864]
- STEINBERG, J. The Novelle of 1908: Necessities and Choices in the Anglo-German Naval Arms Race. Trans. Roy. Hist. Soc., 21, 1971. [5865]
- SUTTER, BERTHOLD. Die innere Lage Ungarns vor dem Ersten Weltkrieg in der Beurteilung deutscher Diplomaten. Südostdeutsch. Arch., XIII, 1970. [5866]
- TRUMPENER, ULRICH. The Escape of the Goeben and Breslau: A Reassessment. Can. J. Hist., no. 2, 1971. [5867]
- VIERHAUS, RUDOLF. Kaiser und Reichstag zur Zeit Wilhelms II. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5868]
- WEICHERT, FRIEDRICH. Die Hintergründe des letzten Berliner Dombaues. Jb. Berlin-Brandenburg. Kirchengesch., XLVI, 1971. [5869]
- GERMANY: 1918 TO 1945
- ANDERLE, ALFRED; HELLER, ILSE; and JENA, DETLEF. Forschungen in der DDR zur Geschichte der UdSSR und der deutsch-sowjetischen Beziehungen (1917-1945). Jb. Gesch. sozial. Länder Europas, no. 1, 1971. [5870]
- ARETIN, OTMAR FREIHERR VON. Die bayerische Regierung und die Politik der bayerischen Monarchisten in der Krise der Weimarer Republik 1930-1933. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5871]
- BALLER, KURT; FRIDERICI, HANS JÜRGEN; and SCHWENDLER, GERHILD. Zur Entwicklung des antifaschistischen Widerstandskampfes unter der Führung der KPD in Leipzig-Westachsen (1939-1945). Beitr. Gesch. Arbeiterbewegung, no. 5, 1971. [5872]
- BAUER, CLEMENS. Erzbischof Gröber und das Reichskonkordat. Alemann. Jb., 1970. [5873]
- BERGHAHN, VOLKER R. Tendances de la "Wehrmachtpropaganda." R. Hist. deux. guerre mond., Oct. 1971. [5874]
- BOELCKE, WILLI A. Die Waffengeschäfte des Dritten Reiches mit Brasilien, Teil I. Tradition, May-Aug. 1971. [5875]
- BRAATZ, WERNER E. Die agrarisch-industrielle Front in der Weimarer Republik von 1930-1932. Schmollers Jb., no. 5, 1971. [5876]
- BRAATZ, WERNER E. Two Neo-Conservative Myths in Germany 1919-1932: The "Third Reich" and the "New State." J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [5877]
- BUSSMANN, WALTER. Der deutsche Katholizismus im Jahre 1933. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5878]
- CORDES, CORD. Das Sozialpfarramt in der hannoverschen Landeskirche 1927-1932. Jb. Ges. niedersächs. Kirchengesch., LXVIII, 1970. [5879]
- DRECHSLER, KARL; DREES, HANS; and HASS, GERHART. Europapläne des deutschen Imperialismus im zweiten Weltkrieg [doc.]. Z. Geschichtswiss., no. 7, 1971. [5880]
- FENSCHL, DOROTHEA, and GROEBLER, OLAF. Imperialistische Ökonomie und militärische Strategie: Eine Denkschrift Wilhelm Gröners. Z. Geschichtswiss., no. 9, 1971. [5881]
- FISHMAN, STERLING. German Mandarins and Weimar Culture. Hist. Ed. Q., Fall 1970. [5882]
- FLASKAMP, FRANZ. Eine Begegnung mit Georg Steinhausen. Arch. Kulturgesch., no. 1, 1971. [5883]
- GRIMM, GERHARD. Führung, Struktur und Aussenpolitik des "Dritten Reiches" [r. art.]. Pol. Stud., July-Aug. 1971. [5884]
- HACK, BERTOLD, and KLEISS, MARIETTA. Hermann Broch and Daniel Brody: Briefwechsel 1930-1951 [pt. 1]. Arch. Gesch. Buchwesens, no. 1-3, 1971. [5885]
- HILDEBRANT, K. Le programme de Hitler et sa réalisation, 1939-1942. R. Hist. deux. guerre mond., Oct. 1971. [5886]
- JANSSEN, GREGOR. Todt et Speer. R. Hist. deux. guerre mond., Oct. 1971. [5887]
- KARBACH, DIETER. Becks Kriegsbild von 1935-1940. Wehrkunde, Aug. 1971. [5888]
- KORBULY, D. Die deutsch-ungarischen Beziehungen vor dem Zweiten Weltkrieg (1936-1939). Österr. Osth., Aug. 1971. [5889]
- LAYTON, ROLAND V., JR. The Völkischer Beobachter, 1920-1933: The Nazi Party Newspaper in the Weimar Era. Central Eur. Hist., Dec. 1970. [5890]
- LEHMANN, HANS G. Hitlers Unterredung mit dem amerikanischen Publizisten Stoddard: Ein unbekanntes Dokument über ein Gespräch am 19. Dezember 1939. Publizistik, Apr.-June 1971. [5891]

LEWALD, URSULA. Dokumente einer Freundschaft: Briefe von Ulrich Stutz an Aloys Schulte 1917 bis 1921. Rhein. Vierteljahrsbl., XXXV, 1971. [5892]

LITTELL, FRANKLIN H. Kirchenkampf and Holocaust: The German Church Struggle and Nazi Anti-Semitism in Retrospect. J. Church and State, Spring 1971. [5893]

LUDWIG, KARL HEINZ. Fabrications de fusées et stratégie. R. Hist. deux. guerre mond., Oct. 1971. [5894]

MARKS, SALLY, and DULUDE, DENIS. German-American Relations 1918-1921. Mid-America, Oct. 1971. [5895]

MERGLIN, ALBERT, and REGLING, VOLKMAR. La percée allemande au sud d'Amiens (juin 1940). R. hist. Armée, no. 1, 1970. [5896]

MIRGELER, ALBERT. Brünnings Memoiren. Hochland, May-June 1971. [5897]

MUTH, HEINRICH. Zeitgeschichte: Innenpolitik 1918-1933 [r. art.; in 2 pts.]. Gesch. Wiss. Unter., Sept., Oct. 1971. [5898]

NAUMANN, HORST. Die USPD und die Kommunistische Internationale: Zur Entsendung einer Delegation der USPD zum II. Weltkongress der KI. Z. Geschichtswiss., no. 8, 1971. [5899]

PAOLI, FRANÇOIS. L'armée française en Haute-Silésie (1920-1922). R. hist. Armée, no. 3, 1971. [5900]

PAOLI, FRANÇOIS. L'offensive avortée sur Berlin en juin 1919. R. hist. Armée, no. 1, 1970. [5901]

PAULY, FERDINAND. Zur Kirchenpolitik des Gauleiters J. Bürckel im Saargebiet (März-April 1935). Rhein. Vierteljahrsbl., XXXV, 1971. [5902]

PHILLIPS, M. S. The Nazi Control of the German Film Industry. J. Eur. Stud., Mar. 1971. [5903]

PRILLARD, PIERRE. Pendant l'offensive des Ardennes: La garde du Rhin, du 5 au 20 janvier 1945. R. hist. Armée, no. 1, 1970. [5904]

- ROESKE, ULRICH. Brüning und die Volkskonservativen (1930). Z. Geschichtswiss., no. 7, 1971. [5905]

RÖSSLER, E. Die deutsche U-Bootausbildung und ihre Vorbereitung 1925-1945. Marine-Rdsch., Aug. 1971. [5906]

ROTHE, ALFRED. Die Jesuiten in Beuthen. Mitt. Beuthener Gesch.-u. Museumsver., XXXI-XXXIII, 1969-71. [5907]

SCHILLY, ERNST. Geschichte des Post- und Fernmeldewesens im Saarland. Arch. dtsch. Postgesch., no. 2, 1971. [5908]

TAPIÉ, VICTOR-L. Le Protectorat de Bohême-Moravie sous l'occupation allemande, 1939-1942 (à propos d'un livre récent). R. hist. (Paris), Apr.-June 1971. [5909]

TRAUTES, HANS. Erinnerungen an Saarbrücken während des Zweiten Weltkrieges (1939-1945), Pt. 1. Saarbrücker Hefte, no. 30, 1969. [5910]

VÖLKER, EBERHARD. Der Stand der Diskussion über die Motive der deutschen Norwegen-Unternehmung 1940. Marine-Rdsch., Aug. 1971. [5911]

WALL, DONALD D. The Reports of the Sicherheitsdienst on the Church and Religious Affairs in Germany, 1939-1944. Church Hist., Dec. 1971. [5912]

WARD, JAMES E. Hitler's Reich Viewed from 1984. Hist. Teacher, Jan. 1971. [5913]

WHEELER-BENNETT, JOHN. The End of the Weimar Republic [reconsideration]. For. Aff., Jan. 1972. [5914]

WÖRFEL, ERHARD. Die Arbeiterregierung in Thüringen im Jahre 1923. Wiss. Z. U. Jena: Ges.-u. sprachwiss. Reihe, no. 2, 1971. [5915]

ZETKIN, CLARA. Clara Zetkin zur internationalen Solidarität [doc.]. Beitr. Gesch. Arbeiterbewegung, no. 5, 1971. [5916]

GERMANY: 1945 TO PRESENT

BOHM, GUNHILD. Die Kunstpolitik der SED in ihrem Widerspruch. Dtsch. Stud., Sept. 1971. [5917]

BRANDT, WILLY. Aktuelle Fragen der deutschen Aussenpolitik. Europa-Arch., no. 13, 1971. [5918]

CASSEL, DIETER, and THIEME, JÖRG. Zum Problem preispolitischer Steuerung der landwirtschaftlichen Produktion in der DDR. Jb. Nationalök. Stat., July 1971. [5919]

DELIUS, WALTER. Die Neuordnung der Evangelischen Kirche der Altpreußischen Union in den Jahren 1945-1951. Jb. Berlin-Brandenburg. Kirchengesch., XLVI, 1971. [5920]

DESCHER, SIEGFRIED. Der moderne Olympismus im Spiegel der Störversuche des westdeutschen Imperialismus. Wiss. Z. Pädagog. Hochschule Potsdam, no. 4, 1965. [5921]

DEUERLEIN, ERNST. Wandel der amerikanischen Deutschlandpolitik 1946: Zum 25. Jahrestag der Byrnes-Rede in Stuttgart. Deutschland-Arch., Sept. 1971. [5922]

DÖRR, MANFRED. Restauration oder Demokratisierung: Zur Verfassungspolitik in Hessen 1945/46. Z. Parlamentsfragen, Mar. 1971. [5923]

EBBIGHAUSEN, ROLF, and KIRCHHOFF, PETER. Der angepasste Klassenkampf: Organisation und Politik der DKP zwei Jahre nach ihrer Neukonstituierung. Pol. Vierteljahresschr., Dec. 1970. [5924]

EPSTEIN, JULIUS. Die Zwangsrepatriierung von antikommunistischen Kriegsgefangenen in die Sowjetunion. Pol. Stud., Mar.-Apr. 1971. [5925]

ERDMANN, KURT. Abkehr vom bisherigen Modell des Ökonomischen Systems des Sozialismus. Deutschland-Arch., Aug. 1971. [5926]

FORBRIG, SIEGFRIED. Die Einführung der Körpererziehung in den Berufsschulen der DDR und die ersten Jahre ihrer Entwicklung. Wiss. Z. Pädagog. Hochschule Potsdam, no. 4, 1970. [5927]

GIMBEL, JOHN. Die Konferenzen der deutschen Ministerpräsidenten 1945-1949. Parlament, no. 31, 1971. [5928]

GRÄTZ, FRANK. Wirtschaftsführer in Ost und West. Deutschland-Arch., Oct. 1971. [5929]

GRILLE, DIETRICH. Bonn: Weimar minus Rapallo. Meditation über das Deutschlandbild der sowjetischen Zeitgeschichte. Dtsch. Stud., Sept. 1971. [5930]

GROELING, ERICH, and MEYER, CHRISTIAN. Die SED und die chinesisch-amerikanische Annäherung. Deutschland-Arch., Nov. 1971. [5931]

HOPPE, HEDWIG. Zur Entwicklung der Industrieproduktion in Deutschland: Korrektur und Vergleich. Deutschland-Arch., Oct. 1971. [5932]

- JANSEN, MARLIES. Deutschlandpolitik und VIII. Parteitag. Deutschland-Arch., Aug. 1971. [5933]
- KÖHLE, KLAUS. Vorgeschichte, Arbeit und Konflikte des Parlamentarischen Rats. Pol. Stud., Nov.-Dec. 1971. [5934]
- KUKLICK, BRUCE. The Division of Germany and American Policy on Reparations. W. Pol. Q., June 1970. [5935]
- LIVINGSTON, ROBERT GERALD. East Germany Between Moscow and Bonn. For. Aff., Jan. 1972. [5936]
- MEIER, CHRISTIAN. Die deutsche Frage [at the 24 Congress of the Soviet Communist Party]. Osteuropa, Aug.-Sept. 1971. [5937]
- MONTAG, CLAUS. Grundzüge der Militärpolitik der FDP in Jahren ihrer parlamentarischen Opposition im Bundestag 1966-1969. Z. Militärgesch., no. 4, 1971. [5938]
- MORGAN, ROGER. Washington and Bonn: A Case Study in Alliance Politics. Int. Aff., July 1971. [5939]
- MÜLLER, ADOLF, and UTITZ, BEDŘICH. Die DDR und die Tschechoslowakei. Deutschland-Arch., Aug. 1971. [5940]
- NIKLES, BRUNO W. Jugendverbandsarbeit und Protestbewegung der Jugend. Parlament, no. 30, 1971. [5941]
- OSCHLIES, WOLF. Historikerdiskussionen Bulgarien-DDR. Deutschland-Arch., Nov. 1971. [5942]
- PANKAU, HEIDE; PANKAU, PETER; and SCHÜTZLER, HORST. Forschungen in der DDR zur Geschichte der UdSSR seit 1945 und der Beziehungen zwischen der UdSSR und der DDR sowie der UdSSR und der BDR. Jb. Gesch. sozial. Länder Europas, no. 1, 1971. [5943]
- SCHMÄHL, WINFRIED. Wirtschaftspolitische Zielkonflikte in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland. Schmollers Jb., no. 6, 1970. [5944]
- SCHULZ, EBERHARD. Die DDR als Gegenspieler der Bonner Ostpolitik. Europa-Arch., no. 8, 1971. [5945]
- SÖNTHIMER, KARL. Die zweite deutsche Teilung. Neue Rdsch., no. 1, 1971. [5946]
- STICKEN, WERNER. DDR-Wirtschaft: Plan und Wirklichkeit [r. art.]. Dtsch. Stud., Sept. 1971. [5947]
- TIMMERMANN, HEINZ. Im Vorfeld der neuen Ostpolitik; Der Dialog zwischen italienischen Kommunisten und deutschen Sozialdemokraten 1967/68. Osteuropa, June 1971. [5948]
- TREUE, WILHELM. Zur jüngeren Wirtschaftsgeschichtsschreibung in der DDR über den "deutschen Imperialismus." Parlament, no. 33, 1971. [5949]
- VOGELSANG, THILO. Koblenz, Berlin und Rüdesheim: Die Option für den westdeutschen Staat im Juli 1948. Veröff. Max-Planck-Inst. Gesch., XXXVI, no. 1, 1971. [5950]
- WESSON, ROBERT G. German Policy Toward East Europe. Current Hist., May 1971. [5951]
- WILLIAMS, A. An Investigation of the Education System of the DDR. German Life Lett., Apr. 1971. [5952]
- BALTZAREK, FRANZ. Beiträge zur Geschichte des vierten Standes in Niederösterreich: Eine vergleichende Stadtgeschichtsuntersuchung mit besonderer Auswertung der Gaisruckschen Städteordnungen von 1745-1747. Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XXIII, 1970. [5954]
- BENNA, ANNA HEDWIG. Von der erzherzoglichen Durchlaucht zur kaiserlichen Hoheit: Eine Titelstudie. Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XXIII, 1970. [5955]
- BERKNER, LUTZ K. The Stem Family and the Developmental Cycle of the Peasant Household: An Eighteenth-Century Austrian Example. AHR, Apr. 1972. [5956]
- BRETTNER-MESSLER, HORST. Die militärischen Absprachen zwischen den Generalstäben Österreich-Ungarns und Italiens vom Dezember 1912 bis Juni 1914. Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XXIII, 1970. [5957]
- BROUCEK, PETER. Die Bedrohung Wiens durch die Schweden im Jahre 1645. Jb. Ver. Gesch. Stadt Wien, XXVI, 1970. [5958]
- BROUCEK, PETER. Erzherzog Leopold Wilhelm und der Oberbefehl über das kaiserliche Heer im Jahre 1645. Schr. Heeresgesch. Mus. Wien, IV, 1969. [5959]
- COONS, RONALD E. Das Dampfschiff als diplomatisches Mittel: Österreich und die englisch-ostindische Post (1842-1848). Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XXIII, 1970. [5960]
- CSENDES, PETER. Wiener Strafgerichtsbarkeit im 17. Jahrhundert. Jb. Ver. Gesch. Stadt Wien, XXVI, 1970. [5961]
- EICHWALDER, REINHARD. Georg Adam Fürst Starhemberg (1724-1807): Diplomat, Staatsmann und Grundherr. Österreich Gesch. Lit., Apr. 1971. [5962]
- FRITZ, HEDWIG. Neue Wege der Unternehmensforschung am Beispiel des österreichischen Sparkassenwesens. Tradition, May-Aug. 1971. [5963]
- GARDOS, HARALD. Ballhausplatz und Hohe Pforte im Kriegsjahr 1915. Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XXIII, 1970. [5964]
- GARMS-CORNIDES, ELISABETH. Marginalien des 18. Jahrhunderts zu zwei Biographien des Grafen Karl Firmian. Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XXIII, 1970. [5965]
- GROSS, NACHUM. Economic Growth and the Consumption of Coal in Austria and Hungary 1831-1913. J. Ec. Hist., Dec. 1971. [5966]
- GRUBRICH, SIMITIS. Sigmund Freuds Lebensgeschichte und die Anfänge der Psychoanalyse. Neue Rdsch., no. 2, 1971. [5967]
- HOLZMANN, GUSTAV. Der Hochofen Edlach: Ein wirtschaftliches Baudenkmal. Tradition, May-Aug. 1971. [5968]
- HUMMELBERGER, WALTER. Anton Dollocek. Schr. Heeresgesch. Mus. Wien, IV, 1969. [5969]
- KAINDL, FRANZ. Von den gemalten zu den gewebten Feldzeichen: Ein Beitrag zur österreichischen Fahngeschichte des 19. Jahrhunderts. Schr. Heeresgesch. Mus. Wien, IV, 1969. [5970]
- KASTNER, RICHARD H. Der Ingenieur in Österreich. Österreich Gesch. Lit., June 1971. [5971]

AUSTRIA

ACHELBURG, WLADIMIR, GRAF. Der Untergang des k.u.k. U-Bootes U30. Marine-Rdsch., Mar. 1971. [5953]

LEITNER, GERTRAUD. Der Wiener Bibliothekar Hugo Blotius und seine Strassburger Korrespondenz. Österreich Gesch. Lit., Apr. 1971. [5972]

MARX, JULIUS. Die amtlichen Verbotslisten. Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XXIII, 1970. [5973]

MECHTLER, PAUL. Dalmatien und die österreichische Eisenbahnpolitik. Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XXIII, 1970. [5974]

MEZLER-ANDELBERG, HELMUT J. Erneuerung des Katholizismus und Gegenreformation in Innerösterreich. Südostdeutsch. Arch., XIII, 1970. [5975]

MIKOLETZKY, HANNS LEO. Ein Sammelband mit Briefen Franz Stephans. Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XXIII, 1970. [5976]

OBERMANN, KARL. Unveröffentlichte Schriftstücke Metternichs vom Sommer 1845 über deutsche Angelegenheiten. Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XXIII, 1970. [5977]

O'BRIEN, GEORGE M. Maria Theresa's Attempt to Educate an Empire. Paedagog. hist., no. 3, 1970. [5978]

Österreichische Militärgeschichtsschreibung ab 1945 (pts. 1-2). Schr. Heeresgesch. Mus. Wien, III-IV, 1967-69. [5979]

OTRUBA, GUSTAV. Der Wirtschaftshistoriker Ivan Slokar. Österreich Gesch. Lit., May 1971. [5980]

PAPACOSTEA, ȘERBAN. Der Absolutismus in den Randgebieten der Habsburgermonarchie: Die Kleine Walachei unter österreichischer Verwaltung (1718-1739). Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XXIII, 1970. [5981]

PEBALL, KURT, and ROTHENBERG, GUNTHER E. Der Fall "U": Die geplante Besetzung Ungarns durch die k.u.k. Armee im Herbst 1905. Schr. Heeresgesch. Mus. Wien, IV, 1969. [5982]

ROTH, PAUL W. Jesuitische Glashüttengründungen in der Steiermark: Drei Glashütten der Herrschaft Thalberg zwischen 1692 und 1852. Tradition, May-Aug. 1971. [5983]

RUDZIO, WOLFGANG. Entscheidungszentrum Koalitionsausschuss: Zur Realverfassung Österreichs unter der Großen Koalition. Pol. Vierteljahresschr., July 1971. [5984]

RÜLING, JOHANNES. Stellenbesetzung des österreichischen Bundesheeres 1920-1938. Schr. Heeresgesch. Mus. Wien, IV, 1969. [5985]

SCHAUSBERGER, NORBERT. Der wirtschaftliche Anschluss Österreichs 1938. Österreich Gesch. Lit., May 1971. [5986]

STAUDINGER, ANTON. Bemühungen Carl Vaugoins um Suprematie der Christlichsozialen Partei in Österreich (1930-33). Mitt. Österr. Staatsarch., XXIII, 1970. [5987]

WANDRUSZKA, ADAM. Siebenbürgen und Österreich. Donauraum, no. 1, 1971. [5988]

WESSELY, KURT. Zur Bibliographie der Militärgrenze. Österr. Osth., Aug. 1971. [5989]

WILLIAMS, C. E. The Legacy of Empire: Aspects of Austrian Supranationalism. J. Eur. Stud., June 1971. [5990]

WÜRTLHLE, FRITZ. Franz Ferdinands letzter Befehl. Österreich Gesch. Lit., June 1971. [5991]

LIECHTENSTEIN

GEIGER, PETER. Geschichte des Fürstentums Liechtenstein von 1848-1866. Jb. Hist. Ver. Fürstentum Liechtenstein, LXX, 1970. [5992]

KÜNG, HERIBERT. Liechtenstein und der Aufstand Jürg Jenatschs gegen die Franzosen im Jahre 1637. Jb. Hist. Ver. Fürstentum Liechtenstein, LXX, 1970. [5993]

MERAN, JOSEF GRAF. Aloys Prinz Liechtenstein 1846-1920. Jb. Hist. Ver. Fürstentum Liechtenstein, LXX, 1970. [5994]

WANNER, GERHARD. Aspekte zur Liechtensteiner Wirtschafts- und Sozialgeschichte um 1800. Jb. Hist. Ver. Fürstentum Liechtenstein, LXX, 1970. [5995]

WILHELM, GUSTAV. Die Rüstkammer des Fürsten Johann Adam Andreas von Liechtenstein 1712. Jb. Hist. Ver. Fürstentum Liechtenstein, LXX, 1970. [5996]

SWITZERLAND

BERTHOUD, GABRIELLE. Un "aspect de la propagande" réformée: la publication de la lettre du Cordelier Jean Critin. R. hist. vaudoise, LXXIX, 1971. [5997]

BOLTHO, ANDREA. The Swiss Balance of Payments in the 1960s. OECD Ec. Outlook, July 1971. [5998]

BULLEN, ROGER. Guizot and the "Sonderbund" Crisis, 1846-1848. EHR, July 1971. [5999]

COMOLLI, ROBERTO BENIGNO. Origine e sviluppi del Monastero di Poschiavo. Boll. Stor. Svizzera Ital., June-Sept. 1971. [6000]

DESSEMONDET, OLIVIER. Un Recensement à Vufflen-le-Château en 1619. R. hist. vaudoise, LXXIX, 1971. [6001]

ELSENER, FERDINAND. Das "Staats-Lexikon" von Rotteck und Welcker als liberale Bibel in der Innenschweiz. Alemann. Jb., 1970. [6002]

GERN, PHILIPPE. Les échanges commerciaux entre la Suisse et la France au XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. Schweiz. Z. Gesch., no. 1-2, 1971. [6003]

GLAUSER, FRITZ. Handel mit Entlebucher Käse vom 16. bis zum 19. Jahrhundert. Schweiz. Z. Gesch., no. 1-2, 1971. [6004]

GRISLIS, EGIL. Calvin's Use of Cicero in the Institutes I: 1-5. Arch. Reformationsgesch., no. 1, 1971. [6005]

JACCARD, MONIQUE. La grève généralisée de mars 1907: Etude d'une tentative d'action directe révolutionnaire dans le canton de Vaud et à Genève. R. hist. vaudoise, LXXIX, 1971. [6006]

LACHENAR, LEON DUPONT. Jean-Jodoc de Quartéry (1608-1669), chanoine de Sion, abbé de Saint-Maurice. Vallesia, XXVI, 1971. [6007]

LEVINE, HERBERT S. The League of Nations Archives in Geneva. Central Eur. Hist., Dec. 1970. [6008]

MARTINOLA, GIUSEPPE. Il blocco della fame. Boll. Stor. Svizzera Ital., Sept. 1970. [6009]

MARTINOLA, GIUSEPPE. L'ingegnere Prospero Franchini (1774-1847). Boll. Stor. Svizzera Ital., June-Sept. 1971. [6010]

MENG, JOHANN ULRICH. Die thurgauische Herrschaft Oberaach der Familie von Salis-Soglio. Bündner Jb., XII, 1970. [6011]

MENG, JOHANN ULRICH. Die Zollbrücken über Landquart und Rhein. Bündner Jb., XII, 1970. [6012]

MEYLAN, HENRI. Farel et les Cordeliers de Grandson. R. hist. vaudoise, LXXIX, 1971. [6013]

MORREN, PIERRE. Frédéric-César Laharpe en Russie: Vingt-Deux lettres inédites. R. hist. vaudoise, LXXIX, 1971. [6014]

MÜTZENBERG, GABRIEL. La réforme du Collège de Genève à la fin du XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle ou l'ajournement perpétuel. Schweiz. Z. Gesch., no. 1-2, 1971. [6015]

PASCHKE, HANS. Die Benediktiner-Abtei Stein am Rhein, ein Ausstattungsgut des Bistums Bamberg. Ber. Hist. Ver. Bamberg, CVI, 1970. [6016]

PELICHET, EDGAR. Le Château de Grand Clos à Rennaz. R. hist. vaudoise, LXXIX, 1971. [6017]

RIBI, HILDE. Zschokke in Graubünden. Bündner Jb., XIII, 1971. [6018]

SCHARPLATZ, ALFRED. Die ersten Anfänge des Spitalwesens in Graubünden. Bündner Jb., XII, 1970. [6019]

WETTER, ERNST. Unsere Militäraviatik 1914 bis 1918. Allg. Schweiz. Militärz., Sept. 1971. [6020]

ITALY

Emiliana P. Noether, University of Connecticut

GENERAL

CECATTO, SILVIO. La cybernétique à la recherche de ses ancêtres: Jean-Baptiste Vico. J. World Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6021]

GARIN, EUGENIO. Hegel nella storia della filosofia italiana. Veltro, Feb. 1971. [6022]

JEMOLO, ARTURO CARLO. Sulla soglia del Vaticano. Nuova antol., Nov. 1971. [6023]

SANTONASTASO, GIUSEPPE. Tradizione e rinnovamento in Ferrero [1871-1942]. Nuova antol., June 1971. [6024]

ZANOTTO, SANDRO. I problemi di Venezia. Comunità, June 1971. [6025]

ITALY: RENAISSANCE TO 1715

BERTELLI, SERGIO. When Did Machiavelli Write Mandragola? Renaissance Q., Autumn 1971. [6026]

CAPPELLETTI, VINCENZO. Il miracolo scientifico del Rinascimento italiano. Veltro, June-Aug. 1971. [6027]

COMITO, TERRY. Renaissance Gardens and the Discovery of Paradise. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [6028]

FRANCHINI, RAFFAELLO. Giordano Bruno e l'ideale del filosofo. Settanta, Sept.-Oct. 1971. [6029]

KIBRE, PEARL. Dominicus de Ragusa, Bolognese Doctor of Arts and Medicine. Bull. Hist. Medicine, July-Aug. 1971. [6030]

LE MOLLÉ, ROLAND. La Ville idéale. A Propos de la publication des plans d'urbanisme de George Vasari le Jeune. Bibl. Humanisme Renaissance, no. 3, 1971. [6031]

MOORES, JOHN D. New Light on Diomedes Carafa and his "Perfect Loyalty" to Ferrante of Aragon. Ital. Stud., XXVI, 1971. [6032]

PIN, CORRADO. Consulti inediti di Paolo Sarpi sopra le immunità delle chiese. Pensiero pol., Aug. 1971. [6033]

RICHARDSON, BRIAN. Notes on Machiavelli's Sources. Ital. Stud., XXVI, 1971. [6034]

ROBERTSON, IAN. The Signoria of Girolamo Riario in Imola. Hist. Stud., Oct. 1971. [6035]

TENENTI, ALBERTO. "Civilità" e civiltà in Machiavelli. Pensiero pol., Aug. 1971. [6036]

VEGNI, ADRIANO; PASTORINO, SANTO; and FERROTTA, VIRGILIO. Le macchine da guerra nel Rinascimento e nascita delle artiglierie. R. mil., Oct. 1971. [6037]

VIVANTI, CORRADO. Una fonte dell'Istoria del concilio tridentino di Paolo Sarpi. R. stor. ital., Sept. 1971. [6038]

ITALY: 1715 TO 1870

BALDI, GUIDO M. Briganti e grassatori tra il 1849 ed il 1852. Osservatore pol. lett., Sept. 1971. [6039]

BETTI, FRANCO. Dante, the Jansenists and the Jesuits in XVIII and XIX Century Italian Literary Criticism. Ital. Q., Summer 1971. [6040]

COSTA, GUSTAVO. Lettere inedite di Giuseppe Baretti. Italica, Autumn 1971. [6041]

CROCE, ELENA. La conversazione di Gino Capponi. Settanta, July-Aug. 1971. [6042]

DAVICO, R. Populations marginales et développement industriel: l'exemple du Piémont à la fin du XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle et au début du XIX<sup>e</sup> siècle. Bull. Soc. Hist. mod., no. 1, 1971. [6043]

DI BENEDETTO, ARNALDO. Qualche ipotesi sui racconti storici di Niccolò Tommaseo. G. stor. lett. ital., no. 462-63, 1971. [6044]

FORESTA, GAETANO. Mazzini nella vita e nella poesia di Unamuno. Boll. Domus mazziniana, no. 1, 1971. [6045]

JORDAN, JAMES E. Matrimony and Machiavellianism: the Marriage of Prince Napoleon. Proc. Am. Phil. Soc., no. 4, 1971. [6046]

MANSERVISI, CLAUDIA. Il Contado di Lodi nel '700. Arch. stor. lodigiano, XVII, 1969. [6047]

MELZI D'ERIL, GIULIO. Una collezione milanese sotto il regno di Maria Teresa: la galleria Firmian. Bergomum, no. 1, 1971. [6048]

NAGARI, MARIO. Un cospiratore novarese del 1821. I costituti di Pietro Ponzani (Pt. I). Boll. stor. prov. Novara, Jan.-June 1971. [6049]

ROTONDI, CLEMENTINA. Il giornale fiorentino La Patria (1847-8). Rass. stor. toscana, Jan.-June 1971. [6050]

SABELLA, DOMENICO. Giacomo Racioppi, attraverso la corrispondenza con lo zio Abate Antonio [letters from 1846 to 1889]. Realtà Mezzogiorno, Aug.-Sept. 1971. [6051]

TEDESCHI, MARIO. Gli ideali giovanili di riforma ecclesiastica di Bettino Ricasoli. Rass. stor. toscana, Jan.-June 1971. [6052]

ZAGO, ALFREDO. Il Codice Napoleone e la sua contrasta applicazione nel Principato di Benevento (1806-8). Samnium, Jan.-June 1971. [6053]

ITALY: 1870 TO PRESENT

AGÓCS, SANDOR. Giolitti's Reform Program: An Exercise in Equilibrium Politics. PSQ, Dec. 1971. [6054]

ANTONICELLI, FRANCO. Gobetti e Prezzolini. Una ferita sempre aperta. Ponte, Oct. 1971. [6055]

ARE, GIUSEPPE. Pensiero economico e vita nazionale in Italia (1890-1922). Considerazioni preliminari (Pt. II). Stor. contemp., June 1971. [6056]

BADALONI, NICOLA. [Antonio] Labriola politico e filosofo. Crit. marxista, Mar.-Apr. 1971. [6057]

BERENGO, MARINO. Le origini del Lombardo-Veneto. R. stor. ital., Sept. 1971. [6058]

BORTOLOTTI, FRANCA PIERONI. La lotta del fronte operaio a Livorno contro il fascismo (1925-6). Movim. liberazione Ital., Apr.-June 1971. [6059]

CATALANO, PIERANGELO. Romolo Murri e l'idea di Roma (a proposito di Populus e "Stato"). Stud. Romani, Jan.-Mar. 1971. [6060]

COLAPIETRA, RAFFAELE. Gli scritti politici di Antonio Labriola. Nuovi Q. meridione, Jan.-Mar. 1971. [6061]

CORSI, ERMANNINO. L'ultimo De Gasperi. Nord Sud, Aug.-Sept. 1971. [6062]

COVERDALE, JOHN F. I primi volontari italiani nell'esercito di Franco. Stor. contemp., Sept. 1971. [6063]

DAMASCELLI, ESTER FANO. La "restaurazione antifascista liberista." Ristagno e sviluppo economico durante il fascismo. Movim. liberazione Ital., July-Sept. 1971. [6064]

DEGANI, GIANNINO. Le violenze fasciste in provincia di Reggio Emilia. Ric. stor., July 1971. [6065]

DE GRAND, ALEXANDER J. The Italian Nationalist Association in the Period of Italian Neutrality, August 1914-May 1915. J. Mod. Hist., Sept. 1971. [6066]

DE LUNA, GIOVANNI. Il partito d'azione e la svolta di Salerno. Movim. liberazione Ital., July-Sept. 1971. [6067]

FALDELLA, EMILIO. Giuseppe Garibaldi in Francia, 1870-1. Risorgimento (Italy), Feb.-July 1971. [6068]

FERRI, RENATO. Le agitazioni siciliane del 1893-4 nella pubblicista dell'epoca (Pt. I). Nuovi Q. meridione, Jan.-Mar. 1971. [6069]

FORNARI, LUISA. I periodici fascisti a Firenze: tendenze e contrasti del primo fascismo fiorentino (1919-22). Rass. stor. toscana, Jan.-June 1971. [6070]

FRIED, ROBERT C. Communism, Urban Budgets, and the Two Italies: A Case Study in Comparative Urban Government. J. Pol., Nov. 1971. [6071]

FUNKE, MANFRED. Le relazioni italo-tedesche al momento del conflitto etiopico e delle sanzioni della Società delle Nazioni. Stor. contemp., Sept. 1971. [6072]

GENTILE, EMILIO. La generazione de La Voce. Osservatore pol. lett., Sept. 1971. [6073]

GENTILE, EMILIO. La Voce e l'età giolittiana. Stor. contemp., June 1971. [6074]

GIANOTTI, RENZO. Lotte e organizzazione di classe alla Fiat nel dopoguerra [post 1945]. Crit. marxista, May-June 1971. [6075]

IGNESTI, GIUSEPPE. Il partito conservatore nazionale (1878-9). Civitas, July-Aug. 1971. [6076]

ISNENGHI, MARIO. Il radioso maggio [1936] africano del Corriere della sera. Movim. liberazione Ital., July-Sept. 1971. [6077]

LANARO, SILVIO. Appunti sul fascismo "di sinistra." La dottrina corporativa di Ugo Spirito. Belfagor, Sept. 1971. [6078]

LEDEEN, MICHAEL A. Fascism and the Generation Gap. Eur. Stud. R., no. 3, 1971. [6079]

LEVRERO, SILVANO. A proposito di Bordiga. Un'occasione mancata. Crit. marxista, May-June 1971. [6080]

LICATA, GLAUCO. L'esordio di Albertini. Nuova antol., Oct. 1971. [6081]

MACERA, GUIDO. Giustino Fortunato come scrittore. Realtà Mezzogiorno, Aug.-Sept. 1971. [6082]

MOUTON-BRADY, JEAN. Un francese a Roma: l'ambasciatore Barrère. Veltro, June-Aug. 1971. [6083]

ODDO, FRANCESCO LUIGI. Il pensiero e l'opera politica di Giovanni Giolitti (Pt. III). Nuovi Q. meridione, Apr.-June 1971. [6084]

ORMOS, MARIA. L'opinione del conte Stefano Bethlen sui rapporti italo-ungheresi (1927-31). Stor. contemp., June 1971. [6085]

PAJETTA, GIULIANO. Lezioni politiche della guerra di Spagna. Crit. marxista, May-June 1971. [6086]

PANKHURST, RICHARD. Italian Fascist Claims to the Port of Jibuti, 1935-41: A Historical Note. Ethiopia Observer, no. 1, 1971. [6087]

PELLEGRINO, MARA. Il socialismo reggiano dal 1914 al 1918 (Pt. II). Ric. stor., July 1971. [6088]

PELLICANI, ANTONIO. Nitti e la questione meridionale. Realtà Mezzogiorno, Aug.-Sept. 1971. [6089]

POMA, ANELLO, and PERONA, GIANNI. L'antifascismo biellese dal 1926 all'inizio della resistenza armata. Movim. liberazione Ital., Apr.-June 1971. [6090]

PREZZOLINI, GIUSEPPE. Su un inedito di Piero Gobetti. Nuova antol., May 1971. [6091]

RAMAT, SILVIO. Crisi e coscienza critica a Firenze (1938-58). Forum ital., Sept. 1971. [6092]

RENZI, WILLIAM A. Mussolini's Sources of Financial Support, 1914-1915. History, June 1971. [6093]

ROSA, LUIGI DE. La rivoluzione industriale in Italia. Rass. ec., Jan.-Feb. 1971. [6094]

SPADOLINI, GIOVANNI. Il cardinale Gasparri e la questione romana. Nuova antol., Oct. 1971. [6095]

SPADOLINI, GIOVANNI. Da Gobetti a Prezzolini. Nuova antol., Aug. 1971. [6096]

SPADOLINI, GIOVANNI. Intransigenza e conciliazione dall'Italia Crispina ai Patti Lateranesi. Nuova antol., May 1971. [6097]

TORRI, ALBERTO PAOLO. Indagine sulle finanze del comune di Roma. Stud. Romani, July–Sept. 1971. [6098]

TOSI, LUCIANO. Romeo A. Gallenga Stuart e la propaganda di guerra all'estero (1917–8). Stor. contemp., Sept. 1971. [6099]

WOODCOCK, GEORGE. Italy's New Regions. Politico, Mar. 1971. [6100]

ITALY: BIBLIOGRAPHY AND SOURCES

BIZZONI, ACHILLE. The Battle of Adowa of 1896: a Contemporary Italian View. Ethiopia Observer, no. 2, 1971. [6101]

BUSINO, GIOVANNI. Quindici lettere di Vilfredo Pareto a Arcangelo Ghisleri [1896–1922]. Boll. domus mazziniana, no. 1, 1971. [6102]

CANNISTRARO, PHILIP V. Il fascismo italiano visto dagli Stati Uniti: cinquant'anni di studi e di interpretazioni. Stor. contemp., Sept. 1971. [6103]

CORTESE, NINO. L'Abela e la carboneria siciliana nel 1819. Nuovi Q. meridione, Apr.–June 1971. [6104]

Dieci lettere inedite di Antonio Labriola ad Alessandro D'Ancona [1885–97]. Crit. marxista, Mar.–Apr. 1971. [6105]

JANNAZZO, ANTONIO. Populismo e storiografia. Mulino, July–Aug. 1971. [6106]

KOENIG, DUANE. Archival Research in Italy. Mil. Aff., Feb. 1971. [6107]

REINERMAN, ALAN J. The Napoleonic Suppression of Italian Religious Orders and Sale of Their Property: Studies Since 1960. Cath. Hist. R., July 1971. [6108]

WRIGHT, A. D. Libraries and Archives. Italy and the Vatican. History, Feb. 1971. [6109]

EASTERN EUROPE

Charles Morley and Carole Rogel, Ohio State University

GENERAL

BATOWSKI, HENRYK. Diplomatic Events in East-Central Europe in 1944. E. Eur. Q., Sept. 1971. [6110]

BEŠEVILIEV, BOJAN. Wirtschaftskarte des europäischen Teils vom Osmanischen Imperium im 18. Jahrhundert. Et. balkaniques, no. 2, 1971. [6111]

CVETKOVA, BISTRA A. Changements dans le féodalisme ottoman dans les terres balkaniques aux XVI<sup>e</sup>–XVII<sup>e</sup> siècles [in Bulgarian]. Ist. Pregled, no. 4, 1971. [6112]

EPSTEIN, FRITZ T. Neue Literatur zur Geschichte der Ostpolitik im Ersten Weltkrieg. Jb. Gesch. Osteuropas, no. 2, 1971. [6113]

KARCZ, JERZY F. Reflections on the Economics of Nationalism and Communism in Eastern Europe. E. Eur. Q., June 1971. [6114]

KÖYMEN, OYA. The Advent and Consequences of Free Trade in the Ottoman Empire. Et. balkaniques, no. 2, 1971. [6115]

KOSINSKI, L. A. Population Censuses in East-Central Europe in the Twentieth Century. E. Eur. Q., Sept. 1971. [6116]

KRIZMAN, BOGDAN. Austro-Hungarian Diplomatic Activity on the Eve of the Collapse of the Monarchy, Autumn 1918. E. Eur. Q., Mar. 1971. [6117]

LITAVRIN, G. G. Les terres à l'abandon selon le "Traité fiscal" de X<sup>e</sup> s. et leur importance pour le fisc. Et. balkaniques, no. 3, 1971. [6118]

REMAK, JOACHIM. The Third Balkan War: Origins Reconsidered. J. Mod. Hist., Sept. 1971. [6119]

SUGAR, PETER A. The Ottoman "Professional Prisoner" on the Western Borders of the Empire in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. Et. balkaniques, no. 2, 1971. [6120]

VAGO, B. Le Second Diktat de Vienne: Le Partage de la Transylvanie. E. Eur. Q., Mar. 1971. [6121]

BALTIC STATES

EZERGAILIS, ANDREW. The Latvian Liberals and the Federative Tradition During the 1917 Revolution. Lituanus, no. 3, 1971. [6122]

RODGERS, HUGH I. Latvia's Quest for an "Eastern Locarno," 1925–1927. E. Eur. Q., Mar. 1971. [6123]

ROGAINIS, JANIS. The Emergence of an Authoritarian Regime in Latvia, 1932–1934. Lituanus, no. 3, 1971. [6124]

BULGARIA

ANDREEV, IORDAN. Les réunions populaires dans la vie politique du Premier royaume bulgare [in Bulgarian]. Ist. Pregled, no. 4, 1971. [6125]

BEŠEVILIEV, VESELIN. Die Feldzug des Kaisers Konstantin V. gegen die Bulgaren. Et. balkaniques, no. 3, 1971. [6126]

BOŽINOV, BOIN. Le rôle du gymnase de Salonique "Cyrille et Méthode" dans la vie socio-politique de la population bulgare (1880–1913) [in Bulgarian]. Ist. Pregled, no. 4, 1971. [6127]

DAMJANOV, SIMEON. La France et la Bulgarie à l'époque des Guerres balkaniques (1912–1913). Et. balkaniques, no. 2, 1971. [6128]

DIMITROV, I. La mort du roi Boris III. R. Hist. deux. guerre mond., July 1971. [6129]

KONSTANTINOV, ALEKO (tr. Francis Salter). Bai Ganiu: The Incredible Tales of a Contemporary Bulgarian. Can. Slavic Stud., Winter 1970. [6130]

KOSEV, D. G. S. Rakovski et la politique extérieure du mouvement bulgare de libération nationale [in Bulgarian]. Ist. Pregled, no. 4, 1971. [6131]

KUZEV, ALEXANDER. Die Beziehung des Königs von Vidin Ivan Sracimir zu den Osmanischen Herrschern. Et. balkaniques, no. 3, 1971. [6132]

MAKEDONSKI, STOJAN. L'Exarchat bulgare et l'enseignement scolaire en Macédoine (1870-1912). Et. balkaniques, no. 2, 1971. [6133]

MIČEVA, ZDRAVKA. Le Pacte balkanique et les relations bulgare-yougoslaves (1933-1934) [in Bulgarian]. Ist. Pregled, no. 4, 1971. [6134]

PUNDEFF, MARIN. Marxism in Bulgaria Before 1891. Slavic R., Sept. 1971. [6135]

ROBBINS, KEITH. British Diplomacy in Bulgaria 1914-1915. Slavonic E. Eur. R., Oct. 1971. [6136]

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

ANDERLE, JOSEF. Major Contributions of Czechs and Slovaks to Austrian and Hungarian History 1918-1945. Austrian Hist. Yrbk., VI-VII, 1970-1971. [6137]

BACHMANN, HARALD. Sozialstruktur und Parteientwicklung im nordwestböhmisches Kohlenrevier vor dem Zusammenbruch der Monarchie. Bohemia, 10, 1969. [6138]

BĚLOHLÁVEK, MILOSLAV. Contribution à la connaissance des conditions de vie de la population dans la première moitié du 19<sup>ème</sup> siècle dans la ville de Starý Plzeňec [in Czech]. Hist. Demog., no. 4, 1970. [6139]

BOROS, FERENC. Les rapports tchécoslovaques-hongrois à l'époque de la crise révolutionnaire [in Czech]. Českoslov. Časopis Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6140]

ČÁNOVÁ, ELIŠKA. Les sources pour la statistique démographique aux archives de l'archevêché de Prague [in Czech]. Hist. Demog., no. 4, 1970. [6141]

FISCHER, KARL. Die Uhrmacher in der Slowakei. Bohemia, 10, 1969. [6142]

GRAUS, FRANTIŠEK. Die Entwicklung der Legenden der sogenannten Slavenapostel Konstantin und Method in Böhmen und Mähren. Jb. Gesch. Osteuropas, no. 2, 1971. [6143]

HLAVÁČEK, IVAN. Des travaux diplomatiques au bas moyen-âge [in Czech]. Českoslov. Časopis Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6144]

JANČAR, BARBARA. The Great Purges and "The Prague Spring." Orbis, Summer 1971. [6145]

JELINEK, YESHAYAHU. Storm-troopers in Slovakia: the Rodobrana and the Hlinka Guard. J. Contemp. Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6146]

KŘIVKA, JOSEF. L'importance des listes nominatives dressées par les domaines seigneuriaux pour les recherches de démographie historique [in Czech]. Hist. Demog., no. 4, 1970. [6147]

MATĚJČEK, JIŘÍ. La particularité de l'évolution démographique dans les zones périphériques des régions industrielles dans les années 1880-1914 [in Czech]. Hist. Demog., no. 4, 1970. [6148]

PALECEK, ANTHONY. The Rise and Fall of the Czechoslovak Agrarian Party. E. Eur. Q., June 1971. [6149]

ROZSÍVALOVÁ, EVA. Santé publique de la ville de Prague dans les années 20 du 18<sup>ème</sup> siècle [in Czech]. Hist. Demog., no. 4, 1970. [6150]

SIEBER, SIEGFRIED. Von böhmischen Blaufarbenwerken. Bohemia, 10, 1969. [6151]

SIMEČEK, ZDENĚK. Conditions des serfs dans les régions de l'extrême Sud de la Bohême à l'époque pre-hussite [in Czech]. Českoslov. Časopis Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6152]

ŠPIESZ, ANTON. Les travaux sur l'évolution de la population à l'époque du bas féodalisme en Slovaquie dans les années 1967-1970 [in Czech]. Hist. Demog., no. 4, 1970. [6153]

TŘEŠTÍK, DUŠAN. La structure sociale de la Bohême des Přemyslides [in Czech; Fr. summary]. Českoslov. Časopis Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6154]

VOJTÍŠKOVÁ, MARIE. Les archives paroissiales et les recherches de démographie historique [in Czech]. Hist. Demog., no. 4, 1970. [6155]

ZACEK, JOSEPH F. Palacký's Politics: The Second Phase. Can. Slavic Stud., Spring 1971. [6156]

GREECE

ASDRACHA, CATHERINE. Formes de brigandage pendant la deuxième guerre civile byzantine au XIV<sup>e</sup> siècle. Et. balkaniques, no. 3, 1971. [6157]

HANSEN-LÖVE, A. A. Die Darstellung der Schlacht bei Adrianopel (1205) in der "Chronik von Morea." Et. balkaniques, no. 3, 1971. [6158]

HUNGARY

GATI, CHARLES. Modernization and Communist Power in Hungary. E. Eur. Q., Sept. 1971. [6159]

JANOS, ANDREW C. Nationalism and Communism in Hungary. E. Eur. Q., Mar. 1971. [6160]

MCCAGG, WILLIAM O., JR. Ennoblement in Dualistic Hungary. E. Eur. Q., Mar. 1971. [6161]

NAGY, ZSUZSA L. The Hungarian Liberal Opposition, 1919-1945. E. Eur. Q., June 1971. [6162]

POLAND

AJZNER, SEWERYN. Pilsudski-ite Trade Unions in the Years 1926-1930 [in Polish; Fr. summary]. Kwartalnik Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6163]

BROŻEK, A., and SUCHOŃSKI, A. The History of the Western Territories in Required Polish History Textbooks [in Polish]. Przegląd Zachodni, no. 3, 1971. [6164]

CIEPLAK, TADEUSZ. Church and State in People's Poland. Polish Am. Stud., Autumn 1969. [6165]

CZUBIŃSKI, A. The Role of Great Poland in the Development of the Polish National Liberation Movement in Silesia, 1918-1921 [in Polish]. Przegląd Zachodni, no. 3, 1971. [6166]

DAVIES, NORMAN. Lloyd George and Poland, 1919-1920. J. Contemp. Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6167]

DZIEWANOWSKI, M. K. Czartoryski and His Essai sur la diplomatie. Slavic R., Sept. 1971. [6168]

FLORKOWSKA, HALINA. The Galician Press and its Attitude toward the Land Question in 1848 [in Polish; Eng. summary]. Prace Hist., no. 30, 1970. [6169]

GÓRALSKI, ZBIGNIEW. Die Grenzdemarkationen in Polen nach der dritten Teilung (1795-1797). Jb. Gesch. Osteuropas, no. 2, 1971. [6170]

GROSFELD, LEON. The German Legation in Warsaw and the Polish-Soviet War of 1920 [in Polish]. Kwartalnik Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6171]

HAUSER, P., and KOTŁOWSKI, T. General S. Szeptycki and the Third Silesian Uprising [in Polish]. Przegląd Zachodni, no. 3, 1971. [6172]

HOMECKI, ADAM. The Prebends of the Chapter of All Saints Collegiate Church in Cracow as Materials for the Historical Study of the Salaries of the Professors of Cracow University [in Polish; Eng. summary]. Prace Hist., no. 35, 1971. [6173]

KANIEWSKA, IRENA. The State of Research into the Polish Parliamentary System in 1506-1572 [in Polish; Eng. summary]. Prace Hist., no. 35, 1971. [6174]

KRAGH, ERIK. Rigafreden 1921 [The Peace of Riga in 1921]. Mil. tids., May 1971. [6175]

LABUDA, GERARD. Polish Chronicle Writing during the Middle Ages [in Polish; Fr. summary]. Kwartalnik Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6176]

MICHALEWICZ, JERZY, and MICHALEWICZ, MARIA. The Cracow Collegiate Church Accounts as Materials for the History of the Endowment of the University of Cracow [in Polish; Eng. summary]. Prace Hist., no. 35, 1971. [6177]

MICHALEWICZ, MARIA. Quaestio oeconomica. An Unknown Memorial of 1647 on the Economic Questions of the University of Cracow, and its Author [in Polish; Eng. summary]. Prace Hist., no. 30, 1970. [6178]

MORLEY, CHARLES. Czartoryski as a Polish Statesman. Slavic R., Sept. 1971. [6179]

PIERADZKA, KRYSZYNA. Charles Knutsson's Account of his Stay in Prussia in the Years 1457-1464 [in Polish; Eng. summary]. Prace Hist., no. 35, 1971. [6180]

PRZYBYLSKI, HENRYK. The Political Centre and the 1935 Constitution and Parliamentary Elections [in Polish; Eng. summary]. Kwartalnik Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6181]

ROSENTHAL, HARRY K. Germans and Poles in 1890: Possibilities for a New Course. E. Eur. Q., Sept. 1971. [6182]

SFERUDA, STANISŁAW. Secret Educational Activity in the District of Kraśnik, 1939-1944 [in Polish; Russian summary]. Kwartalnik Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6183]

STANKIEWICZ, ZBIGNIEW. Class Conflicts on State Domains of the Kingdom of Poland, 1815-1864 [in Polish; Fr. summary]. Kwartalnik Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6184]

SZUSZKIEWICZ, Z. The Popularizing and Propaganda Activity of the East European Institute in Breslau, 1918-1944 [in Polish]. Przegląd Zachodni, no. 3, 1971. [6185]

ULATOWSKA, MAŁGORZATA. The Economic Records and Account Books of the Royal Principal School and their Value for the Study of the Economic Problems of Cracow University at the Time of the Commission for National Education [in Polish; Eng. summary]. Prace Hist., no. 35, 1971. [6186]

WIERZBICKI, ANDRZEJ. Concerning the Book The Spirit of Polish History [in Polish; Russian summary]. Kwartalnik Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6187]

WYROZUMSKI, JERZY. The Beguines and Beghards in Poland [in Polish; Eng. summary]. Prace Hist., no. 35, 1971. [6188]

ZDRADA, JERZY. Jarosław Dąbrowski in the Paris Commune [in Polish; Fr. summary]. Kwartalnik Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6189]

ROMANIA

BODEA, CORNELIA. A Portrait and Fresco From the History of the Romanian People—N. Bălcescu. E. Eur. Q., June 1971. [6190]

FLORESCU, RADU. Nicholas Bălcescu: A Forgotten Diplomat. E. Eur. Q., June 1971. [6191]

HOISINGTON, WILLIAM A., JR. The Struggle for Economic Influence in Southeastern Europe: The French Failure in Romania, 1940. J. Mod. Hist., Sept. 1971. [6192]

KROSS, B. B. The Main Reasons of Romania's Withdrawal from the Triple Alliance on the Eve of the First World War [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vopr. Ist., no. 10, 1971. [6193]

YUGOSLAVIA

CARTER, F. W. The Commerce of the Dubrovnik Republic, 1500-1700. Ec. Hist. R., Aug. 1971. [6194]

HARRIMAN, HELGA H. Slovenia as an Outpost of the Third Reich. E. Eur. Q., June 1971. [6195]

KADIĆ, ANTE. Strossmayer and the Bulgarians. E. Eur. Q., June 1971. [6196]

MARINOVIĆ, ANTE. Etude sur la législation maritime de la République de Dubrovnik. Et. balkaniques, no. 3, 1971. [6197]

Notes on Nonalignment & Yugoslavia. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6198]

SOVIET UNION

Robert V. Allen, Library of Congress

RUSSIA TO 1917

ABRAMSKY, CHIMEN. The Jewish Labour Movement [in Russia]: Some Historiographical Problems. Soviet Jewish Aff., June 1971. [6199]

CHLENOV, A. M. The Six Gods of Prince Vladimir [in Ukrainian]. Ukrains'kyi ist. zhurn., nos. 8-9, 1971. [6200]

DOROSHENKO, V. V. On the Problem of the Market Production of Corvée Estates in Livland in the Eighteenth Century [in Russian]. Ist. SSSR, no. 5, 1971. [6201]

FERRO, MARC. The Russian Soldier in 1917: Undisciplined, Patriotic, and Revolutionary. Slavic R., Sept. 1971. [6202]

GOLIKOV, A. G. The Formation of the "Kolomna-Sormovo" Monopolistic Unit [in Russian]. Vest. Mosk. U.; Ist., no. 5, 1971. [6203]

- IL'INA, T. V. On the Novgorod School of Book Illustration of the Fifteenth Century (from the Materials of the Sofia Library in the State [Saltykov-Shchedrin] Public Library) [in Russian]. Vest. Leningrad U.; Ist., Iaz., Lit., no. 20, 1971. [6204]
- KELLENBENZ, HERMANN. Marchands en Russie aux XVII<sup>e</sup> et XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècles. Cah. monde russe soviétique, Oct.-Dec. 1970, Jan.-June 1971. [6205]
- KHOROSHEV, A. S. On the History of the Struggle of Novgorod against Moscow (Local Canonization of Saints in the 1430's and '40's) [in Russian]. Vest. Mosk. U.; Ist., no. 6, 1971. [6206]
- KORELIN, A. P. The Russian Gentry and its Class Organization (1861-1904) [in Russian]. Ist. SSSR, no. 5, 1971. [6207]
- MEEHAN-WATERS, BRENDA. The Muscovite Noble Origins of the Russians in the Generalitet of 1730. Cah. monde russe soviétique, Jan.-June 1971. [6208]
- PANUKHINA, N. B. "The Trial of the Fifty" as an Act of Revolutionary Struggle [in Russian]. Ist. SSSR, no. 5, 1971. [6209]
- PETHYBRIDGE, R. W. British Imperialists in the Russian Empire. Russian R., Oct. 1971. [6210]
- SENCHAKOVA, L. T. Secret Social-Democratic Printing Plants (1901-1904) [in Russian]. Ist. SSSR, no. 5, 1971. [6211]
- SHANIN, TEODOR. Socio-economic Mobility and the Rural History of Russia, 1905-1930. Soviet Stud., Oct. 1971. [6212]
- SHCHAPOV, IA. N. The Ustav of Prince Iaroslav and the Problem of the Attitude to the Byzantine Heritage in Rus' of the Mid-Eleventh Century [in Russian]. Vizantiiskii vrem., no. 31, 1971. [6213]
- ZAIONCHKOVSKII, P. The Russian Officer Corps at the Turn of the Century (1881-1903) [in Russian]. Voenno-ist. zhurn., no. 8, 1971. [6214]
- MALYSHEV, M. O. The Preparation for the Defeat of the German Occupiers near Petrograd and the Beginning of the Liberation of the Baltic Regions in the Fall of 1918 [in Russian]. Vest. Leningrad U.; Ist., Iaz., Lit., no. 14, 1971. [6222]
- NADTOGHEEV, V. D. From the History of the Struggle with the Trotskyite-Zinov'evite Opposition in the Moscow Party Organization [in Russian]. Vopr. Ist. KPSS, no. 11, 1971. [6223]
- PODBOLOTOV, P. A. The Struggle of the Russian Communist Party (Bolshevik) with the Counter-Revolutionary Ideology of Menshevism, 1923-1925 [in Russian]. Vest. Leningrad U.; Ist., Iaz., Lit., no. 20, 1971. [6224]
- POGOREL'SKII, I. V. V. I. Lenin and the Khorezm Peoples Soviet Republic [in Russian]. Vest. Leningrad U.; Ist., Iaz., Lit., no. 20, 1971. [6225]
- PYKHA, D. D. Komandarm I. E. Iakir (on the 75th Anniversary of his Birth) [in Ukrainian]. Ukrains'kyi ist. zhurn., no. 8, 1971. [6226]
- ROGALINA, N. L. The Tax Policy of the Soviet State in Relation to the Rural Bourgeoisie Before Complete Collectivization (1926-1929) [in Russian]. Vest. Mosk. U.; Ist., no. 5, 1971. [6227]
- SHARLAI, G. M. The Growth in the Number of Party Cells in 1927-1932 [in Ukrainian]. Ukrains'kyi ist. zhurn., no. 8, 1971. [6228]
- SHYSH, A. Z. The Failure of Catholic Action in the Western Ukrainian Lands [in Ukrainian]. Ukrains'kyi ist. zhurn., no. 9, 1971. [6229]
- SNOW, RUSSELL E. The Russian Revolution of 1917-18 in Transbaikalia. Soviet Stud., Oct. 1971. [6230]
- TUROV, N. The Fall of Rostov [1942; in Russian]. Novyi zhurn., no. 105, 1971. [6231]

RUSSIA AND THE SOVIET UNION: HISTORIOGRAPHY AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

- BEN-SHLOMO, ZEEV. The Khrushchev Apocrypha. Soviet Jewish Aff., June 1971. [6232]
- BUGAEV, E. I. Once More "On the Question of the So-called Social-Revolutionary-Menshevik Concept of the Proletarian Revolution" [in Russian]. Vest. Mosk. U.; Ist., no. 5, 1971. [6233]
- KINIAPINA, N. S. Some Problems of the Foreign Policy of Russia in the New Publication of Documents of the Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs [in Russian]. Ist. SSSR, no. 5, 1971. [6234]
- KOVAL'CHENKO, I. D., and SELUNSKAIA, N. B. American Historians on the Russian Peasantry of the Nineteenth Century [in Russian]. Ist. SSSR, no. 5, 1971. [6235]
- MAVRODIN, V. V., and FROIANOV, I. IA. Ancient Rus' in the Works of Soviet Historians between the Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Congresses of the CPSU [in Russian]. Vest. Leningrad U.; Ist., Iaz., Lit., no. 14, 1971. [6236]
- MISHAKOV, V. P., and IASTREBOV, L. B. Falsification of the Problems of the NEP in West German Bourgeois Historiography [in Russian]. Vopr. Ist. KPSS, no. 11, 1971. [6237]
- SEMENOV, L. S. Anglo-Russian Economic Relations of the Mid-Nineteenth Century in Soviet Historiography [in Russian]. Vest. Leningrad U.; Ist., Iaz., Lit., no. 14, 1971. [6238]
- RUSSIA AND THE SOVIET UNION SINCE 1917
- CHEMERISSKII, I. A. The Communist Party—Organizer of the Struggle against Famine (1921-1923) [in Russian]. Vopr. Ist. KPSS, no. 11, 1971. [6215]
- CHERNEV, A. D. Accountability and Reporting in the Russian Communist Party (Bolshevik) between the Seventh and Eighth Party Congresses [in Russian]. Vest. Mosk. U.; Ist., no. 5, 1971. [6216]
- CHUMAK, O. F. On the Liquidation of the Survivals of the "Pale of Settlement" in the 1920's [in Ukrainian]. Ukrains'kyi ist. zhurn., no. 8, 1971. [6217]
- DAROTCHETCHE, B. Mykola Skrypnyk et la politique d'ukrainisation. Cah. monde russe soviétique, Jan.-June 1971. [6218]
- FITZPATRICK, SHEILA. The Emergence of Glaviskusstvo. Class War on the Cultural Front, Moscow, 1928-29. Soviet Stud., Oct. 1971. [6219]
- GVOZDEV, B. I. Changes in the Structure of the Working Class in the USSR in the First Post-war Years (1945-1948) [in Russian]. Vest. Mosk. U.; Ist., no. 5, 1971. [6220]
- LVAVI, JACOB. Jewish Agricultural Settlement in the USSR. Soviet Jewish Aff., June 1971. [6221]

SHILKO, A. E. The Historical Views of N. A. Polevoi [1796-1846; in Russian]. Ist. SSSR, no. 5, 1971. [6239]

VDOVIN, A. I., and DROBIZHEV, V. Z. Social Psychology and Some Problems of the History of Soviet Society [in Russian]. Ist. SSSR, no. 5, 1971. [6240]

VITTENBERG, E. IA. Problems of Social Changes in the USSR in Recent Bourgeois Historiography [in Russian]. Ist. SSSR, no. 5, 1971. [6241]

ZAK, L. M. Contemporary Soviet Historiography of the Problems of National-Cultural Construction [in Russian]. Ist. SSSR, no. 5, 1971. [6242]

NEAR EAST

Sidney Glazer, Washington, D.C.

NEAR EAST: MEDIEVAL

BARBOUR, N. Arabs and Norsemen. Asian Aff., July 1971. [6243]

BONNENFANT, P. Béja, de la conquête musulmane à 1881. IBLA, no. 127, 1971. [6244]

BOURNATIAN, GEORGE. The Armenian Community of Isfahan in the Seventeenth Century. Armenian R., Winter 1971. [6245]

COHEN, C. Notes pour une histoire de l'agriculture dans les pays musulman médiévaux. J. Ec. Soc. Hist. Orient, Apr. 1971. [6246]

FORAND, P. The Status of the Land and Inhabitants of the Sawād during the First Two Centuries of Islam. J. Ec. Soc. Hist. Orient, Apr. 1971. [6247]

GIL, MOSHE. Maintenance, Building Operations, and Repairs in the Houses of the Qodesh in Fustat. J. Ec. Soc. Hist. Orient, Aug. 1971. [6248]

HAMIDULLAH, M. Administration of Justice Under the Early Caliphate. J. Pakistan Hist. Soc., Jan. 1971. [6249]

HASAN, S. A Survey of the Expansion of Islam into Central Asia During the Umayyad Caliphate. Islamic Cult., Apr. 1971. [6250]

HINDS, MARTIN. Kūfan Political Alignments and Their Background in the Mid-Seventh Century A.D. Int. J. Mid. E. Stud., Oct. 1971. [6251]

KAFÉ, E. Le mythe Turc et son déclin dans les relations de voyage des Européens de la Renaissance. Oriens, no. 21-22, 1968-69. [6252]

KHAN, M. Miskawayh and the Buwayhids. Oriens, no. 21-22, 1968-69. [6253]

MAGNARELLA, P., and MAGNARELLA, ELGAR. A View of Social Classes in the Eleventh Century Karakhanid State. Anthropos, no. 66, 1971. [6254]

MEEKER, MICHAEL. The Black Sea Turks: Some Aspects of Their Ethnic and Cultural Background. Int. J. Mid. E. Stud., Oct. 1971. [6255]

MOTZKIN, A. A Thirteenth Century Jewish Teacher in Cairo. J. Jewish Stud., nos. 1-4, 1970. [6256]

PAREDES, L. New Light on the Military Campaigns of Almanzor. Islamic Q., July 1970. [6257]

PELLAT, CHARLES. Peut-on connaître le taux de natalité au temps du Prophète. J. Ec. Soc. Hist. Orient, Aug. 1971. [6258]

PIKE, RUTH. An Urban Minority: the Moriscos of Seville. Int. J. Mid. E. Stud., Oct. 1971. [6259]

SKLADANEK, B. Settlements in Gharchistan During the Early Islamic Period. Rocz. Orient., no. 4, 1971. [6260]

SMILYANSKAYA, I. Systems of Land Ownership and Social Stratification in the Near East (Late Medieval Period) [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Narodi Azii Afrik., no. 1, 1971. [6261]

VESELY, R. Trois certificats délivrés pour les fondations pieuses en Egypte au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle. Oriens, no. 21-22, 1968-69. [6262]

WILLIAMS, D. Imperial Russian Rule in Turkestan. Asian Aff., July 1971. [6263]

ZARTMAN, I. WILLIAM; PAUL, JAMES A.; and ENTELIS, JOHN P. An Economic Indicator of Socio-Political Unrest. Int. J. Mid. E. Stud., Oct. 1971. [6264]

NEAR EAST: MODERN

ABIR, M. The 'Arab Rebellion' of Amīr Ghālib of Mecca (1788-1813). Mid. E. Stud., May 1971. [6265]

AUDA, A. Pan-Africanism in Egyptian National Culture. Egypte Contemp., Jan. 1971. [6266]

BAKHASH, S. The Evolution of Qajar Bureaucracy: 1779-1879. Mid. E. Stud., May 1971. [6267]

BITAR, S. The Rise and Decline of the Baath. Mid. E. Int., June 1971. [6268]

BOONE, NANCY W. An American Opinion of the Arab-Israeli Conflict [essay]. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6269]

CARRE, O. La Ligue des Etats arabes. R. fr. Sci. pol., Apr. 1971. [6270]

CLEVELAND, RAY L. Palestine Is Their Home: The Predicament of the Refugees from Israel. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6271]

DEMEERSEMAN, A. Une Mission tunisienne en France dans la première moitié du XIX<sup>e</sup> siècle. IBLA, no. 127, 1971. [6272]

DONABEDIAN, K. The Eastern Question and the Armenian Case. Armenian R., Summer 1971. [6273]

EDMONDS, C. The Kurdish National Struggle in Iraq. Asian Aff., June 1971. [6274]

EINBECK, E. Moskaus Militärhilfe an die dritte Welt. Aussenpolitik, May 1971. [6275]

FORSYTHE, DAVID P. The Soviets and the Arab-Israeli Conflict. World Aff., Fall 1971. [6276]

GÖKMEN, O. Turkish-German Relations. Dis Politika, Mar. 1971. [6277]

- HAZARD, J. The Residue of Marxist Influence in Algeria. Columbia J. Transnat. Law, no. 2, 1970. [6278]
- HEIFETZ, A. Fifty Years of the First Treaties Between the USSR and Iran, Afghanistan, and Turkey, 1921 [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Narodi Azii Afrik., no. 1, 1971. [6279]
- HOVANNISIAN, R. The Armeno-Azerbaijani Conflict over Mountainous Karabagh, 1918-1919. Armenian R., Summer 1971. [6280]
- HOWARD, HARRY N. Jordan in Turmoil. Current Hist., Jan. 1972. [6281]
- LEMERCIER-QUELQUEJAY, C. Les Relations entre la Porte ottomane et les Cosaques Zaporogues au milieu du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle. Cah. monde russe soviétique, July-Sept. 1970. [6282]
- MEDLICOTT, W. The Near Eastern Crisis of 1875-1878 Reconsidered. Mid. E. Stud., Jan. 1971. [6283]
- MESSARA, A. Les propositions de réforme électorale au Liban (1963-1968): essai de synthèse. R. libanaise sci. pol., Jan.-June 1970. [6284]
- MESSERI, MICHAEL. The Egyptian Labour Movement in the Political Arena, 1919-1936. Part II: the Labour Organization, the Parties and the Government, 1924-1934 [in Hebrew; Eng. summary]. Hamizrah Hehadash, no. 3, 1971. [6285]
- MÜSÄ, S. The Arab al-Fatāh Society [in Arabic]. al-ʿArabī, June 1971. [6286]
- NAKHLEH, E. The Anatomy of Violence: Theoretical Reflections on Palestinian Resistance. Mid. E. J., no. 2, 1971. [6287]
- Notes on Hangings. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6288]
- Notes on Israel. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6289]
- Notes on Refugees. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6290]
- An Overview [U.S. & U.S.S.R. areas of interest in the Arab world]. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6291]
- REICH, BERNARD. Israel's Quest for Security. Current Hist., Jan. 1972. [6292]
- ROSTOW, E. The Middle Eastern Crisis in the Perspective of World Politics. Int. Aff. (London), Apr. 1971. [6293]
- RUBINSTEIN, ALVIN Z. Egypt Since Nasser. Current Hist., Jan. 1972. [6294]
- SCHULZ, ANN T. A Leadership Role for Iran? Current Hist., Jan. 1972. [6295]
- SERAGELDIN, ISMAIL. The Search for Identity Among Muslim Youth: The Case of the U.A.R. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6296]
- SIMPSON, DWIGHT J. Turkey: a Time of Troubles. Current Hist., Jan. 1972. [6297]
- SKIOTIS, D. From Bandit to Pasha: First Steps in the Rise to Power of Ali of Tepelen, 1750-1784. Int. J. Mid. E. Stud., July 1971. [6298]
- SPAGNOLO, J. Constitutional Change in Modern Lebanon: 1861-1864. Mid. E. Stud., July 1971. [6299]
- TEZIC, E. L'évolution du système électoral turc sous la seconde république. An. Fac. Droit Istanbul, nos. 29-32, 1968. [6300]
- THAISS, GUSTAV. The Modernization of Islamic Society in Persia. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6301]
- THOMAS, ROY E. Iraq Under Baathist Rule. Current Hist., Jan. 1972. [6302]
- VANCE, VICK. Le Nouveau Dossier Du Proche-Orient. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6303]
- WALTZ, J. Historical Perspectives on 'Early Missions' to Muslims: a response to Allan Cutler. Muslim World, July 1971. [6304]
- WARD, RICHARD J. Jordan in a Turbulent World: Its Prospects. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6305]
- WOLF, JOHN B. Lebanon: the Politics of Survival. Current Hist., Jan. 1972. [6306]

AFRICA

David E. Gardinier, Marquette University

GENERAL

- AMIJI, HATIM M. Some notes on religious dissent in nineteenth century East Africa. Afric. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1971. [6307]
- ANDREOCCHI, PAOLO. Il Pensiero Politico di Senghor, Sekou Toure e Nyerere. Africa (Rome), June 1971. [6308]
- ANISE, LADUN. Pan-Africanism and the ideology of African Unity. Black Lines, Spring 1971. [6309]
- AUSTEN, RALPH A. Patterns of development in nineteenth-century East Africa. Afric. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1971. [6310]
- BENSIMON, DORIS. La perception de l'identité juive par les juifs nord-africains installés en France. R. fr. Sociol., Oct.-Dec. 1970. [6311]
- BRÁSIO, ANTÓNIO. O Missionário que Barroso Sonhava. Ultramar, no. 3-4, 1970. [6312]
- BRUTENTS, K. Neo-colonialism and its socio-economic strategy. Pol. Aff., Sept. 1971. [6313]
- BUHLMANN, WALBERT. Die Kirchen als entwicklungsfördernder Faktor in Afrika. Int. Afrika-Forum, Sept.-Oct. 1971. [6314]
- CLIGNET, REMI. Damned If You Do, Damned If You Don't: the dilemmas of colonizer-colonized relations. Comp. Ed. R., Oct. 1971. [6315]
- COPANS, JEAN. Pour une histoire et une sociologie des études africaines. Cah. Et. afric., no. 43, 1971. [6316]
- CUOQ, JOSEPH. Begegnung von Islam und Christentum in Afrika. Int. Afrika-Forum, Sept.-Oct. 1971. [6317]

- DAGET, SERGE. L'abolition de la Traite des Noirs en France de 1814 à 1831. Cah. Et. afric., no. 41, 1971. [6318]
- DESCHAMPS, HUBERT. La traite des Noirs. Vue d'ensemble et perspectives. C. R. mensuels séances Acad. Sci. Outre-Mer, Nov. 1969. [6319]
- DOI, A. R. I. Islamic thought and culture: their impact on Africa. Islamic Q., Apr.-June 1970. [6320]
- DORO, MARION E. Bibliographical essay on the role of the military in African states. Current Bibliogr. Afric. Aff., May 1971. [6321]
- DRUMMOND, IAN M. More on British Colonial Aid Policy in the Nineteen Thirties. Can. J. Hist., Sept. 1971. [6322]
- EASTMAN, CAROL M. Who are the Waswahili? Africa (London), July 1971. [6323]
- EMERSON, RUPERT. Self-determination. Am. J. Int. Law, July 1971. [6324]
- FAGE, JOHN D. Continuity and change in the writing of West African history. Afric. Aff., July 1971. [6325]
- FARINE, AVIGDOR. Society and Education: the Content of Education in the French African School. Comp. Ed., Feb. 1969. [6326]
- FAUCCI, R. L'imperialismo tardo-vittoriano: continuità o cambiamento qualitativo. Stud. stor., no. 1, 1971. [6327]
- FISHER, HUMPHREY. The archives and library of the Norwegian Missionary society. Lib. Materials Africa, no. 3, 1971. [6328]
- FISHER, HUMPHREY J. Prayer and military activity in the history of Muslim Africa south of the Sahara. J. Afric. Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6329]
- GABRIELE, F. Arabi e Islām in Africa. Ulysse, Mar. 1971. [6330]
- GALLISOT, RENÉ. Sur l'impérialisme: le colloque d'Alger. Pensée, May-June 1971. [6331]
- GAPPERT, GARY. The Emerging Political Economy of the Indian Ocean and United States policy towards Africa. Current Bibliogr. Afric. Aff., Nov. 1971. [6332]
- GARVEY, AMY JACQUES. Garvey and Pan-Africanism: a wife's footnote to Black History. Black World, Dec. 1971. [6333]
- GAUD, M. L'enseignement primaire en Afrique Noire et à Madagascar. Afrique contemp., May-June 1966. [6334]
- GOODY, JACK. The impact of Islamic writing on the oral cultures of West Africa. Cah. Et. afric., no. 43, 1971. [6335]
- GÜR, ANDRÉ. Les Genevois et le problème de l'esclavage au 18<sup>e</sup> siècle. Musées Genève, Jan. 1970. [6336]
- HAFNER, ANNEMARIE. Die Auseinandersetzung W. I. Lenins mit linksradikalen Auffassungen in der nationalen und kolonialen Frage. Mitt. Inst. Orientforsch., no. 4, 1970. [6337]
- HALSTEAD, C. R. Un "Africain" méconnu: le colonel Juan Beigbeder. R. Hist. deux. guerre mond., July 1971. [6338]
- HENIGE, DAVID P. Oral tradition and chronology. J. Afric. Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6339]
- HERADSTVEIT, D. Norwegian policy in the Middle East crisis of 1967. Cooperation & Conflict, no. 1, 1971. [6340]
- JACOB, ABEL. Israel's military aid to Africa, 1960-66. J. Mod. Afric. Stud., Aug. 1971. [6341]
- JAMES, C. L. R. Marcus Garvey. Black Lines, Spring 1971. [6342]
- KING, KENNETH J. African Studies in the Negro American Colleges: Notes on the Good African. Phylon, Spring 1971. [6343]
- LARKIN, BRUCE D. China and Africa: a prospective on the 1970's. Africa Today, July 1971. [6344]
- LEGGE, GARTH; PRATT, CRAWFORD; WILLIAMS, RICHARD; and WINSOR, HUGH. The Black Paper: an alternative policy for Canada toward Southern Africa. Can. J. Afric. Stud., Fall 1970. [6345]
- LE MELLE, TILDEN J., and SHEPHERD, GEORGE W., JR. Race in the future of international relations. J. Int. Aff., no. 2, 1971. [6346]
- The Lusaka Manifesto on Southern Africa. Lusaka 14th-16th April, 1969. With a commentary by N. M. Shamyarira [complete text]. Afric. R., Mar. 1971. [6347]
- MAFEJE, ARCHIE. The ideology of 'Tribalism.' J. Mod. Afric. Stud., Aug. 1971. [6348]
- MBANHA, ABEL. Histoire des peuples d'Afrique et économie du salut. Dialogue & Cult., Mar. 1969. [6349]
- MITTELMAN, JAMES H. The development of post-colonial African regionalism and the formation of the OAU. Kroniek Afrika, no. 2, 1971. [6350]
- MOORE, CLEMENT HENRY. On theory and practice among Arabs. World Pol., Oct. 1971. [6351]
- MORISON, DAVID. Tropical Africa: the new Soviet outlook. Mizan, Aug. 1971. [6352]
- M'VENG, ENGELBERT. Der negro-afrikanische Beitrag zum religiösen und sozialen Leben im Mittelmeerraum. Int. Afrika-Forum, Sept.-Oct. 1971. [6353]
- NGANDU, PIUS. Littérature négro-africaine: Jalons antillais et africains avant 1937. Congo-Afrique, Oct. 1971. [6354]
- NOVATI, GIAMPAOLO CALCHI. Una questione di storiografia africana. Le città-stato islamiche sulla costa dell'Africa orientale prima dell'arrivo dei Portoghesi. Nuova r. stor., no. 1, 1971. [6355]
- NOWAK, BRONISLAW. Rola czarnych kupców Diula w islamizacji Afryki Zachodniej [Le rôle des marchands noirs dioula dans l'islamisation de l'Afrique Occidentale]. Przegląd hist., no. 3, 1969. [6356]
- OLIVER, CAROLINE. Mary Kingsley. Afric. Aff., July 1971. [6357]
- ONWUACHI, P. CHIKE. Negritude in perspective. Black World, Oct. 1971. [6358]
- PATTEE, RICHARD. Espanha em África—a evolução. Bol. Soc. Geog. Lisboa, Oct.-Dec. 1970. [6359]
- PATTEE, RICHARD. South Africa and Portugal. Bull. Africa Inst., July 1969. [6360]
- PAULME, DENISE. Thème et variations: l'épreuve du "nom inconnu" dans les contes d'Afrique noire. Cah. Et. afric., no. 42, 1971. [6361]
- PEIL, MARGARET. The expulsion of West African aliens. J. Mod. Afric. Stud., Aug. 1971. [6362]

PRANDINI, GIULIANO. Il socialismo africano ed'interpretazione della realtà precoloniale e moderna dell'Africa Negra. Terzo Mondo, June 1971. [6363]

QUECHON, MARTINE. Réflexions sur certains aspects du syncrétisme dans l'islam ouest-africain. Cah. Ét. afric., no. 42, 1971. [6364]

RALSTON, RICHARD D. African and other foreign students in the United States: a bibliographical essay. Current Bibliogr. Afric. Aff., Nov. 1971. [6365]

ROSBURG, CARL G. National identity in African States. Afric. R., Mar. 1971. [6366]

ROSSI-OSMIDA, GABRIELE. L'esploratore Giovanni Miani: i Diari e il carteggio [Nile]. Africa (Rome), June 1971. [6367]

ROUBET, C. Bibliographie Maghreb-Sahara. Anthropologie, préhistoire, ethnographie, 1968. Libyca, no. 17, 1969. [6368]

Round-Table on "Swahili as a language of culture." Présence Afric., no. 2, 1971. [6369]

SIM, YAWSOON. Taiwan and Africa. Africa Today, July 1971. [6370]

SMALDONE, JOSEPH P. Materials for the study of African military history. Current Bibliogr. Afric. Aff., May 1971. [6371]

SPEED, FRANK. The function of the film as historical record. Afric. Notes, no. 1, 1970. [6372]

TANNER, R. E. S. Priestly Classes in East and Central Africa. Heythrop J., Apr. 1971. [6373]

TURNER, HAROLD W. Bibliography of modern African religious movements. Supplement II, nos. 1602-1917. J. Relig. Africa, no. 3, 1970. [6374]

VEDELD, OLAV. Har ikke Bantu-Afrika noen historie? [Does Not Bantu Africa have a History?]. Samtiden, no. 3, 1971. [6375]

VERHAEGEN, BENOÎT. L'utilisation des sources orales et écrites par l'histoire immédiate. R. congolaise Sci. humaines, no. 2, 1971. [6376]

VINCENT, THEO. Two 18th century African writers: Ignatius Sancho and Ottobah Cugoana. Black Orpheus, no. 5-6, 1970. [6377]

WALTON, HANES. Toward a theory of Black African Civilization: the problem of authenticity. J. Black Stud., June 1971. [6378]

WILLETT, FRANK. A survey of recent results in the radiocarbon chronology of Western and Northern Africa. J. Afric. Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6379]

WODDIS, JACK. Neo-colonialism in Africa: schemes and failures. World Marxist R., June 1971. [6380]

ALGERIA

ADAM, HUSSEIN MOHAMED. Frantz Fanon: his "Understanding." Black World, Dec. 1971. [6381]

BURKE, EDMUND. Recent books on colonial Algerian history. Mid. E. Stud., May 1971. [6382]

CALCHI NOVATI, G. Francia e Algeria dieci anni dopi. Ponte, Apr. 30, 1971. [6383]

CERBELLA, GINO. Il Dialogo tra Cristiani e Musulmani nel Pensiero di Ahmed Taleb. Africa (Rome), June 1971. [6384]

COOKE, JAMES J., and HEGGOY, ALF ANDREW. The American Periodical Press and Ahmed Ben Bella. Muslim World, Oct. 1971. [6385]

FIRESTONE, YA'AKOV. The doctrine of integration with France among the Europeans of Algeria, 1955-1960. Comp. Pol. Stud., July 1971. [6386]

GOUTARD, COLONEL. Alger, 8 novembre 1942. R. Paris, Apr. 1970. [6387]

HAZARD, J. The residue of Marxist influence in Algeria. Columbia J. Transnat. Law, no. 2, 1970. [6388]

MALDIDIER, D. Discours politique et guerre d'Algérie. Pensée, May-June 1971. [6389]

MEMMI, ALBERT. La vie impossible de Frantz Fanon. Esprit, Sept. 1971. [6390]

MOREL, JACQUES. L'école et la formation des élites en Algérie de 1919 à 1939. Bull. Inst. hist. Pays Outre-Mer, no. 3, 1968-69. [6391]

Les relations franco-algériens. Eur.-France Outremer, Apr. 1971. [6392]

ANGOLA

HEINTZE, BEATRIX. Beiträge zur Geschichte und Kultur der Kisawa (Angola). Paideuma, no. 16, 1970. [6393]

NETO, AGOSTINHO. Il presente e il futuro dell'Angola. Terzo Mondo, June 1971. [6394]

SAMPAIO, MARIO. Luanda. R. fr. Et. pol. afric., Sept. 1971. [6395]

SOREMEKUN, FOLA. Religion and politics in Angola: the American Board Missions and the Portuguese Government, 1880-1922. Cah. Ét. afric., no. 43, 1971. [6396]

BOTSWANA

GRIFFITHS, J. E. S. A note on the history and functions of local government in Botswana. J. Adm. Overseas, Apr. 1971. [6397]

KHAMA, SERETSE. African-American relations in the 1970's: prospects and problems. Africa Today, July 1971. [6398]

CABINDA

VAZ, JOSÉ M. No Mundo dos cabindas. Portugal em Africa, Mar.-Apr. 1971. [6399]

CAMEROON

CLIGNET, RÉMI, and JORDAN, FRANK. Urbanization and social differentiation in Africa: a comparative analysis of the ecological structures of Douala and Yaoundé. Cah. Ét. afric., no. 42, 1971. [6400]

DEKAR, PAUL. Alfred Saker and the Baptists in Cameroon. Foundations, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [6401]

LABURTHE-TOLRA, PHILIPPE. Yaoundé d'après Zenker. An. Fac. Lett. Sci. humaines, Yaoundé, no. 2, 1970. [6402]

LABURTHE-TOLRA, PHILIPPE. Le So des Beti selon M. Hubert Onana. An. Fac. Lett. Sci. humaines, Yaoundé, no. 1, 1969. [6403]

MELONE, THOMAS. Mongo Beti et la terre camerounaise. An. Fac. Lett. Sci. Humaines, Yaoundé, no. 1, 1969. [6404]

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

DE BAYLE DES HERMENS, R. Quelques aspects de la Préhistoire en République Centrafricaine. J. Afric. Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6405]

MOULY, J. La Jeunesse pionnière nationale en République Centrafricaine. R. int. Trav., no. 1, 1969. [6406]

NGAL, GEORGES. René Maran et la quête de l'Afrique millénaire. Cah. Lit. Ling. Appliquée, June 1970. [6407]

CHAD

CASTERAN, CHRISTIAN. Tchad: difficultés pour M. Tombalbaye. R. fr. Et. pol. afric., Sept. 1971. [6408]

MARABY, J. Le Tchad: une re-colonisation? Fait public, Sept. 1969. [6409]

PLEDGE, ROBERT. Le Tchad ou la théorie française des dominos africains. Esprit, Feb. 1970. [6410]

CONGO-BRAZZAVILLE

ERNY, PIERRE. L'explosion de la jeunesse à Brazzaville. Terre entière, Sept.-Oct. 1966. [6411]

LEE, J. M. Clan loyalties and Socialist doctrines in the People's Republic of the Congo. World Today, Jan. 1971. [6412]

MANISSADJIAN, H. Naissance et Avatars de l'Enseignement Supérieur en Afrique Centrale. An. Centre Enseignement Supérieur, Brazzaville, no. 1, 1965. [6413]

MARCHAT, PHILIPPE. D'une révolution à l'autre au Congo-Brazzaville. R. Mil. gén., June, Sept. 1969. [6414]

PAULIAN, R. Enseignement Supérieur et Technique en Afrique Centrale: Problèmes, Possibilités et Suggestions. An. Centre Enseignement Supérieur, Brazzaville, no. 1, 1965. [6415]

DAHOMÉY

GARCIA, LUC. L'organisation de l'instruction publique au Dahoméy, 1894-1920. Cah. Et. afric., no. 41, 1971. [6416]

RONEN, DOV. On the African role in the trans-Atlantic slave trade in Dahoméy. Cah. Et. afric., no. 41, 1971. [6417]

EGYPT

BOSWORTH, C. E. Christian and Jewish Religious Dignitaries in Mamluk Egypt and Syria: Qalqashandî's Information on their Hierarchy, Titulature, and Appointment (I). Int. J. Mid. E. Stud., Jan. 1972. [6418]

MARTHELOT, PIERRE. Dimensions nouvelles d'une métropole: le Caire. R. Géog. Est., July-Dec. 1969. [6419]

MOTZKIN, A. A thirteenth century Jewish teacher in Cairo. J. Jewish Stud., nos. 1-4, 1970. [6420]

MUZIKÁŘ, I. Égypte et nationalisme arabe. Sbornik Hist., no. 17, 1970. [6421]

VESELY, R. Trois certificats délivrés pour les fondations pieuses en Égypte au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle. Troisième contribution à la question des fondations pieuses ottomanes d'Égypte et de la diplomatie judiciaire. Oriens, nos. 21-22, 1968-69. [6422]

ETHIOPIA

CHAVAILLON, J. État actuel de la préhistoire ancienne dans la vallée de l'Omo, Ethiopie. Archeologia, 38, 1971. [6423]

ESHETE, ALEME. Une ambassade du Ras Ali en Egypte: 1852. J. Ethiopian Stud., no. 1, 1971. [6424]

FERENC, ALEKSANDER. Herezja Stefanitow w Etiopii w XV-XVI wieku [The heresy of the Stephenites in Ethiopia in the 15th and 16th centuries]. Euhemer, no. 1-2, 1969. [6425]

FRANCHINI, VINCENZO. La stazione litica all'aperto di Mehrad Tièl. J. Ethiopian Stud., no. 1, 1971. [6426]

JOUSSAUME, ROGER. Les monuments mégalithiques du Harrar (Ethiopie). Première mission: octobre-novembre 1970. L'Anthrop., no. 3-4, 1971. [6427]

LEORY, JULES. L'icône ex-voto du Negus Lebna Dengel au Monastère de Saint Abtoine du Desert (Egypte). J. Ethiopian Stud., no. 1, 1971. [6428]

PANKHURST, RICHARD. A chapter in Ethiopia's commercial history: developments during the Fascist Occupation of 1936-1941. Ethiopia Observer, no. 1, 1971. [6429]

PANKHURST, RICHARD. An early fourteenth century Persian representation of Ethiopian Emperor Armah and his court. Ethiopia Observer, no. 1, 1971. [6430]

PANKHURST, RICHARD. Economic verdict on the Italian Occupation of Ethiopia (1936-1941). Ethiopia Observer, no. 1, 1971. [6431]

PANKHURST, RICHARD. Emperor Haile Sellassie's litigation in England to reassert the independence of Ethiopia during the Italian Occupation in 1937 and 1938. Ethiopia Observer, no. 1, 1971. [6432]

PANKHURST, RICHARD. Linguistic and cultural data on the penetration of Fire-Arms into Ethiopia. J. Ethiopian Stud., no. 1, 1971. [6433]

SCHWAB, PETER. The rebellion in Gojam Province, Ethiopia. Can. J. Afric. Stud., Spring 1970. [6434]

SELASSIE, TESHAI BERHANE. An Ethiopian medical text-book written by Gerazamač Gäbräwäld Aräghāñ Däga Damot. J. Ethiopian Stud., no. 1, 1971. [6435]

WEISCHER, BERND MANUEL. Historical and philological problems of the Axumitic Literature (especially in the Querellos). J. Ethiopian Stud., no. 1, 1971. [6436]

FRENCH TERRITORY OF THE AFARS AND THE ISSAS

PANKHURST, RICHARD. Italian Fascist claims to the Port of Jibuti, 1935-1941: an historical note. Ethiopia Observer, no. 1, 1971. [6437]

GABON

HAYGOOD, WILLIAM CONVERSE. With Schweitzer in Lambaréné: Noel Gillespie's Letters from Africa [1924]. Wis. Mag. Hist., Spring 1971. [6438]

GAMBIA

QUINN, CHARLOTTE A. A nineteenth century Fulbe State. J. Afric. Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6439]

WEIL, PETER M. Tradition and opposition in area council elections in the Gambia. J. Asian Afric. Stud., Apr. 1971. [6440]

GHANA

- COHEN, DENNIS L. The Convention People's Party of Ghana. Can. J. Afric. Stud., Spring 1970. [6441]
- FINLAY, DAVID J. Education and Polity in Ghana [r. art.]. Hist. Ed. Q., Fall 1971. [6442]
- FYNN, JOHN. Current politics in Ghana. Munger Africana Lib. Notes, June 1971. [6443]
- LANGLEY, J. AYO. Chief Sam's African Movement and Race Consciousness in West Africa. Phylon, Summer 1971. [6444]
- RYAN, SELWYN. The theory and practice of African One Partyism: the CPP re-examined. Can. J. Afric. Stud., Spring 1970. [6445]
- SAFFU, E. O. The Bases of Ghana-Upper Volta Relations during the Nkrumah Regime. Can. J. Afric. Stud., Spring 1970. [6446]
- SHALOFF, STANLEY. The Press and Politics in Accra: The Accra Legislative Council Election of 1935. Societas, Summer 1971. [6447]

GUINEA

- BOUNAMA SY, SEKHOU. Monographie du Rio Pongo. Rech. afric., Jan.-Mar. 1969. [6448]
- JOSEPH-NOEL, Y. La presse guinéenne et la marche à l'indépendance. Rech. afric., Jan.-Mar. 1969. [6449]
- Niani, ancienne capitale de l'Empire du Mali. Rech. afric., Jan.-Mar. 1969. [6450]
- RIVIÈRE, CLAUDE. La politique étrangère de la Guinée. R. fr. Et. pol. afric., Aug. 1971. [6451]
- RIVIÈRE, CLAUDE. Les mécanismes de constitution d'une bourgeoisie commerçante en République de Guinée. Cah. Et. afric., no. 43, 1971. [6452]
- Traité avec les chefs du Fouta Djallon. Rech. afric., Jan.-Mar. 1969. [6453]
- WHITEMAN, KAYE. Guinea in West African politics. World Today, Aug. 1971. [6454]

IVORY COAST

- FAUJAS, ALAIN. M. Houphouët-Boigny et la diplomatie ivoirienne. R. fr. Et. pol. afric., Aug. 1971. [6455]
- PARIS, MME., and BOISADAM, MME. Abidjan. R. fr. Et. pol. afric., Sept. 1971. [6456]

KENYA

- FRANDA, MARCUS F. Some Notes on the Internal Dynamics and Influence of the Indian Community in Ethiopia. Indian Pol. Sci. R., Apr.-Sept. 1971. [6457]
- GOUROU, PIERRE. Les Kikuyu et la crise Mau-Mau. R. belge Géog., nos. 1-3, 1969. [6458]
- HARBESON, JOHN W. Land reforms and politics in Kenya, 1954-70. J. Mod. Afric. Stud., Aug. 1971. [6459]
- LEYS, COLIN. Le développement de la société Paysanne au Kenya. Cah. CEDAF, no. 7, 1971. [6460]
- LEYS, COLIN. Politics in Kenya: the Development of Peasant Society. Brit. J. Pol. Sci., July 1971. [6461]

MAZRUI, ALI A. Tom Mboya and the struggle against Uganda's isolationism. Black Lines, Spring 1971. [6462]

OBUDHO, ROBERT A. The urban geography of Kisumu, Kenya: materials for research. Current Bibliogr. Afric. Aff., Nov. 1971. [6463]

URCH, GEORGE E. Education and colonialism in Kenya. Hist. Ed. Q., Fall 1971. [6464]

LESOTHO

LUCAS, D. W. Villages in Lesotho: their names and their location. Lesotho Notes & Rec., no. 6, 1966-67. [6465]

MOHAPELOA, J. W. The beginnings of education in Lesotho. Lesotho Notes & Rec., no. 7, 1968. [6466]

LIBERIA

ATHERTON, JOHN H. Liberian Prehistory. Liberian Stud. J., no. 2, 1970-71. [6467]

DECREAENE, PHILIPPE. Libéria, 1969. C. R. mensuels séances Acad. Sci. Outre-Mer, Feb. 1969. [6468]

HENRIKSEN, THOMAS H. Edward W. Blyden: his influence on contemporary Afro-Americans. Pan-Afric. J., Summer 1971. [6469]

JOHNSON, WILLIAM. Travel Notes on Liberia By a Black American Author. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6470]

MCEVOY, FREDERICK D. Some proposals for Liberian Archeology. Liberian Stud. J., no. 2, 1970-71. [6471]

MASSING, ANDREAS. Materials for a history of Western Liberia: the Belle. Liberian Stud. J., no. 2, 1970-71. [6472]

ROSS, DAVID F. The tribal entrepreneur in the emerging Liberian economy. Liberian Stud. J., no. 2, 1970-71. [6473]

SCHULZE, WILLI. Early iron smelting among the southern Kpelle. Liberian Stud. J., no. 2, 1970-71. [6474]

WRUBEL, THOMAS P. Liberia: the dynamics of continuity. J. Mod. Afric. Stud., Aug. 1971. [6475]

WYLIE, KENNETH C. Notes on Kailundu's campaign into Liberia in 1889. Liberian Stud. J., no. 2, 1970-71. [6476]

LIBYA

CARVELY, ANDREW. Libya—Act II. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6477]

CARVELY, ANDREW. Libyan Arab Republic: A Chronological Bibliography. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6478]

FILESI, TEOBALDO. Un ambasciatore tripolino a Napoli e un console napoletano a Tripoli nel 1742. Africa (Rome), June 1971. [6479]

FLEISCHLACKER. Rassen- und Bevölkerungsgeschichte Nordafrikas unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Äthiopiden, der Libyer und der Garamanten. Paideuma, no. 15, 1969. [6480]

MURASE, ÉRIC. La campagne de Libye. R. Mil. gén., Feb., May 1969. [6481]

RONDOT, PIERRE. La Libye sur l'échiquier méditerranéen. R. Mil. gén., Nov. 1969. [6482]

ROSSI, M. G. Guerra di Libia e imperialismo italiano. Stud. stor., no. 2, 1971. [6483]

TEBOUL, MONIQUE. Colonisation italienne en Libye de 1922 à 1935. Bull. Inst. Hist. Pays Outre-Mer, no. 2, 1968-69. [6484]

MADAGASCAR

AYACHE, SIMON. Le manuscrit de Raombana (1853-1855). Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 2, 1968. [6485]

BOÎTEAU, PIERRE. Le Professeur Henri Humbert. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 1, 1968. [6486]

DESCHAMPS, HUBERT. Alain Délivré et l'étude critique du Tantaran' ny Andriana. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 2, 1968. [6487]

KOERNER, FRANÇOIS. Les événements de 1947 à Madagascar. Espri, Sept. 1971. [6488]

KOTTAK, CONRAD P. Cultural Adaptation, kinship, and descent in Madagascar. S. W. J. Anthropol., Summer 1971. [6489]

LAITRE, P. DE. Tremblements de terre malgaches en 1967. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 1, 1968. [6490]

MASSOT, VINCENT. Le barrage d'Avaratr' Andambo. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 1, 1968. [6491]

PAIN, M. Les communes de Madagascar, par M. Comte. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 1, 1968. [6492]

Procès à Madagascar. Terre entière, Nov.-Dec. 1969. [6493]

PROFITA, P. Episodes de la campagne de Radama I<sup>er</sup> contre Ambositra. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 1, 1968. [6494]

PROFITA, P. Les responsables betsileo de la vallée d'Imerina-Imady sous la monarchie merina. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 2, 1968. [6495]

RABENORO, CÉSAIRE. Pays de Galles et Madagascar. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 2, 1968. [6496]

RAHARIJAONA, H. La justice répressive à Madagascar en 1896. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 1, 1968. [6497]

RANAIVO, FLAVIAN. Notice sur l'oeuvre de Fredy Rajaofera, poète malgache. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 2, 1968. [6498]

VALETTE, JEAN. Deux documents français sur Madagascar en 1825. Les rapports Duhaut-Cilly et Frères. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 2, 1968. [6499]

VALETTE, JEAN. Documents pour servir à l'étude des relations entre Froberville et Mayeur. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 1, 1968. [6500]

VALETTE, JEAN. Le journal d'Hastie du 14 novembre 1824 au 7 mai 1825. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 1, 1968. [6501]

VALETTE, JEAN. Le journal de Jeffreys du 1<sup>er</sup> mai au 17 juin 1822. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 2, 1968. [6502]

VALETTE, JEAN. Les sources de l'Histoire Malgache au Public Record Office. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 1, 1968. [6503]

VALETTE, JEAN. Note sur la série D.D. des Archives de la République. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 1, 1968. [6504]

VALETTE, JEAN. Un document rédigé par D. Jones sur la mort de J. Hastie. Son utilisation par W. Ellis. Bull. Acad. Malgache, no. 2, 1968. [6505]

VERIN, P. Les origines malgaches: indices culturels et archéologiques. Archéologie, July-Aug. 1969. [6506]

WEINSTEIN, WARREN. Malagasy: modernization in Imerina, 1810-1896. Pan-Afric. J., Summer 1971. [6507]

MALAWI

LANGWORTHY, HARRY W. Swahili influence in the area between Lake Malawi and the Luangwa River. Afric. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1971. [6508]

LINDEN, JANE, and LINDEN, IAN. John Chilembwe and the New Jerusalem. J. Afric. Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6509]

LOHRENTZ, KENNETH. Joseph Booth, Charles Domingo, and the Seventh Day Baptists in Northern Nyasaland, 1910-12. J. Afric. Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6510]

MACDONALD, RODERICK J. Religious independency as a means of social advance in northern Nyasaland in the 1930's. J. Relig. Africa, no. 2, 1970. [6511]

MALI

HARDING, LEONHARD. Les écoles des Pères Blancs au Soudan Français, 1895-1920. Cah. Et. afric., no. 41, 1971. [6512]

SURET-CANALE, JEAN. Essai sur la signification sociale et historique des hégémonies peules (17<sup>e</sup>-19<sup>e</sup> siècles). Rech. afric., Jan.-Mar. 1969. [6513]

MOROCCO

LEWICKI, TADEUSZ. Un royaume ibadite peu connu: l'État des Banu Masala (IX<sup>e</sup>s.). Rocz. orient., no. 1, 1968. [6514]

MARCHAT, HENRI. La question d'Ifni. C. R. mensuels séances Acad. Sci. Outre-Mer, Dec. 1969. [6515]

ROBERT, J. La Constitution marocaine du 31 juillet 1970. Maghreb, Sept.-Oct. 1970. [6516]

MOZAMBIQUE

GRAY, RICHARD. Portuguese Musketeers on the Zambezi. J. Afric. Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6517]

NIGER

THOM, DERRICK J. The City of Maradi: French influence upon a Hausa Urban Center. J. Geog. (U.S.), Nov. 1971. [6518]

NIGERIA

ADELEYE, R. A. Rābih b. Fadlallāh and the diplomacy of European Imperial invasion in the Central Sūdān, 1893-1902. J. Hist. Soc. Nigeria, Dec. 1970. [6519]

ADEWOYE, O. The Judicial Agreements in Yorubaland, 1904-1908. J. Afric. Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6520]

AFIGBO, A. E. Sir Ralph Moor and the economic development of Southern Nigeria: 1896-1903. J. Hist. Soc. Nigeria, Dec. 1970. [6521]

AFIGBO, A. E. The Igbo under British Rule. Conch, Sept. 1971. [6522]

ALAGOA, EBIEGBERI J. Nembe: the City Idea in the Eastern Niger Delta. Cah. Et. afric., no. 42, 1971. [6523]

ANAFULU, J. C. Supplementary Bibliography of Igbo Life, Literature and Art. Conch, Sept. 1971. [6524]

BALLARD, JOHN A. Historical Inferences from the Linguistic Geography of the Nigerian Middle Belt. Africa (London), Oct. 1971. [6525]

BANJO, AYO. A historical view of the English language in Nigeria. Ibadan, July 1970. [6526]

DUFFIELD, IAN. John Eldred Taylor and West African Opposition to Indirect Rule in Nigeria. Afric. Aff., July 1971. [6527]

EGBOH, EDMUND O. Industrial relations and the press in Nigeria (1940-1951). Civilisations, no. 4, 1970. [6528]

FEUSER, WILLFRIED. The French in Nigeria. Ibadan, July 1970. [6529]

HAIR, P. E. H. Samuel Ajayi Crowther: a biographical note. Afric. Lang. R., no. 8, 1969. [6530]

IGBAFE, PHILIP A. Western Ibo society and its resistance to British rule: the Ekumeku Movement, 1898-1911. J. Afric. Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6531]

KOEHL, ROBERT. The Uses of the University: Past and Present in Nigerian Educational Culture, part II. Comp. Ed. R., Oct. 1971. [6532]

LATHAM, A. J. H. Currency, Credit, and Capitalism on the Cross River in the pre-colonial era. J. Afric. Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6533]

LLOYD, CHRISTOPHER. Dr Baikie and the Niger. Hist. Today, Oct. 1971. [6534]

LUCAS, PHILIPPE. Nigérie: lutte de classe ou conflit "nationalitaire"? R. fr. Sci. pol., July 1971. [6535]

MCKENZIE, P. R. Samuel Crowther's attitude to other faiths—during the Early Period. Orita, June 1971. [6536]

NZIMIRO, IKENNA. The Igbo in the modern setting. Conch, Sept. 1971. [6537]

OFOEGBU, MAZI RAY. African political thought: the social ideas of Blyden and Caseley Hayford. Insight & Opinion, no. 4, 1970. [6538]

OJIGBO, A. OKION. Ethnicity and public land policy in Kenya. J. Hist. Soc. Nigeria, Dec. 1970. [6539]

OLORUNTIMEHIN, B. OLATUNJI. Theories of 'Official Mind' and 'Military Imperialism' as related to the French conquest of the Western Sudan. J. Hist. Soc. Nigeria, Dec. 1970. [6540]

SADA, P. O. A critical appraisal of the 1963 Nigerian census, with special reference to the mid-western state. Lagos Notes & Rec., Jan. 1971. [6541]

SADA, P. O. The Nigerian Twelve-State Political Structure. Nigerian Geog. J., June 1971. [6542]

SHAW, THURSTON. Africa in the perspective of World Pre-History. J. Hist. Soc. Nigeria, Dec. 1970. [6543]

SHAW, THURSTON. The analysis of West African bronzes: a summary of the evidence. Ibadan, July 1970. [6544]

SHEPPERSON, GEORGE. Mungo Park and the Scottish contribution to Africa. Afric. Aff., July 1971. [6545]

SMITH, ABDULLAHI. Some considerations relating to the formation of States in Hausaland. J. Hist. Soc. Nigeria, Dec. 1970. [6546]

SMITH, ROBERT. Event and Portent: the fall of Old Oyo. A problem in historical explanation. Africa (London), July 1971. [6547]

VAN DEN BERGHE, PIERRE. Pluralism at a Nigerian University: a case study. Race, Apr. 1971. [6548]

WILLIAMS, DAVID M. Nigeria: Prospects for the Future. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6549]

PORTUGUESE GUINEA

ORTÍZ, EDUARDO. Guinea y la lucha contra el colonialismo. Estud. Int., Jan.-Mar. 1971. [6550]

RHODESIA

BELL, J. BOWYER. The Frustration of Insurgency: The Rhodesian Example in the Sixties. Mil. Aff., Feb. 1971. [6551]

BOLÉO, JOSÉ DE OLIVEIRA. Subsídios para o estudo da cultura zimbábue na Africa Austral. Ultramar, no. 3-4, 1970. [6552]

KATSUKUNYA, VITOS. Makate and Nehoreka. Nada, no. 3, 1971. [6553]

TABLER, E. C. Addenda and Corrigenda II to Pioneers of Rhodesia. Africana Notes, Mar. 1971. [6554]

RWANDA

FELTZ, G. Considérations sur l'histoire contemporaine du Rwanda. R. fr. Et. pol. afric., Sept. 1971. [6555]

SENEGAL

BOULÈGUE, J., and MARQUET, R. Le voyage de Richard Rainolds en Sénégal—(1591). Bull. I.F.A.N., Jan. 1971. [6556]

BOULLE, PIERRE H. Eighteenth century French policies towards Senegal. Can. J. Afric. Stud., Fall 1970. [6557]

The Choiseul Papers [text and notes]. Munger Africana Lib. Notes, Apr. 1971. [6558]

CRUISE O'BRIEN, DONAL B. Co-operators and Bureaucrats: Class Formation in a Senegalese Society. Africa (London), Oct. 1971. [6559]

OLAL N'DIAYE, SAKI. The story of Malik Sy, translated and edited by A. Neil Skinner and Philip D. Curtin with the assistance of Hammady Amadou Sy. Cah. Et. afric., no. 43, 1971. [6560]

SALETTES, JEAN-LOUP. Conséquences du recrutement indigène en A.O.F. pendant la première guerre mondiale. Bull. Inst. Hist. Pays Outre-Mer, no. 2, 1968-69. [6561]

SENGHOR, LÉOPOLD SÉDAR. Problématique de la négritude. Présence Afric., no. 2, 1971. [6562]

SOUTH AFRICA

ADAM, HERIBERT. The South African Power-elite: a survey of ideological commitment. Can. J. Pol. Sci., Mar. 1971. [6563]

A. H. S. Suid-Afrika en Bibliografiese Werk. Africana Notes, Mar. 1971. [6564]

A. H. S. The use of sources. Africana Notes, June 1971. [6565]

ANGLIN, DOUGLAS G. Canada and Southern Africa in the Seventies. Can. J. Afric. Stud., Spring 1970. [6566]

ASHLEY, M. J. The education of white elites in South Africa. Comp. Ed., Aug. 1971. [6567]

ASWEGEN, H. J. VAN. Die Oranje-Vrystaat en die Asiate. Suid-Afr. Hist. J., Nov. 1969. [6568]

ATMORE, ANTHONY; CHIRENJE, J. M.; and MUDENGE, S. I. Sotho Arms and Ammunition in the Nineteenth Century. J. Afric. Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6569]

BERGH, G. N. VAN DEN. Die Drie en Dertig Artikels: Grondwet of Regsprekende Handleiding? Suid-Afr. Hist. J., Nov. 1969. [6570]

BROWN, D. L. Agricultural education for the Bantu in the Ciskei: historical background and present facilities. Fort Hare Pap., Nov. 1970. [6571]

BROWN, TREVOR. Free Press Fair Game for South Africa's Government. Journalism Q., Spring 1971. [6572]

CAPENER, A. L. South African match factories and their labels. Africana Notes, Mar. 1971. [6573]

CURTIS, NEVILLE. South Africa: The Politics of Fragmentation. For. Aff., Jan. 1972. [6574]

FOCK, GERHARD J. Die Anfänge der Missions-station Pniel am Vaal. Afric. Heimatkal., no. 42, 1971. [6575]

GUY, J. J. A Note on Firearms in the Zulu Kingdom with special reference to the Anglo-Zulu War, 1879. J. Afric. Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6576]

HAHN, O. H. Victorian bathing amenities in early Cape Town. Africana Notes, June 1971. [6577]

HARINGTON, A. L. The Graham's Town Journal—its founding, early history and influence. Suid-Afr. Hist. J., Nov. 1969. [6578]

LANDELL-MILLS, P. M. The 1969 Southern African Customers Union Agreement. J. Mod. Afric. Stud., Aug. 1971. [6579]

LEWSEN, PHYLLIS. The Cape Liberal Tradition—Myth or Reality? Race, July 1971. [6580]

LOMBARD, J. A. Political and administrative principles of homeland development. Bantu, Feb. 1971. [6581]

MARKS, SHULA. Firearms in Southern Africa: A survey. J. Afric. Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6582]

MIERS, SUE. Notes on the Arms Trade and Government Policy in Southern Africa between 1870 and 1890. J. Afric. Hist., no. 4, 1971. [6583]

Modjadji. Living legend of the Lobedu [Modjudji IV]. Bantu, Feb. 1971. [6584]

POMEROY, WILLIAM J. The resistance movement against apartheid in South Africa. Freedomways, no. 3, 1971. [6585]

REX, JOHN. The plural society: the South African case. Race, Apr. 1971. [6586]

R. F. K. Africana artists of the 19th century. Africana Notes, Mar. 1971. [6587]

R. F. K. Charles and Constance Penstone, cartoonists. Africana Notes, June 1971. [6588]

R. F. K. I'Ons, F. T. Surgeon Nathaniel Morgan or Surgeon-Major Benjamin Swift. Africana Notes, June 1971. [6589]

SCHOOR, M. C. E. 'n Pleidooi vir Kontemporere Geskiedenis. Suid-Afr. Hist. J., Nov. 1969. [6590]

SOUTHEY, R. J. De Neuville and Isandhlwana. Africana Notes, June 1971. [6591]

SPIES, S. B. The outbreak of the First World War and the Botha Government. Suid-Afr. Hist. J., Nov. 1969. [6592]

STEVENS, RICHARD P. Zionism, South Africa and Apartheid: the paradoxical triangle. Phylon, Summer 1971. [6593]

TICKTIN, D. The war issue and the collapse of the South African Labour Party, 1914-15. Suid-Afr. Hist. J., Nov. 1969. [6594]

TYLER, W. B. Sir George Grey, South Africa, and the Imperial Military Bureau, 1855-1860. Hist. J., Sept. 1971. [6595]

The University of Zululand—an historical survey. Bantu, Aug. 1971. [6596]

VALKHOFF, M. F. Catholiques et Portugais au Cap de Bonne-Espérance en 1685. R. Hist. éc. soc., no. 2, 1969. [6597]

ZYL, M. C. VAN. Die Historiese Navorser en die Suid-Afrikaanse Argiewe. Suid-Afr. Hist. J., Nov. 1969. [6598]

SOUTH-WEST AFRICA

PHILLIPS, EARL. South-West Africa—South Africa's Fifth Province. R. Mil. gén., Sept. 1969. [6599]

SUDAN

AMBORN, HERMANN. Die Problematik der Eisenverhüttung im Reich Meroe. Paideuma, no. 16, 1970. [6600]

EVANS-PRITCHARD, E. E. Sources, with particular reference to the Southern Sudan. Cah. Et. afric., no. 41, 1971. [6601]

GARANG, MADING DE. Southern Sudanese settlements in Uganda. Grass Curtain, July 1971. [6602]

MAGHOUB, A. K. La révolution du 25 mai au Soudan. Nouvelle r. int., Oct. 1969. [6603]

MERCER, PATRICIA. Shilluk trade and politics from the mid-seventeenth century to 1861. J. Afric. Hist., no. 3, 1971. [6604]

P. H. South Sudan under Nimeiri. Grass Curtain, July 1971. [6605]

WOL WOL, L. The place of South Sudan in the new Arab federation. Grass Curtain, Oct. 1971. [6606]

TANZANIA

BROWN, BEVERLY. Muslim influence on trade and politics in the Lake Tanganyika region. Afric. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1971. [6607]

BROWN, WALTER T. The politics of business: relations between Zanzibar and Bagamoyo in the late nineteenth century. Afric. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1971. [6608]

DENOON, DONALD, and KUPER, ADAM. The 'New Historiography' in Dar Es Salaam: a rejoinder. Afric. Aff., July 1971. [6609]

HARTWIG, GERALD W. Long-distance trade and the evolution of sorcery among the Kerebe. Afric. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1971. [6610]

KARIOKI, JAMES N. Julius K. Nyerere and the Organization of African Unity. Black Lines, Spring 1971. [6611]

MARTIN, B. G. Notes on some members of the learned classes of Zanzibar and East Africa in the nineteenth century. Afric. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1971. [6612]

NYERERE, JULIUS. Zambian-Tanzanian Relations. Pan-Afric. J., Summer 1971. [6613]

WOLFE, ALVIN W. Tanzania-Zambia Railway: Escape Route from Neocolonial Control? Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6614]

TOGO

FROELICH, J. C. Le Togo anxieux et amical. R. Mil. gén., Feb. 1969. [6615]

FROELICH, J. C. Togo, 1969. C. R. mensuels séances Acad. Sci. Outre-Mer, Oct. 1969. [6616]

TUNISIA

ABDULWAHAB, H.-H. Coup d'oeil général sur les apports ethniques étrangers en Tunisie. Cah. Tunisie, no. 69-70, 1970. [6617]

BARDIN, PIERRE. Les débuts difficiles du protectorat tunisien (mai 1881-avril 1882). R. Hist. dipl., Jan.-Mar. 1971. [6618]

BELKHODJA, MOHAMED-HABIB. L'émigration andalouse vers l'Ifrîqiya au VII<sup>e</sup>/XIII<sup>e</sup> siècle. Cah. Tunisie, no. 69-70, 1970. [6619]

Ben Salah et le développement tunisien (1961-1969). Esprit, Nov. 1970. [6620]

EPALZA, MIGUEL DE. Recherches récentes sur les émigrations des "Moriscos" en Tunisie. Cah. Tunisie, no. 69-70, 1970. [6621]

GEHRING, GILBERT. Les relations entre l'Allemagne et la Tunisie, 1870-1881. Bull. Inst. Hist. Pays Outre-Mer, no. 3, 1968-69. [6622]

GEHRING, GILBERT. Les relations entre la Tunisie et l'Allemagne avant le Protectorat français. Cah. Tunisie, no. 71-72, 1970. [6623]

LANDURE, JEAN-LOUIS. La Tunisie en quête d'un équilibre politique. R. jur. pol., July-Sept. 1971. [6624]

LEFEVRE, RENATO. La Crociata del 1270 a Tunisi. Nella Documentazione dell' Archivio di Stato di Napoli. Africa (Rome), June 1971. [6625]

LÉZINE, ALEXANDRE. Note sur la Grande Mosquée de Tunis. Cah. Tunisie, no. 71-72, 1970. [6626]

MARTINEZ-MONTALVEZ, PEDRO. Les manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Nationale de Madrid ayant trait aux relations entre l'Espagne et la Tunisie au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle. Cah. Tunisie, no. 69-70, 1970. [6627]

MONCEAUX, PAUL. Les colonies juives dans l'Afrique romaine. Cah. Tunisie, no. 71-72, 1970. [6628]

MONTAGUE, JOEL. Disease and public health in Tunisia, 1882-1970: an overview of the literature and its sources. Part I. Current Bibliogr. Afric. Aff., July 1971. [6629]

OLIVER ASIN, JAIME. Les Tunisiens en Espagne, à travers la toponymie. Cah. Tunisie, no. 69-70, 1970. [6630]

TALBI, MOHAMED. Les relations entre l'Ifrîqiya et l'Espagne Musulmane au III<sup>e</sup> siècle. Cah. Tunisie, no. 69-70, 1970. [6631]

TESSLER, MARK A. Cultural modernity: evidence from Tunisia. Soc. Sci. Q., Sept. 1971. [6632]

UDINA, FEDERICO. Documents relatifs à la Tunisie dans les Archives de la Couronne d'Aragon. Cah. Tunisie, no. 69-70, 1970. [6633]

VALLVE, JOAQUIN. Al-Andalus et l'Ifrîqiya au VIII<sup>e</sup> siècle: histoire et légende. Cah. Tunisie, no. 69-70, 1970. [6634]

UGANDA

HOLMES, C. F. Zanzibari influence at the southern end of Lake Victoria: the Lake Route. Afric. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1971. [6635]

KING, ANNE. The Yakan cult and Lugbara response to colonial rule. Azania, no. 5, 1970. [6636]

KIWANUKA, M. S. M. Nationality and Nationalism in Africa: the Uganda case. Can. J. Afric. Stud., Spring 1970. [6637]

RYAN, SELWYN D. Uganda: a balance sheet of the revolution. Mawazo, June 1971. [6638]

ZAIRE

BRASSINNE, JACQUES. Les relations entre la Belgique et le Congo de 1968 à 1970. Et. afric. C.R.I.S.P., June 1971. [6639]

CHASSARD, PAUL-E. Essai de bibliographie sur le Kimbanguisme. Arch. Sociol. Relig., Jan.-June 1971. [6640]

DE SEVERAC. Histoire intérieure du Congo ex-belge depuis 1960. R. Mil. gén., Feb. 1969. [6641]

DESROCHE, HENRI. D'un Evangile à une Eglise. Note sur le Kimbanguisme et la diversité de ses images. Arch. Sociol. Relig., Jan.-June 1971. [6642]

GUERY, ANDRÉ. Kasa-Vubu, président de l'Abako. Remarques afric., Apr. 1969. [6643]

GUERY, ANDRÉ. La place de Kasa-Vubu dans l'histoire du Congo. Remarques afric., May 1969. [6644]

KABEYA, GASTON. L'histoire du peuple muluba. Remarques afric., June-July 1969. [6645]

LOBHO, JEAN-PIERRE. Impact de la colonisation belge sur les structures socio-politiques au Congo: le Cas de la Société Hema en Ituri. R. congolaise Sci. humaines, Jan. 1971. [6646]

LOBHO, JEAN-PIERRE. Structure et fonctionnement du pouvoir politique chez les Bohema. R. congolaise Sci. humaines, July 1970. [6647]

PALMBERG, MAJ. Patrice Lumumba: en "utvecklad" [Patrice Lumumba: An "Undeveloped"]. Ord och bild, no. 2, 1971. [6648]

PIRET, BAUDOUIN. L'Évolution de la Situation Économique de 1950 à 1970. Et. afric. C.R.I.S.P., Aug. 1971. [6649]

RAYMAEKERS, PAUL. Histoire de Simon Kimbangu, prophète, d'après les écrivains Nfinangani et Nzungu. Arch. Sociol. Relig., Jan.-June 1971. [6650]

SAINT-MOULIN, LÉON DE. Kinshasa. R. fr. Et. pol. afric., Sept. 1971. [6651]

SALMON, PIERRE. Les Zandé sous l'administration belge (1908-1960). C. R. trimestriels séances Acad. Sci. Outre-Mer, 31, 1971. [6652]

SEVERAC, M. DE. Histoire intérieure du Congo ex-belge depuis 1960. R. Mil. gén., Feb. 1969. [6653]

TURNER, THOMAS. Mouvements de résistance chez les Mongo du Sankuru. R. congolaise Sci. humaines, Jan. 1971. [6654]

WAINWRIGHT, GEOFFREY. Theological reflections on "the Catechism concerning the Prophet Simon Kimbangu." Orita, June 1971. [6655]

ZAMBIA

GARDINER, JOHN. Some aspects of the establishment of towns in Zambia during the nineteen twenties and thirties. U. Zambia Inst. Afric. Stud., Urban Stud., no. 3, 1970. [6656]

LABRECQUE, EDOUARD. Les origines des Babemba de Zambie. Dialogue & Cult., Mar. 1970. [6657]

WOLFE, ALVIN W. Tanzania-Zambia Railway: Escape Route from Neocolonial Control? Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6658]

EAST ASIA

Hilary Conroy, University of Pennsylvania

AKASHI, YOJI. The Formation of [Japan's] Malay Military Administration And Its Policies, November 1941-July 1942. Asian Forum, July-Sept. 1971. [6659]

BEAUCHAMP, EDWARD R. Recent Trends in the Japanese Student Movement. Midwest Q., Spring 1971. [6660]

BING, DOV. Sneevliet and the Early Years of the CCP. China Q., Oct.-Dec. 1971. [6661]

BOWERS, JOHN Z. The Founding of Peking Union Medical College: Policies and Personalities [2 pts.]. Bull. Hist. Medicine, July-Aug., Sept.-Oct. 1971. [6662]

BOYLE, JOHN H. An Incident Becomes a War: Konoe's Aite Ni Sezu Declaration. Japan Interpreter, Autumn 1970. [6663]

CHAN, K. C. British Policy in the Reorganization Loan to China 1912-13. Mod. Asian Stud., Oct. 1971. [6664]

CHAN, WING-TSIT. Wang Yang-ming: A Biography. Phil. E. W., Jan. 1972. [6665]

CHANG, SEN-DOU. China's Crop-land Use, 1957. Pac. Viewpoint, May 1971. [6666]

CHAO, KANG. Sino-Soviet Exchange Rates. China Q., July-Sept. 1971. [6667]

CHEN, CHANG-SIANG. The Sugar Industry of China. Geog. J., Mar. 1971. [6668]

CHENG, PETER. Liu Shao-ch'i and the Cultural Revolution. Asian Survey, Oct. 1971. [6669]

CHUANG, CHI-FA. Japanese Textile Industry in Shanghai after the Treaty of Shimonoseki [in Chinese]. Ta-lu, May 1970. [6670]

CHUANG, CHI-FA. Peking University During the Late Ch'ing Period [in Chinese]. Ta-lu, July 1970. [6671]

CHUANG, CHI-FA. The Waichow Revolt of 1900 [in Chinese]. Ta-lu, Aug. 1970. [6672]

CHUNG, CHIN O., et al. [North Korea; 3 arts.]. J. Korean Aff., Oct. 1971. [6673]

CLUBB, O. EDMUND, et al. [Communist China, 1971; 8 arts.]. Current Hist., Sept. 1971. [6674]

COHEN, JEROME ALAN. Recognizing China. For. Aff., Oct. 1971. [6675]

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY COMMITTEE OF CONCERNED ASIAN SCHOLARS. Modern China Studies: How the Foundations Bought a Field. Bull. Concerned Asian Scholars, Summer-Fall 1971. [6676]

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY COMMITTEE OF CONCERNED ASIAN SCHOLARS. Interview with Chou En-lai. Bull. Concerned Asian Scholars, Summer-Fall 1971. [6677]

DIENY, JEAN-PIERRE. Vues japonaises sur la littérature chinoise. T'oung-pao, no. 1-4, 1971. [6678]

DRAKAKIS-SMITH, D. W. Traditional and Modern Aspects of Urban Systems in the Third World: A Case Study in Hong Kong. Pac. Viewpoint, May 1971. [6679]

DUICKER, WILLIAM J. Phan Boi Chau: Asian Revolutionary in a Changing World. J. Asian Stud., Nov. 1971. [6680]

DUUS, PETER. Japan's 'New Pacific Age.' Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6681]

DUUS, PETER. Nagai Ryūtarō and the "White Peril," 1905-1944. J. Asian Stud., Nov. 1971. [6682]

FISHER, CHARLES A. Containing China? Geog. J., Sept. 1971. [6683]

FLERSHEM, ROBERT G., and TOSHIKO, N. Nakano Family Documents: Satsuma-Choshu Trade, 1856-1866. Monum. Nipponica, no. 1-2, 1971. [6684]

GEISER, PETER. The Contemporary Ainu: A People in Search of Society. Human Organ., Spring 1971. [6685]

GRAHAM, A. C. A New Translation of a Chinese Poet: Li Ho [791-817]. Bull. School Orient. Afric. Stud., U. London, pt. 3, 1971. [6686]

GUPTA, KARUNAKAR. The McMahon Line, 1911-1945. China Q., July-Sept. 1971. [6687]

HAGA, NOBORU. Furuhashi Teruji: A Wealthy Farmer of the 1890's [in Japanese]. Nihon Rekishi, Oct. 1971. [6688]

HAH, CHONG-DO. The Dynamics of the Chinese Cultural Revolution. World Pol., Jan. 1972. [6689]

- HAN, Y. C. The 1969 Constitutional Revision and Party Politics in South Korea. Pac. Aff., Summer 1971. [6690]
- HAROOTUNIAN, HARRY D. Nationalism as Intellectual History [Japan]. J. Asian Stud., Nov. 1971. [6691]
- HARRIS, RICHARD. British Relations with China. Pac. Community (Japan), July 1971. [6692]
- HO, LIEH. The "Transit Pass" Question During the Late Ch'ing [in Chinese]. Ta-lu, Dec. 1970. [6693]
- HOADLEY, J. STEPHEN, and HASEGAWA, SUKEHIRO. Sino-Japanese Relations 1950-1970: An Application of the Linkage Model of International Politics. Int. Stud. Q., June 1971. [6694]
- INOUE, TATSUO. Historical Characteristics of Regional Clans [in Japanese]. Nihon Rekishi, Sept. 1971. [6695]
- ISHIZUKA, HIROMICHI. Baku-han Formation of Military Industries [pts. 1 and 2; in Japanese]. Shigaku Zasshi, Aug., Sept. 1971. [6696]
- JAN, GEORGE P. Public Opinion's Growing Influence on Japan's China Policy. Journalism Q., Spring 1971. [6697]
- KIM, S. S. Burlingame and the Inauguration of the Co-operative Policy. Mod. Asian Stud., Oct. 1971. [6698]
- KITAOJI, HIRANOBU. The Structure of the Japanese Family. Am. Anthropol., Oct. 1971. [6699]
- KLEIN, IRA. The Anglo-Russian Convention and the Problem of Central Asia, 1907-1914. J. Brit. Stud., Nov. 1971. [6700]
- KO, SEUNG K. South Korea's Policy Toward the Non-Aligned Countries. Asian Forum, Apr.-June 1971. [6701]
- LEARY, WILLIAM M., JR. Portrait of a Cold War Warrior: Whiting Willauer and Civil Air Transport. Mod. Asian Stud., Oct. 1971. [6702]
- LEE, CHAE-JIN. Socio-Economic Conditions and Party Politics in Japan: A Statistical Analysis of the 1969 General Election. J. Pol., Feb. 1971. [6703]
- LEE, HAHN-BEEN, and WHANG, IN-JOUNG. Development of Senior Administrators: The Korean Experience. Koreana Q., Autumn 1971. [6704]
- LI, WEN L. Migration Differentials in Taiwan, 1920-1940: A Comparative Study. J. Dev. Areas, Jan. 1972. [6705]
- LIEBERTHAL, KENNETH. Mao Versus Liu? Policy Towards Industry and Commerce: 1946-1949. China Q., July-Sept. 1971. [6706]
- LIU, TSUN-YAN. The Penetration of Taoism into the Ming Neo-Confucian Elite. T'oung-pao, no. 1-4, 1971. [6707]
- LUBOT, EUGENE. The Formation of Political Convictions: Liberalism vs. Communism in Modern China. Asian Forum, July-Sept. 1971. [6708]
- LÜ, SHIH-CH'ANG. The Political Thought of Feng Kuei-fen [in Chinese]. Chung-hua wen-hua fu-hsing yüeh-k'an, Feb. 1971. [6709]
- LUI, ADAM. The Education of the Manchus, China's Ruling Race (1644-1911). J. Asian Afric. Stud., Apr. 1971. [6710]
- LUTZ, JESSIE G. The Chinese Student Movement of 1945-1949. J. Asian Stud., Nov. 1971. [6711]
- MASUMI, JUNNOSUKE. The Japanese Political System of 1955. Asian Forum, Apr.-June 1971. [6712]
- MATSUMOTO, SANNOSUKE. The Significance of Nationalism in Modern Japanese Thought. J. Asian Stud., Nov. 1971. [6713]
- MAYO, MARLENE J. Some Reflections on New Texts in Japanese History and the Current State of American Scholarship on Japan. J. Asian Stud., Nov. 1971. [6714]
- MILLER, ALLAN. Ritsuryō Japan: The State as Liturgical Community. Hist. Relig., Aug. 1971. [6715]
- MILLER, STUART CREIGHTON. An East Coast Perspective to Chinese Exclusion, 1852-1882. Historian, Feb. 1971. [6716]
- MIYAKAWA, HISASHI. On the Concept of Immortals in Taoism [in Japanese]. Shirin, June 1971. [6717]
- MIYATA, NOBORU, et al. Religion in History [in Japanese]. Rekishigaku Kenkyū, Nov. 1971. [6718]
- MORLEY, JAMES WILLIAM. The First Seven Weeks [of the Japanese Occupation]. Japan Interpreter, Summer 1970. [6719]
- MUN, SA-WI. On Reclamation of the Kinai Region by Korean Immigrants in the Three Kingdoms Period [in Japanese]. Rekishigaku Kenkyū, July 1971. [6720]
- MUNRO, DONALD J. The Malleability of Man in Chinese Marxism. China Q., Oct.-Dec. 1971. [6721]
- NAGAHARA, KEIJI (ed.). Views of World History and Problems of the Study of the History of People's Struggles [in Japanese]. Rekishigaku Kenkyū, Oct. 1971. [6722]
- NAJITA, TETSUO. Restorationism in the Political Thought of Yamagata Daini (1725-1767). J. Asian Stud., Nov. 1971. [6723]
- NAMBU, NOBORU. Empresses and the Imperial Lineage [in Japanese]. Nihon Rekishi, Nov. 1971. [6724]
- NOMURA, TADAO. On the Law of Ranks for Ritsuryō Officials [in Japanese]. Shigaku Zasshi, Sept. 1971. [6725]
- NOTEHELPER, FRED. G. Kōtoku Shūsui and Nationalism. J. Asian Stud., Nov. 1971. [6726]
- Notes on China, U.S. & UNESCO. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6727]
- NUMATA, TETSU. On the Thought and Behavior of a Wealthy Farmer at the Time of Transition [in Japanese]. Nihon Rekishi, Nov. 1971. [6728]
- OKI, MOTOKU. The Philosophical Foundation of Fukuda Hideko: Her Concept of Nation [in Japanese]. Rekishigaku Kenkyū, Oct. 1971. [6729]
- OKSENBERG, MICHEL. The Strategies of Peking. For. Aff., Oct. 1971. [6730]
- OTA, JUNZO. Manors and the Encouragement of Agriculture in the Kamakura Period [pts. 1 and 2; in Japanese]. Rekishigaku Kenkyū, Sept., Oct. 1971. [6731]
- OTSUKA, HATSUE. Problems in the Study of Earth Tombs [in Japanese]. Nihon Rekishi, Oct. 1971. [6732]
- PENG, MING-MIN. Political Offences in Taiwan: Laws and Problems. China Q., July-Sept. 1971. [6733]
- P'ENG, TSE-CHOU. The Early Relations Between the Han-ye-h'ing Company and Japan [in Chinese]. Ta-lu, June 1970. [6734]
- PEPPER, SUZANNE. The Student Movement and the Chinese Civil War. China Q., Oct.-Dec. 1971. [6735]

- PUGACH, NOEL H. Standard Oil and Petroleum Development in Early Republican China. Bus. Hist. R., Winter 1971. [6736]
- PLYE, KENNETH B. Some Recent Approaches to Japanese Nationalism. J. Asian Stud., Nov. 1971. [6737]
- REA, KENNETH W. The Five-Anti Campaign in Communist China. Asian Forum, Apr.-June 1971. [6738]
- ROBINSON, THOMAS W. The Wuhan Incident: Local Strife and Provincial Rebellion During the Cultural Revolution. China Q., July-Sept. 1971. [6739]
- SCHANTZ, ROY N. The International Double Image of "China" and "Cathay." Historian, Nov. 1970. [6740]
- SCHWARTZ, BENJAMIN I. The New Turn in Sino-U.S. Relations: Background and Significance. Pac. Community (Japan), Oct. 1971. [6741]
- SEYBOLT, PETER J. The Yenian Revolution in Mass Education. China Q., Oct.-Dec. 1971. [6742]
- SOTOYAMA, MIKIO. On Constables in Early Muromachi [in Japanese]. Nihon Rekishi, Nov. 1971. [6743]
- STEINBERG, DAVID. Law Development and Korean Society. Koreana Q., Autumn 1971. [6744]
- SUN, E-TU ZEN. Ming Labor in the Ch'ing Period [in Chinese]. J. Inst. Chinese Stud., no. 1, 1970. [6745]
- SUN, E-TU ZEN. The Transportation of Yunnan Copper to Peking in the Ch'ing Period [in Chinese]. J. Orient. Stud., no. 1, 1971. [6746]
- TAKAHASHI, TOMIO. Problems Regarding the Akita Castle [in Japanese]. Nihon Rekishi, Oct. 1971. [6747]
- TAKEUCHI, MINORU. The Background to Chinese Studies in Japan. Japan Q., July-Sept. 1971. [6748]
- THORNE, CHRISTOPHER. Viscount Cecil, the Government and the Far Eastern Crisis of 1931. Hist. J., Dec. 1971. [6749]
- USUI, KATSUMI. Pursuing an Illusion: The New Order in East Asia. Japan Interpreter, Autumn 1970. [6750]
- WANG, ERH-MING. Searching for Problems in Modern Chinese Intellectual History [in Chinese]. Chung-hua wen-hua fu-hsing yüeh-k'an, May 1971. [6751]
- WANG, TSENG-TSAL. The Audience Question: Foreign Representatives and the Emperor of China, 1858-1873. Hist. J., Sept. 1971. [6752]
- WEAKLAND, JOHN H. Chinese Film Images of Invasion and Resistance. China Q., July-Sept. 1971. [6753]
- YOSHINAMI, TAKASHI. The Dual Structure of the Former Han [in Japanese]. Rekishigaku Kenkyū, Aug. 1971. [6754]

SOUTHEAST ASIA

D. R. SarDesai, University of California, Los Angeles

GENERAL

- CHAN, K. E.; CHO, C. H.; and KHOO, S. H. Place-names in the Sitiawan Area, Perak. J. S.E. Asian Stud., Sept. 1971. [6755]
- CHEONG, W. E. The Decline of Manila as the Spanish Entrepôt in the Far East, 1785-1826: Its Impact on the Pattern of Southeast Asian Trade. J. S.E. Asian Stud., Sept. 1971. [6756]
- CRISSELL, C. N. The Origins of the Limbang Claim. J. S.E. Asian Stud., Sept. 1971. [6757]
- DUNCANSON, DENNIS. Whither Indo-China? J. Roy. Central Asian Soc., June 1971. [6758]
- EMERSON, RUPERT. Post-Independence Nationalism in South and Southeast Asia: A Reconsideration. Pac. Aff., Summer 1971. [6759]
- FILLIOZAT, JEAN. Notice sur la vie et les travaux de M. George Coedes. Bull. Ecole fr. Extrême-Orient, LVII, 1970. [6760]
- GONZALEZ, ALFREDO Q. A Layman's Analysis of the Phil-Japan Treaty. S.E. Asia Q., Second Quarter 1970. [6761]
- HUARD, PIERRE. Le Pionnier de la Technologie Vietnamiennne Henri Oger (1885-1936?). Bull. Ecole fr. Extrême-Orient, LVII, 1970. [6762]
- HUYNH, KIM KHANH. The Vietnamese August Revolution Reinterpreted. J. Asian Stud., Aug. 1971. [6763]
- IKEDA, MASATAKA. The Shwedagon Pagoda Thamaing in Burma. J. Indian Buddhist Stud., Mar. 1971. [6764]
- JACQUES, CLAUDE. Etudes d'Epigraphie cambodgienne. Bull. Ecole fr. Extrême-Orient, LVII, 1970. [6765]
- KNAUP, KATHIANNE. Native Court in Sabah: The Survival of Customary Law in a Common Law State. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6766]
- LARKIN, JOHN A. The Causes of an Involved Society: A Theoretical Approach to Rural Southeast Asian History. J. Asian Stud., Aug. 1971. [6767]
- LEWITZ, SAVEROS. Textes en Kmer Moyen Inscriptions modernes d'Angkor 2 et 3. Bull. Ecole fr. Extrême-Orient, LVII, 1970. [6768]
- LEWITZ, SAVEROS. Recherches sur le vocabulaire cambodgien (V), les mots Lan-len/Lanlyin dans les inscriptions khmeres. J. Asiatique, no. 1-2, 1969. [6769]
- LOCKARD, CRAIG A. Leadership and Power within the Chinese Community of Sarawak: A Historical Survey. J. S.E. Asian Stud., Sept. 1971. [6770]
- MAHAJANI, USHA. President Kennedy and United States Policy in Laos, 1961-63. J. S.E. Asian Stud., Sept. 1971. [6771]
- MATHESON, VIRGINIA. The Tuhfat Al-Nafis: Structure and Sources. Bjd. Tot de Taal-, Land-en Volkenkunde, 3<sup>e</sup> Aflevering, 1971. [6772]
- MINATTUR, JOSEPH. Malay and Malayalam. Indo-Asian Cult., Apr. 1971. [6773]
- MORECHAND, GUY. Paul Mus (1902-1969). Bull. Ecole fr. Extrême-Orient, LVII, 1970. [6774]
- NAWAWI, MOHD. A. Punitive Colonialism: The Dutch and the Indonesian National Integration. J. S.E. Asian Stud., Sept. 1971. [6775]

Notes on Malaysia. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6776]

Notes on Cambodia. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6777]

Notes on U.S., Vietnam & U Thant. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6778]

PURI, BRIJ NATH. Ganesa and Ganapati Cult in India and South-east Asia. J. Indian Hist., Aug. 1970. [6779]

SOEBARDI. Santri-Religious Elements as reflected in the Book of Tjenti. Bijdr. Tot de Taal-, Land-en Volkenkunde, 3<sup>e</sup> Aflevering, 1971. [6780]

STERNBACH, LUDWIK. Similar Thoughts in the Mahabharata, the Literature of "Greater India" and in the Christian Gospels. J. Am. Orient. Soc., July-Sept. 1971. [6781]

YEO, KIM WAH. The Selangor Succession Dispute, 1933-38. J. S.E. Asian Stud., Sept. 1971. [6782]

SOUTH ASIA

Stephen Hay, University of California, Santa Barbara

SOUTH ASIA: ANCIENT

AHIR, D. C. Buddhism and Sikhism. Maha Bodhi, Oct.-Nov. 1970. [6783]

BANERJEE, P. A Manuscript dated in the Regnal Year 53 of Rampala. Indo-Asian Cult., Jan. 1969. [6784]

BARUA, DIPAK KUMAR. India's Social Condition as depicted in the Buddhist Canon. Maha Bodhi, June 1969. [6785]

BIVAR, A. D. H. Hariti and the Chronology of the Kusanas. Bull. School Orient. Afric. Stud., U. London, pt. 1, 1970. [6786]

CHAKROBARTY, SANTOSH. Library in Ancient India. Mod. R., Dec. 1969. [6787]

DANI, AHMAD HASAN. Kushana Civilisation in Pakistan. J. Asiatic Soc. Pakistan, Apr. 1969. [6788]

GEORGE, P. T. The Evolution of Land Tenures in India. Artha Vijnāna, Mar.-June 1970. [6789]

GHOSH, U. N. A Pre-Historic Event in Diffusion of Indian Culture. Indo-Asian Cult., July 1969. [6790]

GOKHALE, BALAKRISHNA GOVIND. The Early Buddhist View of the State. J. Am. Orient. Soc., Oct.-Dec. 1969. [6791]

IRELAND, JOHN D. Indian Origins. Maha Bodhi, Jan. 1969. [6792]

JAYATILLEKE, K. N. The Historical Context of the Rise of Buddhism. Maha Bodhi, Mar. 1969. [6793]

KHAN, HUSSAIN. The Role of the People of Sind in the Struggle between Muhammad Ibn Qasim and Raja Dahir. J. Asiatic Soc. Pakistan, Dec. 1969. [6794]

KHLOPIN, I. N. Indo-Iranians: Farmers or Cattlebreeders [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vopr. Ist., no. 10, 1970. [6795]

MALONEY, CLARENCE. The Paratavar: 2000 Years of Culture Dynamics of a Tamil Caste. Man in India, July-Sept. 1969. [6796]

MUDIYANSE, NANDENSA. A Mahayanist Sculpture from Bodhi-Gaya. Maha Bodhi, Oct.-Nov. 1970. [6797]

NAZIA, SHAHEER. The Origin of the Pathans. J. Pakistan Hist. Soc., Jan. 1970. [6798]

PADDAYYA, K. Radiocarbon Dates and the South Indian Neolithic Culture. Antiquity, June 1971. [6799]

PRAKASH, BUDDHA. The Genesis and Character of Landed Aristocracy in Ancient India. J. Ec. Soc. Hist. Orient, Aug. 1971. [6800]

RAMANATHAN, P. Irunkovel and the Kottai Velalar—The Possible Origins of a Closed Community. Bull. School Orient. Afric. Stud., U. London, pt. 2, 1969. [6801]

RANGNEKAR, SHARU S. The Strategy of Alexander the Great. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 2, 1969-70. [6802]

SAXENA, K. K. Emergence of Settled Community Life in N. W. Indo-Pakistan sub-continent. Indo-Asian Cult., July 1969. [6803]

SHAMSUDDIN. The Status of Women in Ancient India. Mod. R., Apr. 1969. [6804]

SHARMA, MOHAN LAL. Kanheri's Glory in the Island of Sixty Villages. Maha Bodhi, Apr. 1971. [6805]

STEIN, BURTON. Early Indian Historiography: A Conspiracy Hypothesis. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Mar. 1969. [6806]

SUDA, J. P. Dharma: Its Nature and Role in Ancient India. Indian J. Pol. Sci., Oct.-Dec. 1970. [6807]

THAPAR, ROMILA. The Image of the Barbarian in Early India. Comp. Stud. Soc. Hist., Oct. 1971. [6808]

TRAUTMAN, THOMAS R. Length of Generation and Reign in Ancient India. J. Am. Orient. Soc., July-Sept. 1969. [6809]

WEERARATNE, AMARASIRI. The Bhikkhuni Order in Ceylon. Maha Bodhi, Oct.-Nov. 1970. [6810]

SOUTH ASIA: c. 1000-c. 1700

AHMAD, A. The Role of Ulema in Indo-Muslim History. Stud. Islamica, XXXI, 1970. [6811]

ANAND, INDIRA. The Appearance of Ostenders in Indian Waters. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., June 1969. [6812]

APTE, M. D. The Nature and Scope of the Records from Peshwa Daftar with Reference to Zakat System. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Dec. 1969. [6813]

ARASARATNAM, S. The Indigenous Ruling Class in Dutch Maritime Ceylon. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Mar. 1971. [6814]

ARASARATNAM, S. The Politics of Commerce in the Coastal Kingdoms of Tamil Nad, 1650-1700. S. Asia, no. 1, 1971. [6815]

BECHERT, HEINZ. Theravada Buddhist Sangha: Some General Observations on Historical and Political Factors in its Development. J. Asian Stud., Aug. 1970. [6816]

BENJAMIN, N. Economic History of India (1526-1900). Artha Vijnāna, Dec. 1970. [6817]

CHAUDHURI, K. N. Towards an 'Intercontinental Model': Some Trends in Indo-European Trade in the 17th Century. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Mar. 1969. [6818]

CHOUDHURI, SUSIL. The Problem of Financing East India Company's Investments in Bengal: 1650-1720. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., June 1971. [6819]

GHAURI, IFTIKHAR AHMAD. Origins of the Adil Shahs of Bijapur. J. Pakistan Hist. Soc., Apr. 1969. [6820]

GHAURI, IFTIKHAR AHMAD. Origin of the Qutb Shahs of Golconda. J. Pakistan Hist. Soc., Oct. 1969. [6821]

GOPAL, SURENDRA. Gujarati Shipping in the 17th Century. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Mar. 1971. [6822]

GRAHAM, GAIL MINAULT. Akbar and Aurangzeb—Syncretism and Separation in Mughal India, A Re-examination. Muslim World, Apr. 1969. [6823]

HABIB, IRFAN. Potentialities of Capitalistic Development in the Economy of Mughal India. J. Ec. Hist., Mar. 1969. [6824]

HASSAN, RIAZ. The Nature of Islamic Urbanization—A Historical Perspective. J. Pakistan Hist. Soc., Apr. 1969. [6825]

JOSHI, P. S. The Work of Chhatrapati Rajaram in Maharashtra. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1968-69. [6826]

KARIM, K. M. Mughal Nawwara in Bengal. J. Asiatic Soc. Pakistan, Apr. 1969. [6827]

KIENIEWICZ, JAN. The Portuguese Factory and Trade in Pepper in Malabar during the 16th Century. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Mar. 1969. [6828]

LE BERRE, MARE. Le Monument de Danestama en Afghanistan. R. Et. Islamiques, no. 1, 1970. [6829]

MUKHERJEE, JATINDRA NATH. Akbar the Great and Raja Birbal. Mod. R., Jan. 1969. [6830]

MUKHERJEE, JATINDRA NATH. The Mogul Empire in India. Mod. R., Apr. 1969. [6831]

NATH, R. Augustine of Bordeaux and his relations with the Mughal Court. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1968-69. [6832]

NATH, R. Mausoleum of Mariam Zamani at Sikandara (Agra). Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 2, 1970-71. [6833]

NATH, R. The Moti-Masjid of the Red Fort. Indica, Mar. 1971. [6834]

PEELER, SUE PYATT. Gerald Aungier and Bombay. Hist. Today, Aug. 1970. [6835]

RAHIM, M. A. Emperor Aurengzeb's Annexation of Jodhpur and the Rajput Rebellion. J. Asiatic Soc. Pakistan, Apr. 1969. [6836]

RAMZAN, M. Isa Khan Masnad-i-Ala, the Leader of Barah Bhuyas. J. Pakistan Hist. Soc., July 1969. [6837]

RAY, INDRANI. The French Company and the Merchants of Bengal 1680-1730. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Mar. 1971. [6838]

ROOMAN, M. ANWAR. The Thirty Years Rind Lashar War 1489-1519. J. Pakistan Hist. Soc., July 1969. [6839]

SALIM, MUHAMMAD. Shaykh Baha al-Din Zakariyya. J. Pakistan Hist. Soc., Jan. 1969. [6840]

SANGAR, SATYA PRASAD. Food and Food Habits in Mughal India. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 4, 1969-70. [6841]

SEYMOUR, WILLIAM. The Company that Founded the Empire. Hist. Today, Sept. 1969. [6842]

SHYAM, RADHEY. Akbar and Pushti-marg Vaishnavism. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 2, 1968-69. [6843]

SINGH, O. P. The English Trade at Surat in the late 17th Century. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 4, 1968-69. [6844]

SPENCER, GEORGE W. Royal Initiative under Rajaraja I: The Auditing of Temple accounts. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Dec. 1970. [6845]

STARGARDT, JANICE. Burma's Economic and Diplomatic Relations with India and China from Early Medieval Sources. J. Ec. Soc. Hist. Orient, Apr. 1971. [6846]

TAMASKAR, B. G. The Date of Shahji's Death. Indica, Mar. 1971. [6847]

Thera, WALPOLA SRI RAHULA. The Influence of Buddhism on Ceylon's Culture. Maha Bodhi, May, June 1970. [6848]

SOUTH ASIA: EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

CALKINS, PHILIP B. The Formation of a Regionally Oriented Ruling Group in Bengal, 1706-1740. J. Asian Stud., Aug. 1970. [6849]

CANNON, GARLAND. Sir William Jones's Indian Studies. J. Am. Orient. Soc., July-Sept. 1971. [6850]

DAS, BINOD SANKAR. British Relations with S. W. Bengal. Mod. R., July 1969. [6851]

GORDON, STEWART N. Scarf and Sword: Thugs, Marauders, and State-formation in 18th Century Malwa. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Dec. 1969. [6852]

MOHSIN, K. M. Food Policy of Warren Hastings. J. Asiatic Soc. Pakistan, Apr. 1969. [6853]

SARAJUDDIN, A. M. The Origin of the Rajas of the Chittagong Hill Tracts and their Relations with the Mughals and the East India Company in the 18th Century. J. Pakistan Hist. Soc., Jan. 1971. [6854]

SHARMA, SUNDARI KUM. Durga Das Rathore and his relations with his Master Ajit Singh Rathore of Marwar. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 4, 1968-69. [6855]

SINHA, CHITTARANJAN. Doctrinal Influences in the Judicial Policy of the East India Company's Administration in Bengal, 1772-1883. Hist. J., no. 2, 1969. [6856]

SOUTH ASIA: NINETEENTH CENTURY

AHMAD, SAFI. Darshan Singh—A Refractory Talukdar of Awadh. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 2, 1970-71. [6857]

ALI, S. M. Syed Amir Ali. J. Asiatic Soc. Pakistan, Dec. 1969. [6858]

ARCHER, MILDRED. Benares and the British. Hist. Today, June 1969. [6859]

BAROOAH, NIRODE K. David Scott and the Question of Slavery in Assam: A Case Study in British Paternalism. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., June 1969. [6860]

BAYLY, C. A. Local Control in Indian Towns: The Case of Allahabad 1880-1920. Mod. Asian Stud., Oct. 1971. [6861]

BHATIA, B. M. Terms of Trade and Economic Development: A case study of India, 1861-1939. Indian Ec. J., Apr.-June 1969. [6862]

- BRENNAN, L. Social Change in Rohilkand 1801-1893: The Formation of a Zamindar Class. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Dec. 1970. [6863]
- BRODKIN, E. I. Proprietary Mutations and the Mutiny in Rohilkand. J. Asian Stud., Aug. 1969. [6864]
- BROOMFIELD, J. H. Four Lives: History as Biography. S. Asia, no. 1, 1971. [6865]
- CHANDRA, JAGADISH. Sir Syed Ahmad Khan and the Indian National Congress. Mod. R., Apr. 1969. [6866]
- CHATTERJEE, S. The Cause of Lushai Rising 1891-92: An Unknown Episode of our North East Frontier. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 4, 1969-70. [6867]
- CHAUDHURI, BINAY BHUSHAN. Rural Credit Relations in Bengal, 1859-1885. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Sept. 1969. [6868]
- DAS, NARAYAN. Controversy over the First Civil Marriage Bill in India. Mod. R., July 1970. [6869]
- DENHOLM, A. F. The Conversion of Lord Ripon—Christian Socialist, Grandmaster of the English Freemasons, and Gladstonian Statesman. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1969-70. [6870]
- GHOSE, DILIP KUMAR. The Kashmir Residency Question (1846-85). Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 1, 1968-69. [6871]
- HARNETTY, PETER. Cotton Exports and Indian Agriculture, 1861-1870. Ec. Hist. R., Aug. 1971. [6872]
- JAWED, NASIM AHMAD. Religion and Modernity: Some Nineteenth- and Twentieth-century Indo-Pakistan Ideas. Muslim World, Apr. 1971. [6873]
- KESSINGER, TOM G. Historical Materials on Rural India. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Dec. 1970. [6874]
- KHAN, HUSAIN. Why was the Congress founded in 1885? J. Pakistan Hist. Soc., July 1969. [6875]
- KLEIN, IRA. English Free Traders and Indian Tariffs, 1875-1890. Mod. Asian Stud., July 1971. [6876]
- KLEIN, IRA. Wilson vs Trevelyan: Finance and Modernisation in India after 1857. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., June 1970. [6877]
- KUMAR, DHARMA. The Economy Under the Raj. S. Asian R., July 1970. [6878]
- LEONARD, KAREN. The Hyderabad Political System and the Participants. J. Asian Stud., May 1971. [6879]
- LEOPOLD, JOAN. The Aryan Theory of Race in India, 1870-1920: Nationalist and Internationalist Visions. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., June 1970. [6880]
- MALIK, HAFEEZ. Sir Sayyid Ahmad Khan's Contribution to the Development of Muslim Nationalism in India. Mod. Asian Stud., Apr. 1970. [6881]
- MASSELOS, J. C. Bombay in the 1870s: A Study of Changing Patterns in Urban Politics. S. Asia, no. 1, 1971. [6882]
- MEHROTRA, S. A. The Poona Sarvajanik Sabha: The Early Phase 1870-1880. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Sept. 1969. [6883]
- MEHTA, MARKAND J. Educational Changes in Gujarat in the First Half of the 19th Century. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 4, 1968-69. [6884]
- MISRA, J. P. Lansdowne and the Indian National Congress. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 2, 1968-69. [6885]
- MOHL, RAYMOND A. Confrontation in Central Asia, 1885. Hist. Today, Mar. 1969. [6886]
- MUKHERJEE, SUJIT. Tagore and Vivekanand. Quest, May-June 1971. [6887]
- NARAIN, PREM. Sir Sayyid Ahmad Khan and Muslim Political Thinking. Mod. R., July 1970. [6888]
- ODDIE, G. A. Protestant Missions, Caste and Social Change in India 1850-1914. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Sept. 1969. [6889]
- OWTRAM, T. C. Warren Hastings. Hist. Today, July 1969. [6890]
- PANDIT, DHAIRYABALA. The Myths around Sub-division and Fragmentation of Holdings: A Few Case Histories. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., June 1969. [6891]
- POWELL, GEOFFREY. Johnston's March on Kandy, 1804. Hist. Today, May 1969. [6892]
- RAJAN, M. S. The Impact of British Rule in India. J. Contemp. Hist., Jan. 1969. [6893]
- RANGANATH, A. Raja Ram Mohan Roy and Social Change in Modern India. Indo-Asian Cult., Oct. 1969. [6894]
- RAO, T. V. S. Land Legislation in Kerala State (1800-1960). Artha Vijnāna, Mar.-June 1970. [6895]
- REDDY, K. N. Indian Defense Expenditure: 1872-1967. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Dec. 1970. [6896]
- ROBINSON, F. C. R. Consultation and Control: The United Provinces' Government and its Allies 1880-1906. Mod. Asian Stud., Oct. 1971. [6897]
- ROOKSBY, R. L. W. H. R. Rivers and the Todas. S. Asia, Aug. 1971. [6898]
- ROSSELLI, JOHN. Theory and Practice in North India: The Background of the Land "Settlement" of 1883. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., June 1971. [6899]
- ROTHERMUND, DIETMAR. An Aspect of the Monetary Policy of British Imperialism. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Mar. 1970. [6900]
- ROTHERMUND, DIETMAR. Government, Landlord and Tenant in India, 1875-1900. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Dec. 1969. [6901]
- SENGUPTA, KALYAN KUMAR. Agrarian Disturbances in Eastern and Central Bengal in the Late 19th Century. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., June 1971. [6902]
- SENGUPTA, K. K. The Agrarian League of Pabna, 1873. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., June 1970. [6903]
- SENIOR, HEReward. Mercenaries in British Service. Hist. Today, July 1970. [6904]
- SIDDIQI, ASIYA. Agrarian Depression in Uttar Pradesh in 1828-33. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., June 1969. [6905]
- STAPLES, A. C. Indian Maritime Transport in 1840. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Mar. 1970. [6906]
- SUNTHARALINGAM, R. The Salem Riots, 1882. Judiciary versus Executive in the Mediation of a Communal Dispute. Mod. Asian Stud., July 1969. [6907]

TUCKER, RICHARD P. From Dharmashastra to Politics: Aspects of Social Authority in 19th Century Maharashtra. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Sept. 1970. [6908]

ZELLIOT, ELEANOR. The 19th Century Background of the Mahar and Non-Brahman Movements in Maharashtra. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Sept. 1970. [6909]

SOUTH ASIA: c. 1900–c. 1947

AMBANNAVAR, JAIPAL P. Comparability and Adjustment of the Indian Working Force Data, Censuses 1911–61. Artha Vijñāna, Dec. 1969. [6910]

BAHA, LAL. Activities of Turkish Agents in Khyber during World War I. J. Asiatic Soc. Pakistan, Aug. 1969. [6911]

BAHA, LAL. The North West Frontier in the First World War. Roy. Central Asian J., Feb. 1970. [6912]

BAIG, M. R. A. The Partition of Bengal and its Aftermath. Indian J. Pol. Sci., Apr.–June 1969. [6913]

BAINS, J. S. Lala Lajpat Rai's Idealism and the Indian National Movement. Indian J. Pol. Sci., Dec. 1969. [6914]

BHAMBERI, C. P. Nehru and Socialist Movement in India (1920–1947). Indian J. Pol. Sci., Apr.–June 1969. [6915]

CHOPRA, P. N. Role of Liberal Englishmen in India's Struggle for Freedom. Indo-Asian Cult., Apr. 1969. [6916]

DAS, J. L. Azad Hind Government: Its Genesis. Mod. R., Jan. 1969. [6917]

DAS, J. L. Mahatama Gandhi and Acharya Prafulla Chandra. Mod. R., Jan. 1970. [6918]

DESHPANDE, V. D. History of Tenancy Relations in the State of Maharashtra Since 1900. Artha Vijñāna, Mar.–June 1970. [6919]

DIGNAN, DON K. The Hindu Conspiracy in Anglo-American Relations during World War I. Pac. Hist. R., Feb. 1971. [6920]

DUTTA, AMITA. The Economy of Inter-War Ceylon: A Neo-classical Model of Trade and Migration. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Mar. 1970. [6921]

FERNANDO, P. T. M. The British Raj and the 1915 Communal Riots in Ceylon. Mod. Asian Stud., July 1969. [6922]

GANGULI, B. N. Gandhian Contribution to Indian Thought. India Q., Oct.–Dec. 1970. [6923]

GANGULI, B. N. Lenin and Gandhi. India Q., Jan.–Mar. 1971. [6924]

GANGULI, H. C. Hindu-Muslim Problem in Gandhian Programme. India Q., Oct.–Dec. 1970. [6925]

GEORGE, P. T. Land System and Legislation in Madras. Artha Vijñāna, Mar.–June 1970. [6926]

GOKHALE, B. G. Gandhi and the British Empire. Hist. Today, Nov. 1969. [6927]

GUHA, ARUN CHANDRA. Economic Ideas of Mahatama Gandhi. Indo-Asian Cult., Oct. 1969. [6928]

HAITHCOX, JOHN PATRICK. Left Wing Unity and the Indian Nationalist Movement: M. N. Roy and the Congress Socialist Party. Mod. Asian Stud., Jan. 1969. [6929]

HESS, GARY. The "Hindu" in America: Immigration and Naturalisation Policies and India, 1917–1946. Pac. Hist. R., Feb. 1969. [6930]

ISHAQUE, KHALID M. Role of History in the Growth of National Consciousness. J. Pakistan Hist. Soc., Jan. 1969. [6931]

KITAGAWA, JOSEPH M., and REYNOLDS, FRANK. Theravada-Buddhismus im zwanzigsten Jahrhundert. Saeculum, nos. 2–4, 1969. [6932]

KOMAROV, E. N. Gandhi and the Russian Revolution [in Russian; Eng. summary]. Vopr. Ist., no. 10, 1969. [6933]

KOMAROV, E. N. Mahatama Gandhi and the Revolution. India Q., Oct.–Dec. 1970. [6934]

KOSS, STEPHAN E. Morley and Kitchener: A Private War. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 1, 1968–69. [6935]

MCPHERSON, KENNETH. The Social Background and Politics of the Muslims of Tamilnad, 1901–1937. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Dec. 1969. [6936]

MEHTA, USHA. Gandhi, Tolstoy and Ruskin. Indian J. Pol. Sci., Oct.–Dec. 1969. [6937]

NAIR, P. THANKAPPAN. The Martyrdom of Bagha Jatin. Mod. R., Oct. 1970. [6938]

NARAYAN, JAYA PRAKASH. Gandhi and the Politics of Decentralisation. Quest, Jan.–Mar. 1970. [6939]

POLONSKAYA, L. R., and SHASTITKO, P. M. Ajoy Ghosh [in Russian]. Vopr. Ist., no. 6, 1969. [6940]

RAIKOV, A. V. Bhagat Singh and the Legacy of his Ideas [in Russian]. Narodi Azii Afrik., no. 1, 1971. [6941]

RAMANUJAM, S. History of Trade Union Movement in India. Mod. R., Jan. 1970. [6942]

RAMUSACK, BARBARA N. Incident at Nabha: Interaction between Indian States and British Indian Politics. J. Asian Stud., May 1969. [6943]

RAO, RAJESWARA P. Role of the Indian National Army in Expediting our Liberation. Mod. R., Oct. 1969. [6944]

ROTHERMUND, D. Gandhi as a Politician. India Q., Oct.–Dec. 1970. [6945]

ROTHERMUND, INDIRA. Gandhi and Maharashtra: Nationalism and the National Response. S. Asia, no. 1, 1971. [6946]

ROTHERMUND, INDIRA. The Individual and Society in Gandhi's Political Thought. J. Asian Stud., Feb. 1969. [6947]

ROY, PRASANTA. Bipin Chandra Pal, the Philosopher-Statesman. Mod. R., May 1970. [6948]

SENGUPTA, ARATI. Sister Nivedita and Swadeshi Movement. Mod. R., Jan. 1969. [6949]

SHAH, A. B. Gandhi and the Muslim World. Quest, Jan.–Mar. 1970. [6950]

SINGH, K. S. Mahatama Gandhi and the Adivasis. Man in India, Jan.–Mar. 1970. [6951]

VERMA, DINA NATH. Some International Aspects of India's Constitutional Development (1919–1935). Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1968–69. [6952]

SOUTH ASIA: POST-1947

- AHMAD, AIJAZ. Erikson's Untruth. Human Inquiries, nos. 1-3, 1970. [6953]
- AHMED, BASHIRUDDIN. Caste and Electoral Politics. Asian Survey, Nov. 1970. [6954]
- ALLEN, W. E. D. Afghan Landscape. Roy. Central Asian J., Feb. 1970. [6955]
- ALLEN, ZOE. Land Reform in a Democratic Framework. S. Asian R., Oct. 1969. [6956]
- AMES, MICHAEL M. Indian Castes Old and New. Pac. Aff., Spring 1971. [6957]
- ANAND, R. P. The Status of Tibet in International Law. Int. Stud., Apr. 1969. [6958]
- ANTONY, FERNANDO. Buddhismus im heutigen Ceylon. Saeculum, nos. 2-4, 1969. [6959]
- AYOOB, MOHAMMED. Pakistan's Trade Relations with The Soviet Union. Int. Stud., July 1969. [6960]
- BANNERJEE, KALYAN KUMAR. Historiography in Modern India: Some Relevant Issues. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 3, 1970-71. [6961]
- BECK, BRENDA E. F. The Right-Left Division of South Indian Society. J. Asian Stud., Aug. 1970. [6962]
- BISHOP, DONALD H. Caste in India, Past and Present. Soc. Stud., Jan. 1971. [6963]
- BOWLES, CHESTER. America and Russia in India. For. Aff., July 1971. [6964]
- BROWN, MACALISTER. The Diplomatic Development of Nepal. Asian Survey, July 1971. [6965]
- CHAKRAVARTI, P. C. India and the Tibetan Question. Int. Stud., Apr. 1969. [6966]
- COHEN, STEPHEN P. The Untouchable Soldier—Caste, Politics and the Indian Army. J. Asian Stud., May 1969. [6967]
- COORAY, L. J. M., and JUPP, JAMES. The Constitutional System in Ceylon. Pac. Aff., Spring 1970. [6968]
- CORCA, A. One Hundred Years of Education in Ceylon. Mod. Asian Stud., Apr. 1969. [6969]
- DAS, PARIMAL KUMAR. The Indo-Chinese Crises and India's Efforts towards Peace Making, 1959-1966. Int. Stud., Jan. 1969. [6970]
- DUTT, GARGI. Peking, the Indian Communist Movement and International Communism 1962-70. Asian Survey, Oct. 1971. [6971]
- ELDERSVELD, SAMUEL J. Elections and the Party System: Patterns of Party Regularity and Defection in 1967. Asian Survey, Nov. 1970. [6972]
- EMERSON, RUPERT. Post Independence Nationalism in South and South East Asia: A Reconsideration. Pac. Aff., Summer 1971. [6973]
- EVANS, HUBERT. The Language Problem in Multi-National States: The Case of India and Pakistan. Roy. Central Asian J., June 1971. [6974]
- EVERS, HANS-DIETER. Monastic Landlordism in Ceylon: A Traditional System in a Modern Setting. J. Asian Stud., Aug. 1969. [6975]
- FELDMAN, HERBERT. The Communal Problem in the Indo-Pakistan Sub-continent: Some Current Implications. Pac. Aff., Summer 1969. [6976]
- FICKETT, LEWIS P., JR. The Politics of Regionalism in India. Pac. Aff., Summer 1971. [6977]
- FISKE, ADELE M. Buddhistische Bewegungen in Indien. Saeculum, nos. 2-4, 1969. [6978]
- FRANDA, MARCUS F. Electoral Politics in West Bengal: The Growth of the United Front. Pac. Aff., Fall 1969. [6979]
- FRYKENBERG, ROBERT ERIC. The Partition of India: A Quarter Century After [r. art.]. AHR, Apr. 1972. [6980]
- FURBER, HOLDEN. Asia and the West as Partners, Before "Empire" and After. J. Asian Stud., Aug. 1969. [6981]
- GEORGE, P. T. Land Reforms in Andhra Pradesh—Some Problems of Implementation of Tenancy Reforms. Artha Vijnāna, Dec. 1970. [6982]
- HARRISON, J. B. The Rulers and the Ruled. S. Asian R., Oct. 1969. [6983]
- HAYDAR, AFAK. The Rise and Fall of Ayub Khan. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6984]
- HONE, ANGUS. India's Fourth Plan: The Missing Steps. S. Asian R., Oct. 1970. [6985]
- HOPPER, PAUL J. The Role of Indigenous Languages in Three Third World Nations. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [6986]
- JHA, D. C. Pakistan's Foreign Policy: An Analytical Study. Indian J. Pol. Sci., Apr.-June 1970. [6987]
- JHA, D. C. Roots of Indo-Pakistan Discord. Indian J. Pol. Sci., Jan.-Mar. 1971. [6988]
- KARANDIKAR, M. A. The Hindu-Muslim Problem. Quest, Oct.-Dec. 1970. [6989]
- KIRTHISINGHE, BUDDHADASA P. German-American Mother of Ceylon's Buddhist Womanhood. Mod. R., Dec. 1969. [6990]
- KOTHARI, RAJNI. Continuity and Change in India's Party System. Asian Survey, Nov. 1970. [6991]
- KURUNDKAR, NARAHAR. The Muslim Problem in Indian Politics. Quest, Oct.-Dec. 1970. [6992]
- MACHALPURKAR, R. S. On Sovereignty of the Indian Princes. Mod. R., Apr. 1971. [6993]
- MACMILLAN, MARGARET. The Indian Army since Independence. S. Asian R., Oct. 1970. [6994]
- MALIK, HAFEEZ. The Muslims of India and Pakistan. Current Hist., Mar. 1969. [6995]
- MASSEY, HECTOR J. The Commonwealth since the Second World War. J. Asian Afric. Stud., Oct. 1970. [6996]
- MAXWELL, NEVILLE. Sino-Indian Relations since 1960. Asia, Spring 1970. [6997]
- MISHRA, RAM SAGAR. Partition in Retrospect. Mod. R., Dec. 1970. [6998]
- MOHAPATRA, MANINDRA KUMAR. Questioning Behaviour in the Lok Sabha in 1952. Indian J. Pol. Sci., Oct.-Dec. 1969. [6999]
- MURTHY, T. S. India's Himalayan Frontier. Int. Stud., Apr. 1969. [7000]

- NAKKIRAM, S. The Neglect and Exploitation of Rural India. Mod. R., Dec. 1970. [7001]
- NEWELL, RICHARD S. Afghanistan: The Dangers of Cold-War Generosity. Mid. E. J., Spring 1969. [7002]
- Notes on India. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [7003]
- Notes on Pakistan. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [7004]
- PADHYE, PRABHAKAR. A Secularist View of the Muslim Problem in India. Quest, Oct.-Dec. 1970. [7005]
- PALMER, NORMAN D. China's Relations with India and Pakistan. Current Hist., Sept. 1971. [7006]
- PANSE, G. Regional Individuality of Maharashtra. Q. R. Hist. Stud., no. 4, 1969-70. [7007]
- PATIL, S. K. The Challenge of Famine: A Case Study. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [7008]
- PEARL, DAVID. Within the Limits Prescribed by Allah. S. Asian R., July 1970. [7009]
- PRABHA, CHANDER. District-wise Rates of Growth of Agricultural Output in East and West Punjab during the Pre-partition and Post-partition Periods. Indian Ec. Soc. Hist. R., Dec. 1969. [7010]
- RAHMAN, F. Islam and the Constitutional Problem of Pakistan. Stud. Islamica, XXXII, 1970. [7011]
- RAHMAN, M. AINSUR. East Pakistan: The Roots of Estrangement. S. Asian R., Apr. 1970. [7012]
- RAHUL, R. The Institution of Dalai Lama. Int. Stud., Apr. 1969. [7013]
- RAM, MOHAN. India: Nonalignment to Dual Satellitism. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [7014]
- RAO, P. R. The 4th General Elections in Sikkim. Mod. R., Sept. 1970. [7015]
- RAO, P. R. The Language Problem of Ceylon. Mod. R., May 1970. [7016]
- RAY, HEMEN. Changing Soviet Views on Mahatama Gandhi. J. Asian Stud., Nov. 1969. [7017]
- ROSE, LEO E. India and Sikkim: Redefining the Relationship. Pac. Aff., Spring 1969. [7018]
- SANDERATNE, NIMAL. Agricultural Credit: Ceylon's Experience. S. Asian R., Apr. 1970. [7019]
- SCHANBERG, SYDNEY H. Pakistan Divided. For. Aff., Oct. 1971. [7020]
- SEN, CHANAKYA. Tibet and the Sino-Indian Impasse. Int. Stud., Apr. 1969. [7021]
- SETH, S. P. Russia's Role in Indo-Pak Politics. Asian Survey, Aug. 1969. [7022]
- SINGER, PHILIP. Towards a Reevaluation of the Concept of Charisma with Reference to India. Mich. Academician, Summer 1971. [7023]
- SINGH, L. P. Political Development or Political Decay in India. Pac. Aff., Spring 1971. [7024]
- TINKER, H. Continuity and Change in Asian Societies. Mod. Asian Stud., Apr. 1969. [7025]
- ZAGORIA, DONALD S. The Ecology of Peasant Communism in India. Am. Pol. Sci. R., Mar. 1971. [7026]

UNITED STATES

Wood Gray, George Washington University

BIBLIOGRAPHY AND SOURCES

- ALDERSON, WILLIAM T., JR. The American Association for State and Local History [1904-]. W. Hist. Q., Apr. 1970. [7027]
- ATHEARN, ROBERT G. A View from the High Country [autobiography]. W. Hist. Q., Apr. 1971. [7028]
- BAKER, AUGUSTA. The Black Experience in Children's Books: An Introductory Essay. Bull. N.Y. Public Lib., Mar. 1971. [7029]
- BAKER, RONALD L. Folklore Courses and Programs in American Colleges and Universities. J. Am. Folklore, Apr.-June 1971. [7030]
- BANKS, JAMES A. Teaching Black History with a Focus on Decision Making. Soc. Ed., Nov. 1971. [7031]
- BANNON, JOHN FRANCIS. Herbert Eugene Bolton [1870-1953]-Western Historian. W. Hist. Q., July 1971. [7032]
- BANNON, JOHN FRANCIS. A Western Historian-How He Got That Way [autobiography]. W. Hist. Q., July 1970. [7033]
- BASSETT, T. D. SEYMOUR. A List of New England Bibliographies. New Eng. Q., June 1971. [7034]
- BASTIDE, ROGER. État actuel et perspectives d'avenir des recherches afro-américaines. J. Soc. Am., LVIII, 1969. [7035]
- BERNARD, LEON. The Making of a History Teachers' Journal. Mid. Hist., Spring 1971. [7036]
- BILLINGTON, RAY ALLEN. The Frontier and I [autobiography]. W. Hist. Q., Jan. 1970. [7037]
- BOILEAU, THORNTON I., and BOILEAU, MARGO. Joe Scheurle [1873-1948], Modest Man with Friendly Palette. Mont. Mag. W. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7038]
- BROMBERG, ERIK. Bibliography of Theses and Dissertations, Pacific Northwest and Alaska: Supplement, 1964-70. Ore. Hist. Q., Sept. 1971. [7039]
- CORRIGAN, ROBERT A. Afro-American Fiction: Errata and Additions (Fall 1970 issue). Am. Stud. (formerly Midcont. Am. Stud. J.), Spring 1971. [7040]
- CRAVEN, AVERY. A History Still Unwritten [autobiography]. W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7041]
- DEW, LEE A. The Day I Saw the Ghost and Learned Some Lessons about History. Ark. Hist. Q., Autumn 1971. [7042]
- DUKES, PAUL. History Congress in Moscow [1970]. Russian R., July 1971. [7043]

DUSHNYCK, WALTER. Eastern European and Soviet Studies in America. Ukrainian Q., Summer 1971. [7044]

ELLIS, JOSEPH V. A Philosophical Analysis of the "New" Social Studies. Soc. Stud., Oct. 1971. [7045]

GARRISON, DEE. Cultural Custodians of the Gilded Age: The Public Librarians and Horatio Alger. J. Lib. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7046]

GOLDMAN, MARTIN S. Black Arrival in American History: A Historiographical Look at the Sixties. Soc. Stud., Oct. 1971. [7047]

GREENWELL, SCOTT L. Sources and Literature: A List of Dissertations. W. Hist. Q., July 1971. [7048]

HAGAN, WILLIAM T. On Writing the History of the American Indian. J. Interdisc. Hist., Summer 1971. [7049]

HANNA, ARCHIBALD. Western Americana at Yale. W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7050]

HANNA, ARCHIBALD. Western Americana Collectors and Collections. W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7051]

HICKS, JOHN D. Changing Concepts of History. W. Hist. Q., Jan. 1971. [7052]

HOLLON, W. EUGENE. Adventures of a Western Historian [autobiography]. W. Hist. Q., July 1971. [7053]

JACOBS, WILBUR R. The Many-Sided Frederick Jackson Turner. W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1970. [7054]

MENARD, EDWARD J. Constitutional History: Past and Present. Hist. Teacher, Nov. 1971. [7055]

POLENBERG, RICHARD. The Roosevelt Library Case. Am. Archivist, July 1971. [7056]

ROGERS, EARL M. Books on Agricultural History Published in 1969. Agric. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7057]

ROPP, THEODORE. Forty Years of the American Military Institute, 1933-1972. Mil. Aff., Oct. 1971. [7058]

RUNDELL, WALTER, JR. Researching the American Past for Relevance. Hist. Teacher, May 1971. [7059]

SCHMIDT, HANS. Francis Parkman als Historiker. Arch. Kulturgesch., no. 1, 1971. [7060]

SCHUYLER, ROBERT L. The History of American Archaeology: An Examination of Procedure. Am. Antiq., Oct. 1971. [7061]

SHALHOPE, ROBERT E. Toward a Republican Synthesis: The Emergence of an Understanding of Republicanism in American Historiography. WMQ, Jan. 1972. [7062]

SKOTHEIM, ROBERT ALLEN. Two Challenges to Historians [Howard Zinn and Martin Duberman]. Historian, May 1971. [7063]

SMILEY, DAVID L. A Slice of Life in Depression America: The Records of the Historical Records Survey. Prologue, Winter 1971. [7064]

Sources and Literature for Western American History: State Histories and Bibliographies. W. Hist. Q., Apr. 1971. [7065]

STEPHENSON, RICHARD W. Atlases of the Western Hemisphere: A Summary Survey. Geog. R., Jan. 1972. [7066]

STOVEL, JOHN E. Black Studies Is White Studies. Soc. Stud., Oct. 1971. [7067]

TIGGES, LINDA. The College History Survey Course: A Developmental Model. Soc. Stud., Dec. 1971. [7068]

UTLEY, ROBERT M. But for Custer's Sins [autobiography]. W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7069]

VANDEBURG, WILLIAM L. Ulrich B. Phillips: Progress and the Conservative Historian. Ga. Hist. Q., Fall 1971. [7070]

WAGAR, W. WARREN. Does the AHA Need a Journal for Teachers? Md. Hist., Spring 1971. [7071]

WINTHER, OSCAR OSBURN. Strictly Personal [autobiography]. W. Hist. Q., Apr. 1970. [7072]

UNITED STATES: GENERAL

ABRAMS, PHILIP, and ROTHMAN, DAVID J. Sociology and History. Past & Present, Aug. 1971. [7073]

ADKINSON, ROBERT. A History: The Golden Years of Cars. Réalités, June 1971. [7074]

ALSBROOK, JAMES E. Historic Color Bias in Print: Career Aid to Three "Black" Officials. Journalism Q., Autumn 1971. [7075]

CARROTT, M. B. Expansion of the Fourteenth Amendment to Include Freedom of Expression. NDQ, Autumn 1971. [7076]

CHESTEEN, RICHARD D. Bibliographical Essay: The Legal Validity of Jim Crow. J. Negro Hist., Oct. 1971. [7077]

DAVIDSON, CARLA. Art out of the Attic. Am. Heritage, Dec. 1971. [7078]

EWERS, JOHN G. When Red and White Men Met. W. Hist. Q., Apr. 1971. [7079]

FAIRBANK, JOHN K. China Missions in History: Some Introductory Remarks. J. Presb. Hist., Winter 1971. [7080]

GALLAWAY, LOWELL E., and VEDDER, RICHARD K. Mobility of Native Americans. J. Ec. Hist., Sept. 1971. [7081]

GATES, PAUL W. Public Land Issues in the United States. W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7082]

GLEASON, PHILIP. Mass and Maypole Revisited: American Catholics and the Middle Ages. Cath. Hist. R., July 1971. [7083]

GUDE, GEORGE J., JR. Women Teachers in the Missouri Synod. Concordia Hist. Inst. Q., Nov. 1971. [7084]

HILLIARD, SAM B. Indian Land Cessions West of the Mississippi. J. West, July 1971. [7085]

HUTCHINSON, WILLIAM K., and WILLIAMSON, SAMUEL H. The Self-Sufficiency of the Antebellum South: Estimates of the Food Supply. J. Ec. Hist., Sept. 1971. [7086]

IZUMI, SHOICHI. The West in American Politics [in Japanese; Eng. summary]. Am. R. (Tokyo), 5, 1971. [7087]

JAKLE, JOHN A. Time, Space, and the Geographic Past: A Prospectus for Historical Geography. AHR, Oct. 1971. [7088]

JEREMY, DAVID J. British and American Yarn Count Systems: An Historical Analysis. Bus. Hist. R., Autumn 1971. [7089]

JOHNSTON, RICHARD E. Some Comparative Statistics on U.S. Chief Justice Courts. Rocky Mt. Soc. Sci. J., Jan. 1972. [7090]

KETT, JOSEPH F. Adolescence and Youth in Nineteenth-Century America. J. Interdisc. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7091]

LASLETT, PETER. The Comparative History of Household and Family. J. Soc. Hist., Fall 1970. [7092]

LIVINGSTON-LITTLE, D. E. Indian Non-Military Intertribal and International Relations. J. West, July 1971. [7093]

MAIN, JACKSON TURNER. Trends in Wealth Concentration Before 1860 [note]. J. Ec. Hist., June 1971. [7094]

MCCLUGGAGE, ROBERT W. The Senate and Indian Land Titles, 1800-1825. W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1970. [7095]

MOORE, LEROY, JR. The Spiritual: Soul of Black Religion. Am. Q., Dec. 1971. [7096]

MUNKRES, ROBERT L. Indian-White Contact before 1870: Cultural Factors in Conflict. J. West, July 1971. [7097]

NASH, GERALD D. Bureaucracy and Reform in the West: Notes on the Influence of a Neglected Interest Group [the government]. W. Hist. Q., July 1971. [7098]

NISHIO, MASARU. The Changing Pattern of Political Integration in a Multi-Ethnic Society [in Japanese; Eng. summary]. Am. R. (Tokyo), 5, 1971. [7099]

NOMURA, TATSURO. The I.W.W. and Migratory Workers in the West [in Japanese; Eng. summary]. Am. R. (Tokyo), 5, 1971. [7100]

OKADA, YASUO. The Westward Movement and Land Speculation [in Japanese; Eng. summary]. Am. R. (Tokyo), 5, 1971. [7101]

OWENS, KENNETH N. Pattern and Structure In Western Territorial Politics. W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1970. [7102]

PAINTER, NELL. Black Journalism, the First Hundred Years. Harvard J. Afro-Am. Aff., no. 2, 1971. [7103]

PAWA, JAY M. Workingmen and Free Schools in the Nineteenth Century: A Comment on the Labor-Education Thesis [note]. Hist. Ed. Q., Fall 1971. [7104]

PETERS, GLEN W. The American Weekly [1896-]. Journalism Q., Autumn 1971. [7105]

ROSENBERG, CHARLES E. Science, Technology, and Economic Growth: The Case of the Agricultural Experiment Station Scientist, 1875-1914. Agric. Hist., Jan. 1971. [7106]

SCHAEFER, DONALD, and WEISS, THOMAS. The Use of Simulation Techniques in Historical Analysis: Railroads versus Canals. J. Ec. Hist., Dec. 1971. [7107]

SKARD, SIGMUND. The Image of America in Europe. Am. R. (Tokyo), 5, 1971. [7108]

SMITH, MICHAEL T. The History of Indian Citizenship. Great Plains J., Fall 1970. [7109]

SOLTOW, LEE. Economic Inequality in the United States in the Period from 1790 to 1860. J. Ec. Hist., Dec. 1971. [7110]

SPENCE, CLARK C. Knights of the Tie and Rail—Tramps and Hoboes in the West. W. Hist. Q., Jan. 1971. [7111]

TARR, JOEL A. Urban Pollution, Many Long Years Ago. Am. Heritage, Oct. 1971. [7112]

TATUM, GEORGE B. American Architecture: Three Reappraisals. N.-Y. Hist. Soc. Q., Oct. 1971. [7113]

TURETT, J. STEPHEN. The Vulnerability of American Governors, 1900-1969. Midwest J. Pol. Sci., Feb. 1971. [7114]

Uncle Tom: The Enduring Old Image. Am. Heritage, Dec. 1971. [7115]

USELDING, PAUL. Conjectural Estimates of Gross Human Capital Inflows to the American Economy, 1790-1860. EEH, Fall 1971. [7116]

WATANABE, TOSHIO. "The Western Dream" and "the Western Experience"—The American West as Revealed in Literature [in Japanese; Eng. summary]. Am. R. (Tokyo), 5, 1971. [7117]

WEISBERGER, BERNARD A. Liberty and Disunion: Three Centuries of Divorce, American Style. Am. Heritage, Oct. 1971. [7118]

WELLS, ROBERT V. Demographic Change and the Life Cycle of American Families. J. Interdisc. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7119]

YOUNG, MARY. The West and American Cultural Identity: Old Themes and New Variations. W. Hist. Q., Apr. 1970. [7120]

UNITED STATES: COLONIAL (TO 1763)

DETWEILER, ROBERT. Was Richard Hakluyt a Negative Influence in the Colonization of Virginia? N.C. Hist. R., Autumn 1971. [7121]

HUNTER, WILLIAM A. Thomas Barton and the Forbes Expedition [1758]. Pa. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [7122]

JACOBS, WILBUR R. Colonial Origins of the United States: The Turnerean View. Pac. Hist. R., Feb. 1971. [7123]

KLINGAMAN, DAVID. Food Surpluses and Deficits in the American Colonies, 1768-1772. J. Ec. Hist., Sept. 1971. [7124]

UNITED STATES:

REVOLUTION AND CONFEDERATION (1763-89)

EGNAL, MARC, and ERNST, JOSEPH A. An Economic Interpretation of the American Revolution. WMQ, Jan. 1972. [7125]

GOFF, FREDERICK R. Jefferson, the Book Collector. Q. J. Lib. Cong., Jan. 1972. [7126]

GRIFFITHS, DAVID M. An American Contribution to the Armed Neutrality of 1780. Russian R., Apr. 1971. [7127]

MACMASTER, RICHARD K. Anti-Slavery and the American Revolution. Hist. Today, Oct. 1971. [7128]

MACMASTER, RICHARD K. (ed.). News of the Yorktown Campaign: The Journal of Dr. Robert Honyman, April 17-November 25, 1781. Va. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [7129]

MAST, JAMES H. Hugh Henry Brackenridge and the Mississippi Question, 1786-1787. W. Pa. Hist. Mag., Oct. 1971. [7130]

MORRIS, RICHARD B. Meet Dr. Franklin. Am. Heritage, Dec. 1971. [7131]

NELSON, PAUL DAVID. Horatio Gates at Newburgh, 1783: A Misunderstood Role, with a Rebuttal by Richard H. Kohn. WMQ, Jan. 1972. [7132]

PEARSON, MICHAEL. The Siege of Quebec, 1775-1776. Am. Heritage, Feb. 1972. [7133]

SMITH, PAUL H. Benjamin Franklin: Gunrunner? Pa. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [7134]

WOLF, EDWIN, 2nd. The American Printings of the Definitive Treaty of Peace of 1783 Freed of Obfuscation. Pap. Bibliogr. Soc. Am., Third Quarter 1971. [7135]

YAMAGATA, MASAO. Quakers and Antislavery, 1688-1776 [in Japanese; Eng. summary]. Am. R. (Tokyo), 5, 1971. [7136]

UNITED STATES: EARLY NATIONAL PERIOD TO THE ERA OF JACKSON (1789-1828)

ALDRIDGE, A. OWEN. Thomas Paine, Edmund Burke and Anglo-French Relations in 1787. Stud. Burke Times, Spring 1971. [7137]

ARING, CHARLES D. Adams and Jefferson: a correspondence. Hist. Today, Sept. 1971. [7138]

ATKINSON, BETTY J. Some Thoughts on Nancy Hanks Lincoln. Lincoln Herald, Fall 1971. [7139]

BANNER, LOIS W. Religion and Reform in the Early Republic: The Role of Youth. Am. Q., Dec. 1971. [7140]

BARNETT, SUZANNE W. Silent Evangelism: Presbyterians and the Mission Press in China, 1807-1860. J. Presb. Hist., Winter 1971. [7141]

BEAVER, DONALD DEB. Altruism, Patriotism and Science: Scientific Journals in the Early Republic. Am. Stud. (formerly Midcont. Am. Stud. J.), Spring 1971. [7142]

BRADLEY, JARED W. W. C. C. Claiborne and Spain: Foreign Affairs under Jefferson and Madison, 1801-1811, Part I. La. Hist., Fall 1971. [7143]

BRODIE, FAWN M. Jefferson Biographers and the Psychology of Canonization. J. Interdisc. Hist., Summer 1971. [7144]

DUNHAM, CHESTER G. Christopher Hughes, Jr. at Ghent, 1814. Md. Hist. Mag., Fall 1971. [7145]

HILT, DOUGLAS. Manuel Godoy [1767-1851], Prince of Peace. Hist. Today, Dec. 1971. [7146]

LYCAN, GILBERT L. Alexander Hamilton's Florida Policy. Fla. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7147]

MASON, JULIAN. William Vans Murray: The Fancy of a Poet. Early Am. Lit., Spring 1971. [7148]

NICHOLLS, JAMES C. Lady Henrietta Liston's Journal of Washington's "Resignation," Retirement, and Death. Pa. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [7149]

ROBBINS, JAN C. Jefferson and the Press: The Résolution of an Antinomy. Journalism Q., Autumn 1971. [7150]

WOEHRMANN, PAUL. National Response to the Sack of Washington. Md. Hist. Mag., Fall 1971. [7151]

UNITED STATES: THE ERA OF JACKSON, EXPANSION, AND SECTIONALISM (1828-61)

BAYM, NINA. The Women of Cooper's Leatherstocking Tales. Am. Q., Dec. 1971. [7152]

BRACK, GENE M. Mexican Opinion, American Racism, and the War of 1846. W. Hist. Q., Apr. 1970. [7153]

EMINHIZER, EARL EUGENE. Alexander Campbell's Thoughts on Slavery and Abolition. W. Va. Hist., Jan. 1972. [7154]

ERSHKOWITZ, HERBERT, and SHADE, WILLIAM G. Consensus or Conflict? Political Behavior in the State Legislatures during the Jacksonian Era. J. Am. Hist., Dec. 1971. [7155]

GRIMSTED, DAVID. Rioting in Its Jacksonian Setting. AHR, Apr. 1972. [7156]

HÉBERT, JOHN R. Maps by Ephraim George Squier [1821-88]. Journalist, Scholar and Diplomat. Q. J. Lib. Cong., Jan. 1972. [7157]

LIVESAY, HAROLD C. Marketing Patterns in the Antebellum American Iron Industry. Bus. Hist. R., Autumn 1971. [7158]

LIVESAY, HAROLD C., and PORTER, GLENN. The Financial Role of Merchants in the Development of U.S. Manufacturing, 1815-1860. EEH, Fall 1971. [7159]

MCDONALD, JOHN J. Emerson and John Brown. New Eng. Q., Sept. 1971. [7160]

MUSICK, MICHAEL P. Under Skyscrapers—Harry Wise aboard the Razee Independence [1850]. Prologue, Winter 1971. [7161]

PASSELL, PETER. The Impact of Cotton Land Distribution on the Antebellum Economy. J. Ec. Hist., Dec. 1971. [7162]

PASSELL, PETER, and SCHMUNDT, MARIA. Pre-Civil War Land Policy and the Growth of Manufacturing. EEH, Fall 1971. [7163]

PESSEN, EDWARD. Did Fortunes Rise and Fall Mercurially in Antebellum America? The Tale of Two Cities: Boston and New York. J. Soc. Hist., Summer 1971. [7164]

PESSEN, EDWARD. The Egalitarian Myth and the American Social Reality: Wealth, Mobility, and Equality in the "Era of the Common Man." AHR, Oct. 1971. [7165]

PETERSEN, WILLIAM J. Audubon on the Missouri in 1843. Palimpsest, Nov. 1971. [7166]

PORTER, DAVID. The Southern Press and the Presidential Election of 1860. W. Va. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7167]

PREYER, NORRIS W. Why Did Industrialization Lag in the Old South? Ga. Hist. Q., Fall 1971. [7168]

PRICE, ROBERT (ed.). The Road to Boston: 1860 Travel Correspondence of William Dean Howells. Ohio Hist., Spring 1971. [7169]

SHALHOPE, ROBERT E. Race, Class, Slavery, and the Antebellum Southern Mind. J. S. Hist., Nov. 1971. [7170]

VAUTHIER, SIMONE. Une brèche sudiste dans l'image traditionnelle de l'esclave: Life in the South, 1849. J. Soc. Am., LVIII, 1969. [7171]

WEISER, FREDERICK S., and MUELLER, BERTHA (eds.). Journey to North America: Theodor Fliedner (1800-1864). Concordia Hist. Inst. Q., Nov. 1971. [7172]

WILSON, MAJOR L. The Repressible Conflict: [William H.] Seward's Concept of Progress and the Free-Soil Movement. J. S. Hist., Nov. 1971. [7173]

YASUTAKE, HIDETAKA. Jackson's Bank War and New York State Politics [in Japanese; Eng. summary]. Am. R. (Tokyo), 5, 1971. [7174]

UNITED STATES:

CIVIL WAR AND RECONSTRUCTION (1861-77)

ARNOLD, WILLIAM E. An Analysis of Some Speeches of Jefferson Davis. J. Miss. Hist., Nov. 1971. [7175]

BRANDT, NAT. "New York is Worth Twenty Richmonds" [Confederate arson, Nov. 1864]. Am. Heritage, Oct. 1971. [7176]

BRYSON, THOMAS A. A Note on Jefferson Davis's Lawsuit against Appleton Publishing Company. J. Miss. Hist., May 1971. [7177]

ELLSWORTH, EDWARD W. America's Gideon in "the Scepter'd Isle": The British Tour of Henry Ward Beecher in 1863. Lincoln Herald, Fall 1971. [7178]

GALLAWAY, LOWELL E., and VEDDER, RICHARD K. Emigration from the United Kingdom to the United States, 1860-1913. J. Ec. Hist., Dec. 1971. [7179]

HANCOCK, HAROLD B. The Income and Manufacturers' Tax of 1862-1872 as Historical Source Material. Del. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7180]

MACMASTER, RICHARD K. Anti-Slavery and the American Revolution: A Crack in the Liberty Bell. Hist. Today, Oct. 1971. [7181]

MIURA, SUSUMU. Recent Trends in Reconstruction Historiography [in Japanese; Eng. summary]. Am. R. (Tokyo), 5, 1971. [7182]

MORGAN, CLAUDE M. Mutiny at Camp Hubbard [2d R.I. Cav., 1863]. R.I. Hist., Fall 1971. [7183]

MULLEN, JAY CARLTON. "Dear Brother . . . I send you a brief account of 'The Action at Scarey Creek'": George S. Patton's Baptism of Fire [1861]. W. Va. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7184]

OEDEL, HOWARD T. Lincoln Takes the Pulse of the Confederacy at Charleston in March, 1861. Lincoln Herald, Fall 1971. [7185]

PETTIT, ARTHUR G. Mark Twain's Attitude Toward the Negro in the West, 1861-1867. W. Hist. Q., Jan. 1970. [7186]

RUBY, BARBARA C. General Patrick Cleburne's Proposal [Dec. 1863] to Arm Southern Slaves. Ark. Hist. Q., Autumn 1971. [7187]

SCHMITZ, NEIL. Twain, Huckleberry Finn, and the Reconstruction. Am. Stud. (formerly Midcont. Am. Stud. J.), Spring 1971. [7188]

SHANNON, WILLIAM HUNTER. First Blood in Baltimore Or—How Ben Butler Saved the Union. Soc. Stud., Dec. 1971. [7189]

STAPLETON, DARWIN H. Assistant Charles O. Boutelle, of the United States Coast Survey, with the South Atlantic Blockading Squadron, 1861-1863. Am. Neptune, Oct. 1971. [7190]

STUART, REGINALD C. Cavalry Raids in the West: Case Studies of Civil War Cavalry Raids. Tenn. Hist. Q., Fall 1971. [7191]

WRIGHT, D. G. English Opinion on Secession: A Note. J. Am. Stud., Aug. 1971. [7192]

UNITED STATES:

INDUSTRIALISM AND REFORM (1865-1917)

ANDREWS, WAYNE. American Gothic [revival architecture]. Am. Heritage, Oct. 1971. [7193]

ANSBACHER, HEINZ L. Alfred Adler and G. Stanley Hall: Correspondence and General Relationship. J. Hist. Behavioral Sci., Oct. 1971. [7194]

ATHEARN, ROBERT G. A Brahmin in Buffaloland [1884, Charles Francis Adams, Jr.]. W. Hist. Q., Jan. 1970. [7195]

BAYLEN, JOSEPH O., and WEYANT, JANE G. Vasil Vereshchagin in the United States [1888, 1902]. Russian R., July 1971. [7196]

BENKART, PAULA K. Changing Attitudes of Presbyterians toward Southern and Eastern European Immigrants, 1880-1914. J. Presb. Hist., Fall 1971. [7197]

BERNAYS, EDWARD L. Emergence of the Public Relations Counsel: Principles and Recollections. Bus. Hist. R., Autumn 1971. [7198]

BOWERS, WILLIAM L. Country-Life Reform, 1900-1920: A Neglected Aspect of Progressive Era History. Agric. Hist., July 1971. [7199]

BUNTING, DAVID. The Truth about "The Truth about the Trusts." J. Ec. Hist., Sept. 1971. [7200]

BUNTING, DAVID, and BARBOUR, JEFFERY. Interlocking Directorates in Large American Corporations, 1896-1964. Bus. Hist. R., Autumn 1971. [7201]

CRAVENS, HAMILTON, and BURNHAM, JOHN C. Psychology and Evolutionary Naturalism in American Thought, 1890-1940. Am. Q., Dec. 1971. [7202]

CRIPPS, THOMAS R. The Unformed Image: The Negro in the Movies before Birth of a Nation. Md. Hist., Spring 1971. [7203]

DAVIS, THOMAS M. The Poetry of The Ladies' Home Journal from 1895 to 1905. Am. Stud. (formerly Midcont. Am. Stud. J.), Spring 1971. [7204]

DORN, JACOB H. Sunday Afternoon [1878-81]: The Early Social Gospel in Journalism. New Eng. Q., June 1971. [7205]

EMMONS, DAVID M. Theories of Increased Rainfall and the Timber Culture Act of 1873. Forest Hist., Oct. 1971. [7206]

FOSTER, HAROLD. Employers Strike Insurance. Labor Hist., Fall 1971. [7207]

GOODWYN, LAWRENCE C. Populist Dreams and Negro Rights: East Texas as a Case Study. AHR, Dec. 1971. [7208]

GRIEVE, ALASTAIR. Whistler and the Pre-Raphaelites. Art Q., Summer 1971. [7209]

HALLER, JOHN S., JR. Nathaniel Southgate Shaler [1841-1906]: A Portrait of Nineteenth-Century Academic Thinking on Race. Essex Inst. Hist. Collect., Apr. 1971. [7210]

HIMELHOCH, MYRA. Frederick Douglass and Haiti's Mole St. Nicolas [Port au Prince, 1889-91]. J. Negro Hist., July 1971. [7211]

HYATT, IRWIN T., JR. The Missionary as Entrepreneur: Calvin Mateer [1836-1908] in Shantung. J. Presb. Hist., Winter 1971. [7212]

ILLICK, JOSEPH E. "Some of Our Best Indians Are Friends . . .": Quaker Attitudes and Actions Regarding the Western Indians during the Grant Administration. W. Hist. Q., July 1971. [7213]

KENNEDY, P. M. Imperial Cable Communications and Strategy, 1870-1914. EHR, Oct. 1971. [7214]

LOWENTHAL, DAVID. Post-Emancipation Race Relations: Some Caribbean and American Perspectives. J. Inter-Am. Stud. World Aff., July-Oct. 1971. [7215]

MCMAINS, HOWARD F. The Road to George Ade's Farm: Origins of Taft's First Campaign Rally, September, 1908. Ind. Mag. Hist., Dec. 1971. [7216]

MEADOWS, MARTIN. Colonialism, Social Structure and Nationalism: The Philippine Case. Pac. Aff., Fall 1971. [7217]

MILLER, SALLY M. The Socialist Party and the Negro, 1901-20. J. Negro Hist., July 1971. [7218]

OSNES, LARRY G. The Birth of a Party: The Cincinnati Populist Convention of 1891. Great Plains J., Fall 1970. [7219]

PARSONS, EDWARD B. The German-American Crisis of 1902-1903. Historian, May 1971. [7220]

PEASE, OTIS A. Urban Reformers in the Progressive Era: a Reassessment. Pac. N.W. Q., Apr. 1971. [7221]

POMEROY, EARL. Josiah Royce [1855-1916], Historian in Quest of Community. Pac. Hist. R., Feb. 1971. [7222]

PUGACH, NOEL H. Standard Oil and Petroleum Development in Early Republican China. Bus. Hist. R., Winter 1971. [7223]

SANDLER, STANLEY. A Navy in Decay: Some Strategic Technological Results of Disarmament, 1865-69 in the U.S. Navy. Mil. Aff., Dec. 1971. [7224]

SCHEIPS, PAUL J. Hold the Fort! The Story of a Song from the Sawdust Trail to the Picket Line. Smithsonian Stud. Hist. Technol., no. 9, 1971. [7225]

SHAPIRO, HERBERT. Steffens, Lippmann, and Reed: The Muckraker and his Protégés. Pac. N.W. Q., Oct. 1971. [7226]

SKEELS, JOYCE G. The Early American Federation of Labor and Monetary Reform. Labor Hist., Fall 1971. [7227]

ST. HILL, THOMAS NAST. The Life and Death of Thomas Nast [1840-1902]. Am. Heritage, Oct. 1971. [7228]

TILMAN, ROBERT O. The Impact of American Education on the Philippines. Asia (N.Y.), Spring 1971. [7229]

TWETON, D. JEROME. Progressivism Discovers the Farm: The Country Life Commission of 1908. NDQ, Summer 1971. [7230]

VAUGHN, WILLIAM P. West Point and the First Negro Cadet [1870-74, James Webster Smith]. Mil. Aff., Oct. 1971. [7231]

WALKER, HENRY P. The Reluctant Corporal [4th U.S. Cav. Regt.]: The Autobiography of William Bladen Jett [1858-1941, pt. 1]. J. Ariz. Hist., Spring 1971. [7232]

YOUNG, JAMES D. Scottish Labor and the American Railway Strike of 1877. Labor Hist., Fall 1971. [7233]

UNITED STATES: WORLD WAR I TO FDR (1914-32)

BAKER, GLADYS L. "And to Act for the Secretary": Paul H. Appleby and the Department of Agriculture, 1933-1940. Agric. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7234]

BEST, GARY DEAN. Food Relief as Price Support: Hoover and American Pork, January-March 1919. Agric. Hist., Apr. 1971. [7235]

BRINNIN, JOHN MALCOLM. The Sway of the Grand Saloon [internment, 1914, of S.S. Kronprinzessin Cecile, later Mount Vernon]. Am. Heritage, Oct. 1971. [7236]

BROMMEL, BERNARD J. Debs's Cooperative Commonwealth Plan for Workers. Labor Hist., Fall 1971. [7237]

COWLEY, ROBERT. The Drought and the Dole: Herbert Hoover's Dismal Dilemma. Am. Heritage, Feb. 1972. [7238]

DIGNAN, DON K. The Hindu Conspiracy in Anglo-American Relations during World War I. Pac. Hist. R., Feb. 1971. [7239]

DYSON, LOWELL K. Radical Farm Organizations and Periodicals in America, 1920-1960. Agric. Hist., Apr. 1971. [7240]

HEANEY, HOWELL J. Thomas W. Strerter, Collector, 1883-1965. Pap. Bibliogr. Soc. Am., Third Quarter 1971. [7241]

HERWIG, HOLGER H., and TRASK, DAVID F. The Failure of Imperial Germany's Undersea Offensive against World Shipping, February 1917-October 1918. Historian, Aug. 1971. [7242]

HESSEN, ROBERT. The Admiralty's American Ally [Charles M. Schwab, 1862-1939]. Hist. Today, Dec. 1971. [7243]

JENSEN, BILLIE BARNES. Philip Dru, the Blueprint of a Presidential Adviser [Colonel E. M. House]. Am. Stud. (formerly Midcont. Am. Stud. J.), Spring 1971. [7244]

KELLER, PHYLLIS. George Sylvester Viereck [1884-1962]: The Psychology of a German-American Militant. J. Interdisc. Hist., Summer 1971. [7245]

KIST, EUGENE. William Sollman [1881-1951], a Teacher. Quaker Hist., Autumn 1971. [7246]

LASLETT, JOHN H. M. End of an Alliance: Selected Correspondence between Socialist Party Secretary Adolph Germer and U.M.W. of A. Leaders in World War One. Labor Hist., Fall 1971. [7247]

LESLIE, JOHN C. International Air Transport Association: Some Historical Notes [1919-]. J. Inter-Am. Stud. World Aff., July-Oct. 1971. [7248]

PATTERSON, DAVID S. Woodrow Wilson and the Mediation Movement, 1914-17. Historian, Aug. 1971. [7249]

PORTO, VICTOR JOHN. Woodrow Wilson, the War, and the Interpretations: 1917-1970. Soc. Stud., Jan. 1972. [7250]

RADER, BENJAMIN G. Federal Taxation in the 1920s: A Re-examination. Historian, May 1971. [7251]

SANSOM, WILLIAM. A Memory: The Golden Years of Cars. Réalités, June 1971. [7252]

SCHICKEL, RICHARD. Doug Fairbanks [Douglas Elton Ulman, 1833-1939]: Superstar of the Silents. Am. Heritage, Dec. 1971. [7253]

SHAPIRO, STANLEY. The Twilight of Reform: Advanced Progressives after the Armistice. Historian, May 1971. [7254]

SNOW, SINCLAIR. Protestant versus Catholic: U.S. Reaction to the Mexican Church-State Conflict of 1926-29. NDQ, Summer 1971. [7255]

TRANI, EUGENE P. Woodrow Wilson, China, and the Missionaries, 1913-1921. J. Presb. Hist., Winter 1971. [7256]

VIOLAS, PAUL C. The Indoctrination Debate and the Great Depression. Hist. Teacher, May 1971. [7257]

WINKLER, FRED H. Disarmament and Security: The American Policy at Geneva, 1926-1935. NDQ, Autumn 1971. [7258]

UNITED STATES: THE NEW DEAL AND THE SECOND WORLD WAR (1932-45)

CHERNY, ROBERT W. Isolationist Voting in 1940: A Statistical Analysis. Nebr. Hist., Fall 1971. [7259]

DALLEK, ROBERT. Franklin Roosevelt as World Leader [r. art.]. AHR, Dec. 1971. [7260]

DAVIDSON, MARSHALL B. American Design: The WPA's Amazing Artistic Record. Am. Heritage, Feb. 1972. [7261]

DIBACCO, THOMAS V. William Gibbs McAdoo and His Patented Razor [1934]. Hist. Teacher, Mar. 1971. [7262]

FUNK, ARTHUR L. Eisenhower, Giraud, and the Command of "TORCH" [1942]. Mil. Aff., Oct. 1971. [7263]

GELLMAN, IRWIN F. The St. Louis Tragedy [1939]. Am. Jewish Hist. Q., Dec. 1971. [7264]

GOODPASTURE, H. MCKENNIE. China in an American, Frank Wilson Price [b. 1895]: A Bibliographical Essay. J. Presb. Hist., Winter 1971. [7265]

GRIEB, KENNETH J. The United States and the Rise of General Maximiliano Hernández Martínez [El Salvador, 1931-34]. J. Latin Am. Stud., Nov. 1971. [7266]

HOLLEY, DONALD. The Negro in the New Deal Resettlement Program. Agric. Hist., July 1971. [7267]

HYTIER, ADRIENNE D. La politique étrangère des États-Unis en 1942. R. Hist. deux. guerre mond., July 1971. [7268]

INFELD, GLENN. Disaster at Bari [Dec. 1943]. Am. Heritage, Oct. 1971. [7269]

JONES, ALFRED HAWORTH. The Persistence of the Progressive Mind: The Case of Bernard Devoto. Am. Stud. (formerly Midcont. Am. Stud. J.), Spring 1971. [7270]

JONES, ALFRED HAWORTH. The Search for a Usable American Past in the New Deal Era. Am. Q., Dec. 1971. [7271]

KIMBALL, WARREN E. Lend-Lease and the Open Door: The Temptation of British Opulence, 1937-1942. PSQ, June 1971. [7272]

LAMBERT, C. ROGER. The Drought Cattle Purchase, 1934-1935: Problems and Complaints. Agric. Hist., Apr. 1971. [7273]

NIPP, ROBERT E. The Negro in the New Deal Resettlement Program: A Comment. Agric. Hist., July 1971. [7274]

OSTROWER, GARY B. American Ambassador to the League of Nations—1933: A Proposal Postponed. Int. Organ., Winter 1971. [7275]

PARMAN, DONALD L. The Indian and the Civilian Conservation Corps. Pac. Hist. R., Feb. 1971. [7276]

SIMMS, L. MOODY, JR. Robert Herrick [1868-1938] and the Race Question. NDQ, Autumn 1971. [7277]

SIREVAG, TORBJORN. Rooseveltian Ideas and the 1937 Court Fight: A Neglected Factor. Historian, Aug. 1971. [7278]

SITKOFF, HARVARD. Racial Militancy and Interracial Violence in the Second World War. J. Am. Hist., Dec. 1971. [7279]

STEIN, HARRY. Marx's Disenchanted Salesman [Earl Russell Browder, 1891-]. Am. Heritage, Dec. 1971. [7280]

SZAJKOWSKI, ZOSA. The Attitude of American Jews to Refugees from Germany in the 1930's. Am. Jewish Hist. Q., Dec. 1971. [7281]

THOMPSON, J. A. An Imperialist and the First World War: The Case of Albert J. Beveridge. J. Am. Stud., Aug. 1971. [7282]

UNITED STATES: SINCE 1945

ABRAMSON, HAROLD J. Ethnic Diversity within Catholicism: A Comparative Analysis of Contemporary and Historical Religion. J. Soc. Hist., Summer 1971. [7283]

CORRELL, LARAINÉ. American Theatre Librarianship: Focus on Leadership of George R. Freedley [1904-67]. J. Lib. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7284]

DELORIA, VINE, JR. The Rise and Fall of the First Indian Movement [r. art.]. Historian, Aug. 1971. [7285]

DOANE, DAVID P. Regional Cost Differentials and Textile Location: A Statistical Analysis. EEH, Fall 1971. [7286]

DRAPER, THEODORE. The Dominican Intervention [1965] Reconsidered. PSQ, Mar. 1971. [7287]

HARNWELL, GAYLORD P. An Environment for Learning. Proc. Am. Phil. Soc., no. 3, 1971. [7288]

HERRING, GEORGE C. The United States and British Bankruptcy, 1944-1945: Responsibilities Deferred. PSQ, June 1971. [7289]

HOLLANDER, NEIL. Adolescents and the War: The Sources of Socialization. Journalism Q., Autumn 1971. [7290]

KRAMER, VICTOR A. The Manuscript and the Text of James Agee's A Death in the Family [1957]. Pap. Bibliogr. Soc. Am., Third Quarter 1971. [7291]

LIPSET, SEYMOUR MARTIN, and LADD, EVERETT CARLL, JR. College Generations from the 1930's to the 1960's. Public Interest, Fall 1971. [7292]

MCDERMOTT, LOUIS M. Guatemala, 1954: Intervention or Aggression? Rocky Mt. Soc. Sci. J., Jan. 1972. [7293]

SCHALLER, MICHAEL. The Federal Prohibition of Marihuana. J. Soc. Hist., Fall 1970. [7294]

SCHRATZ, PAUL R. A Commentary on the Pueblo Affair [1968]. Mil. Aff., Oct. 1971. [7295]

SITKOFF, HARVARD. Harry Truman and the Election of 1948: The Coming of Age of Civil Rights in American Politics. J. S. Hist., Nov. 1971. [7296]

THEOHARIS, ATHAN. The Truman Presidency: Trial and Error. Wis. Mag. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7297]

VINYARD, DALE, and SIGEL, ROBERTA S. Newspapers and Urban Voters. Journalism Q., Autumn 1971. [7298]

WALCH, JIM. Regeringen och Vietnamkrigsvägrarna [The Swedish Government and the Vietnam War Deserters]. Tiden (Sw.), no. 5, 1971. [7299]

WILSON, THEODORE A., and MCKENZIE, RICHARD M. Save Wheat, Save Meat, Save the Peace: The Food Crusade of 1947. Prologue, Winter 1971. [7300]

WITTNER, LAWRENCE S. MacArthur and the Missionaries: God and Man in Occupied Japan. Pac. Hist. R., Feb. 1971. [7301]

UNITED STATES: NEW ENGLAND

BAGHDADI, MANIA KLEINBURD. "Community" and the Providence Jew in the Early 20th Century. R.I. Jewish Hist. Notes, Nov. 1971. [7302]

BASSETT, T. D. SEYMOUR. An Inland Port: Burlington, Vermont in 1840. New Eng. Q., Dec. 1971. [7303]

BEALES, ROSS W., JR. The Diary of John Cleaveland, January 15–May 11, 1742. Essex Inst. Hist. Collect., Apr. 1971. [7304]

BICKNELL, THEODORE WILLIAMS. Minyan, Shiva and Shroud: Early Providence Jewish Community, 1840. R.I. Jewish Hist. Notes, Nov. 1971. [7305]

BRODHEAD, MICHAEL J. Elliott Coues and the Sparrow War. New Eng. Q., Sept. 1971. [7306]

BUENKER, JOHN D. The Mahatma and Progressive Reform: Martin Lomasney as Lawmaker, 1911–1917. New Eng. Q., Sept. 1971. [7307]

BUENKER, JOHN D. Urban Liberalism in Rhode Island, 1909–1919. R.I. Hist., Spring 1971. [7308]

BURG, RICHARD (ed.). A Letter of Richard Mather to a Cleric in Old England [1696]. WMQ, Jan. 1972. [7309]

COOK, EDWARD M., JR. Local Leadership and the Typology of New England Towns, 1700–1785. PSQ, Dec. 1971. [7310]

COWDREY, A. E. The Boston Mahomet [Increase Mather]. Hist. Today, Nov. 1971. [7311]

DAVISSON, WILLIAM I., and DUGAN, DENNIS J. Commerce in Seventeenth-Century Essex County, Massachusetts. Essex Inst. Hist. Collect., Apr. 1971. [7312]

FOWLER, WILLIAM M., JR. William Ellery: An American Lord of Admiralty [1779–81]. Am. Neptune, Oct. 1971. [7313]

FOWLER, WILLIAM M., JR. William Ellery: Making of a Rhode Island Politician [1727–1776]. R.I. Hist., Fall 1971. [7314]

GALEY, JOHN H. Salem's Trade with Brazil, 1801–1870. Essex Inst. Hist. Collect., Apr. 1971. [7315]

GARVIN, JAMES L. Portsmouth and the Piscataqua: Social History and Material Culture. Hist. N.H., Summer 1971. [7316]

GERLACH, LARRY R. Charles Dudley and the Customs Quandary in Pre-Revolutionary Rhode Island. R.I. Hist., Spring 1971. [7317]

GERLACH, LARRY R. Customs and Contentions: John Hatton of Salem and Cohasset, 1764–1776. N.J. Hist., Summer 1971. [7318]

GOLDOWSKY, BERNARD M. Get That Crook! Reminiscences of a Private Detective. R.I. Jewish Hist. Notes, Nov. 1971. [7319]

GOLDOWSKY, SEEBERT J. Bernard Manuel Goldowsky, 1864–1936. R.I. Jewish Hist. Notes, Nov. 1971. [7320]

GOLDOWSKY, SEEBERT J. The Mysterious Mr. Brown [World War I Intelligence]. R.I. Jewish Hist. Notes, Nov. 1971. [7321]

GOLDSTEIN, SIDNEY. Number and Distribution of Jewish Households in Rhode Island, 1970. R.I. Jewish Hist. Notes, Nov. 1971. [7322]

HARLOW, THOMPSON R. Connecticut Engravers, 1774–1820. Conn. Hist. Soc. Bull., Oct. 1971. [7323]

HOLIFIELD, E. BROOKS. The Renaissance of Sacramental Piety in Colonial New England. WMQ, Jan. 1972. [7324]

HOLST, ANNE CRAWFORD ALLEN. Cowesett Road [Warwick] 1870–1900. R.I. Hist., Spring 1971. [7325]

JOHNSON, PEGGY M. "Old" and "New" Unionism in England during the 1890's. NDQ, Autumn 1971. [7326]

KODAMA, KAYOKO. A Town-Gown Relationship: The Case of Yale University [in Japanese; Eng. summary]. Am. R. (Tokyo), 5, 1971. [7327]

LEWIS, ROBERT G., and MORRIS, WALTER J. John Quincy Adams' Verse Translation of Jean-Baptiste Rousseau's Ode à la Fortune. New Eng. Q., Sept. 1971. [7328]

MCGOVERN, JAMES R. The Student Rebellion in Harvard College, 1807–1808. Harvard Lib. Bull., Oct. 1971. [7329]

MCKAY, DAVID. William Selby, Musical Émigré in Colonial Boston. Musical Q., Oct. 1971. [7330]

MARTIN, JAMES KIRBY. A Model for the Coming American Revolution: The Birth and Death of the Wentworth Oligarchy in New Hampshire, 1741–1776. J. Soc. Hist., Fall 1970. [7331]

MASSEY, ROBERT K., JR. The Democratic Laggard: Massachusetts in 1932. New Eng. Q., Dec. 1971. [7332]

OSHIMO, SHOICHI. The Post-Perry Miller Study of Early New England [in Japanese]. Am. R. (Tokyo), 5, 1971. [7333]

PAINTER, NELL. Jim Crow at Harvard, 1923. New Eng. Q., Dec. 1971. [7334]

RAINBOLT, JOHN C. A Note on the Maryland Declaration of Rights and Constitution of 1776. Md. Hist. Mag., Winter 1971. [7335]

ROBBINS, JAMES H. The Impact of the First American Party System on Salem Politics. Essex Inst. Hist. Collect., July 1971. [7336]

ROSEN, BENTON H. As the Gentiles Saw It: Some Observations on the Providence Jewish Community, circa 1909. R.I. Jewish Hist. Notes, Nov. 1971. [7337]

ROSSITER, MARGARET W. Benjamin Silliman and the Lowell Institute: The Popularization of Science in Nineteenth-Century America. New Eng. Q., Dec. 1971. [7338]

SAINSBURY, JOHN A. Miantonomo's Death and New England Politics 1630–1645. R.I. Hist., Fall 1971. [7339]

SCHULTZ, STANLEY K. The Making of a Reformer: The Reverend Samuel Hopkins as an Eighteenth-Century Abolitionist. Proc. Am. Phil. Soc., no. 5, 1971. [7340]

SEGAL, BERYL. Jewish Population of Providence, Rhode Island: Estimates and Studies over the years. R.I. Jewish Hist. Notes, Nov. 1971. [7341]

SEGAL, BERYL. The General Jewish Committee—The First Quarter Century, 1945–1970. R.I. Jewish Hist. Notes, Nov. 1971. [7342]

STANFORD, DONALD E. Edward Taylor versus the “Young Cockerill” Benjamin Ruggles: A Hitherto Unpublished Episode from the Annals of Early New England Church History [1697–98]. New Eng. Q., Sept. 1971. [7343]

STOUT, NEIL R. The [British] Spies Who Went out in the Cold [Boston, 1775]. Am. Heritage, Feb. 1972. [7344]

TICHI, CECELIA. The Puritan Historians and Their New Jerusalem. Early Am. Lit., Fall 1971. [7345]

TOLLES, BRYANT FRANKLIN, JR. Textile Mill Architecture in East Central New England: An Analysis of Pre-Civil War Design. Essex Inst. Hist. Collect., July 1971. [7346]

TRIGGER, BRUCE G. The Mohawk-Mahican War (1624–28): The Establishment of a Pattern. Can. Hist. R., Sept. 1971. [7347]

VINOVSKIS, MARIS A. The 1789 Life Table of Edward Wigglesworth. J. Ec. Hist., Sept. 1971. [7348]

UNITED STATES: MIDDLE ATLANTIC REGION

ALBERTS, ROBERT C. The Good Provider: “57 Varieties” [Henry John Heinz, 1844–1919]. Am. Heritage, Feb. 1972. [7349]

ATHEY, LOUIS L. Florence Kelley [1859–1932] and the Quest for Negro Equality. J. Negro Hist., Oct. 1971. [7350]

BARNETT, LINCOLN. The Case of John Peter Zenger [1734–5]. Am. Heritage, Dec. 1971. [7351]

BERGMAN, HERBERT. Walt Whitman as a Journalist, 1831–January, 1848. Journalism Q., Summer 1971. [7352]

BERGMAN, HERBERT. Walt Whitman as a Journalist, March 1848–1892. Journalism Q., Autumn 1971. [7353]

BISHOP, MORRIS. Four [Mohawk] Indian Kings in London [1709–10, King Hendrick, et al.]. Am. Heritage, Dec. 1971. [7354]

BORKOWSKI, JOSEPH A. The Role of Pittsburgh’s Polish Falcons in the Organization of the Polish Army in France [World War I]. W. Pa. Hist. Mag., Oct. 1971. [7355]

BRUNS, ROGER. Anthony Benezet’s Assertion of Negro Equality. J. Negro Hist., July 1971. [7356]

BRUNS, ROGER A. Anthony Benezet [1713–84] and the Natural Rights of the Negro. Pa. Mag. Hist. Biog., Jan. 1972. [7357]

BURWELL, BASIL. A Man for All Souls [John Woolman, 1720–71, Quaker preacher]. Am. Heritage, Dec. 1971. [7358]

BUXBAUM, MELVIN H. (ed.). Cyrus Bustill Addresses the Blacks of Philadelphia [1789]. WMQ, Jan. 1972. [7359]

CAMPBELL, AGNES H. “In This Time of Commotion” [1776–1780]. Quaker Hist., Autumn 1971. [7360]

CAMPBELL, ARCHIBALD. Letters from a Cass County Farmer [1851–1856]. J. Ill. State Hist. Soc., Autumn 1971. [7361]

COHEN, IRA. The Auction System in the Port of New York, 1817–1837. Bus. Hist. R., Winter 1971. [7362]

COOKE, JACOB E. Tench Coxe [1755–1824], Tory Merchant. Pa. Mag. Hist. Biog., Jan. 1972. [7363]

CROMBIE, JOHN NEWELL (ed.). Account of the Pennsylvania Railroad Riots [1877] from a Young Girl’s Diary, Helen Crombie. W. Pa. Hist. Mag., Oct. 1971. [7364]

DAVIS, KENNETH S. Miss Eleanor Roosevelt. Am. Heritage, Oct. 1971. [7365]

DAVISSON, WILLIAM L., and BRADLEY, LAWRENCE J. New York Maritime Trade: Ship Voyage Patterns, 1715–1765. N.-Y. Hist. Soc. Q., Oct. 1971. [7366]

DEJONG, GERALD FRANCIS. The Dutch Reformed Church and Negro Slavery in Colonial America. Church Hist., Dec. 1971. [7367]

EBNER, MICHAEL H. “Deserting the Poor”: Three Documents on a Church in an Expanding City [Passaic, N.J.]—1893. Labor Hist., Fall 1971. [7368]

FARMERIE, SAMUEL A. A Tom Thumb History of Clarion State College [1867–]. W. Pa. Hist. Mag., Oct. 1971. [7369]

FOWLER, WILLIAM M., JR. A Farce [satire on proposal to move capital by William Ellery] Re-examined. Pa. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [7370]

FROST, JERRY W. As the Twig Is Bent: Quaker Ideas of Childhood. Quaker Hist., Autumn 1971. [7371]

GOUGH, ROBERT. Notes on the Pennsylvania Revolutionaries of 1776. Pa. Mag. Hist. Biog., Jan. 1972. [7372]

HOWARD, HELEN ADDISON. Hiawatha: Co-Founder of an Indian United Nations. J. West, July 1971. [7373]

JONES, OLIVER P. Health Care Facilities at Buffalo in 1846. Niagara Frontier, Spring 1971. [7374]

JUDD, JACOB. Frederick Philipse [1626–1702] and the Madagascar Trade. N.-Y. Hist. Soc. Q., Oct. 1971. [7375]

LANE, JAMES B. Unmasking Poverty: Jacob A. Riis and How the Other Half Lives. Md. Hist., Spring 1971. [7376]

LEMISCH, JESSE; ALEXANDER, JOHN K.; CROWTHER, SIMEON J.; and HUTSON, JAMES H. The White Oaks, Jack Tar, and the Concept of the “Inarticulate.” WMQ, Jan. 1972. [7377]

MCKELVEY, BLAKE. A History of Penal and Correctional Institutions in the Rochester Area. Rochester Hist., Jan. 1972. [7378]

MCLAUGHLIN, JOHN J., and ANSBACHER, ROWENA R. Sane Ben Franklin: An Adlerian View of His Autobiography. J. Individ. Psych., Nov. 1971. [7379]

MCLAUGHLIN, VIRGINIA YANS. Patterns of Work and Family Organization: Buffalo’s Italians. J. Interdisc. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7380]

MCNEALY, TERRY A. Bristol: The Origins of a Pennsylvania Market Town. Pa. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [7381]

MARCEAU, HENRI. William Penn's Other Statue. Pa. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [7382]

MARTI, DONALD B. The Purposes of Agricultural Education: Ideas and Projects in New York State, 1819-1865. Agric. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7383]

NEWMAN, ERIC P. Franklin Making Money More Plentiful. Proc. Am. Phil. Soc., no. 5, 1971. [7384]

Note Concerning Daniel Adee and the American Editions of Newton's Principia. Harvard Lib. Bull., Oct. 1971. [7385]

PARKMAN, AUBREY. President [David Jayne] Hill and the Sectarian Challenge at the U. of R. Rochester Hist., Oct. 1971. [7386]

PERLMAN, DANIEL. Organizations of the Free Negro in New York City, 1800-1860. J. Negro Hist., July 1971. [7387]

PESSER, EDWARD. A Social and Economic Portrait of Jacksonian Brooklyn: Inequality, Social Immobility, and Class Distinction in the Nation's Seventh City. N.-Y. Hist. Soc. Q., Oct. 1971. [7388]

RICHARDSON, EDGAR P. Centennial City: [Philadelphia, 1876 and the water colors of David J. Kennedy]. Am. Heritage, Dec. 1971. [7389]

ROSA, ALFRED F. Charles Ives [1874-1954]: Music, Transcendentalism, and Politics. New Eng. Q., Sept. 1971. [7390]

ROWE, G. S. Thomas McKean and the Coming of the Revolution. Pa. Mag. Hist. Biog., Jan. 1972. [7391]

A Schoolgirl's Album [Ogontz School, Philadelphia 1883-1950]. Am. Heritage, Dec. 1971. [7392]

SMITH, KATHLEEN A. Moore's Rural New Yorker: A Farm Program for the 1850s. Agric. Hist., Jan. 1971. [7393]

STICKEL, FRED G., JR. Through the Morris Canal. N.J. Hist., Summer 1971. [7394]

TORGRUD, RAYMOND D. The Banning of a Book [Huckleberry Finn in New Brunswick]. NDQ, Autumn 1971. [7395]

WOLCOTT, JOHN R. Philadelphia's Chestnut Street Theatre: A Plan and Elevation. J. Soc. Architectural Historians, Oct. 1971. [7396]

UNITED STATES: SOUTHEAST

BASKETT, SAM S. Eliza Lucas Pinckney [1722-93]: Portrait of an Eighteenth Century American. S.C. Hist. Mag., Oct. 1971. [7397]

BELOHLAVEK, JOHN M. John B. Floyd as Governor of Virginia, 1849-1852. W. Va. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7398]

BONEY, F. N. The Blue Lizard: Another View of Nat Turner's Country on the Eve of Rebellion. Phylon, Winter 1970. [7399]

BONEY, F. N. The Redneck. Ga. R., Fall 1971. [7400]

BONNER, JAMES C. The Georgia Penitentiary at Milledgeville, 1817-1874. Ga. Hist. Q., Fall 1971. [7401]

BRAWLEY, HARRY M. Educational Broadcasting in West Virginia (a Sequel). W. Va. Hist., Jan. 1972. [7402]

BRYAN, T. CONN. [Charles Augustus] Conn-[Mary A.] Brantley Letters, 1862. Ga. Hist. Q., Fall 1971. [7403]

CARTER, EDWARD C., II. The Papers of Benjamin Henry Latrobe and the Maryland Historical Society, 1885-1971: Nature, Structure and Means of Acquisition. Md. Hist. Mag., Winter 1971. [7404]

CASSELL, FRANK A. Response to Crisis: Baltimore in 1814. Md. Hist. Mag., Fall 1971. [7405]

COULTER, E. MERTON. Presidential Visits to Georgia during Ante-Bellum Times. Ga. Hist. Q., Fall 1971. [7406]

CURTIS, JULIA. The Architecture and Appearance of the Charleston Theatre, 1793-1833. Ed. Theatre J., Mar. 1971. [7407]

DIN, GILBERT C. The Irish [Roman Catholic] Mission to West Florida [1786-1803]. La. Hist., Fall 1971. [7408]

DUKE, MAURICE. John Taylor of Caroline, 1753-1824: Notes toward a Bibliography. Early Am. Lit., Spring 1971. [7409]

FABIAN, MONROE H. An All-Star Stage Troupe, Cast by the Portrait Gallery: Exhibition Saluting Kennedy Center. Smithsonian, Sept. 1971. [7410]

FINK, ARTHUR E. Changing Philosophies and Practices in North Carolina Orphanages. N.C. Hist. R., Autumn 1971. [7411]

FUKE, RICHARD PAUL. The Baltimore Association for the Moral and Educational Improvement of the Colored People, 1864-1870. Md. Hist. Mag., Winter 1971. [7412]

FULLER, CHARLES F., JR. Edwin and John Wilkes Booth, Actors at the Old Marshall Theatre in Richmond. Va. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [7413]

GARNER, JOHN S. Leclaire, Illinois: A Model Company Town (1890-1934). J. Soc. Architectural Historians, Oct. 1971. [7414]

GATEWOOD, WILLARD B., JR. North Carolina's Negro Regiment in the Spanish-American War. N.C. Hist. R., Autumn 1971. [7415]

GLEISSNER, RICHARD A. The Revolutionary Settlement of 1691 in Maryland. Md. Hist. Mag., Winter 1971. [7416]

HARLAN, LOUIS R. Booker T. Washington and the Kanawha Valley 1875-1879. W. Va. Hist., Jan. 1972. [7417]

HOWE, DANIEL WALKER. A Massachusetts Yankee in Senator Calhoun's Court: Samuel Gilman in South Carolina. New Eng. Q., June 1971. [7418]

JOHNSON, HERBERT A. The Tribulations of Conway Robinson, Jr.: John Marshall's "Washington Lotts." Va. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [7419]

JORDAN, DANIEL P. Congressional Electioneering in Early West Virginia: A Mini-War in BroadSides, 1809. W. Va. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7420]

LEMAV, J. A. LEO. Robert Bolling and the Bailment of Colonel [John] Chiswell [1766]. Early Am. Lit., Fall 1971. [7421]

LONG, DURWARD. Labor Relations in the Tampa Cigar Industry, 1885-1911. Labor Hist., Fall 1971. [7422]

MILLER, MARY EMILY. The Delaware Oyster Industry. Del. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7423]

MONTAGUE, LUDWELL LEE (ed.). Letters Home to Maine from Virginia, 1841-1859. Va. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [7424]

- MORGAN, DAVID T. The Great Awakening in South Carolina, 1740-1775. S. Atl. Q., Autumn 1971. [7425]
- MORRISON, JOSEPH L. W. J. Cash: The Summing Up. S. Atl. Q., Autumn 1971. [7426]
- MYERS, JOHN B. The Freedmen and the Labor Supply: The Economic Adjustments in Post-Bellum Alabama, 1865-1867. Ala. Hist. Q., Fall, Winter 1970. [7427]
- PAISLEY, CLIFTON. Tallahassee through the Storebooks, 1843-1863: Antebellum Cotton Prosperity. Fla. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7428]
- PERKINS, EDWIN J. Financing Antebellum Importers: The Role of Brown Bros. & Co. in Baltimore. Bus. Hist. R., Winter 1971. [7429]
- PUDNER, H. PETER. People Not Pedagogy: Education in Old Virginia. Ga. R., Fall 1971. [7430]
- REED, H. CLAY, and PALERMO, JOSEPH A. Justices of the Peace in Early Delaware. Del. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7431]
- REIGER, JOHN F. Florida after Secession: Abandonment by the Confederacy and its Consequences. Fla. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7432]
- RICE, OTIS K. Eli Thayer and the Friendly Invasion of Virginia. J. S. Hist., Nov. 1971. [7433]
- SAUNDERS, ROBERT M. Progressive Historians and the Late Nineteenth-Century Agrarian Revolt: Virginia as a Historiographical Test Case. Va. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [7434]
- SCAFIDI, POLLY JOSE. Notes on Delaware Cabinetmakers. Del. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7435]
- SCHLEBECKER, JOHN T. Farmers in the Lower Shenandoah Valley, 1850. Va. Mag. Hist. Biog., Oct. 1971. [7436]
- STARR, ROGER. The Carpenter-Architects of Key West. Am. Heritage, Feb. 1972. [7437]
- TERBRAAKE, ALEX L. Postal History of the James River and Kanawha Turnpike. W. Va. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7438]
- THOMSON, ROBERT POLK. The Reform of the College of William and Mary, 1763-1780. Proc. Am. Phil. Soc., no. 3, 1971. [7439]
- WARE, JOHN D. (ed.). Tampa Bay in 1757: Francisco Maria Celi's Journal and Logbook, Part I. Fla. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7440]
- WILLIAMS, JOHN ALEXANDER. A Note and Documents on the Wayne County Shooting Incident during the Election Campaign of 1894. W. Va. Hist., Jan. 1972. [7441]
- YATES, BOWLING C. Macon, Georgia, Inland Trading Center, 1826-1836. Ga. Hist. Q., Fall 1971. [7442]
- BRUINS, ELTON J. Holocaust [fire] in Holland [Mich.], 1871. Mich. Hist., Winter 1971. [7447]
- BUROKER, ROBERT L. From Voluntary Association to Welfare State: The Illinois Immigrants' Protective League, 1908-1926. J. Am. Hist., Dec. 1971. [7448]
- CARMONY, DONALD F. (ed.). William P. Dole, Wabash Valley Merchant and Flatboatman [1840-43]. Ind. Mag. Hist., Dec. 1971. [7449]
- CATTON, BRUCE. A Michigan Boyhood, Part I. Am. Heritage, Feb. 1972. [7450]
- COOPER, JERRY M. The Wisconsin National Guard in the Milwaukee Riots of 1886. Wis. Mag. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7451]
- FIGORE, JORDAN D. Mr. Lincoln's Portuguese Neighbors. Lincoln Herald, Fall 1971. [7452]
- FLANAGAN, JOHN T. The Fiction of Jessamyn West. Ind. Mag. Hist., Dec. 1971. [7453]
- FOGEL, WALTER. Blacks in Meatpacking: Another View of The Jungle. Ind. Relations, Oct. 1971. [7454]
- HAEGER, JOHN DENIS. Eastern Money and the Urban Frontier: Chicago, 1833-1842. J. Ill. State Hist. Soc., Autumn 1971. [7455]
- HAMILTON, RAPHAEL N. An Unrecognized Father Marquette Letter? Wis. Mag. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7456]
- HOWARD, VICTOR B. The Illinois Republican Party: The Party Becomes Conservative, 1855-1856. J. Ill. State Hist. Soc., Autumn 1971. [7457]
- LEWIS, DAVID L. The Square Dancing Master [Henry Ford]. Am. Heritage, Feb. 1972. [7458]
- MCCARTY, DWIGHT G. Memoirs of a Legal Savant. Palimpsest, Aug. 1971. [7459]
- MCMACKEN, DAVID. Jim Carr [1855-92], Desperado. Mich. Hist., Summer 1971. [7460]
- MEYER, DOUGLAS K. Evolution of a Permanent Negro Community in Lansing. Mich. Hist., Summer 1971. [7461]
- MODELL, JOHN. Family and Fertility on the Indiana Frontier, 1820. Am. Q., Dec. 1971. [7462]
- NELSON, PAUL C. Rise and Decline of the Rock Island Passenger Train in the 20th Century. An. Iowa, Summer, Fall 1901. [7463]
- NEUMEYER, ELIZABETH. Michigan Indians Battle against Removal. Mich. Hist., Winter 1971. [7464]
- NOYES, EDWARD. White Opposition to Black Migration into Civil-War Wisconsin. Lincoln Herald, Fall 1971. [7465]
- NWANKWO, R. L. NWAFO. Communication in Campus Crisis: A Study of Symbolic Interaction. Journalism Q., Autumn 1971. [7466]
- O'RIORDAN, TIMOTHY. The Third American Conservation Movement: New Implications for Public Policy. J. Am. Stud., Aug. 1971. [7467]
- PAUL, JUSTUS F. The Ku Klux Klan in the Midwest: A Note on the 1936 Nebraska Elections. NDQ, Autumn 1971. [7468]
- PETERSON, FRANK ROSS. Protest Songs for Peace and Freedom: People's Songs and the 1948 Progressives. Rocky Mt. Soc. Sci. J., Jan. 1972. [7469]

UNITED STATES: MIDWEST-OLD NORTHWEST

- BIGGLESTONE, W. E. Oberlin College and the Negro Student, 1865-1940. J. Negro Hist., July 1971. [7443]
- BLIVEN, BRUCE. An Iowan in New York. Palimpsest, Oct. 1971. [7444]
- BRADSHAW, JAMES STANFORD. Grand Rapids, 1870-1880: Furniture City Emerges. Mich. Hist., Winter 1971. [7445]
- BROOKS, H. ALLEN. Chicago Architecture: Its Debt to the Arts and Crafts. J. Soc. Architectural Historians, Dec. 1971. [7446]

PUGH, M. D.; PERRY, JOSEPH B., JR.; SNYDER, ELTON E.; and SPREITZER, ELMER. Participation in Anti-War Demonstrations: A Test of the Parental Continuity Hypothesis. Sociol. Soc. Res., Oct. 1971. [7470]

RINGENBERG, WILLIAM C. Church Colleges vs. State University. Mich. Hist., Winter 1971. [7471]

SCHMIDT, ROYAL J. The Chicago Daily News and Traction Politics, 1876-1920. J. Ill. State Hist. Soc., Autumn 1971. [7472]

SHELTON, WILLIAM. The United States and the Soviet Union: Fourteen Years in Space. Russian R., Oct. 1971. [7473]

SIEBER, GEORGE WESLEY. Lumbermen at Clinton: Nineteenth Century Sawmill Center. An. Iowa, Fall 1971. [7474]

SJÖHOLM, PENTTI. FAO, storbolagen och den gröna revolutionen [FAO, Monopolies and the Green Revolution]. Ord och bild, no. 2, 1971. [7475]

SMITH, RONALD A. Athletics in the Wisconsin State University System: 1867-1913. Wis. Mag. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7476]

STERLING, ROBERT E. Civil War Draft Resistance in Illinois. J. Ill. State Hist. Soc., Autumn 1971. [7477]

THELEN, DAVID P. Robert LaFollette's Leadership, 1891-1906: The Old and New Politics and the Dilemma of the Progressive Politician. Pac. N. W. Q., July 1971. [7478]

WEEKS, LOUIS. John P. Parker: Black Abolitionist Entrepreneur, 1827-1900. Ohio Hist., Spring 1971. [7479]

WILLSON, WALT. Freedmen in Indian Territory during Reconstruction. Chron. Okla., Summer 1971. [7480]

UNITED STATES: OLD SOUTHWEST

AGNEW, BRAD. The 1858 War against the Comanches. Chron. Okla., Summer 1971. [7481]

AGNEW, EDITH J., and BARBER, RUTH K. The Unique Presbyterian School System of New Mexico. J. Presb. Hist., Fall 1971. [7482]

ALLEN, JOHN L. Geographical Knowledge & American Images of the Louisiana Territory. W. Hist. Q., Apr. 1971. [7483]

APPLEN, ALLEN G. An Attempted Indian State Government: The Okmulgee Constitution in Indian Territory, 1870-1876. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7484]

ATKINS, LEAH R. Populism in Alabama: Reuben F. Kolb and the Appeals to Minority Groups. Ala. Hist. Q., Fall, Winter 1970. [7485]

ATKINSON, JAMES HARRIS. Memories of a University Student, 1906-1910. Ark. Hist. Q., Autumn 1971. [7486]

BAIRD, W. DAVID. Fort Smith and the Red Man. Ark. Hist. Q., Winter 1971. [7487]

BARDE, ROBERT E. Arthur E. Morgan, First Chairman of TVA. Tenn. Hist. Q., Fall 1971. [7488]

BEAUCHAMP, GREEN. Early Chronicles of Barbour County [1873]. Ala. Hist. Q., Spring 1971. [7489]

BERTHRONG, DONALD J. Cattlemen on the Cheyenne-Arapaho Reservation, 1883-1885. Ariz. West, Spring 1971. [7490]

BERTHRONG, DONALD J. White Neighbors Come among the Southern Cheyenne and Arapaho. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7491]

CARRIKER, ROBERT C. (ed.). Thompson McFadden's Diary of an Indian Campaign, 1874. S. W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7492]

CLARK, J. STANLEY. The Killing of Big Snake [1879]. Chron. Okla., Autumn 1971. [7493]

EAST, DENNIS. The New York and Mississippi Land Company and the Panic of 1837. J. Miss. Hist., Nov. 1971. [7494]

EDMONSON, BEN G. Pat Harrison and Mississippi in the Presidential Elections of 1924 and 1928. J. Miss. Hist., Nov. 1971. [7495]

FARIES, CLYDE J. Redneck Rhetoric and the Last of the Redeemers: The 1899 [Anselm J.] McLaurin-[John Mills] Allen Campaign. J. Miss. Hist., Nov. 1971. [7496]

FERGUSON, CLYDE R. Andrew Pickens and U.S. Policy toward the Creek Nation, 1789-1793. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7497]

FOLMAR, JOHN KENT. Post Civil War Mobile: The Letters of James M. Williams, May-September, 1865. Ala. Hist. Q., Fall, Winter 1970. [7498]

FOSTER, ISABELLE. Washington College and Washington College Academy. Tenn. Hist. Q., Fall 1971. [7499]

FRANTZ, JOE B. Western Impact on the Nation. W. Hist. Q., July 1970. [7500]

HAMMETT, EVELYN ALLEN. With Pen in Hand: Letters of Malachi and Avline Groves (1860-1867). J. Miss. Hist., Aug. 1971. [7501]

HEASTON, MICHAEL D. Whiskey Regulation and Indian Land Titles in New Mexico Territory, 1851-1861. J. West, July 1971. [7502]

HOLLAND, REID A. Life in the Cherokee Nation, 1855-1860. Chron. Okla., Autumn 1971. [7503]

HOWELL, ELMO. The Chickasaw Queen in William Faulkner's Story. Chron. Okla., Autumn 1971. [7504]

HUETTEL, WILLIAM L. (ed.). Letters from Private Richard C. Bridges [11th Miss. Regt.], C.S.A. 1861-1864. J. Miss. Hist., Nov. 1971. [7505]

HULCE, DEVERN C. Michigan at Sea [vessels of that name]. Mich. Hist., Summer 1971. [7506]

JAMES, FELIX. The Tuskegee Institute Movable School, 1906-1923. Agric. Hist., July 1971. [7507]

JENNINGS, L. C. L'abolition de l'esclavage par la II<sup>e</sup> république et ses effets en Louisiane (1848-1858). R. fr. Hist. Outre-Mer, no. 4, 1969. [7508]

JORDAN, JULIA A. Oklahoma's Oral History Collection: New Source for Indian History. Chron. Okla., Summer 1971. [7509]

KELLEHER, DANIEL T. The Case [1935-40] of Lloyd Lionel Gaines: The Demise of the Separate but Equal Doctrine. J. Negro Hist., Oct. 1971. [7510]

KEMP, SUSAN. Up the Mississippi [1857]. La. Hist., Fall 1971. [7511]

KENDRICK, JACK E. Alabama Congressmen in the Wilson Administration. Ala. R., Oct. 1971. [7512]

- KORNELL, GARY L. Reconstruction in Nashville, 1867-1869. Tenn. Hist. Q., Fall 1971. [7513]
- LEGAN, MARSHALL SCOTT. Mississippi and the Yellow Fever Epidemics of 1878-1879. J. Miss. Hist., Aug. 1971. [7514]
- LITTLEFIELD, DANIEL F., JR. Utopian Dreams of the Cherokee Fullbloods, 1890-1934. J. West, July 1971. [7515]
- LOOS, JOHN L. William Clark, Indian Agent. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7516]
- LUMPKINS, WILLIAM. A Distinguished Architect Writes on Adobe. El Palacio: Q. J. Mus. N.M., no. 4, 1971. [7517]
- MCHANEY, THOMAS L. Sanctuary [by William Faulkner] and Frazer's Slain Kings. Miss. Q., Summer 1971. [7518]
- MCMLLEN, NEIL R. Organized Resistance to School Desegregation in Tennessee. Tenn. Hist. Q., Fall 1971. [7519]
- MARKS, HENRY S. Boundary Disputes in the Republic of West Florida in 1810. La. Hist., Fall 1971. [7520]
- MARSHALL, F. RAY. Some Reflections on Labor History. S.W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7521]
- MELLINGER, PHILIP. Discrimination and Statehood in Oklahoma. Chron. Okla., Autumn 1971. [7522]
- METZ, LEON C. Pat Garrett [1851-1908]: Another Look at a Western Gunman. Mont. Mag. W. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7523]
- MONROE, BILL. Louis Armstrong, a Tribute. La. Hist., Fall 1971. [7524]
- MORGAN, GEORGE T., JR. The Gospel of Wealth Goes South: John Henry Kirby and Labors' Struggle for Self-Determination, 1901-1916. S.W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7525]
- MYERS, LEE. Mutiny at Fort Cummings [1867]. N.M. Hist. R., Oct. 1971. [7526]
- MYRICK, DONALD. Recollections of an Arizona Ranch School in 1911 [H. David Evans' El Rancho Bonito]. J. Ariz. Hist., Spring 1971. [7527]
- NASH, A. E. KEIR. The Texas Supreme Court and Trial Rights of Blacks, 1845-1860. J. Am. Hist., Dec. 1971. [7528]
- PEARCE, LARRY WESLEY. The American Missionary Association and the Freedmen's Bureau in Arkansas, 1866-1868. Ark. Hist. Q., Autumn 1971. [7529]
- POWERS, RAMON. Why the Northern Cheyenne Left Indian Territory in 1878: A Cultural Analysis. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7530]
- REESE, JAMES V. The Evolution of an Early Texas Union: The Screwmen's [longshoremen] Benevolent Association of Galveston, 1866-1891. S.W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7531]
- RILEY, CARROLL L. Early Spanish-Indian Communication in the Greater Southwest. N.M. Hist. R., Oct. 1971. [7532]
- ROSS, MARGARET. The Hinderliter House [Little Rock]: Its Place in Arkansas History. Ark. Hist. Q., Autumn 1971. [7533]
- ROTHROCK, THOMAS. Joseph Carter Corbin and Negro Education in the University of Arkansas. Ark. Hist. Q., Winter 1971. [7534]
- RYAN, JOHN B., JR. Willard Warner [1829-1906] and the Rise and Fall of the Iron Industry in Tecumseh, Alabama. Ala. R., Oct. 1971. [7535]
- RYAN, JOHN B., JR. Willard Warner in the California Gold Rush: A Social and Cultural View. J. West, Oct. 1971. [7536]
- SCHWENINGER, LOREN. The American Missionary Association and Northern Philanthropy in Reconstruction Alabama. Ala. Hist. Q., Fall, Winter 1970. [7537]
- SELF, NANCY HOPE. The Building of the Railroads in the Cherokee Nation. Chron. Okla., Summer 1971. [7538]
- SHOFNER, JERRELL H. The Chimerical Scheme of Ceding West Florida. Ala. Hist. Q., Spring 1971. [7539]
- SHORT, JULEE. [Washington] Irving's Eden: Oklahoma, 1832. J. West, Oct. 1971. [7540]
- STEVENS, HARRY R. A Company of Hands and Traders: Origins of the [Hugh] Glenn-[Jacob] Fowler Expedition of 1821-1822. N.M. Hist. R., July 1971. [7541]
- STEVENSON, JANET. Rosa Parks Wouldn't Budge [Montgomery, Alabama, Bus Boycott, 1955]. Am. Heritage, Feb. 1972. [7542]
- STRONG, BRYAN. Images of Nietzsche in America, 1900-1970. S. Atl. Q., Autumn 1971. [7543]
- SWADESH, FRANCES LEON. The Social and Philosophical Context of Creativity in Hispanic New Mexico. Rocky Mt. Soc. Sci. J., Jan. 1972. [7544]
- SZASZ, FERENC M. The Scopes Trial in Perspective. Tenn. Hist. Q., Fall 1971. [7545]
- TAYLOR, MORRIS E. Plains Indians on the New Mexico-Colorado Border The Last Phase, 1870-1876. N.M. Hist. R., Oct. 1971. [7546]
- THEISEN, GERALD (ed.). A Brief Memoir: Julian Aragon y Perea [1830-1892]. N.M. Hist. R., Oct. 1971. [7547]
- TURNER, MARTHA ANNE. The Yellow Rose of Texas, the Story of a Song. S.W. Stud., no. 31, 1971. [7548]
- UNDERHILL, LONNIE E., and LITTLEFIELD, DANIEL F., JR. Quail Hunting: Big Business in Early Oklahoma. Chron. Okla., Autumn 1971. [7549]
- WALKER, HENRY PICKERING. Freightling from Guaymas to Tucson, 1850-1860. W. Hist. Q., July 1970. [7550]
- WARD, ROBERT D. A Note on General Leonard Wood's Experimental Companies [1913-14]. Mil. Aff., Oct. 1971. [7551]
- WEBER, DAVID J. William Becknell as a Mountain Man: Two Letters [1824]. N.M. Hist. R., July 1971. [7552]
- WETHERED, SAMUEL, JR. A Sidelight on the Santa Fe Trade, 1844. N.M. Hist. R., July 1971. [7553]
- WIGGINS, SARAH W. A Proposal for Women's Suffrage in Alabama in 1867. Ala. Hist. Q., Fall, Winter 1970. [7554]
- WOODWARD, EARL F. The [Joseph] Brooks and [Elisha] Baxter War in Arkansas, 1872-1874. Ark. Hist. Q., Winter 1971. [7555]

UNITED STATES: FAR WEST

ATHERTON, LEWIS. The Mining Promoter in the Trans-Mississippi West [Theodore J. Lamoreaux]. W. Hist. Q., Jan. 1970. [7556]

- BATMAN, RICHARD DALE. The Founding of the Hollywood Motion Picture Industry. J. West, Oct. 1971. [7557]
- BLACKORBY, EDWARD C. George B. Winship [1843-1931]: Progressive Journalist of the Middle Border. NDQ, Summer 1971. [7558]
- BORNE, LAWRENCE R. Triumph to Disaster: Colonel James A. Ownbey [1859-1927]. Colo. Mag., Fall 1971. [7559]
- BOWEN, MARSHALL. The Kinkaid Act [1904] and the Southern Sheridan County Sandhills of Nebraska. Rocky Mt. Soc. Sci. J., Jan. 1972. [7560]
- BROADBENT, T. L. The German-Language Press in California: Record of a German Immigration. J. West, Oct. 1971. [7561]
- CASE, LELAND D. The Westerners: Twenty-five Years of Riding the Range. W. Hist. Q., Jan. 1970. [7562]
- CHAFFIN, GLENN. Aunt Tish [Nevins, 1862-1942], Beloved Gourmet of the Bitter Root [Hamilton, Mont.]. Mont. Mag. W. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7563]
- CHESTER, EDWARD W. The Great Plains State Constitutions and the Webb Thesis. Great Plains J., Spring 1971. [7564]
- DAVIS, W. N., JR. The Sutler at Fort Bridger. W. Hist. Q., Jan. 1971. [7565]
- DEWITT, ESTHER T. Melvin Olanna [artist]. Alas. J., Autumn 1971. [7566]
- DILLON, RICHARD H. Faith to Move Mountains: A Boondoggle in the High Sierras [false claims in building of Central Pacific Railroad]. Mont. Mag. W. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7567]
- DONOVAN, RUTH GODFREY. The Nebraska League of Women Voters. Nebr. Hist., Fall 1971. [7568]
- ELAM, EARL H. The Origin and Identity of the Wichita. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7569]
- EMMERT, REGINALD A. Bill Berry, Artist of the Far North. Alas. J., Summer 1971. [7570]
- FAHEY, JOHN. The Million-Dollar Corner: The Development of Downtown Spokane, 1890-1920. Pac. N.W. Q., Apr. 1971. [7571]
- FRITZ, HENRY E. George W. Manypenny [b. 1808] and Our Indian Wards. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7572]
- GOUGH, BARRY M. British Policy in the San Juan Boundary Dispute, 1854-72. Pac. N.W. Q., Apr. 1971. [7573]
- GREER, CHARLES, and SCHEFFER, VICTOR B. A 1715 Picture of a Fur Seal. Pac. N.W. Q., Oct. 1971. [7574]
- GRIFFIN, WALTER R. George W. Goethals, Explorer of the Pacific Northwest, 1882-84. Pac. N.W. Q., Oct. 1971. [7575]
- HALL, MARK W. Journalism in California: The Pioneer Period, 1831-1849. J. West, Oct. 1971. [7576]
- HAMPTON, H. D. With [George Bird] Grinnell in North Park [1879]. Colo. Mag., Fall 1971. [7577]
- HANSEN, H. N. An Account of a Mormon [Rev. H. N. Hansen] Family's Conversion to the Religion of the Latter Day Saints and of Their Trip from Denmark to Utah. An. Iowa, Summer, Fall 1971. [7578]
- HINCKLEY, TED C. The Americanization of Alaska, 1867-1897. Alas. J., Summer 1971. [7579]
- HINCKLEY, TED C. (ed.). "The Canoe Rocks—We Do Not Know What Will Become of Us." The Complete Transcript of a Meeting Between Governor John Green Brady of Alaska and a Group of Tlingit Chiefs, Juneau, December 14, 1898. W. Hist. Q., July 1970. [7580]
- HORNBEIN, MARJORIE. Denver's Struggle for Home Rule [1892-1911]. Colo. Mag., Fall 1971. [7581]
- HUNT, WILLIAM R. Harry DeWindt: He Blew it at Chilkoot Pass. Alas. J., Summer 1971. [7582]
- HUNT, WILLIAM R. Northwest Bibliography from Dall to Lada-Mocarski. Pac. N.W. Q., July 1971. [7583]
- JACKSON, RICHARD H. Myth and Reality: Environmental Perception of the Mormon Pioneers. Rocky Mt. Soc. Sci. J., Jan. 1972. [7584]
- JOHNSON, KEACH. Iowa Dairying at the Turn of the Century: The New Agriculture and Progressivism. Agric. Hist., Apr. 1971. [7585]
- JOHNSON, KENNETH M. The Impeachment of Judge Carlos S. Hardy [1929]. J. West, Oct. 1971. [7586]
- JONES, BRIAN. John Richard, Jr. and the Killing at Fetterman [1869]. An. Wyo., Fall 1971. [7587]
- JONES, DOROTHY V. A Potawatomi Faces the Problem of Cultural Change: Joseph N. Bourassa in Kansas. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7588]
- KANE, RALPH J. The Paradox of California Populism. NDQ, Summer 1971. [7589]
- KELSEY, HARRY. William P. Dole and Mr. Lincoln's Indian Policy. J. West, July 1971. [7590]
- KRAMER, WILLIAM M., and STERN, NORTON B. The Great "Elaine" [painting by Toby E. Rosenthal] Robbery [San Francisco, 1875]. J. West, Oct. 1971. [7591]
- KUTZLER, CHARLES R. Can Forests Bring Rain to the Plains? Forest Hist., Oct. 1971. [7592]
- KVASNICKA, ROBERT M. From the Wilderness to Washington—and Back Again: The Story of the Chippewa Delegation of 1855. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7593]
- LEAMAN, BERTHA R. An Early Settler [Ozias Ferree] in Iowa: Westward Expansion in Microcosm. An. Iowa, Summer 1971. [7594]
- LENT, JOHN A. The Press on Wheels: A History of The Frontier Index. J. West, Oct. 1971. [7595]
- LENT, JOHN A. The Press on Wheels: A History of The Frontier Index of Nebraska, Colorado, Wyoming, Elsewhere? An. Wyo., Fall 1971. [7596]
- LOWITT, RICHARD. George W. Norris [1861-1944]: A Country Boy in an Urbanizing Nation. Nebr. Hist., Fall 1971. [7597]
- LOY, EDWARD H. Editorial Opinion and American Imperialism: Two Northwest Newspapers [Portland Morning Oregonian and Seattle Daily Times, 1900-1903]. Ore. Hist. Q., Sept. 1971. [7598]
- MCCALL, MEG SUTHERLAND. A Walk to Forty Mile [gold camp]. Alas. J., Autumn 1971. [7599]
- MACPHEE, DONALD A. The Centralia [Washington] Incident [1919] and the Pamphleteers. Pac. N.W. Q., July 1971. [7600]

- MARDOCK, ROBERT W. Alfred H. Love [d. 1913], Indian Peace Policy, and the Universal Peace Union. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7601]
- MELLINGER, PHILIP J. Frontier Camp to Small Town: A Study of Community Development [Hartville, Wyo.]. An. Wyo., Fall 1971. [7602]
- MILLER, GLENN W. The Extent, Characteristics and Effects of Multijobholding in South Central Kansas. Rocky Mt. Soc. Sci. J., Jan. 1972. [7603]
- MUNKRES, ROBERT L. Soda Springs: Curiosity of the [Oregon] Trail. An. Wyo., Fall 1971. [7604]
- NASKE, CLAUS-M. Blacks Blocked by Bureaucracy [1930's]. Alas. J., Autumn 1971. [7605]
- NICHOLS, ROGER L. Printer's Ink and Red Skins: Western Newspapermen and the Indians. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7606]
- NICHOLS, ROGER L. Soldiers as Farmers: Army Agriculturalists in the Missouri Valley, 1818-1827. Nebr. Hist., Fall 1971. [7607]
- PATTY, STANTON A. Felix Pedro [ca. 1858-1910, Founder of Fairbanks]—a Mystery. Alas. J., Autumn 1971. [7608]
- PAUL, WILLIAM L., SR. The Real Story of the "Lincoln Totem." Alas. J., Summer 1971. [7609]
- PETERSEN, LANCE. Ancient Aleut Rock Paintings: The Clam Cove Pictographs. Alas. J., Autumn 1971. [7610]
- PETERSON, CHARLES S. "A Mighty Man Was Brother Lot": A Portrait of Lot Smith [1830-92]—Mormon Frontiersman. W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1970. [7611]
- PHILLIPS, WILLIAM W. Growing up with the Country: Asle J. Gronna's Apprenticeship [b. 1858]. NDQ, Summer 1971. [7612]
- PIERCE, RICHARD A. Alaska's Russian Governors: Chistiakov and Wrangel. Alas. J., Autumn 1971. [7613]
- PIERCE, RICHARD A. Alaska's Russian Governors: M. I. Murav'ev, 1820-1825. Alas. J., Summer 1971. [7614]
- PUTNAM, JACKSON K. Down to Earth: A. B. Guthrie's Quest for Moral and Historical Truth. NDQ, Summer 1971. [7615]
- RAUGEWITZ, RICHARD F. The Horse Disease in Kansas, 1912-1913. Emporia [Kan.] State Res. Stud., Dec. 1971. [7616]
- RAVENAL, EARL C. Approaching China, Defending Taiwan. For. Aff., Oct. 1971. [7617]
- REINHARDT, RICHARD. A Nice Piece of Real Estate [San Francisco, 1856]. Am. Heritage, Dec. 1971. [7618]
- RENNER, FREDERIC G. A Schoolboy's [Charles Russell] Sketchbook. Am. Heritage, Oct. 1971. [7619]
- ROBINSON, ELWYN B. The [George W.] Starcher Years: The University of North Dakota, 1954-1971. NDQ, Spring 1971. [7620]
- ROPPEL, PATRICIA. Sumdum [mining camp]. Alas. J., Summer 1971. [7621]
- SAVAGE, WILLIAM W., JR. [Horace Curzon] Plunkett of the EK: Irish Notes on the Wyoming Cattle Industry in the 1880's. An. Wyo., Fall 1971. [7622]
- Sea Otter Hunting [1890's]. Alas. J., Autumn 1971. [7623]
- SHERMAN, STEVE. Ruby's Gold Rush Newspapers. Alas. J., Autumn 1971. [7624]
- SHUNK, HAROLD W. [MATO SKA]. Reminiscing about the Dakota. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7625]
- SKAGGS, JIMMY M. Hip Pocket Businessmen: The Cattle-trailing Contractors. Great Plains J., Fall 1970. [7626]
- SMITH, DUANE. Colorado's Urban-Mining Safety Valve. Colo. Mag., Fall 1971. [7627]
- SPERRY, JAMES E. Waheenee: An Indian Girl's Story Told by herself [1921] to Gilbert L. Wilson. N.D. Hist., Winter-Spring 1971. [7628]
- SUGGS, GEORGE G., JR. Militant Western Labor Confronts the Hostile State: A Case Study [Colorado, 1903-04]. W. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7629]
- SWART, MARGARET. Educational Eskimo Toys. Alas. J., Autumn 1971. [7630]
- THAYER, RUTH (ed.). One-Room School, 1900. Ore. Hist. Q., Sept. 1971. [7631]
- THOMAS, PHILLIP DRENNON. Artists among the Indians, 1493-1850. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7632]
- THOMPSON, ALBERT W. The Early History of the Palouse River and its Names. Pac. N.W. Q., Apr. 1971. [7633]
- TUERK, RICHARD. Los Angeles' Reaction to Emerson's Visit to San Francisco [1871]. New Eng. Q., Sept. 1971. [7634]
- TURNER, RUTH M. Athabaskan Art. Alas. J., Autumn 1971. [7635]
- UNRAU, WILLIAM E. United States "Diplomacy" with the Dhegiha-Siouan Kansa, 1815-1825. Kan. Q., Fall 1971. [7636]
- VENN, GEORGE A. The Wobblies and Montana's [Missoula, 1909] Garden City. Mont. Mag. W. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7637]
- WAAGE, WESLEY A. The Wheat Grower: A Journal of the Commodity Pooling Movement [1923-33]. NDQ, Summer 1971. [7638]
- WALKER, HENRY P. Soldier in the California Column: The Diary [1861-64] of John W. Teal [2d Calif. Cav. Regt.]. Ariz. West, Spring 1971. [7639]
- WEDEL, MILDRED MOTT. J.-B. Bénard, Sieur de la Harpe: Visitor to the Wichitas in 1719. Great Plains J., Spring 1971. [7640]
- WELSCH, ROGER L. The Myth of the Great American Desert. Nebr. Hist., Fall 1971. [7641]
- WENGER, ROBERT E. The Anti-Saloon League in Nebraska Politics, 1898-1910. Nebr. Hist., Fall 1971. [7642]
- WILL, DRAKE W. Lewis and Clark: Westering Physicians. Mont. Mag. W. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7643]
- WIPRUD, THEODORE. Butte: A Troubled Labor Paradise as a Corporal Saw It [1914]. Mont. Mag. W. Hist., Autumn 1971. [7644]

LATIN AMERICA

Donald E. Worcester, Texas Christian University

GENERAL

- CAZADERO, MANUEL. Pierre Queville. L'Amerique Latine, La Doctrine Monroe et le Panamericanismo. Latino Am., no. 4, 1971. [7645]
- CLEGERN, WAYNE M. Teaching Latin American History. Hist. Teacher, Nov. 1971. [7646]
- COLE, WILLIAM E., and SANDERS, RICHARD D. A Modified Dualism Model for Latin American Economies. J. Dev. Areas, Jan. 1972. [7647]
- CRAIG, ALEXANDER. Urban Guerrilla In Latin America. Survey, Summer 1971. [7648]
- DUNCAN, W. RAYMOND. Soviet Policy in Latin America Since Khrushchev. Orbis, Summer 1971. [7649]
- KLAIBER, JEFFREY L. The Non-Communist Left in Latin America [note]. J. Hist. Ideas, Oct.-Dec. 1971. [7650]
- MAGUIRE, PATRICIO JOSÉ. La masonería como instrumento en la lucha de influencias durante el período de la independencia y organización de los países hispanoamericanos. Bol. Inst. Hist. Arg. "Dr. Emilio Ravignani", XIII, nos. 22-23, 1970. [7651]
- MINTZ, SIDNEY W. Groups, Group Boundaries and the Perception of 'Race' [r. art.; Caribbean]. Comp. Stud. Soc. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7652]
- MONTALVA, EDUARDO FREI. The Second Latin American Revolution. For. Aff., Oct. 1971. [7653]
- No Simple Answer: An Interview with Ivan D. Illich. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [7654]
- Notes on Latin America. Nonaligned Third World An., 1970. [7655]
- NUNN, FREDERICK M. The Latin American Military Establishment: Some Thoughts on the Origins of its Socio-Political Role and an Illustrative Bibliographical Essay. The Americas, Oct. 1971. [7656]
- PIKE, FREDERICK. Hispanismo and the Non-Revolutionary Spanish Immigrant in Spanish America, 1900-1930. Inter-Am. Ec. Aff., Autumn 1971. [7657]
- PRICE, BARBARA J. Prehispanic Irrigation Agriculture in Nuclear America. Latin Am. Res. R., Fall 1971. [7658]
- REZNECK, SAMUEL (ed.). An American Diplomat Writes About Latin America in 1832. The Americas, Oct. 1971. [7659]
- RUZ MENÉNDEZ, RODOLFO. La familia Ruz Rives de Yucatán: don José María, don Ildefonso y fray Joaquín. Bol. arch. gen. nación (México), July-Dec. 1969. [7660]
- SLOAN, JOHN W. Three Views of Latin America: President Nixon, Governor Rockefeller, and the Latin American Consensus of Viña Del Mar. Orbis, Winter 1971. [7661]
- SUÁREZ GAONA, ENRIQUE. Latinoamérica: cultura y mito. Latino Am., no. 4, 1971. [7662]
- TAU ANZOÁTEGUI, VÍCTOR. Un epitome de la Recopilación Indiana en el siglo XIX. R. Inst. Hist. Derecho Ricardo Levene, no. 21, 1970. [7663]
- VASILYEV, V. The United States' "New Approach" to Latin America. Int. Aff. (U.S.S.R.), June 1971. [7664]

LATIN AMERICA:
COLONIAL PERIOD

- ALCÁNTARA AVELAR, HÉLIO DE. Organização e vida político-administrativa e eclesiástica. R. inst. hist. geog. bras., July-Sept. 1970. [7665]
- BEEMAN, RICHARD R. Labor Forces and Race Relations: A Comparative View of the Colonization of Brazil and Virginia. PSQ, Dec. 1971. [7666]
- CANABRAVA BARREIROS, EDUARDO. A cidade do Rio de Janeiro de sua fundação aos fins do século XVII. R. inst. hist. geog. bras., July-Sept. 1970. [7667]
- CHARTRAND, RENE. Notes on Bermuda Military Forces, 1687-1815. Bermuda Hist. Q., Summer 1971. [7668]
- COHEN, MARTIN A. Antonio Díaz de Cáceres: Marrano Adventurer in Colonial Mexico. Am. Jewish Hist. Q., Dec. 1970. [7669]
- FERREIRA FRANÇA, MÁRIO. Panorama médico dos séculos XVI e XVII. R. inst. hist. geog. bras., July-Sept. 1970. [7670]
- FERREIRA REIS, ARTHUR CEZAR. Vida social nos séculos XVI e XVII. R. inst. hist. geog. bras., July-Sept. 1970. [7671]
- FREDERICKO, CELSO. A idéia de revolução no Brasil colonial. R. hist. (São Paulo), Jan.-Mar. 1971. [7672]
- FULLER, THOMAS. A Contemporary View of Captain John Smith. Bermuda Hist. Q., Autumn 1971. [7673]
- GOLDBERG, RITA. Don Jerónimo Cortés y Arellano, nieto de Hernán Cortés. Bol. arch. gen. nación (México), July-Dec. 1969. [7674]
- KEEN, BENJAMIN. The White Legend Revisited: A Reply to Professor Hanke's "Modest Proposal" [note]. Hisp. Am. Hist. R., May 1971. [7675]
- KUETHE, ALLAN J. The Status of the Free Pardo in the Disciplined Militia of New Granada. J. Negro Hist., Apr. 1971. [7676]
- LACOMBE, LUIS LOURENÇO. Ordens religiosas, irmandades e confrarias. R. inst. hist. geog. bras., July-Sept. 1970. [7677]
- LEVAGGI, ABELARDO. Esponsales. Su régimen jurídico en Castilla, Indias y Río de la Plata hasta la Codificación. R. Inst. Hist. Derecho Ricardo Levene, no. 21, 1970. [7678]
- LIEBMAN, SEYMOUR B. The Great Conspiracy in Peru. The Americas, Oct. 1971. [7679]
- MARTÍNEZ DELGADO, LUIS. Fundación de Popayán. Bol. hist. antigüedades (Bogotá), Jan.-Mar. 1971. [7680]
- MESQUITA FILHO, JÚLIO DE. Índios, jesuítas e bandeirantes. R. hist. (São Paulo), Apr.-June 1971. [7681]
- Minutes of His Majesty's Council, 1741/2. Bermuda Hist. Q., Summer 1971. [7682]
- Minutes of His Majesty's Council (1742). Bermuda Hist. Q., Autumn 1971. [7683]
- MURRAY, D. R. Statistics of the Slave Trade to Cuba, 1790-1867. J. Latin Am. Stud., Nov. 1971. [7684]

O comércio marítimo e alguns armadores do século XVIII, na Bahia (VII). R. hist. (São Paulo), Apr.-June 1971. [7685]

O'CONOR, HUGO (tr. May Lu Moore and Delmar L. Beene). The Interior Provinces of New Spain: The Report of Hugo O'Connor, Jan. 30, 1776. Ariz. West, Autumn 1971. [7686]

OLIVEIRA, ANTÔNIO CAMILO DE. Negociações diplomáticas entre as Côrtes de Lisboa e Paris, decorrentes da presença de franceses no Rio de Janeiro. R. inst. hist. geog. bras., July-Sept. 1970. [7687]

PORRO, NELLY R. La inalienabilidad de los bienes de mayorazgo. Tres documentos inéditos del siglo XV para su estudio. R. Inst. Hist. Derecho Ricardo Levene, no. 21, 1970. [7688]

REIS DE QUEIROZ, SUELY ROBLES. José de Góis e Morais: o paulista que quase comprou São Paulo. R. hist. (São Paulo), Apr.-June 1971. [7689]

RIOS FILHO, ADOLFO MORALES DE LOS. Evolução urbana e arquitetônica do Rio de Janeiro nos séculos XVI e XVII (1567-1699). R. inst. hist. geog. bras., July-Sept. 1970. [7690]

RUBIO MAÑÉ, J. IGNACIO. Noticias biográficas del Padre Clavijero, 1731-1782. Bol. arch. gen. nación (México), July-Dec. 1969. [7691]

SHERIDAN, R. B. Simon Taylor, Sugar Tycoon of Jamaica, 1740-1813. Agric. Hist., Oct. 1971. [7692]

SOARES DE SOUSA, JOSÉ ANTÔNIO. Aspectos do comércio do Brasil e de Portugal no fim do século XVIII e começo do século XIX. R. inst. hist. geog. bras., Oct.-Dec. 1970. [7693]

VEIGA GARCIA, EMANUEL SOARES DA. Buenos Aires e Cádiz. Contribuição ao estudo do comércio livre (1789-1791) (II). R. hist. (São Paulo), Jan.-Mar. 1971. [7694]

VERISSIMO, INÁCIO JOSÉ. História militar de Rio de Janeiro nos séculos XVI e XVII. R. inst. hist. geog. bras., July-Sept. 1970. [7695]

VIGIL, RALPH H. Negro Slaves and Rebels in the Spanish Possessions, 1503-1558. Historian, Aug. 1971. [7696]

WARE, JOHN D. (ed.). Tampa Bay in 1757: Francisco María Celi's Journal and Logbook, Part I. Fla. Hist. Q., Oct. 1971. [7697]

WHITAKER, ARTHUR P. Changing and Unchanging Interpretations of the Enlightenment in Spanish America. Proc. Am. Phil. Soc., no. 4, 1970. [7698]

LATIN AMERICA: NATIONAL PERIOD North and Central America and the Caribbean

ALBA, H. FRANCISCO, and ALVARADO, RICARDO. Algunas observaciones sobre la mortalidad por causas en México, 1950-1967. Demog. Ec., no. 2, 1971. [7699]

BENBOW, COLIN. A Sidelight on the Spanish 'Flu.' Bermuda Hist. Q., Autumn 1971. [7700]

BRACK, GENE M. La opinión mexicana, el racismo norteamericano y la guerra de 1846. Anglia, no. 4, 1971. [7701]

CALVERT, PETER. The Last Occasion on which Britain Used Coercion to Settle a Dispute with a Non-colonial Territory in the Caribbean: Guatemala and the Powers, 1909-1913. Inter-Am. Ec. Aff., Winter 1971. [7702]

DAVIS, MILLIE C. American Religious and Religious Reaction to Mexico's Church-State Conflict, 1926-1927: Background to the Morrow Mission. J. Church and State, Winter 1971. [7703]

DOMÍNGUEZ, JORGE I. Sectoral Clashes in Cuban Politics and Development. Latin Am. Res. R., Fall 1971. [7704]

GRIEB, KENNETH J. The United States and the Rise of General Maximiliano Hernández Martínez. J. Latin Am. Stud., Nov. 1971. [7705]

GRUBER, WILLIAM. Career Patterns of Mexico's Elite. W. Pol. Q., Sept. 1971. [7706]

GUZMÁN, JOSÉ R. John Galvin en la Guerra de Independencia de México. Bol. arch. gen. nación (México), July-Dec. 1969. [7707]

HALLETT, WILLIAM L. HOLLIS. Internal Transportation: The Bermuda Railway. Bermuda Hist. Q., Summer 1971. [7708]

HILTY, HIRAM H. Zenas L. Martin [1855-1930], Quaker Pioneer in Cuba. Quaker Hist., Autumn 1970. [7709]

MEYER, JEAN. Los obreros en la Revolución mexicana: Los "Batallones Rojos." Hist. mex., July-Sept. 1971. [7710]

MICHAELS, ALBERT J. Las elecciones de 1940. Hist. mex., July-Sept. 1971. [7711]

PALENCIA, F. JAVIER. Don Ezequiel A. Chávez: su idea de la Universidad de México. Latino Am., no. 4, 1971. [7712]

ROSS, STANLEY R. México: Las tensiones del progreso. Latino Am., no. 4, 1971. [7713]

SANDELS, ROBERT. Silvestre Terrazas and the Old Regime in Chihuahua. The Americas, Oct. 1971. [7714]

TIERNEY, JOHN J., JR. U.S. Intervention in Nicaragua, 1927-1933: Lessons for Today. Orbis, Winter 1971. [7715]

TOBLER, HANS-WERNER. Las paradojas del ejército revolucionario: su papel social en la reforma agraria mexicana, 1920-1935. Hist. mex., July-Sept. 1971. [7716]

TUCKER, TERRY. Cataclysm [earthquakes in Bermuda, 1664-]. Bermuda Hist. Q., Autumn 1971. [7717]

TUCKER, TERRY. Internal Transportation: Bicycles (of the type known as "PUSH BIKES"). Bermuda Hist. Q., Summer 1971. [7718]

ZEÁ, IRENE. Butler y las reclamaciones norteamericanas a México. Anglia, no. 4, 1971. [7719]

LATIN AMERICA: NATIONAL PERIOD South America

ADAMS, DALE W. What Can Under-Developed Countries Expect from Foreign Aid to Agriculture? Case Study: Brazil 1950-1970. Inter-Am. Ec. Aff., Summer 1971. [7720]

ÁLVAREZ CURBELLO, SILVIA. Vicisitudes del nacionalismo argentino. Latino Am., no. 4, 1971. [7721]

ANSEL, BERNARD D. Discord Among Western and Eastern European Jews in Argentina. Am. Jewish Hist. Q., Dec. 1970. [7722]

BRICEÑO PEROZO, MARIO. El legado bolivariano de Lasso de la Vega. Bol. hist. antigüedades (Bogotá), Jan.-Mar. 1971. [7723]

- BRUNO LOBO, FRANCISCO. Rita Lobato. A primeira médica formada no Brasil. R. hist. (São Paulo), Apr.-June 1971. [7724]
- CARRETERO, ANDRÉS M. Contribución al conocimiento de la propiedad rural en la provincia de Buenos Aires para 1830. Bol. Inst. Hist. Arg. "Dr. Emilio Ravignani," XIII, nos. 22-23, 1970. [7725]
- CASTRO SOUZA, LUIZ DE. A medicina na Guerra do Paraguai (Mato Grosso) (V) (Conclusion). R. hist. (São Paulo), Jan.-Mar. 1971. [7726]
- CICCARELLI, ORAZIO. Sánchez Cerro and the Depression in Peru, 1930-1933. S. Q., Apr. 1971. [7727]
- CONTRERAS R., MARIO A. ¿Revolución o golpe de estado? Brasil, octubre de 1930. Latino Am., no. 4, 1971. [7728]
- CORREIA NETO, JONAS. Influência Napoleônica no Exército Brasileiro. R. inst. hist. geog. bras., Oct.-Dec. 1970. [7729]
- CRESPI, MURIEL. Changing Power Relations: The Rise of Peasant Unions on Traditional Ecuadorian Haciendas. Anthropol. Q., Oct. 1971. [7730]
- DAVIES, THOMAS M., JR. The Indigenismo of the Peruvian Aprista Party: A Reinterpretation. Hisp. Am. Hist. R., Nov. 1971. [7731]
- DEAN, WARREN. Latifundia and Land Policy in Nineteenth-Century Brazil. Hisp. Am. Hist. R., Nov. 1971. [7732]
- FINCH, M. H. Three Perspectives on the Crisis in Uruguay. J. Inter-Am. Stud., Nov. 1971. [7733]
- FORD, A. G. British Investment in Argentina and Long Swings, 1808-1941. J. Ec. Hist., Sept. 1971. [7734]
- GALLOWAY, J. H. The Last Years of Slavery on the Sugar Plantations of Northeastern Brazil. Hisp. Am. Hist. R., Nov. 1971. [7735]
- GANDÍA, ENRIQUE DE. Manuel Belgrano. Inter-Am. R. Bibliogr., July-Sept. 1971. [7736]
- GITLITZ, JOHN S. Impressions of the Peruvian Agrarian Reform. J. Inter-Am. Stud. World Aff., July-Oct. 1971. [7737]
- GOLDBERG DE FLICHMAN, MARTA B. Los intereses económicos que influyeron en la orientación diplomática norteamericana en el Río de la Plata (1810-1823) (conclusion). Bol. Inst. Hist. Arg. "Dr. Emilio Ravignani," XIII, nos. 22-23, 1970. [7738]
- GONZÁLEZ, JULIO CÉSAR. La misión Guido-Luzuriaga a Guayaquil (1820). Bol. Inst. Hist. Arg. "Dr. Emilio Ravignani," XIII, nos. 22-23, 1970. [7739]
- HELGUERA, J. LEÓN. Antecedentes sociales de la revolución de 1851 en el sur de Colombia (1848-1851). An. Colombiano Hist. Soc. Cult., July 1971. [7740]
- HELGUERA, J. LEÓN. Coconuco. Datos y documentos para la historia de una gran hacienda caucana. An. Colombiano Hist. Soc. Cult., July 1971. [7741]
- HELGUERA, J. LEÓN. Don José María Arboleda Llorente. R. Acad. Colombiana Hist. Ecles., Aug.-Dec. 1969. [7742]
- HELGUERA, J. LEÓN. Semana Santa en Pasto. Una descripción de 1850. Bol. hist. antigüedades (Bogotá), Apr.-June 1971. [7743]
- HELGUERA, J. LEÓN. Una descripción olvidada de la Sabana y del Salto de Tequendama: la de William Davis Robinson hecha en 1824. Bol. hist. antigüedades (Bogotá), Oct.-Dec. 1970. [7744]
- HODGE, JOHN E. Benjamin Apthorp Gould and the Founding of the Argentine National Observatory. The Americas, Oct. 1971. [7745]
- IGLESIAS, FRANCISCO. Industrialização brasileiro no século XIX. R. hist. am., July-Dec. 1970. [7746]
- JANOTTI, ALDO. Como e porque terminou a monarquia brasileira. R. hist. (São Paulo), Apr.-June 1971. [7747]
- JORDAN, DAVID C. Marxism in Chile: An Interim View of Its Implications for U.S. Policy. Orbis, Spring 1971. [7748]
- KLEIN, HERBERT S. The Internal Slave Trade in Nineteenth-Century Brazil: A Study of Slave Importations into Rio de Janeiro in 1852. Hisp. Am. Hist. R., Nov. 1971. [7749]
- LINHARES, MARIA-YEDDA. Le Brésil et la seconde guerre mondiale. R. Hist. deux. guerre mond., July 1971. [7750]
- LINS, IVAN. Dom Pedro II, o Positivismo e os seus adeptos. R. inst. hist. geog. bras., Oct.-Dec. 1970. [7751]
- LUX, WILLIAM R. Is Chile Red? Pol. Q., July-Sept. 1971. [7752]
- MCKANNA, CLARE V. The Water Witch Incident. Am. Neptune, Jan. 1971. [7753]
- MAIER, GEORG. Presidential Succession in Ecuador: 1860-1968. J. Inter-Am. Stud. World Aff., July-Oct. 1971. [7754]
- MARTÍNEZ BAEZA, SERGIO. El ensayo Federalista en Chile. R. Inst. Hist. Derecho Ricardo Levene, no. 21, 1970. [7755]
- MILENKY, EDWARD S. From Integration to Developmental Nationalism: The Andean Group 1965-1971. Inter-Am. Ec. Aff., Winter 1971. [7756]
- NASCIMENTO E SILVA, GERALDO E. Influência brasileira na gênese do Pan-Americanismo. R. inst. hist. geog. bras., July-Sept. 1970. [7757]
- PLÁ, JOSEFINA. Los Británicos en el Paraguay. R. hist. am., July-Dec. 1970. [7758]
- La Revolución de 1890 narrada por un testigo. Bol. Inst. Hist. Arg. "Dr. Emilio Ravignani," XIII, nos. 22-23, 1970. [7759]
- ROSENBERG, EMILY S. Dollar Diplomacy Under Wilson: An Ecuadorian Case. Inter-Am. Ec. Aff., Autumn 1971. [7760]
- RUIZ MORENO, ISIDORO. Los tratados de San José de Flores y la libre navegación de los ríos. R. Inst. Hist. Derecho Ricardo Levene, no. 21, 1970. [7761]
- SALES DE BOHIGAS, NURIA. Esclavos y reclutas en Sudamérica, 1816-1826. R. hist. am., July-Dec. 1970. [7762]
- SARLI, RICARDO. El fraude electoral octubrista de 1908. Bol. Inst. Hist. Arg. "Dr. Emilio Ravignani," XIII, nos. 22-23, 1970. [7763]
- SEVERINO LÓPEZ, JUAN. Génesis y fundación de la Colonia San José de Entre Ríos. Bol. Inst. Hist. Arg. "Dr. Emilio Ravignani," XIII, nos. 22-23, 1970. [7764]

SKIDMORE, THOMAS E. Failure in Brazil. J. Contemp. Hist., no. 3, 1970. [7765]

STABB, MARTIN S. Argentine Letters and the Peronato: An Overview. J. Inter-Am. Stud. World Aff., July-Oct. 1971. [7766]

STERN, LARRY N., and PALMER, MONTE. Political Socialization, Student Attitudes, and Political Participation: A Sample of Colombian University Students. J. Dev. Areas, Oct. 1971. [7767]

TRUE, D. L.; NÚÑEZ, LAUTARO; and NÚÑEZ, PATRICIO. Tarapacá 10: A Workshop Site in Northern Chile. Proc. Am. Phil. Soc., no. 5, 1971. [7768]

VALENZUELA, ARTURO. The Scope of the Chilean Party System. Comp. Pol., Jan. 1972. [7769]

VALLA, VICTOR. Os Estados Unidos e a influência estrangeira na economia brasileira: um período de transição (1904-1928). R. hist. (São Paulo), Jan.-Mar. 1971. [7770]

VILLAVARDE, JUAN. Guillermo Rawson's Idealistic Vision of the United States. Américas, Aug. 1971. [7771]

WILLIAMS, JOHN HOYT. Tevegó on the Paraguayan Frontier: A Chapter in the Black History of the Americas. J. Negro Hist., Oct. 1971. [7772]

LATIN AMERICA: BIBLIOGRAPHY, HISTORIOGRAPHY, AND ARCHIVAL GUIDES

CASTELLANOS, RAFAEL RAMÓN. El tricentenario del nacimiento de un cronista de Indias bogotano José de Oviedo y Baños. Bol. hist. antigüedades (Bogotá), Jan.-Mar. 1971. [7773]

DAVIS, ROBERT H. Prescott y Acosta: dos prohombres de la historia científica. Bol. hist. antigüedades (Bogotá), Jan.-Mar. 1971. [7774]

Índice del Ramo de Provincias Internas (conclusion). Bol. arch. gen. nación (México), July-Dec. 1968. [7775]

Índice del Ramo de Reales Cédulas. Bol. arch. gen. nación (México), July-Dec. 1968; Jan.-June 1969; July-Dec. 1969. [7776]

Índice del Ramo de Tierras. Bol. arch. gen. nación (México), July-Dec. 1968; Jan.-June 1969; July-Dec. 1969. [7777]

LACOMBE, AMÉRICO JACOBINA. Fontes da história Carioca. R. inst. hist. geog. bras., July-Sept. 1970. [7778]

ROMOLI DE AVERY, KATHLEEN. Informe sobre investigaciones realizadas en Exterior. Bol. hist. antigüedades (Bogotá), Jan.-Mar. 1971. [7779]

RUBIO MAÑÉ, J. IGNACIO. Nota Necrológica. Robert Sidney Smith, 1904-1969. Bol. arch. gen. nación (México), July-Dec. 1969. [7780]

TORODASH, MARTIN. Magellan Historiography. Hisp. Am. Hist. R., May 1971. [7781]

TOVAR PINZÓN, HERMES. Las haciendas jesuitas de México, índice de documentos existentes en el Archivo Nacional de Chile [pt. 2]. Hist. mex., July-Sept. 1969. [7782]

ZUBATSKI, DAVID S. A Bibliography of Cumulative Indexes to Latin American Journals of the XIX and XX Centuries. R. hist. am., July-Dec. 1970. [7783]

---

The American Historical Association

---

Founded in 1884. Chartered by Congress in 1889

Office: 400 A Street, S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003

President: Thomas C. Cochran, University of Pennsylvania

Vice-President: Lynn White, jr., University of California, Los Angeles

Treasurer: Elmer Louis Kayser, George Washington University

Executive Secretary: Paul L. Ward

Assistant Executive Secretary: John J. Rumbarger

MEMBERSHIP: Persons interested in historical studies, whether professionally or otherwise, are invited to membership. The present membership is about 18,000. Members elect the officers by ballot.

MEETINGS: The Association's annual meeting takes place on December 28–30. The meeting in 1972 will be held in New Orleans. Many professional historical groups meet within or jointly with the Association at this time. The Pacific Coast Branch holds separate meetings on the Pacific Coast and publishes the Pacific Historical Review.

PUBLICATIONS AND SERVICES: The American Historical Review is published five times a year and sent to all members. It is available by subscription to institutions. The Association also publishes its Annual Report, the AHA Newsletter, a variety of pamphlets on historical subjects, and bibliographical and other volumes. To promote history and assist historians, the Association offers many other services. It also maintains close relations with international, specialized, state, and local historical societies through conferences and correspondence.

PRIZES: The Herbert B. Adams Prize of $300 awarded annually for a first book in the field of European history. The Troyer Steele Anderson Prize awarded every ten years to the person whom the Council of the Association considers to have made the most outstanding contribution to the advancement of the purposes of the Association during the preceding ten years (next award, 1980). The George Louis Beer Prize of $300 awarded annually for a first book on any phase of European international history since 1895. The Albert J. Beveridge Award of $5,000 given annually for the best book on the history of the United States, Canada, or Latin America. The Albert B. Corey Prize, sponsored jointly by the AHA and the Canadian Historical Association, of $1,000 awarded biennially for the best book on the history of Canadian-American relations or the history of both countries. The John H. Dunning Prize of $300 awarded in the even-numbered years for a book on any subject relating to American history. The John K. Fairbank Prize in East Asian History of $500 awarded in the odd-numbered years beginning in 1969. The Clarence H. Haring Prize of $500 awarded every five years to that Latin American who has published the most outstanding book in Latin American history during the preceding five years (next award, 1976). The Robert Livingston Schuyler Prize of $500 awarded every five years for the best work in modern British and Commonwealth history (next award, 1976). The Watumull Prize awarded in the even-numbered years for a work on the history of India originally published in the United States; beginning this year it carries a cash award of $1,000.

DUES: Annual regular dues are $20.00, student (faculty signature required), emeritus, and spouse $10.00, and life $400. All members receive the American Historical Review, the AHA Newsletter, and the program of the annual meeting.

CORRESPONDENCE: Inquiries should be addressed to the Executive Secretary at 400 A Street, S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003.

---

The American Historical Review

---

Founded in 1895

The AHR is sent to all members of the American Historical Association; information concerning membership will be found on the preceding page. The AHR is also available to institutions by subscription. There are two categories of subscription:

CLASS I: American Historical Review only, United States, Canada, and Mexico $25.00, foreign $27.00.

CLASS II: American Historical Review, the AHA Newsletter, and the program of the annual meeting of the Association, United States, Canada, and Mexico $30.00, foreign $32.00.

Single copies of the current issue and back issues in and subsequent to volume 71 (1965-66) can be ordered from the Business Manager of the Association at $6.00 per copy. Issues prior to volume 71 should be ordered from Kraus Reprint Corporation, 16 East 46th Street, New York, N.Y. 10017.

Correspondence regarding contributions to the American Historical Review and books for review should be sent to the Managing Editor, 400 A Street, S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003. Unsolicited book reviews or review articles are not accepted; a statement concerning reviewing policy will be found in the issue for December 1970, vol. 75, pp. 1889-91. Preliminary inquiries concerning articles are not necessary, though authors may find them useful. Attention is urged, however, to a statement concerning the kinds of articles the AHR ordinarily will and will not publish; it appears in the issue for October 1970, vol. 75, pp. 1577-80. The entire text, including footnotes, of manuscripts submitted for publication must be prepared in double-spaced typescript, with generous margins to allow for copyediting. Footnotes should be numbered consecutively throughout and should appear in a separate section at the end of the text. The editors of the AHR are the final arbiters of length, grammar, usage, and the laws of libel; articles will be edited to conform to AHR style in matters of punctuation, capitalization, and the like. The editors may suggest other changes in the interests of clarity and economy of expression, but such changes are never made without consultation with authors. There is no official style sheet for the American Historical Review, but a convenient general guide is A Manual of Style, published by the University of Chicago Press.

more light!

(GOETHE)

The largest single project in publishing history has been completed with the publication this month of the 1000th volume in the Irish University Press series of British Parliamentary Papers, 1801-1899.

This series contains all the key sessional and command papers which inspired social and political legislation throughout the nineteenth century. Its impact on university research, throughout the world derives from the fact that it documents not only Britain as a culture and an empire but also the revolutionary changes in living and working which began at that time and still affect mankind today.

The most valuable feature of this edition – whose consultant editors are Professor and Mrs Percy Ford of Southampton University – is the reorganization of the original papers by subject. This presentation in 82 subject sets, ranging from Agriculture through Colonies to Religion and Urban Areas, has dramatically reduced the time and effort required for research.

Yet, although the work of publication is in one sense completed, in another it is only beginning. Over the next three years the Press will publish a variety of related bibliographical aids. This month the Checklist appears, listing all the papers chronologically and by subject. Next autumn will see the publication of the first subject-set indexes and commentaries – the finishing touch.

Irish University Press

60 Russell Square London WC1B 4HP

81 Merrion Square Dublin 2

Suite 208 485 Madison Avenue New York, NY 10022

---

China and Japan at War

1937-1945

The Politics of Collaboration

John Hunter Boyle. Imperial Japan and Nationalist China had good reasons not to go to war with each other in the 1930's, since any conflict between them could only strengthen their mortal enemies, the Soviet Union and the Chinese Communists. Yet war came in 1937 and lasted eight years, despite mutual efforts to bring about a workable peace. This book describes the most ambitious of the attempts at wartime collaboration between the two nations, the Japanese-backed regional puppet governments initially set up in various parts of China in the late 1930's and ultimately consolidated in a single national collaborationist regime in Nanking under Wang Ching-wei. Illustrated. $16.50

Popular Movements and Secret Societies in China, 1840-1950

Edited by Jean Chesneaux. Historians of China have increasingly shifted their focus from government and the gentry to the popular movements and secret societies that claimed the allegiance of China's inarticulate and disadvantaged peasant masses. This volume is concerned with the impact of secret societies on the great crises of the modern era in China—the great rebellions of the 1850's and 1860's, the social and political disintegration of the late nineteenth century, the Revolution of 1911, the Communist-Kuomintang conflict, and the Sino-Japanese War of 1937-45. Among the scholars who have contributed papers are Frederic Wakeman, Jr., Mark Mancall, and Lucien Bianco. August. About $11.50

Stanford University Press

---

THE DYNAMICS OF HISTORY IN NEW BOOKS FROM

 The logo for Praeger, featuring the word "praeger" in a bold, lowercase, sans-serif font. The letters are closely spaced, and the 'p' and 'r' have a distinctive shape with a horizontal bar extending from the bottom.

111 Fourth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10003

LATIN AMERICA New World, Third World

Stephen Clissold

Reform — radical or otherwise — appears inevitable throughout all of Latin America. Here is a trenchant political, economic, and social analysis of the countries—all of whom seem to be rediscovering their common heritage not only of their Spanish past but of the pre-Columbian civilizations.

ca 348 pp.

$13.50

EUROPE, MOTHER OF REVOLUTIONS

Friedrich Heer

A close look at the men and women whose ideas transformed the western world in the nineteenth century. The author examines the French revolution; the English Romantic movement; revolutionary romantics such as Holderlin and Schlegel; German intellectuals including Marx and Engels; and more.

384 pp.

$12.50

A DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF CONSERVATION IN AMERICA

Edited by Robert McHenry with Charles Van Doren

Here—from the materials of hundreds of authors, most of them Americans—is the evolution of man's relationship with nature in America, as the nation went from virgin wilderness to the world's most industrial and urbanized state.

384 pp. Illustrated

$13.50

THE IRON CENTURY Social Change in Europe 1550-1660

Henry Kamen

Though called the "Golden Century" because of its cultural flowering, this was a European era of cruelty, poverty, political unrest, religious tension, and upheaval. Here — filling a long neglected area of European history—is a fascinating survey of all the available material on the popular rebellions of the time.

552 pp. Illustrated

$15.00

JAMAICA A Historical Portrait

Samuel J. and Edith F. Hurwitz

A political, social, and economic view of Jamaica: from the age of exploration and exploitation through its era of slavery and anti-slavery crusade; from Crown Colony to independent nation. Explores the roots of all societal relationships and includes a perceptive account of the overthrow of a small oligarchy. "A solid history of Jamaica... recommended for public and academic libraries."—Library Journal

286 pp. Illustrated

$9.50

THE ANCIENT AMERICAN CIVILIZATIONS

Friedrich Katz

The author makes extensive use of current archaeological findings to shed light on contradictory notions that still persist concerning the Incas and Aztecs. He examines the origins of these Indians in previous cultures, social organization, geographical and ecological conditions, and other relevant factors.

ca. 474 pp. Illustrated

$15.00

At your fingertips... An American Studies resource equalled only by the greatest libraries of the world!

THE MICROBOOK® LIBRARY OF AMERICAN CIVILIZATION

definitive, 19,000-volume collection of early Americana fully cataloged, and including the revolutionary Biblioguide™ Index

Now, through the economy of Microbook technology, the most significant of the writings that have recorded the history and defined the future of America are available to all college students and faculty regardless of the size or location of the institution. Not buried away in the stacks but instantly accessible in a single 30-drawer card catalog file.

The Library of American Civilization covers more than three centuries of printed material to 1914. It includes the collected writings of distinguished Americans as well as many of their personal records. There are narratives of travel through the continent, standard biographies, works of fiction, poetry, essays, speeches, collections of original papers and documents, and significant runs of more than sixty periodicals—a total of more than 6,500,000 pages of material selected by 52 distinguished scholars in the field of American studies. Each of this work, until now, has been unavailable outside major centers of learning and large metropolitan libraries.

The Library provides balanced coverage of every aspect of American history: political, economic, social, cultural, scientific and technological. It offers opportunity for study in areas other than "history" by showing the origins and developments of drama, art, economics, law and many other subjects.

The Microbook System

The Library of American Civilization is in Microbook form—a system that involves precise photographic reproduction of entire libraries on 3" x 5" film cards, or fiche. Up to 100 pages can be reproduced on a single card, although any book of more than 100 pages has its own fiche for greater convenience. This principle of unitization permits the fiche to be stored, cataloged and circulated as one would a book.

The Library comes complete with five sets of book-form Author, Title, and Subject catalogs, ten sets of the same Catalogs in fiche form, and . . .

The BIBLIOGUIDE™ Index

The Biblioguide Index is one of the most remarkable access tools ever devised for library use. It indexes the entire collection under 565 topics or themes of interest to students of American history and related studies. Each theme is introduced by a headnote describing the range and scope of references to be found thereunder, followed by an average of 220 citations of whole books, parts of books and relevant periodical literature. There are roughly 5,000 references to help the user identify exactly the material he is seeking. Five book-form Biblioguide Indexes, and ten in fiche-form, accompany each Library. Catalog cards are available as an optional extra.

Convenience, as with no other library

Microbook Desk Reader, which clearly projects the fiche image on an 8½" x 12" screen in normal room light, is provided at no additional cost with each Library. A lightweight portable reader is also available. This reader, with a bright 10" screen, can be used in the library, in the dormitory, in a professor's office.

So there you have it. A complete basic library for your American studies programs, at a price you can afford, fully cataloged and indexed and ready to use the day you receive it. For a free copy of the 20-page booklet, The Microbook Library Series, containing information on the Library of American Civilization and other Microbook Libraries, please fill in the coupon at the right.

Photos courtesy of Library of Congress

Library Resources Inc.

AN ENCYCLOPAEDIA BRITANNICA Company
301 East Erie Street, Chicago, Illinois 60611

To: Library Resources Inc., Dept. K-14
301 East Erie Street
Chicago, Illinois 60611

Please send your booklet, The Microbook Library Series, containing information on the Library of American Civilization and other Microbook Libraries.

Name _____

Title _____

Institution or Organization _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip Code _____

IN PRINT NOW

THE TOKYO JUDGMENT. The International Military Tribunal for the Far East. (IMTFE) November 12, 1948.

Editors: B. V. A. Röling (University of Groningen) and C. F. Rüter (University of Amsterdam)

Contents: Part I—The Majority Judgment
Part II—Dissenting Opinion PAL
Part III—Other Dissenting Opinions & Charter of the IMTFE.

Bound in 2 volumes. (ca. 900 + 300 pp.) With documents and Indexes of persons & subjects. Cloth. Amsterdam 1972.

Subscription price till Oct. 1st, 1972 Hfl. 300,— ORDER NOW AND

Price after publication Hfl. 400,— SAVE US$ 35,—

FOR THE FIRST TIME PUBLISHED IN FULL IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE

It is, to say the least, curious that the Tokyo judgment (i.e. the majority verdict and the separate 'opinions') has not until now been published. The judgment is of the greatest importance for two problems (at present at the centre of controversy again): the question of the limits of the group of persons who may be held responsible for crimes against peace, and the question of how far and under what circumstances an individual or group of persons may be held responsible for NEGLECTING TO ACT IN ORDER TO PREVENT 'CONVENTIONAL WAR CRIMES'. "Indeed, the fate of some future President of the U. S. and his Chiefs of Staff and military advisors may well have been sealed by this decision . . ." (Judge Murphy) and ". . . the biggest trial in recorded history . . ." (General prosecutor Joseph Keenan). No complete assessment of the administration of justice after the war can be made without a consideration of the Tokyo trial, in which Japanese leaders were called to account for the country's foreign policy from 1928 until the capitulation in 1945, and for the activities which resulted from that policy during the wars with China and the Allies. TO BE PUBLISHED OCTOBER 1972. PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION.

IN PROGRESS

JUSTIZ UND NS-VERBRECHEN. Sammlung deutscher Strafurteile wegen national-sozialistischer Tötungsverbrechen 1945-1966. (Justice and National Socialist Crimes: a collection of penal sentences passed in the German Federal Republic between 1945 and 1966 on persons convicted of "national socialist crimes" resulting in the deaths of the victims)

Editors: C. F. Rüter, LL.M. (University of Amsterdam) and ref. iur. A. L. Rüter-Ehlermann

Contents: 20 volumes of ca. 800 pp. and one index volume including facsimiles of relevant documents. 21 volumes. Cloth. Amsterdam 1968-1976.

Price: Hfl. 230,— per volume. Volume X will be published September 1972.

Language: German, the original language of the sentences. ONLY ORDERS FOR THE COMPLETE SET WILL BE ACCEPTED.

The way in which these sentences have been edited was determined by the principle, that they should be readily available to non-Germans and non-lawyers, without their having to resort to further sources. Exhaustive explanations of abbreviations and concepts have been included as well as the texts of laws and documents to which references occur. Over 95% of the sentences have never before been made public. "The publication of these legal documents saves historical source material from possible loss" (T. L. S. Sept. 18, 1970) "The project deserves sincere appreciation. The full collection will be required especially for libraries and research institutions" (Am. Journ. Internat. Law. Vol. 65, 1971) "Not only lawyers but also historians, sociologists, criminologists and psychologists will find here a rich mine waiting for exploitation. . . . Their value as a source of information to scholars in many fields is doubtless" (Brit. Yearbook of Internat. Law) PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION.

Published by and to be ordered from:
UNIVERSITY PRESS AMSTERDAM
P.O. Box 10562
Amsterdam-C/The Netherlands

Now & there

Newspapers Periodicals Records for Research
Microfilm Corporation of America
1971-1972

For your free copy of Microfilming Corporation of America's new 1971-1972 microfilm catalog, write or call —

Microfilming Corporation of America

21 Harristown Road, Glen Rock, New Jersey 07452 • 201 - 447-3000
A New York Times Company

new harper
torchbooks

GOVERNMENT IN REFORMATION EUROPE, 1520-1560

Edited by Henry J. Cohn. Encompassing not only the monarchies of England, France and Spain, but also Sweden, Russia, the Netherlands and the principalities of Germany and Italy. HR/1703 $4.45

THE RECOVERY OF FRANCE IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY

Edited by P. S. Lewis. Contributors include: Robert Boutruche, André Bossuat, Georges Hubrecht, Paul Ourliac, Barthélemy-Amédée Posquet du Haut-Jussé, Jean Richard, René Fedou, Bernard Chevalier, P. S. Lewis, Georges Duby and Bernard Guenée. HR/1701 $4.95

THE EMERGING NATIONS AND THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

By Richard B. Morris. "He is a distinguished historian who has not only reminded us of many forgotten elements in the history of our revolutionary beginnings but has also clarified for all the nations, new and old and our own, the lessons of our experience and the traditions of equality and freedom to which America and Americans remain committed."—PHILIP C. JESSUP TB/1653 $2.95
Cloth $6.95

TO PURGE THIS LAND WITH BLOOD A Biography of John Brown

By Stephen B. Oates. "The most objective and absorbing biography of John Brown ever written."—WILLIE LEE ROSE, New York Review of Books. "Engrossing . . . reads like a novel."—ERICK FONER, New York Times Book Review. Illustrated. TB/1655 $3.95
Cloth $10.00

AMERICAN CIVILIZATION IN THE FIRST MACHINE AGE, 1890-1940

A Cultural History of America's First Age of Technological Revolution and "Rule by the Young"

Gilman M. Ostrander. "A kaleidoscope of social history."—ARTHUR A. EKIRCH, JR., New York Historical Society Quarterly. "[He] has raised several important questions in a stimulating way. The book is an impressionistic synthesis of secondary historical literature."—HAMILTON CRAVENS, Journal of American History. TB/1652 $3.25

THE DISTANT MAGNET European Emigration to USA

By Philip Taylor. "Richly rewarding. . . . It treats one of the most important themes in American history with humanity and learning."—Times Literary Supplement. TB/1656 $2.95

HISTORY OF THE FAR EAST

Milton W. Meyer. Comprehensive and up-to-date summary of Asian political, economic, social and cultural history from its beginning to the present. India, Pakistan, China, Japan, Southeast Asia. Maps, charts, and bibliography. A Barnes & Noble Paperback CO/135 $2.95

For complete
catalog, write:

Harper & Row

Paperback Dept.
49 E. 33rd St., New York 10016

From Resistance to Revolution

COLONIAL RADICALS AND THE DEVELOPMENT OF AMERICAN
OPPOSITION TO BRITAIN, 1765-1776

Pauline Maier

■ "A superb account of the ideological escalation that led to the American Revolution . . . Demonstrates in a way never before done how the revolution in the hearts and minds of the American people was accomplished in the decade prior to the Declaration of Independence."—Gordon S. Wood, Brown University

■ "One can say of this valuable monograph not merely that it is thoroughly based in the relevant sources but that it is addressed to questions of critical importance for our understanding of the decisive changes in American attitudes to Britain and to the problem of resistance. It should therefore have an immediate effect on the way we formulate those problems for ourselves and the way we teach the subject."—J. R. Pole, Cambridge University

■ "Written gracefully and clearly . . . fills a significant need for professional historians and general readers alike. Its fresh interpretation of American radicals in the crucible of revolution, based upon substantial research and subtle reasoning, transcends its immediate subject and illuminates the meaning of radicalism, violence, and rebellion in American history."
—Michael Kammen, Cornell University

368 pages • $10 • Alfred • A • Knopf

WILLIAM G.
McLOUGHLIN

NEW ENGLAND DISSENT, 1630-1833

The Baptists and the Separation of Church and State

Mr. McLoughlin examines the tradition of dissent among American Baptists and other pietistic dissenters against the New England Congregational establishment. By tracing the diverse and often complex ways by which the colonies and states achieved disestablishment, he depicts the evolution and application of the unique American principle of separation of church and state. Center for the Study of the History of Liberty in America. Two volumes, $35.00

RICHARD E.
WELCH, JR.

GEORGE FRISBIE HOAR AND THE HALF-BREED REPUBLICANS

George Frisbie Hoar (1826-1904), whose national career spans the period from the Gilded Age to Progressivism, was a Radical Republican who became one of the original Half-Breed Republicans. Mr. Welch, the first person to have examined the entire collection of Hoar's papers, presents here both a biography of Hoar and a study of the Republican party. $14.00

FREDERICK MERK
with the collaboration of Lois Bannister Merk

FRUITS OF PROPAGANDA IN THE TYLER ADMINISTRATION

Using documentary evidence hitherto undisclosed, distinguished historian Frederick Merk explores a little-known aspect of Tyler's administration. He shows that Tyler's two major successes in foreign affairs—the annexation of Texas and the settlement of the Maine boundary dispute—were due to his use of the secret fund authorized for foreign propaganda to win domestic support for his policies. $9.00

JACKSONIAN DEMOCRACY IN NEW HAMPSHIRE, 1800-1851

Mr. Cole focuses on New Hampshire to present an evaluation of Jacksonian Democracy which differs sharply from that proposed by historians of the "consensus" school. Tracing the continuous development of issues through the careers of Isaac Hill and Levi Woodbury, he shows the Democratic Party of 1830 as the direct descendant of the Republican Party of 1800. $10.00

DONALD B. COLE

EXPERIMENT IN REPUBLICANISM

New Hampshire Politics and the American Revolution, 1741-1794

The American Revolution, Mr. Daniell believes, can best be understood by a careful examination of political dynamics at the provincial and state level. In this study he focuses on New Hampshire to show the enormous effect that purely local circumstances had on the course of the revolution. $10.00

JERE R. DANIELL

TOWN INTO CITY

Springfield, Massachusetts, and the Meaning of Community, 1840-1880

Through the history of one city Mr. Frisch provides a persuasive and graceful account of the shifting context of urban experience. He traces the shift of people's perception of community from an informal, direct sensation to a formal, perceived abstraction, thus relating the history of a place to the history of an idea. Harvard Studies in Urban History. $10.00

MICHAEL H. FRISCH

In Canada/Saunders of Toronto, Ltd.

---

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Kraus Reprint

presents
one of the most extensive collections of primary source material for the study of the American Indian ever offered by any publisher or reprinter.

Write for our brochure.

Kraus Reprint Co.

16 East 46th Street
New York, N.Y. 10017

beamur international ltd.

☐ DVINOV PAPERS – A STUDY OF RUSSIAN EMIGRE POLITICS

Boris L. Dvinov. Hong Kong, Beamur International Limited, 1972 pp. c.280. $8.00

The author was a well-known emigre scholar and politician. On the basis of his own comprehensive files on all aspects of emigre political life and his own personal experience as an emigre politician, he wrote what is, without any doubt, the most comprehensive account of Russian emigre politics available in English or Russian. It was written originally 1953–1956 and is now published for the first time. The author deals with the most important emigre political organizations; the problem of war-time collaboration with Nazism; the 'new' postwar emigration; Soviet infiltration and provocation and emigre relations with the U.S. authorities at the height of the 'Cold War'.

☐ THE DEPORTATION OF GREGORII SEMENEV

A reprint of U.S. Senate, Committee on Education and Labour. Hearings Re Deportation of Gregorie Semenoff. 1922. Hong Kong, Beamur International Limited, 1972, pp. c.104. Paperback $3.50

Gregorii Semenev is a name familiar to all students of the Russian Civil War in Siberia. In 1922 Semenev was in the United States in transit to Europe. His presence aroused a storm of protest from all sections of the American public who were aware of his activities in Siberia. Emergency hearings to effect his deportation were held. This report is the result of those hearings. It contains valuable testimony by eye-witnesses to the atrocities and depredations of Semenev and his agents

☐ 清議報 CH'ING I PAO (THE CHINA DISCUSSION) 12-volumes

A complete reprint of the leading journal of the late Reform Movement. Edited and published by Liang Ch'i Ch'ao among others. There were 100 issues from Kuang Hsu 24 to 27 (Nov. 1898 – Nov. 1901). Printed in Yokohama. $70.00

☐ CHINESE COMMUNISM IN 1927, CITY vs COUNTRYSIDE

Hsiao Tso-liang. Hong Kong, Chinese University of Hong Kong Press, 1970. pp. 200. $6.00

☐ EMINENT CHINESE OF THE CH'ING PERIOD 1644–1912

A.W. Hummel (Editor). A single volume reprint of a two-volume work prepared by the Library of Congress (1943–1944) pp. 1,103 + xi. $10.00

☐ HISTORY OF THE MONGOLS FROM THE 9TH TO THE 19TH CENTURY

Henry H. Howorth. London, Longmans, Green and Co., 1876–1927, 5-volumes. A reprint. $58.00

Address orders or write for our 1972 catalogue to:

 beamur international ltd.
608-9 Takshing House
20 Des Voeux Road, Central Hong Kong

 beamur international ltd.
P.O.Box 35038, Postal Station 'E'
Vancouver 13. B.C.
Canada

Louis J. Halle

THE IDEOLOGICAL IMAGINATION

The rise of mass bigotry in our time, and its roots in the thought of Hobbes, Rousseau, and Marx. $6.95

Marshall Smelser

THE WINNING OF INDEPENDENCE

A bright, lively narrative of the political, financial, diplomatic, and military aspects of America's War for Independence. First volume in Quadrangle's Bicentennial History of the American Revolution, edited by Leonard W. Levy. Maps. $10.00

James Gilbert

DESIGNING THE INDUSTRIAL STATE

The Intellectual Pursuit of Collectivism in America, 1880-1940. A fresh, innovative look at the underpinnings of collectivist thinking in America, which provides a wholly new understanding of American reform in this century. $10.00

Robert Estall

A MODERN GEOGRAPHY OF THE UNITED STATES

The most important new geography to appear in many years and an indispensable sourcebook for historians. $10.00

Leonard W. Levy

JUDGMENTS

Essays on American Constitutional History. The first collection of those essays that have earned Mr. Levy a reputation as our leading historian of the Constitution. $12.50

Keith Middlemas

THE STRATEGY OF APPEASEMENT

The British Government and Germany, 1937-39. The first detailed study of how the British government confronted a resurgent Germany and handled the Munich crisis. $15.00

Charles E. Larsen

THE GOOD FIGHT

The Life and Times of Ben B. Lindsey. The first biography of the colorful American reformer who battled the Establishment in the early years of the 20th century. $10.00

NEW QUADRANGLE PAPERBACKS

William L. O'Neill, ed., Women at Work (QP90) $2.95

Lloyd C. Gardner, Architects of Illusion (QP91) $2.95

Jerome Levinson and Juan de Onís, The Alliance That Lost Its Way (QP92) $2.95

Arthur S. Link, Woodrow Wilson: A Brief Biography (QP93) $2.45

Gabriel Jackson, ed., The Spanish Civil War (NYTIMES BOOK, QP313) $2.45

QUADRANGLE BOOKS, Inc.

A New York Times Company

12 East Delaware Place, Chicago 60611

New from Wisconsin

Campanus of Novara and Medieval Planetary Theory Theorica planetarum

Edited, with an introduction, English translation, and commentary by Francis S. Benjamin, Jr. and G. J. Toomer

Historians of science will welcome this first English translation and printed Latin text of Campanus of Novara's Theorica planetarum. The Latin text, based on a collation of almost all known manuscripts, is accompanied on facing pages with a cogent English translation. Explanatory notes, an extensive introduction, and full indices of names, technical terms, and of manuscripts described in the book, aid the reader's comprehension.

508 pages, illus. cloth $20.00

Letters of Horatio Greenough, American Sculptor

Edited by Nathalia Wright

With this publication of Greenough's letters, historians of American cultural development will gain new insights into both a significant figure and an important era. Greenough, sculptor, architectural theorist, and author, corresponded with some of the most prominent writers, artists, and politicians of the first half of the nineteenth century. Collected here are 241 of his letters, of which 198 are published in their entirety for the first time.

504 pages, illus. cloth $22.50

Wisconsin residents add 4% sales tax

Africa and the West Intellectual Responses to European Culture

Edited by Philip D. Curtin

In this, his latest effort, Philip Curtin presents seven essays which together help to reconstruct Africans' views of the West over the past hundred years. The work is one of intellectual history, approached not only by historians but by anthropologists and literary critics as well. Included are papers by James W. Fernandez, Wyatt MacGaffey, Jean Herskovits, G. Wesley Johnson, Jr., Leo Spitzer, and the editor.

280 pages cloth $12.50

Mozambique The Africanization of a European Institution, the Zambezi Prazos, 1750-1902

By Allen Isaacman

This highly original work, one of the best examples of the recent "cross-cultural" approach to non-Western history, breaks new ground in the recording of the historiography of Mozambique. Using fresh data within an African point of view, it reassesses an important European institution that survived in Mozambique for 250 years. The result is a compelling and scholarly study of great import to historians of both Europe and Africa, to political and social scientists, and to anthropologists.

304 pages cloth $17.50

University of Wisconsin Press
Box 1379, Madison, Wisconsin 53701

New

Revolution in PerspectiveEssays on the Hungarian Soviet RepublicEdited by Andrew C. Janos and William B. Slottman

Looking back over fifty years, Andrew Janos, Peter Kenez, Keith Hitchins, and William B. Slottman reexamine the antecedents and highlights of the short-lived Hungarian Soviet Republic. Their topics range from the decline of oligarchy, coalition politics, and agrarian opposition, to the roles played by the Rumanian Socialists and Austria's Geistesaristokraten. Also included is a paper on the Hungarian Soviet and international communism.

LC: 74-138510 216 pages 1 map $10.00

*Revolution in Central Europe, 1918-1919F. L. Carsten

A comparative study of Central European revolutionary movements at the end of World War I, this book has as its theme the rise and decline of the Workers' and Soldiers' Councils. The author also considers the activities of the nascent Communist Parties, the role of Rosa Luxemburg and Karl Liebknecht, the new armies and their politics, and the beginnings of right-wing extremism.

LC: 78-165225 352 pages illustrations $11.95

*Christian Political Theory and Church Politics in the Mid-Twelfth CenturyThe Ecclesiology of Gratian's DecretumStanley Chodorow

Prior to the Decretum Gratiani in 1139, Church law was a jumble of documents and writings of exegetes, theologians, and historians. Magister Gratian brought order to this material and presented it in manageable form. Mr. Chodorow places Gratian within the political and spiritual framework of the time, disputing earlier historians' assumption that Gratian was aloof from Church politics. He contends instead that Gratian was a political thinker who presented the most extensive exposition of mid-12th century Christian political theory.

LC: 71-138512 312 pages $15.00

*Sayyid Jamal ad-Din "al-Afghani"A Political BiographyNikki R. Keddie

In unscrambling some of Jamāl ad-Dīn al-Afghānī's life (1838/39-1897), Mrs. Keddie shows that all previous accounts of his life rest in large part on what al-Afghānī wanted others to believe: little of what he said can be trusted. In this account the author goes back to primary sources to give us, for the first time, a clear outline of the career of this important figure in the Muslim world.

LC: 74-159671 504 pages frontispiece $20.00

from California

University of California Press • Berkeley 94720

The voices of America talk straight to your students.

In this comprehensive collection of original source material, the voices of America—reacting to events as they occur—talk straight to your students.

From diaries, letters, articles, speeches, songs, poems...from reasoned discourse to passionate polemics...the student finds American history unfolding before his very eyes—finds himself involved. He identifies with the problems and issues of the time and relates them to those of today!

American voices—
the full range

$174.50*

per complete program

THE ANNALS OF AMERICA

More than 2,200 original writings by almost 1,200 authors provide a year-by-year record of American life, action and thought from 1493 to 1968. The Annals may be used as supplementary text material for the inquiry approach or as a reference resource. Program includes 18 text volumes, a 2-volume Conspectus (topical indices), an Index volume and an overhead transparency series on the use of The Annals.

* Price to schools and libraries only. Price does not include shipping and handling charge.

$79.50*

per 10-volume set

Voices to make a point—

Britannica's FASCICLES

Paperback, 32-page booklets provide each student with original source material on periods, topics or themes drawn from The Annals or Makers of America—for example: The Colonial Period, Industrial America, International Problems, etc. Write for complete listing of titles.

100-499
40¢ each*

History-making voices SELECTED READINGS

on Great Issues in American History

$5.50*
per copy

A basic or supplemental text of original writings that present a chronological flow of events and issues throughout American history. The volume concludes with three special-interest chapters: The American City, The Challenge of Technology and Art in America.

Reference Division Dept. AHR

ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA EDUCATIONAL CORPORATION
425 North Michigan Avenue • Chicago, Illinois 60611

Ethnic voices—pluralism in America

MAKERS OF AMERICA

The most extensive review ever published of Ethnic Pluralism in the United States. In its 731 selections, Makers of America voices the thoughts and viewpoints of more than 85 separate ethnic, national and religious minorities that, regardless of origin, call the United States their home. More than 1,000 illustrations, photographs and drawings.

$24.50*

per 3-volume set

Voices from Black history

THE NEGRO IN AMERICAN HISTORY

This 3-volume reference work contains 186 selections by 134 different authors who voice their concerned opinions on the Negro's role in American life. Includes the writings of Stokely Carmichael, Martin Luther King, Jr., John F. Kennedy, Malcolm X, Walter White, Abraham Lincoln, Nat Turner and many others. Includes 138 pages of illustrative material.

Please send me detailed information on:

- ☐ The Annals of America
- ☐ Makers of America
- ☐ The Negro in American History
- ☐ Selected Readings on Great Issues in American History
- ☐ Fascicles

Name _____

PLEASE PRINT

School _____

School Address _____

City _____

State _____

Zip _____

new harper
torchbooks

Announcing two collections of works from Annales

SOCIAL HISTORIANS IN CONTEMPORARY FRANCE

Essays from *Annales

Edited and translated by the staff of Annales, Paris . . . Each essay presents a different aspect of the method combining social, economic, and cultural history. Contributors include Marcel Bataillon, Micheline Baulant, Nicole Belmont, R. W. Bulliet, Francois Crouzet, Georges Duby, Jean Georgelin, Jacques Le Goff, Emmanuel Le Roy Ladurie, E. Ladewig Peterson, Denis Richet, Pierre Vidal-Naquet, Nathan Wachtel.

HR/1571 $3.95

ECONOMY AND SOCIETY IN EARLY MODERN EUROPE

Essays from *Annales

Edited by Peter Burke. Contributors include Fernand Braudel, Carlo M. Cipolla, Alexandre R. E. Chabert, C. Verlinden, J. Craeybeckx, E. Scholliers, Stanislas Hoszowski, Marian Matowist, Zs. P. Pach, Emmanuel Le Roy Ladurie.

TB/1671 $2.45

Cloth TLE/74 $7.50

For complete
catalog, write:

Harper & Row

Paperback Dept.
49 E. 33rd St., New York 10016

New from Columbia

THE PREFATORY EPISTLES OF JACQUES LEFEVRE D'ETAPLES AND RELATED TEXTS
EUGENE F. RICE, JR.

This work assembles some 152 Latin texts dating from 1492 to 1534. Each text is prefaced by an extensive introduction containing an identification of the original source, a history of various reprintings, and background material covering the origin and publication of the work and its place in Lefevre's corpus. $20.00

KIRBY-SMITH'S CONFEDERACY:
The Trans-Mississippi South, 1863-1865
ROBERT L. KERBY

The first comprehensive history of the Trans-Mississippi after Vicksburg, this book offers an extreme case-study of a segment of American society which consumed itself by surrendering everything in its commitment to the pursuit of an unattainable military victory. $12.95

THE UNITED STATES AND THE ORIGINS
OF THE COLD WAR, 1941-1947
JOHN LEWIS GADDIS

A full-scale reassessment of Soviet-American relations during and after World War II, this volume goes beyond recent revisionist interpretations to argue that many other forces—bureaucratic inertia, personality quirks, and both accurate and inaccurate perceptions of Soviet intentions—affected Washington officials. Contemporary American History Series, 3

$12.50 cloth, $3.95 paper

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

Address for orders: 136 South Broadway, Irvington, New York 10533

Black Women in White America

A DOCUMENTARY HISTORY
by Gerda Lerner

"A very timely, powerful, and usable collection which gives emphasis to the magnificent role of Black women in the struggle of Black people to survive in the United States."

—PROFESSOR NAT HUGGINS, Dept. of History, Columbia University

"The selections are richly representative and provide an enormous amount of significant background material from the earliest colonial period through to the present."—ELEANOR FLEXNER, author of Century of Struggle: The Woman's Rights Movement in the United States

"Full, rich, exciting . . . Such lively personalities emerge that I feel I know them all."

—PROFESSOR WILLIE LEE ROSE,
University of Virginia

"Very readable and totally appealing."—FLORYNCE KENNEDY, Black lawyer and feminist

"Interesting and very informative."—ELIZABETH KOONTZ, Director, Women's Bureau, U.S. Dept. of Labor

$12.95

Going to America

by Terry Coleman

The first popular history of America's largest immigrant "minority"

Weaving together many heroic and moving personal experiences, this is the story of the millions of men, women, and children who came to North America from England and Ireland in the mid-19th century. 32 pages of illustrations. $8.95

Republic to Reich

THE MAKING OF THE NAZI REVOLUTION

Edited by Hajo Holborn

Translated by Ralph Manheim

A remarkable book about the rise and reign of Nazism by some of Germany's leading historians

"Extremely valuable . . . breaks new paths in modern German history."—PETER GAY

The first collection in English of work done at the Institute of Contemporary History — established in Germany after World War II as a center for the study of National Socialism. 480 pages. $12.95

Now at your bookstore

PANTHEON

Mohammed

by Maxime Rodinson

author of Israel and the Arabs

A "perceptive new biography" by a prominent French Orientalist. "Explains how his teachings have taken root and continued to grow even to this day . . . High interest is sustained, and the author's concern with Mohammed's role in giving the warring Arab peoples of his time a sense of identity and ethnic coherence leading to political stability and the rise of a great Islamic civilization is completely valid."—Publishers Weekly $8.95

The Chilean Revolution

CONVERSATIONS WITH ALLENDE

by Régis Debray

Postscript by Salvador Allende

"Creatively illuminates one of the most interesting socialist experiments in the world today . . . Essential reading, not just for those with an unquenchable appetite for Latin Americana, but for anyone who wants the feel of participating in a real and relevant political debate."—The Guardian (London)

Cloth $6.95;

Vintage paperbound $1.95

---

BASIC BOOKS

In Search of Nixon

A PSYCHOHISTORICAL INQUIRY

By BRUCE MAZLISH. In this exciting work a distinguished historian, versed in psychoanalysis, attempts something new—a "psychohistorical inquiry" into the subtle interplay between Nixon the man and Nixon the public figure. "Professor Mazlish's purpose is to unravel for the public certain mysteries of a strikingly opaque personality and he succeeds, in a thoroughly admirable way."—HARRIET VAN HORNE, New York Post. "This is the most complete and dispassionate psychological sketch of Richard Nixon we are likely to have for some time to come. It belongs among the best Nixon literature to date, which includes Garry Wills' Nixon Agonistes."—KIRKUS

Just published/$6.95

The Fascist Experience

ITALIAN SOCIETY AND CULTURE, 1922-1945

By EDWARD R. TANNENBAUM. To write this highly original book on a much-studied subject, the author interviewed hundreds of Italians and gained access to nearly all of Mussolini's correspondence. The result is a fresh and convincing account of how the Italians experienced Fascism. "Exhaustive and well balanced, this book is a remarkable achievement as an overall outline of the impact of Fascism on Italian society."—ALBERTO AQUARONE, University of Pisa

July/$12.50

The American Left

RADICAL POLITICAL THOUGHT IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

Edited by LOREN BARITZ. This provocative volume is an invitation to listen to the left—not just the "new left" of the last decade, but to those voices of radical dissent which throughout the century have fought for the liberation of oppressed groups and the reconstruction of American society. Several momentous topics addressed are war, racial discrimination, the class struggle, revolutionary unionism, communism and anti-communism, the depression, the new left, and sexual oppression.

New/$12.50

Paperback classroom edition, $6.95

The Names of Kings

PARISIAN LABORING POOR IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

By JEFFRY KAPLOW. Professor Kaplow explores why and how the relatively passive Parisian working poor of the pre-revolutionary period developed the political consciousness which led them to participate in the essentially bourgeois French Revolution. In the course of studying this intriguing historical question, the author paints a broad and richly detailed panorama of everyday life in eighteenth-century Paris.

July/$7.95

The Vision of Politics on the Eve of the Reformation

MORE, MACHIAVELLI, SEYSSEL

By J. H. HEXTER. In a major contribution to our understanding of the antecedents of modern political thought, a distinguished historian seeks to capture the perception of politics of three extraordinarily acute thinkers of early sixteenth-century Europe: Thomas More in Utopia, Niccolò Machiavelli in The Prince, and Claude de Seyssel in The Monarchy of France.

July/$8.50

For examination copy requests, write the Promotion Department

BASIC BOOKS, Inc.

404 Park Ave. South • N.Y., N.Y. 10016

---

The Ormée of Bordeaux

A Revolution during the Fronde

Sal Alexander Westrich In 1652 the Ormée—a movement of artisans, petty officials, and small merchants—seized power from the Parlement, declared war on the royal government, and proceeded to rule Bordeaux for over a year. In the first study of social stratification during the Fronde, Sal Westrich describes how the Ormée transformed political life in Bordeaux and how its own conflicting goals ironically caused its failure. $10.00

Men of the First French Republic

Political Alignments in the National Convention of 1792

Alison M. H. Patrick By analyzing voting behavior, political alignments, geographic divisions, and political experience of deputies to the convention of 1792, Dr. Patrick shatters longstanding views of the 'Mountain' as a party of Parisian radicals. She shows that the Montagnards held national support long before Robespierre, that they represented nearly all social groups, and that many of them gained political experience in the earlier national assembly of 1791.

Coming in August $16.50

American Physicians in the Nineteenth Century

From Sects to Science

William G. Rothstein Combining sociological with historical analysis, William Rothstein examines the transformation of American medicine from a group of competing sects to a highly organized profession. He discusses the founding of medical schools and societies, the regulatory effort of licensing proponents, the rise of heroic medicine, and the effects of scientific advances. $15.00

Mary Adelaide Nutting

Pioneer of Modern Nursing

Helen E. Marshall One of the principal shapers of the modern profession of nursing, Mary Adelaide Nutting was both an innovative educator and an advocate of better working conditions for nurses. Professor Marshall traces Miss Nutting's career as Dr. Osler's head nurse, as principal of The Johns Hopkins Training School for Nurses, as professor of nursing at Columbia University, and as one of the founders of the American Journal of Nursing. $12.00

THE JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY PRESS

Baltimore, Maryland 21218

Cornell University
Press

NEW AND RECENT BOOKS...

Uprising in East Germany

The Events of June 17, 1953

By ARNULF BARING. Translated from the German by Gerald Onn. Focusing on East Berlin, Mr. Baring reconstructs the drama of the two days when East Germany seemed on the verge of counter-revolution, and explains why the uprising took place and why it dissipated as swiftly as it began. Setting the revolt in the context of the Cold War, he describes Soviet and Western reactions and comments on the misunderstandings and missed opportunities that marked the episode. $8.75

New Light on the Earliest Gospel

Seven Markan Studies

By T. A. BURKILL. Serving as a sequel to Professor Burkill's Mysterious Revelation (1963), these closely related essays not only develop and clarify points made in the previous work, but also break new ground. The author supplements his earlier observations on Mark, and in an exegetical chapter, he discusses Mark's philosophical views and the antinomies within the gospel. An analysis and critique of the work of Etienne Trocmé, a distinguished New Testament scholar, is offered in the final chapter. $11.50

Anabaptism

*A Social History, 1525-1618
Switzerland, Austria, Moravia, and South and Central Germany*

By CLAUS-PETER CLASEN. This is the first comprehensive and detailed history of the Anabaptist movement. Surveying the development and nature of Anabaptism, the author discusses the numerical strength of the sect and its spiritual life, ideology, and literature, placing it against the background of sixteenth-century German society. He makes clear the political implications of Anabaptism as he comments on its relationship to the Peasants' War of 1525, and describes its revolutionary doctrines on government, war, property, finance, and marriage. $17.50

CORNELL UNIVERSITY PRESS ITHACA AND LONDON

Cornell University
Press

...FROM CORNELL

Greek and Roman Voting and Elections

By E. S. STAVELY. A well-known classicist discusses the origins of the vote in early Greek city-states, the election of magistrates and jurors in Athens and Sparta, and manipulation of voting and sortition. He then surveys the structure of Rome's voting assemblies, examines the principles of the group vote, and takes up more technical questions such as the mechanics of the voting process itself. (Aspects of Greek and Roman Life.) $9.50

Argos and the Argolid

By R. A. TOMLINSON. Specialist and nonclassical reader alike will find valuable this full treatment of the history and achievements of the people of Argos, an important Greek city-state.* The author tells their story from the Bronze Age to the Roman occupation, describing their religion, art, and political system. He emphasizes in particular the role of the Argives as the leaders of a "third force" in mainland Greek history, when they challenged the supremacy of the Spartans. $9.75

NOW IN PAPERBACK...

The Cameroon Federal Republic

By VICTOR T. LE VINE. This book provides a general introduction to the politics of the only union of French- and English-speaking countries in Africa. It examines the contemporary political organizations, personalities, structures, and institutions of Cameroon on both the federal and state levels, against the background of the country's social and economic systems. Key sections also trace the country's political history and discuss contemporary political and economic problems. (Africa in the Modern World Series.)

$8.50 cloth; $2.45 paper.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY PRESS ITHACA AND LONDON

PERSPECTIVES IN WESTERN CIVILIZATION: Essays from *Horizon

Edited by William L. Langer

Thirty-five historical essays from Horizon magazine span topics in European civilization from earliest times to the present. Distinguished for their historical content and literary style, the selections are vivid and authoritative accounts of important episodes in European history. Contributors include such scholars as Peter Gay, M. I. Finley, C. M. Bowra, Morris Bishop, H. R. Trevor-Roper, Garrett Mattingly, C. V. Wedgwood, J. H. Plumb, J. Christopher Herold, Harold Nicolson, and Allan Nevins. General and chapter introductions. In two volumes. Paper. 288 pp. each; $3.25 each. February, 1972. A joint publication of Harper & Row, Publishers, Inc. and American Heritage Publishing Co., Inc.

A HISTORY OF THE WORLD

Edited by John A. Garraty and Peter Gay

Authors: René Albrecht-Carrié, Herman Ausubel, A. Doak Barnett, Jacques Barzun, Elias Bickerman, Hans Bielenstein, Shepard B. Clough, Gerson Cohen, Robert D. Cross, Ainslie Embree, Rhodes Fairbridge, John A. Garraty, Nina Garsoian, Peter Gay, J. Mason Gentzler, Henry F. Graff, Lewis U. Hanke, Richard Hofstadter, Graham W. Irwin, Charles Issawi, Edward P. Lanning, William E. Leuchtenburg, Maan Madina, John A. Moore, Richard B. Morris, John H. Mundy, Ernest Nagel, Peter A. Pardue, Orest Ranum, Eugene F. Rice, Henry L. Roberts, James P. Shenton, Jacob Smit, Morton Smith, Fritz Stern, Alden Vaughan, Immanuel Wallerstein, Herschel Webb, Robert K. Webb, Lodewyk Woltjer / Forty scholars of both the social and the natural sciences have collaborated on this truly global history of the world. Available in one volume or three. Complete work: Cloth; 1,257 pp.; $17.50 through December, 1972 and $20 thereafter. Three volume edition—Vol. I: The World to 1500; Vol. II: Toward Modernity (from 1500 to the end of the 18th century); Vol. III: The Modern World: Paper; 384 pp. each (tentative); $4.95 each (tentative). May, 1972.

SEMINAR STUDIES IN HISTORY

Under the editorship of Patrick Richardson

The brief paperbound volumes in this series offer original and thought-provoking studies of specialized aspects of history with extensive documentary materials. Each book includes an analysis of a particular problem, a critical narrative of main developments, an assessment which places the problem in historical perspective, and a general introduction by Patrick Richardson. Each volume: approximately 150 pp.; $2.95. 1971.

JOSEPH II AND ENLIGHTENED DESPOTISM by T. C. W. Blanning

THE SCIENTIFIC REVOLUTION OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY by Robin Briggs

HENRY VII by Roger Lockyer

NINETEENTH-CENTURY EDUCATION by Eric Midwinter

VICTORIAN SOCIAL REFORM by Eric Midwinter

EMPIRE AND SLAVERY by Patrick Richardson

THE LEVELLERS by Howard Shaw

LEFT AND RIGHT IN TWENTIETH-CENTURY EUROPE by David Smith

SLAVERY IN THE AMERICAN SOUTH by John White and Ralph Willett

NEW reflections on history from HARPER & ROW

For more information on these and our other texts of interest write Dept. 275 (J), Harper & Row, 49 E. 33d Street, N.Y. 10016. 1817

America Encounters India, 1941-1947

Gary R. Hess During World War II the demand of the Indian National Congress for independence placed the United States in an awkward position. Should she support a prized ally's intransigent colonial policy or fulfill her dedication to the ideals of the Atlantic Charter? In relating the events surrounding America's initial unfavorable response to nationalism in Asia, Gary Hess provides new insight into America's subsequent promises and frustrations in dealing with emerging peoples. $9.50

Universities in Politics

Case Studies from the Late Middle Ages and Early Modern Period

Edited with an Introduction by John W. Baldwin and Richard Goldthwaite Four eminent historians here consider separate instances of university involvement in politics. J. K. Hyde tells of the law students' efforts to create a university at Bologna. Jacques Verger analyzes the Paris university's attempt to gain independence from the crown. Howard Kaminsky discusses the role of the Czech masters in the Hussite Revolution; and Christopher Hill examines the involvement of English scholars in the Puritan Revolution and Civil War. $8.50

Preconditions of Revolution in Early Modern Europe

Now in paperback Edited by Robert Forster and Jack P. Greene "The editors contribute an excellent introduction on the nature of revolution. J. W. Smit's and Lawrence Stone's essays on the Dutch independence movement and the English Civil War are magnificent. J. H. Elliott compares Portuguese, Catalan, Neapolitan, and Sicilian revolts against Spain. Roland Mousnier writes of the Fronde, and Marc Raeff of Pugachev's rising. Scholars will find each essay stimulating."—Library Journal $8.95, $2.50 paper

The Savage Ideal

Intolerance and Intellectual Leadership in the South, 1890-1914

Bruce Clayton The generation of scholars, writers, and social critics that came of age in the 1890s subjected the South to searching, often scathing criticism, denouncing illiteracy, demagoguery, and racism. Dr. Clayton probes the social values, myths, prejudices, and "unconscious assumptions" in the mind of the South's first intellectual community and demonstrates that even the best minds unconsciously adhered to the Savage Ideal. Coming in September $10.00

Civil Strife in Latin America

A Legal History of U.S. Involvement

William Everett Kane As recent events in Guatemala, the Dominican Republic, and Cuba illustrate, America's commitment to nonintervention in Latin America has increasingly become a myth. In recounting the legal history of U.S. involvement in Latin American civil strife, William Kane analyzes America's strategic doctrines from the 1890s to the present. $10.00

THE JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY PRESS

Baltimore, Maryland 21218

Oxford University Press

The Letters and Papers of Chaim Weizmann

Series A. Letters: Volume III. September 1903-December 1904

Edited by BARNET LITVINOFF. Spanning a critical period in the history of Zionism, the letters in this volume cover Britain's offer of an East African territory to the Jews (which Weizmann opposed) and the death of the Zionist leader, Theodor Herzl. 9 plates. $15.25

Belgium's Return to Neutrality

An Essay in the Frustrations of Small Power Diplomacy

By DAVID OWEN KIEFT, University of Minnesota. In this study of Belgium's foreign and domestic policies, the author contends that it was primarily the latter which forced her return to neutrality in the wake of the Rhineland crisis. illus. $13.75

Socialism and the Great War

The Collapse of the Second International

By GEORGES HAUP. Studying the attitudes and actions taken by the International Socialist Bureau against the dangers of war between 1900 and 1914, the author discusses the psychological climate and the conflicting political motives that led to disarray among the Socialist leaders at the outbreak of the war. $17.00

Movements in European History

Second Edition

By D. H. LAWRENCE, with a previously unpublished epilogue by the author and a new introduction by J. T. BOULTON. Containing many characteristically vivid passages, this text clarifies Lawrence's view of history, political morality, and leadership. In the epilogue, he expresses his opinions on Fascism, Communism, and British democracy. 15 maps. paper $12.00

Politics in Independent Poland 1921-1939

The Crisis of Constitutional Government

By ANTONY POLONSKY. Polish political life during this period is set against the social and economic background of the new state. The author describes the failure of the democratic constitution adopted in March 1921 and its replacement by the semi-autocratic regime of Marshal Pilsudski and his successors. 7 maps. $22.50

English Diplomatic Administration 1259-1339

Second Edition

By G. P. CUTTINO, Emory University. Based largely on hitherto unexplored manuscript materials, this study of the administrative structure of medieval English diplomacy focuses on relations between England and France and on the history of the office of Keeper of Processes. Frontispiece, 5 tables. (Oxford Historical Monographs.) $13.00

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

Bitch goddess or coy mistress?

"A monumental paradox in American values is that nobody really approves of the definition of material success, but almost everybody wants to become the definition they deplore."

The analysis is by historian Richard M. Huber in his The American Idea of Success, a "stimulating and deeply thoughtful [book on how] 'success' and 'getting ahead' have been viewed in America. Here are Horatio Alger, Elbert Hubbard, Emile Coué, Bruce Barton and the two giants of self-help, Dale Carnegie and Peale, carefully impaled and dissected." Publishers' Weekly

"Keenly relevant . . . provides a fascinating perspective on present doubts and worries." The Wall Street Journal

"An answer to the probing and disconcerting questions the younger generation is raising." Library Journal

"A notable achievement . . . definitive . . . an extraordinary illumination of a very important aspect of American culture . . ." Ralph H. Gabriel, Sterling Professor of History Emeritus, Yale University.

THE AMERICAN IDEA OF SUCCESS

RICHARD M. HUBER $10.00

Jacket design: Ken Braren

Perspectives in American History

Edited by Donald Fleming and Bernard Bailyn

VOLUME VI • 1972

THE FACES OF LORD BUTE: A VISUAL CONTRIBUTION TO ANGLO-AMERICAN POLITICAL IDEOLOGY by John Brewer

EARDLEY-WILMOT, BRITANNIA, AND THE LOYALISTS:
A PAINTING BY BENJAMIN WEST By Mary Beth Norton

THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION: THE IDEOLOGY AND PSYCHOLOGY OF NATIONAL LIBERATION
By Edwin G. Burrows and Michael Wallace

ROOTS OF THE NEW CONSERVATION MOVEMENT
By Donald Fleming

UTOPIA FOR AN URBAN AGE: HENRY GEORGE, HENRY
DEMAREST LLOYD, EDWARD BELLAMY By John L. Thomas

NATIVE BLACKS AND FOREIGN WHITES: VARYING RESPONSES
TO EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES IN AMERICA, 1880-1950
By Timothy L. Smith

NEW PERSPECTIVES ON WOODROW WILSON
By Samuel F. Wells, Jr.

THE FRANKFURT SCHOOL IN EXILE By Martin Jay

A FURTHER NOTE ON THE STATISTICS OF HISTORICAL CHANGE By P. M. G. Harris

PERSPECTIVES is sold only in advance of publication. Single copies, $6.50.
5-yr subscriptions, $30.00. Checks, payable to Harvard University, must accompany subscriptions. Not responsible for copies lost because of failure to report a change of address in time for the mailing. Mail to:

CHARLES WARREN CENTER FOR STUDIES IN AMERICAN HISTORY

Harvard University
53 Church Street
Cambridge, Massachusetts 02138

Chicago Presents

INWARD HUNGER

The Education of a Prime Minister

Eric Williams

A highly respected historian and prime minister of Trinidad and Tobago, Eric Williams has produced a formidable and intelligent political autobiography. "A firework display of historical analysis, political controversy, and frank personal reminiscence."—Denis Judd, Sunday Telegraph (London)

1972 360 pages Cloth $7.95

BLACK NATIONALISM

A Search for an Identity in America

E. U. Essien-Udom

"A profound insight into the thinking of lower-class Negroes and into the dynamics and significance of the Black Muslim movement."—American Historical Review Cloth edition (1962), $7.50.

1972 xvi, 368 pages illus.
Paper $3.45

ILLUSTRIOUS IMMIGRANTS

The Intellectual Migration from Europe, 1930-41
Second Edition

Laura Fermi

"Illustrious Immigrants is crammed with information, with illuminating anecdotes, often moving incidents, and revealing statistics."—Peter Gay, New York Times Book Review

1972 xii, 432 pages Cloth $12.50
Paper $3.95

ANCESTORS AND IMMIGRANTS

A Changing New England Tradition

Barbara Miller Solomon

Taking as a vantage point the development of the ideology of restriction, Barbara Solomon examines Boston Brahmin attitudes toward themselves in their local society, in the nation at large, and in the world beyond from the 1850s to the 1920s.

1972 (Phoenix edition) xii,
276 pages Paper $2.95

THE PROGRESS OF SOCIETY IN EUROPE

A Historical Outline from the Subversion of the Roman Empire to the Beginning of the Sixteenth Century

William Robertson

Edited and with an Introduction by Felix Gilbert

Robertson's writings demonstrate an early stage in the development of the concepts and methods of modern historical research and are important expressions of the mind of the Enlightenment. Classic European Historians series.

1972 224 pages Cloth $9.00

The University of Chicago Press

5801 South Ellis Ave.

Chicago 60637

THE CAMBRIDGE ANCIENT HISTORY

Third Edition
Volume 2, Part 1:
HISTORY OF THE
MIDDLE EAST AND THE AEGEAN REGION
c. 1800-1380 B.C.

Edited by I. E. S. EDWARDS,
 C. J. GADD,
 N. G. L. HAMMOND,
 E. SOLLBERGER

This volume of the new third edition covers the era of Hammurabi in Western Asia, the Hyksos and the warrior kings of the Eighteenth Dynasty in Egypt, and the Minoan and Mycenaean civilizations in Crete and mainland Greece. $27.50

Third Edition volumes previously published:

Volume 1, Part 1: PROLEGOMENA
AND PREHISTORY $27.50

Volume 1, Part 2: EARLY HISTORY
OF THE MIDDLE EAST $27.50

LORD SALISBURY ON POLITICS

Edited by
 PAUL SMITH

A selection of Salisbury's articles from Murray's Quarterly Review, ranging from his criticism of Gladstone's budget and Russell's Reform Bill in 1860 to his warning of "Disintegration" (of the nation and the empire) in 1883. Each article is introduced and annotated. A general introduction analyzes Salisbury's conservatism. $21.00

POLICY AND POLICE

The Enforcement of the Reformation in the Age of Thomas Cromwell
 G. R. ELTON

In this new examination of Reformation enforcement G. R. Elton investigates the question whether or not resistance was overcome by a reign of terror and studies not only the policies and purposes of government but also the way in which these operated and their effect on the people. Years covered are 1532-1540. $19.50

THE POLITICS OF REFORM 1884

ANDREW JONES

A detailed study of the passing of the Reform Act of 1884 and the political environment in which it took place. The book's central theme is the complex interaction of the power groups and personalities involved, including Parnell, Gladstone, Salisbury and their dissident colleagues.

$19.50

BARON FRIEDRICH VON HÜGEL AND THE MODERNIST CRISIS IN ENGLAND

LAWRENCE F. BARMANN

Professor Barmann reconstructs von Hügel's involvement with modernism, particularly in England, and rejects the received explanations of his survival in the church. In von Hügel's unpublished manuscripts and letters the author finds evidence that he never compromised or disowned his principles and that he was more active politically than has yet been suggested. $18.50

Cambridge University Press

32 East 57th Street, New York, N.Y. 10022

Americana

FRANCIS W. SUTTON,
SEYMOUR E. HARRIS,
CARL KAYSEN, JAMES TOBIN
The American Business Creed
paper $2.25

ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE
Democracy in America
Unabridged edition in two volumes
The only edition containing J.S.
Mill's introduction to each volume.
cloth $7.00 each/paper $1.95 each

DENIS W. BROGAN
Abraham Lincoln
New introduction by the author
paper $1.75

GERDA LERNER
The Grimke Sisters from South Carolina
Pioneers for Woman's Rights and Abolition paper $3.95

HELEN and SCOTT NEARING
The Maple Sugar Book
Together with Remarks on Pioneering as a Way of Living in the Twentieth Century
cloth $5.95/paper $2.75

WOODROW WILSON
George Washington
Introduction by Marcus Cunliffe
cloth $7.50/paper $2.45

JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS
Uncle Remus
Introduction by
Stella Brewer Brookes
79 illustrations by A.B. Frost
cloth $3.95/paper $1.75

Examination copies are available when requested on academic letterhead. Write to Department AHA-2.

Schocken Books

67 Park Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

YOU MEAN I CAN GET $50,000 OF TIAA LIFE INSURANCE FOR LESS THAN $100?

That's what an Assistant Professor asked us when he heard about TIAA's low life insurance costs.

It's true. At his age 30 the annual premium for a 20-Year Home Protection policy providing $50,000 initial amount of insurance is $159.00. The first-year dividend, based on our current dividend scale, is $61.50, making a net payment of $97.50. Dividends, of course, are not guaranteed.

The Home Protection plan is level premium Term insurance providing its largest amount of protection initially, reducing by schedule each year to recognize decreasing insurance needs. This is just one example of the many low-cost TIAA plans available. If you need more protection for your family, ask us to mail you a personal illustration with figures for a policy issued at your age. We'll also send the Life Insurance Guide describing other TIAA policies.

ELIGIBILITY

Eligibility to apply for this or other TIAA life insurance is limited to persons employed at the time of application by a college, university, private school, or other nonprofit educational or scientific institution that qualifies for TIAA eligibility.

TEACHERS INSURANCE AND ANNUITY ASSOCIATION
730 Third Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10017

pE

Please mail the new Life Insurance Guide and a personal illustration.

Name _____

Address _____ Street _____

City _____ State _____

Your Date of Birth _____ ZIP _____

Dependents' Ages _____

Nonprofit Employer _____ college, university, or other educational or scientific institution

"A landmark in the study of American historical writing..."

No other so successfully integrates historiography into the mainstream of the nation's thought. For the first time we can know not only what historians said, but why they thought and wrote as they did."—Ray A. Billington,

Senior Research Associate, Henry E. Huntington Library

Photo: Gary Gladstone

"This book is one of a kind. For historians and social scientists it is indispensable . . . The Notes and Bibliography are of great value and the Index is excellent."

—Helen Merrell Lynd, Professor Emeritus, Sarah Lawrence College

"An extraordinary achievement. Everyone who is interested in the nature of the historical process, in the development of historical scholarship, and in the history of American thought is certain to profit from [this book]."—Merle Curti,

Frederick Jackson Turner Professor of History, Univ. of Wisconsin

"Unusually rewarding. It not only seems to cover the field both in detail and in general, but does so without pedantry."

—George Boas, Professor of Philosophy, Johns Hopkins Univ.

AMERICAN HISTORY IN AMERICAN THOUGHT

by Bert James Loewenberg

731 pages • $14.95 • SIMON AND SCHUSTER

Count Witte and the Tsarist Government in the 1905 Revolution

By Howard Mehlinger and John M. Thompson

In the first major study of the 1905 revolution from the viewpoint of the government, the authors examine the dilemma of the moderate Count Witte, who was confronted by the problem of maintaining order and simultaneously instituting social and political reforms. 480 pages $17.50

Revolution and Politics in Russia

*Essays in Memory of
B. I. Nicolaevsky*

Edited by Alexander and Janet Rabinowitch with Ladis K. D. Kristof

Distinguished articles on a wide range of specific topics bearing on Russian political and intellectual history, principally of the twentieth century, written by noted scholars in the field. Contributors include Marc Raeff, Philip Mosely, Israel Getzler, Walter Sablinsky, and Anna M. Bourguina.

440 pages, photos September $12.75

Quisling

The Career and Political Ideas of Vidkun Quisling, 1887-1945

By Paul M. Hayes

Recent years have brought new controversy over Quisling in Norway, but little information has been available in English. This, the first full-length biography of Quisling by a professional historian, incorporates much new material based on files assembled for Quisling's trial. 352 pages $12.95

Now in paperback . . . .

Manifestations of Discontent in Germany on the Eve of the Reformation

Edited and translated by Gerald Strauss

"His selections from the vast body of 'grievance literature,' dating chiefly from about 1490 to about 1525, provide the first genuine review of this age of dissent available to the English reader. Both students and general readers will appreciate finding this excellent book in their college or public libraries."

—Library Journal

247 pages (cloth $9.50) paper $3.50

Indiana University Press

BLOOMINGTON, INDIANA 47401

New Penguins in HISTORY

THE STRUGGLE FOR THE MIDDLE EAST. Walter Laqueur. A review of Soviet policy in the Middle East between 1958 and 1971 together with an analysis of the USSR's prospects in the area. $1.65

REVOLUTIONS 1775–1830. Edited by Merryn Williams. Key writings and documents forming a panorama of the Age of Revolutions. $3.25

THE IDEA OF PROGRESS: History and Society. Sidney Pollard. A survey of what men have thought about progress throughout history. Covers thinkers as different as Saint-Simon, Macaulay, Spengler, Marx, and Marshall. $1.75

AN ECONOMIC HISTORY OF THE USSR. Alec Nove. The growth of the Soviet economy, from the early days of "war communism" through Stalinism and the more liberal era of Malenkov and Khrushchev. $2.25

THE IDEA OF PREHISTORY (Reissue). Glyn Daniel. A study of Western man's interest in prehistorical civilizations, from the seventeenth century to the present. $1.45

ARRIAN: THE CAMPAIGNS OF ALEXANDER. Translated by Aubrey de Sélincourt. Introduction by J.R. Hamilton. Written four hundred years after Alexander's death, Arrian's account depicts better than anything else the enigma of the conqueror's aims and personality. $2.45

CARLYLE: SELECTED WRITINGS. Edited by Alan Shelston. A choice of passages from the great historian's major books. Includes the whole of Chartism and chapters from The French Revolution, Past and Present, and Frederick the Great. $2.45

CONFLICT IN THE CONGO. Thomas Kanza. A review of the liberation of the Congo, Patrice Lumumba's struggle to create a viable state, Belgian attempts to sabotage the newly independent country, and Lumumba's death. $3.25

For a complete list of Penguin books in history, write:

PENGUIN BOOKS INC

7110 Ambassador Rd Baltimore, Md 21207

Overseas readers write Penguin Education, Harmondsworth, Middlesex, England.

from BARNES & NOBLE

COLLECTED PAPERS ON THE JACOBITE RISINGS, VOL I

Rupert C. Jarvis

It has been said that many a devotee of history has approached this particular field of the Jacobite Risings with an honest intention to truthful inquiry and impartial investigation, only to be lured away to fall victim from historian to romancer. The papers collected in this volume demonstrate convincingly that all romance remains in fictional form. 294 pp. 1971 $11.50

THE EXPLORERS OF NORTH AMERICA

John Bartlet Brebner

The author has drawn together, the explorations which first revealed the general character of the North American continent. He has mainly been interested in showing why, and where men explored and who promoted the expeditions. 1933; repr. ready July 1972 $9.25

THE POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT IN NEPAL

R. S. Chauhan

The author attempts to analyze the basic socio-political forces and factors that are eating into the vitals of the Nepalese politics and whose conflict is allowing instability and chaos to perpetuate in the kingdom. Ready July 1972 $13.50

PARLIAMENTARY DEMOCRACY IN JAPAN

Niranjan Bhuinya

Japan is the first Asian country to develop a strong and variable democracy, although she had no democratic tradition. The system of government and politics was thoroughly authoritarian and this was consistent with the social and political values the Japanese held as good. 121 pp. Ready June 1972 $6.50

SIKKIM AND BHUTAN

V.H. Coelho

This book deals with two little known, but fascinating countries, Sikkim and Bhutan, tucked away in the Himalayas to the south of Tibet. Written from the author's first hand knowledge, it is intended to be a genuine contribution to a better understanding between the peoples of India on the one hand, and of Sikkim and Bhutan on the other. 138 pp. Illus. Ready June 1972 $6.75

THE CHANGING MAP OF ASIA 5th ed.

W.G. East, O.H.K. Spate and Charles A. Fisher

A completely revised and expanded edition. The prologue, epilogue and chapters on India, Pakistan, and Asiatic U.S.S.R. are updated versions of the 4th edition. 500 pp. Ready June 1972 (Methuen) $18.50

barnes & noble books

(a division of Harper & Row, Publishers) 49 E. 33d Street, New York, 10016

STRUGGLE FOR A CONTINENT

A Diplomatic History of South America. 1919-1945

Glen Barclay

The success of Latin-American diplomacy in the period between the two World Wars is very much the measure of the failure of American policy. The insensitivity of Washington to the desires and cultural subtleties of Latin American governments is almost beyond compare, and Glen Barclay, a distinguished Australian historian, has woven diplomatic, economic, and military history into a dramatic and entertaining narrative.

214 pages

$7.50

MEDIEVAL CHURCH AND SOCIETY

Christopher Brooke

In this exploration of medieval society, Professor Brooke reveals an historical approach which combines objective analysis with a firm belief that the past is a living and integral part of the present and that the true historian cannot be an isolated scholar. The essays, diverse in origin, are tied together by a far-reaching breadth of learning and understanding.

256 pages

4 illustrations

$8.95

AN ENGLISHMAN IN THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR

The Diaries of Henry Yates Thompson

Edited by Christopher Chancellor

Henry Yates Thompson, a young Englishman, travelled in America after leaving Cambridge in 1863. He was 24 at the time. He left a readable and perceptive account of his journey which included conversations with politicians, wounded soldiers on the battlefields, generals, preachers, slaves, academics, and farmers, and a magnificent account of the Battle of Chattanooga (during which he had stood next to General Grant).

215 pages

2 maps 50 illustrations

$12.50

THE GODS OF REVOLUTION

Christopher Dawson

Introduction by Arnold Toynbee

The late Christopher Dawson's brilliant and hitherto unpublished analysis of the French Revolution, which concludes his famous series of books dealing with religion as a dynamic force in history. He looks first at the ideological antecedents of the Revolution, then at the Revolution itself, and finally at its aftermath.

224 pages

$8.95

A STUDY OF NAIMA

Lewis V. Thomas

Edited by Norman Itzkowitz

A critical account of Naima's life, including an analysis of the two prefaces to his History, of the structure of his chronicle, and of Naima's thought, his sources, and his accomplishments. It also ranges over a variety of topics, including career patterns in 17th and 18th century Ottoman life, the structure of factions in Ottoman politics, and insights into the problems of Ottoman decline.

182 pages

$12.50

OTTOMAN IMPERIALISM DURING THE REFORMATION

Europe and the Caucasus

Carl Max Kortepeter

Dedicated to the high drama of the 16th and 17th centuries accompanying the expansion and consolidation of the Ottoman Empire, when Russia and Poland paid tribute to the Turks and Tartars, and European diplomats fought over the right of access to the Turkish Sultan and his viziers.

328 pages

3 maps

$14.50

ORDER DIRECTLY FROM:

New York University Press

WASHINGTON SQUARE,
NEW YORK 10003

Spring
'72

Party Strength in the United States 1872-1970

By PAUL T. DAVID, University of Virginia. xiii, 310 pp.

$9.75

Election records from 1872 to 1970 for the offices of president, governor, senator, and representative to Congress are published here in a usable form for the first time. Paul T. David began this study by calculating the percentage divisions of the vote among Democratic, Republican, and other candidate parties. Using this as a basis, he was able to devise a new and more accurate method of measuring long-term trends in party strength at the polls for each state. These trends make up almost two hundred pages of graphic material in which states are analyzed individually, nationally, regionally, and in special groups according to their long-term partisan affiliations. This compilation of numerical data and its accompanying text is an indispensable reference work for anyone interested in elections in the United States.

Privacy in Colonial New England

By DAVID H. FLAHERTY, University of Virginia. xii, 287 pp., tables, bibliog., index.

$12.50

Inspired by a growing concern for the assurance of individual privacy, this study undertakes to determine the role privacy played in the life of the colonial New Englander. Privacy as a value is examined thoroughly as it existed in the home, family, and neighborhood, and contact with the broader institutions of religion, government, and the courts. Flaherty's study of a concept which Americans until recently have almost unconsciously valued is an important step toward meeting the present challenges to its preservation.

The Collapse of Orthodoxy

The Intellectual Ordeal of George Frederick Holmes

By NEAL C. GILLESPIE, Georgia State University. x, 273 pp., illus., bibliog., index.

$9.50

The Collapse of Orthodoxy is the only complete biography of George Frederick Holmes, the first president of the University of Mississippi and later professor of history and political economy at the University of Virginia. He spent his life conveying to Americans new ideas from nineteenth-century Europe. As a distinguished essayist, reviewer, and teacher of history, literature, and economics, Holmes contributed much to the thinking of his times. His philosophical debates—particularly those with Comte about positivism—are vividly described here and are of considerable importance.

University Press of Virginia
Box 3608 University Station
Charlottesville, Virginia 22903

Invite Henry VIII to class?

Unthinkable. But why not invite his biographer to class?

Sussex Tapes brings you
Geoffrey Elton, Professor of English
Constitutional History, Cambridge University
and
J. J. Scarisbrick, Professor of History, University of Warwick, and biographer
of Henry VIII
in a lively dialogue on
"The Politics and Personality of Henry VIII"
and
"Thomas Cromwell and the Government of Henry VIII"

Invite these historians into your classroom.

Let your students hear them and other British scholars speak on the central controversies and issues of Tudor England in a series of 10 recordings on The Tudors and the Stuarts.

In addition to Henry VIII, the series covers Elizabethan England; Cromwell; Science and Society; Charles I and Puritanism, 1570-1640; and English and Dutch Trade, 1500-1700.

Sussex Tapes, produced in England at the University of Sussex, are now available for the first time in North America.

Each hour-long tape is available in open-reel or cassette format.

Other series (about 10 tapes each) cover:

The Middle Ages in Europe
European History
Modern Britain
The Modern World
Economics
Politics

For full details and a free catalog, write:

HOLT INFORMATION SYSTEMS
383 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10017

Please send me the Sussex Tapes
International catalog.

Name _____

Institution _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

Sussex Tapes
INTERNATIONAL makes it possible.

ST. MARTIN'S PRESS announces the publication of AMERICA SINCE 1945

Edited by
ROBERT D. MARCUS and DAVID BURNER
State University of New York, Stony Brook

Readings on the social and political history of the United States from 1945 to the 1960's

CONTENTS

PART I 1945-1952

Introduction

Russia and the Cold War, Averell Harriman
The Cold War: A Revisionist View, David Horowitz
To Secure These Rights, The President's Committee on Civil Rights, 1947
Truman and Domestic Politics: The Election of 1948, Richard Kirkendall
Truman and Foreign Policy: The Korean War, Walter LaFeber

PART II 1952-1959

Introduction

Nixon Agonistes: The Checkers Speech, Garry Wills
The Army-McCarthy Hearings, Senate Committee Hearing
The Underestimation of Dwight D. Eisenhower, Murray Kempton
Eisenhower Revisited—A Political Genius? A Brilliant Man? Richard H. Rovere
From The Feminine Mystique, Betty Friedan
The Texture of Poverty, Michael Harrington

PART III The 1960's

Introduction

Kennedy: A Cold Warrior, David Burner
The Port Huron Statement, Students for a Democratic Society
Building the Great Society: The Case of Equal Rights, James Sundquist
Lyndon Johnson and Vietnam: 1968, Townsend Hoopes
One Morning in the War, Richard Hammer
Violence in Chicago, 1968: The Walker Report
Youth as a Stage of Life, Kenneth Keniston

228 pages paperbound, $3.50 (probable)

If you would like to consider this book for class adoption, please write for a complimentary examination copy to—

ST. MARTIN'S PRESS, College Department
175 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10010

Mark Naidis,
Los Angeles Valley College

THE WESTERN TRADITION

With a foreword by Professor Robin Winks, Jr.

This text consists of twenty-seven chapters which survey western civilization from the beginning to the present. Each chapter is a comment on an outstanding period or movement. These are presented in chronological order so that separate themes, such as religion, economic development, and the scientific outlook are suggested as part of the modern Western cultural heritage. Political events are used as a matrix in which the whole is set, but political developments are not specially emphasized. The book is intended to help put the student in touch with his cultural past in such a way that he can sort out the past events that are the most relevant for the present. Each chapter is accompanied by a selected reading list. These bibliographical references are intended to convey the spirit and flavor of the time as well as the factual material. In his foreword, Professor Winks writes of the place that this book occupies among the many available western civilization textbooks.

Pub. January, 1972, 532 pages
$7.00 paperback, $10.00 cloth

A Student Study Guide and an Instructor's Manual prepared by Professor James Dodson, also of Los Angeles Valley College will be available.

James Dodson,
Los Angeles Valley College

READINGS IN WESTERN CIVILIZATION

February, 1972, 384 pages
$5.95 paperback

John C. Miller,
Stanford University

THE RISE OF THE AMERICAN COLONIES

An interpretive survey of the period 1584-1763. The book attempts to relate colonial developments to events occurring in Europe and then show a relationship of these to the present. A unifying theme develops from the struggle waged by the various colonies for local self-government and how this struggle broadened gradually into a unified effort to achieve independence.

August, 1972, 640 pages
$5.95 paperback, $10.00 hardbound

Norman Cohen,
Occidental College

CIVIL STRIFE IN AMERICA

Using selected readings and extensive analysis of his own, Professor Cohen uses incidents of urban violence in America to indicate the one-dimensional analysis of these events which has generally been made. If the analysis is made by behavioral scientists history tends to be ignored and historians tend to ignore behavioral analysis. Professor Cohen includes in this book examples of the theories of collective behavior, the extent Gustave LeBon's theories have influenced public opinion concerning riots and rioters, and how differing research techniques, such as used by George Rudé, can perhaps result in not only an altered but also a more meaningful interpretation of these incidents.

Pub. February, 1972, 249 pages, $4.00

Forthcoming books for U. S. History survey courses are being written by John Schutz (U.S.C.) and Norris Hundley (U.C.L.A.); John C. Miller (Stanford); and George Frakes (Santa Barbara City College) and Royce Adams (Santa Barbara City College).

The
Dryden Press, Inc.

901 NORTH ELM ■ HINSDALE, ILLINOIS 60521

Essays on Radicalism in Contemporary America

Edited by Leon Borden Blair    Introduction by Lyndon B. Johnson

Includes four essays on radicalism in twentieth-century America; contributors are Jerome L. Rodnitzky, Frank Ross Peterson, Kenneth R. Philp, and John A. Garraty. The Walter Prescott Webb Memorial Lectures, No. 6. $5.00

Parliament and Congress

By Kenneth Bradshaw and David Pring

A historical and comparative analysis of the British Parliament and United States Congress. $10.00

Reconstruction to Reform

Texas Politics, 1876-1906

By Alwyn Barr

Analyzes political developments based on the shift from a rural frontier society and economy toward commercialization of agriculture, industrialization, and urbanization. Illustrated. $8.50

Rural Politics in Nasser's Egypt

A Quest for Legitimacy

By J. B. Mayfield    Foreword by George Lenczowski

A careful analysis of Nasser's belated attempts to modernize the rural areas of Egypt. $8.50

The Ethereal Aether

A History of the Michelson-Morley-Miller Aether-Drift Experiments, 1880-1930

By Loyd S. Swenson, Jr.

A historical narrative of one of the great experiments in modern physical science; the fame of the test derives largely from the role it is popularly supposed to have played in the origins of Einstein's first theory of relativity. Illustrated. $10.00

Alberta Homestead

Chronicle of a Pioneer Family

By Sarah Ellen Roberts    Edited by Lathrop E. Roberts

A personal chronicle of pioneering in western Canada. $7.50

UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS PRESS    •    AUSTIN AND LONDON

Box 7819, Austin, Texas 78712

Essential History From Missouri

The Venezuelan Armed Forces in Politics, 1935-1959.

Winfield J. Burggraaff. Systematically explores the political role of Venezuela's powerful military establishment during a quarter century when the country underwent the full impact of rapid social change caused by the development of its vast oil riches.

256 pages $10.00

The New Citizenship: Origins of Progressivism in Wisconsin, 1885-1900. David P. Thelen. A new interpretation of progressivism that attributes its origins, not to particular leaders or interest groups, but to the awakening of popular grass-roots consciousness that stimulated the public to participate in politics in new ways.

350 pages $12.00

Wea Creek to El Dorado: Oil in Kansas, 1860-1920.

Francis W. Schruben. The men and events involved in the discovery of oil in Kansas and the ensuing conflict between small, independent companies and Standard Oil are richly described in this history of the first 60 years of the Kansas oil industry. Ills. 188 pages $8.00

An Army for Empire: The United States Army in the Spanish-American War. Graham A. Cosmas. Tradition has blamed the blunders of the Spanish-American War on the Military. Cosmas documents other factors—including political—that reduced the Army's efficiency in this shortest of U.S. wars. Ills. & maps. 346 pages $11.50

Essays on Russian Liberalism. Charles E. Timberlake, editor. Eight distinguished scholars analyze the origin and evolution of Russian liberalism and examine the prospects the movement held for a peaceful, liberal alternative to autocracy in Russia before 1917. 208 pages $9.00

Available from your bookseller or the University of Missouri Press 107 Swallow Hall, Columbia, Missouri 65201 “...clearly one of the most important books ever to be written by an American historian.”*

Toward the Scientific Study of History

Selected Essays of Lee Benson,
University of Pennsylvania

These eight essays written between 1957 and 1971 reveal with disarming logic the development of Professor Benson's theory of scientific history. A variant form of his main theme runs through all essays: that historians have lacked a good conception of science and have been immensely indifferent to methodology, clarification of concepts, and development of theory. Professor Benson's argument culminates in his latest essay in which he writes that in order to develop a genuinely scientific historiography and a genuinely powerful social science, historians must break down disciplinary walls in order to focus on enduring social problems.

352 Pages / 1972 / Paperbound $3.95 /
Clothbound $8.75

\“More than any other book, these essays specify the necessary steps for making the study of history a social science. Because of its revolutionary implications, this is clearly one of the most important books ever to be written by an American historian.”*

—J. Rogers Hollingsworth

---

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

---

“What an impressive book it is,
and what a major contribution...”

—Ray A. Billington

American Convictions

Cycles of Public Thought, 1600-1850
Charles A. Barker,
Johns Hopkins University

An intellectual history of America from its beginnings to 1850, this book takes as its focus those ideas which concern public affairs, institutions, and policies. Among those ideas, Professor Barker finds recurrences, or “cycles,” in the loyalties and purposes of the people. His book demonstrates that more individualistic, protestant and innovative convictions emerge in certain periods; that more consolidating and conservative ones develop in other times. This outstanding work is an incisive analysis of the derivation of American thoughts and attitudes.

1971 Ralph Waldo Emerson Award,
Phi Beta Kappa

632 Pages/1970/Text Edition, $11.25

“A remarkable achievement—one of those magisterial books which appear most infrequently, and which will win immediate recognition as a classic in American Studies.”

—Robert D. Cross

---

College Department
East Washington Square, Philadelphia, Pa. 19105

---

INDEX OF ADVERTISERS

| Advertiser                               | Pages            | Advertiser                              | Pages         |
|--|------------------|---|---------------|
| Alfred A. Knopf                          | 11               | New York University Press               | 43            |
| American Historical Association          | 53, 54, 55       | Oxford University Press                 | 2nd Cover, 32 |
| Arno Press                               | 19               | Pantheon                                | 24, 25        |
| Barnes & Noble                           | 42               | Penguin Books Inc.                      | 41            |
| Basic Books                              | 26               | Perspectives in American History        | 34            |
| Beamur International Ltd.                | 15               | Praeger                                 | 5             |
| Cambridge University Press               | 36               | Princeton University Press              | 4th Cover     |
| Columbia University Press                | 23               | Quadrangle Books, Inc.                  | 16            |
| Cornell University Press                 | 28, 29           | Schocken Books                          | 37            |
| Encyclopaedia Britannica                 | 6, 7, 20, 21     | St. Martin's Press                      | 46            |
| Harper & Row                             | 10, 22, 30       | Stanford University Press               | 4             |
| Harvard University Press                 | 3rd Cover 12, 13 | Simon and Schuster                      | 39            |
| Holt Information Systems—SussexTapes | 45               | Teachers Insurance and AnnuityAssn. | 38            |
| Index of Advertisers                     | 52               | The Dryden Press, Inc.                  | 47            |
| Indiana University Press                 | 40               | University of California Press          | 18            |
| Irish University Press                   | 3                | University of Chicago Press             | 35            |
| J. B. Lippincott Co.                     | 50, 51           | University of Missouri Press            | 49            |
| Johns Hopkins University Press           | 27, 31           | University of Texas Press               | 48            |
| Kraus Reprint                            | 14               | University of Wisconsin Press           | 17            |
| McGraw-Hill                              | 33               | University Press Amsterdam              | 8             |
| Microfilming Corp. of America            | 9                | University Press of Virginia            | 44            |

Announcing...Two New Pamphlet Series

AHA PAMPHLETS DISCUSSIONS ON TEACHING

Between 1956 and 1970 the Service Center for Teachers of History, affiliated with the American Historical Association, published a series of pamphlets intended primarily for use by teachers in the schools. The Service Center has been discontinued and its activities absorbed into the regular program of the AHA and the series has been reorganized to allow for a still wider appeal and usefulness.

The AHA Pamphlets will abandon the essentially bibliographical approach of most of the earlier series and will offer instead concise, readable, and stimulating essays, narrative and critical. These essays will summarize the most recent interpretations, and select, critical bibliographies will be included. Handsomely designed, yet inexpensive, the pamphlets should appeal to anyone interested, as professional scholar or as general reader, in history and should prove useful as well for supplementary classroom reading. Some pamphlets will be revisions of items in the old series; some, though by the same authors, will be entirely rewritten to conform to the new program, while a large number of new pamphlets will be added. Price: $1.00 each

Available Spring 1972

- |   |  |
|---|--|
| 101 Ray Allen BillingtonThe American FrontierThesis: Attack and Defense    | 240 William T. HaganThe Indian in AmericanHistory |
| 212 George E. MowryThe Progressive Era,1900-1920: The ReformPersuasion | 241 Franklin D. ScottEmigration and Immigration       |
| 222 Harvey L. CarterFar Western Frontiers                                      | 403 Harold J. GrimmThe Reformation                    |

Discussions on Teaching will be a series devoted to problems of particular interest to teachers in the schools. It will cover questions of interpretation, method, and approaches suitable to the modern classroom.

Available Spring 1972: 1 Paul L. Ward
Elements of Historical Thinking

(Pamphlets in the old Service Center series will continue to be available until supplies are exhausted or until they are replaced in the new series.)

THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

400 A Street S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003

---

Lists of Doctoral Dissertations in History

---

Sets of the mimeographed Supplements, Number 6-11, to the 1970 List of Doctoral Dissertations in History are available at $1.00 the set. These Supplements list the titles of dissertations in progress that were registered with the Association between May 15, 1971 and May 15, 1972; the titles of completed dissertations that were reported during that period, and changes and deletions to the printed Lists. The Lists for 1964, 1967, and 1970 are also available at the prices indicated below.

---

Ph.D. Dissertations
American Historical Association
400 A Street S. E.
Washington, D. C. 20003

I enclose _____ (check or money order) in payment for _____ Supplements 6-11 to the 1970 List

$1.00 the set

|                        |                        |                        |
|------------------------|------------------------|------------------------|
| _____ 1964 List | _____ 1967 List | _____ 1970 List |
| $1.50 each            | $2.00 each            | $3.00 each            |

Name (please print) _____

Address _____

_____ Zip Code _____

If you are planning to move, please let us know six weeks before changing your address. Attach address label and fill in your name and new address below. This will ensure prompt service on your subscription.

Attach Label Here
(address label found on AHR wrapper) Send label with your name and new address to: American Historical Review, 400 A St., S.E., Washington, D. C. 20003. If a label is not available, be sure to attach your OLD address, including Zip Code number.

Name _____

New address _____

City _____

State _____ Zip _____

VOLUME 77 • NUMBER 4 • OCTOBER 1972

The American Historical Review

THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

American University Center

U S I S - Calcutta

7 NOV 1972

1972
Bancroft Prize Winners from Oxford

THE EUROPEAN DISCOVERY OF AMERICA

The Northern Voyages

Samuel Eliot Morison

"A great book by a great historian. . . . He has addressed a subject of the most confused character, filled with good, bad, and imaginary actors, the whole put into a state of interpretive confusion by assorted historians, fanatics, and crackpots. Yet he has not only made sense of it but he has made it sing." — WILCOMB E. WASHBURN, Virginia Quarterly Review.
210 halftones, 17 maps. $15.00

THE MATHERS

Three Generations of Puritan Intellectuals, 1596-1728

Robert Middlekauff

"[An] impressive book. . . . a work of original, personal, creative scholarship. . . . [Middlekauff's] chapters on seventeenth-century Chiliasm, on typology, and on the historical consciousness are excellent; his explanation of the Mathers' Christology is unequalled. . . . Superb intellectual history [that] reverses the judgment of two and a half centuries and explores Cotton Mather's intellectual achievements as never before."
— MICHAEL G. HALL, William and Mary Quarterly $12.50

Oxford University Press

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

VOLUME 77 • NUMBER 4 • OCTOBER 1972

---

The American Historical Review

---

THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

Managing Editor: R. K. WEBB

Associate Editor: NANCY LANE

Assistant Editors: JOHN T. APPLEBY, JANET CROLY HAYMAN, ANN HOFSTRA

Assistant Editor-Bibliographer: EDWARD C. PAPENFUSE, JR.

Editorial Assistants: JOAN ANSHELES, ROBIN E. BYRNES, ESTEN H. HARDEE

Advertising Manager: LOUISE M. DOUGLAS

Board of Editors

ALBERT FEUERWERKER
University of Michigan

KENNETH S. LYNN
Johns Hopkins University

NANCY LYMAN ROELKER
Boston University

PETER GAY
Yale University

BRYCE LYON
Brown University

GEORGE B. TINDALL
University of North Carolina

TOM B. JONES
University of Minnesota

EDMUND S. MORGAN
Yale University

GORDON WRIGHT
Stanford University

903.001 / 2A

Contributors:

RICHARD A. GOLDTHWAITE has his doctorate from Columbia University (1965) and is now associate professor of history at the Johns Hopkins University. He is interested primarily in the social and economic history of Renaissance Italy and has published Private Wealth in Renaissance Florence: A Study of Four Families, with the Princeton University Press in 1968. Mr. Goldthwaite is currently studying the construction industry in Florence and the history of wages and prices; he hopes to write an urban history of Florence that examines the social and economic implications of the physical transformation of the city in the Renaissance.

PHILLIP S. PALUDAN, assistant professor of history at the University of Kansas, has published articles in the American Journal of Legal History and the Journal of the History of Ideas. His book on legal-constitutional thought in the years 1830-75 will be published in the near future. He is presently at work on a study of selected Northern and Southern communities during the Civil War era.

JAMES R. SCOBIE is professor and chairman of the history department at Indiana University. He trained under the late Clarence H. Haring at Harvard and has worked extensively in Argentina. Mr. Scobie's research on the city of Buenos Aires carries forward his earlier studies, Argentina: A City and a Nation (2d ed., 1971), Revolution on the Pampas (1964), and La lucha por la consolidación de la nacionalidad argentina (1964). He is completing a general social history of Buenos Aires in the late nineteenth century, to be complemented by a subsequent volume analyzing census data on occupation and ethnic groups.

LEWIS L. GOULD received a Ph.D. from Yale, where he studied with Howard R. Lamar. An associate professor of history at the University of Texas at Austin, Mr. Gould is interested in American politics between 1880 and 1920. He has written Wyoming: A Political History, 1868-1896 (1968) and Progressives and Prohibitionists: Texas Democrats in the Wilson Era (forthcoming in early 1973), and he is working on a history of the Republican party from McKinley to Taft.

---

The AHR and the AHA: An Editorial

---

The financial crisis through which the American Historical Association is passing results in part from the inflationary pinch in which every organization finds itself these days. To that general problem, however, are added two pressures more specific to the AHA: one, the marked increase in activities and services over recent years; the other, the academic recession, which has brought a leveling off in number of members and in anticipated dues income. The cash balance with which the business office must operate is far from adequate, and at times in the past fiscal year meeting payrolls and printing bills has been, as Wellington said of Waterloo, "a damned nice thing—the nearest run thing you ever saw in your life." At least qualitatively, the AHA has shared a situation all too familiar in parts of the university world.

The search for economy goes on constantly at the Washington headquarters these days, but prices continue to rise, and it is clear that cheeseparing alone—even rather brutal cheeseparing—is not going to remedy the situation. Merely gaining reasonable security for ordinary day-to-day operations, let alone a sufficiency to allow for coping with emergencies or expanding into new services, must depend on increasing income. And that means primarily increasing the number of members and subscribers.

The Council is considering means of bettering performance on both these counts. It may be useful in the interval, however, to say something about the role of the AHR in the financial affairs of the AHA. The AHR is the largest and most expensive single operation within the AHA: the biggest bills the AHA pays are printing bills for the AHR, and a little under 40 per cent of the salary allocation in the headquarters staff goes to the AHR. But there are less immediately obvious ways in which the AHR figures in the financial picture. It is to those interrelations and their implications that this editorial is directed.

BASIC FINANCE

Although the AHR means large outlays for printing and salaries, the AHR also produces large amounts of revenue, revenue that would simply not exist if the AHR did not exist. Two sources of this revenue are major items in the AHA balance sheet:

(1) Subscription revenue—that is, money paid by libraries and other institutions for the AHR—runs well over $140,000 per year.

(2) Advertising revenue yields somewhat less, but if a modest anticipated rise in advertising rates does not adversely affect the volume of advertising, anticipated income from this source may begin to approach the income from subscriptions.

In the calculations that follow, only these two clearly definable and measurable items are used as AHR-generated income. But additional sources of revenue that arise solely from the AHR include:

(1) A relatively small income from sales of back copies.

(2) Income from permissions to reprint articles, and from royalties on the reprinting and microreproduction of the entire journal.

(3) Income from promotional activities. Over the past three years copies of the AHR sent to libraries have carried two coupons. At a total cost for printing and insertion of under $3,000, this campaign has secured more than 1,650 new members, just under two-fifths of them regular members and the remainder student members—a net yield of more than $16,000.

(4) Finally, an indeterminate amount must be reckoned for those memberships held by persons who join the AHA only because they want to receive the AHR. Present constitutional provisions do not allow individuals to subscribe separately.

Two conclusions follow: Subscription and advertising revenue alone cover about 70 per cent of the total cost of producing the AHR (including distributed overhead), a proportion that would rise somewhat if the other sources of AHR-generated income could be taken into account. It follows, using the membership circulation for the issue for June 1972 and including salaries and office overhead in total cost, that, in effect, no more than $6.50 (and probably somewhat less) of a member's dues pays for the five issues of the AHR he receives each year. This sum invites favorable comparison, considering size, coverage, and quality, with any other learned journal to which a member may subscribe.

Some consideration must be given to a large increase in resources made available in 1969. In that year the AHA severed its connection with the Macmillan Company. From 1895 to 1969 the AHR was published by Macmillan, under a contract that was singularly generous when the journal was founded and its future uncertain. Macmillan never provided any editorial services under that contract: they were the responsibility of the managing editor and his then very small staff. To this end the Macmillan Company contributed $2,400 per year, the salary of an assistant editor in 1895. (It might be pointed out, at the risk of a mutiny in the present staff, that that sum was the equivalent in purchasing power of perhaps $12,000 in 1970.) The services the publisher provided were maintaining the list of subscribers, but not of AHA members; handling financial and contractual (but not editorial) matters with the printer; and securing the advertising. The Macmillan Company also agreed to absorb any losses the AHR might incur. In return the board of editors (and, after the sale of the journal in 1917, the AHA) agreed to pay the publisher a 10 per cent commission on advertising secured and one-third of the net income (if any) of the journal.

These terms, including the payment of $2,400 for editorial services, were still in effect in 1968. But by that time Macmillan was receiving some $7,000 in agency fees and some $30,000 as its share of the net income. When the AHA became its own publisher in 1969 that money became immediately available to the AHA and the AHR. The money made possible expansion of the staff and services of the AHR and improvement of the salary scale and accompanying fringe benefits for the entire AHA staff. The AHR had long been working with an entirely inadequate staff, in terms of numbers, and under routine pressure so great that there was no possibility of expanding and improving the scholarly usefulness of the journal or of finding time for long-range planning: the editing was done, the deadlines were met, and that was all. The salaries were scandalously low—and this in a city where decent academic scales (all that we have aspired to) are inevitably at a disadvantage compared with what government and private agencies pay. Without the expansion of staff that this change permitted, none of the improvements in the AHR in the last few years would have been possible; and members of the AHA must feel some relief in knowing that their association no longer presumes upon the self-sacrifice of its staff. The work load is still heavy and deadlines still press, but we are no longer using sweated labor.

One final point must be made about basic finance. Over the three fiscal years from 1969 to 1972, the advertising and subscription revenue from the AHR has gone up by roughly 50 per cent. Over the same period the percentage of total AHA revenue ascribable to these two AHR items alone has risen from about 27 per cent to 32 per cent. Meanwhile, the total expenditures on the AHR (including distributed overhead) have remained virtually constant as a proportion of total AHA expenditure, falling from an even 46 per cent to 45.3 per cent. Taking actual amounts of money, from the fiscal year 1969–70 to the fiscal year 1970–71, total expenditures for the AHR rose by roughly $42,000, while its income from advertising and subscriptions rose by roughly $45,000—more than covering the increased expenditure, even without taking into account the money made available by the termination of the Macmillan contract and without drawing more heavily than before on dues income. The increase in expenditures on the AHR from 1970–71 to 1971–72 was roughly $25,000, while income from advertising and subscriptions rose by almost half again as much, by some $36,000. The additional revenues the AHR has generated have in good part gone to support expanded AHA operations.

OPERATING COSTS

Since 1968 the editors of the AHR have made a number of changes in editorial policy and practice.

(1) The review articles are probably the most immediately evident innovation, one apparently much welcomed. Review articles have, of course, increased the amount of space devoted to articles.

(2) The bibliographical services have been markedly altered. A bibliographer has been added to the staff of the AHR (though a part of his time goes to important AHA activities); he has introduced a number of technical changes while securing far more systematic coverage in the lists of periodical articles. We anticipate that other changes in the near future will make possible yet more efficient and sophisticated services. A future editorial will directly address the question of the obligations and accomplishments of the AHA and the AHR in the field of bibliographical control.

(3) Promotional campaigns have been launched to increase memberships and subscriptions, an effort that will grow as we gain time, resources, and experience to allow the careful planning that must underlie such work.

(4) A good many technical reforms have improved the effectiveness of the operations within the AHR staff. They include ways of keeping down the printer's charges for authors' alterations; more systematic handling of the extremely complicated matter of copyright and permissions, along with more generous financial provision for the authors of articles involved; rationalization and simplification of copyediting procedures; and improved filing and record keeping.

As the proportional figures above suggest, these changes have been made with a steady eye to cost-effectiveness, as well as to a careful assessment of their scholarly usefulness.

By all odds the most striking change that has been made in the AHR is the redesign that took effect in February 1971. While the welcome accorded this new format, within the AHA and outside it, has been overwhelmingly favorable, some members have continued to be plagued by doubts about the wisdom of such a departure at precisely the time the AHA was entering a period of financial stringency. This concern has been anticipated and answered on earlier occasions, both in the AHR and in the report of the managing editor for 1971. But, as the question of whether we can afford such luxury persists, a fuller, more prominent explanation is called for.

The problem of controlling printing costs is a very difficult one, inasmuch as, in recent years, operating costs in the printing industry have risen some 5 to 7 per cent annually. At the same time significant technological changes have been taking place. These have offered opportunities to control costs but have in some instances required changing specifications. The production cost of any publication is determined by the cumulative effect of three factors—physical specifications, design esthetics, and quantity of material. We can examine each of these factors as they apply to the AHR.

PHYSICAL SPECIFICATIONS: In close consultation with our printer, we have undertaken a number of technological changes.

(1) Beginning with the issue for December 1968 we changed from the traditional book-sewn binding to adhesive binding, at a considerable saving.

(2) We are now using computerized composition to set and store indexes, thus making possible the publication of cumulative indexes, at five-year instead of ten- or twenty-year intervals, without the necessity for resetting.

(3) The lists of periodical articles are being set by computer, allowing some slight saving in cost, greater ease of proofreading, and far greater capacity for control and retrieval and for future flexibility of service.

(4) We have converted from sheetfed letterpress to web offset printing. A number of consequences—and opportunities—have flowed from this basic transformation.

(a) Paper. The paper presently used for the AHR is cheaper, though no less permanent, than the basic text stock used in the old format. The web offset process allows us to print illustrations on the same kind of paper used for text matter. Because advertisers have always required the possibility of illustration, the old format and technique required the use of a different, much more expensive coated stock for the advertising section. This use of two kinds of paper in the old AHR was not only costly, it was by general agreement ugly and caused more than a few crises in laying out advertising and front matter.

(b) Illustrations. The use of pictures in the text, prohibitively expensive with the old methods, is relatively inexpensive with the new. It costs much less to prepare a page of illustrative material for a web offset press than it does to set a page of type. The printer's charges for preparing illustrations have averaged around fifty to seventy-five dollars for each issue.

(c) Cost. The most expensive single issue ever produced, in terms of printing cost per copy, was that for October 1968, using the old process and format: $1.25 per copy for 432 pages of editorial text and 92 of advertising. In the report of the managing editor for 1971 it was pointed out that the average per-copy cost of the last three issues printed by letterpress in the old design was just under $.98, while the average per-copy cost of the first three issues printed by offset in the new design was just over $.93, although the general level of printing costs rose that year; the amount of material in each set of three issues was, so nearly as it can be calculated, roughly the same. Another comparison follows. Constructed on the basis of groups of five issues running from October through June, this table represents the organization of volumes prior to volume 76 rather than the present organization, which corresponds to the calendar year. But we gain in comparability over a four-year period and perhaps to some extent from the coinciding of this definition of the volume year with the AHA fiscal year.

|                      | Total pages of textper volume | Average printingcost per copy |
|----------------------|---|---|
| 1968-69              | 1828                                      | 1.06                                      |
| 1969-70 <sup>a</sup> | 1565                                      | .97                                       |
| 1970-71 <sup>b</sup> | 1634                                      | .95                                       |
| 1971-72              | 1757                                      | 1.04                                      |

<sup>a</sup> Shift to web offset printing with the issue for June 1970.

<sup>b</sup> Shift to new format with the issue for February 1971.

In summary, while printing costs have been rising, we are currently benefiting from an average printing cost per copy that is certainly no more than it was four years ago and is probably less. In terms of dollars, it is equivalent to at least a 20 per cent reduction over the four-year period. And we believe we are producing a better journal. The wisdom of our approach has been reinforced by the fact that we will have no increase in printing price in the coming year. We continue to look aggressively at new technologies and methods in a continual effort to control costs without sacrificing quality.

DESIGN ESTHETICS: There is no question but that the AHR can be produced more cheaply. Smaller type sizes could be used, but the journal would be proportionately less readable. We could use still cheaper paper, but it would not look or wear as well, and its shelf life would in all probability be limited. It is in this connection that questions of technology and economics come together with questions of design.

The change in technology dictated redesign at the earliest possible moment, to gain still further economies as well as to take fullest esthetic advantage of the new methods. By way of illustration, we may raise two questions that have been asked about the design.

(1) Are we not wasting paper on bigger pages and wide margins? When the AHR was printed in its old size on the web offset press—the issues for June through December 1970—the copies had to be trimmed down; paper was thus wasted as scrap. We now take the fullest advantage of the size of the press. This determines the margins in the length of the page. Some saving in paper could be attained by narrowing the width margins. But to do so would produce a page with a rather queer shape. The present length of the line used in printing articles is the longest the linotype machine will set, and given the type size we are using, it is also probably the longest line that the eye can tolerate readily, in purely psychological terms. If the wider margins in the articles sections are a luxury, it is a very small one and pleasing as well; practically, they make the text easier to read in a book of this size. Material other than articles is now printed in double columns and in smaller type than in the old format; this means a very considerable gain in the amount of print on the page over what we used to manage. Together with the redesign of the headings, particularly in the review section, these changes in format mean a markedly more efficient use of paper.

(2) How can we afford such a luxurious and elegant cover? The relative cheapness of using pictures has already been explained, but the glossy paper seems to stick in some readers' minds as the quintessence of extravagance. They are unaware that our paper cost for the journal itself is significantly lower than was the case in the old format, with savings that are scarcely eroded by the cost of the coated stock used for the covers. A cover for a copy of the AHR costs about a penny more than we paid for the old fraying and faded blue cover. The gain in durability is obvious, that in attractiveness should be equally obvious; and together with all our other economies they surely warrant a marginal increase in expenditure on this one item.

To sum up, one must make choices between esthetics and economics. As an editorial staff we have worked hard to understand the economic alternatives, to take the best advice available to us, and to make judgments that are sound both as to cost and as to appearance. Everyone knows that the cheapest product available is not invariably the best buy, and a cheaply produced journal is not going to attract readers, advertisers, or contributors. On this score, the new design seems to have made as well as saved money. Subscriptions have increased; the response to the coupon solicitation rose noticeably with the new design; perhaps most important of all, the level of advertising sold has held remarkably steady at a time when the publishing business has been cutting back on advertising budgets. The new printing methods, moreover, make the preparation of advertising copy easier, more flexible, and more certain; and a comparison of advertising in the new and old formats will quickly reveal how much more attractively designed the advertisements are—a direct consequence of the altered methods and design.

Even more important, the new design has proved more attractive to the AHR's audience—and not merely in an esthetic sense. The use of illustration has made it possible to attract a kind of article that would not have come to the AHR before, as it has made possible the enrichment of more traditional articles through a valuable but hitherto prohibitively expensive category of evidence. Of the truth of this statement the present issue is a remarkable confirmation. What is more, every evidence that has come into the Washington office has indicated a much higher degree of interest on the part of readers. Since the primary purpose of the AHR is scholarly communication, this last should be the only justification needed for the changes we have made, but it is pleasant to know that the better fulfillment of our central purpose could be accomplished with the added advantage of economic gain.

QUANTITY OF MATERIAL: It is apparent from the table above that the AHR, after dropping back in size in 1969, has crept steadily up again. To some extent this has been deliberate. The present editors determined to try a greater flexibility than was possible before with respect to length of articles accepted and length of book reviews. There is no doubt, at least in the managing editor's mind, that this decision is completely justified from a scholarly point of view. It has been possible to give fuller attention and argument to important books, while gaining in the use of space by increasing resort to joint reviews. The greater amplitude allowed to authors of articles has been well used. Since the size of a given issue of the AHR is committed about a year in advance of its publication, the unusually large issue (by recent measures) for October 1971 was in press before the serious situation presented by the fiscal year 1970-71 was known. Readers will note a slimming down in some current and future issues; strict limitations have been put on the length of communications; fewer review articles will be published than we had hoped; on occasion the number of articles in an issue will drop from four to three or even two, at least partly in an effort to cope with a backlog of reviews that is building up. Some economy will result, but it will not be very great: a few pages here and there do not bring about a financial revolution.

A number of more drastic possibilities have been raised by members of the AHA and have been steadily in the minds of the editors. It is important to consider what such changes, if implemented, might mean.

(1) Dropping back from five issues per year to four. To cut a yearly volume to four issues would deny the AHA some $20,000-$25,000 in advertising revenue, almost exactly the cost of printing the issue. To do that would necessitate reducing the subscription rate as well, for subscribers pay only for the AHR and cannot be asked, by means of an indirect and ill-concealed rate increase, to subsidize the activities of the AHA. But even if there were no loss of income from subscriptions, the only sure gain from dropping one issue per year would be the saving of perhaps three thousand dollars for wrapping and postage, and much of that saving would undoubtedly be eaten up by increased postage on the remaining four issues, as they would each be considerably larger. Cutting out one issue would mean no saving in staff cost. The present members of the staff—some of whom also carry responsibilities for other publications and activities of the AHA—are stretched to (or beyond) the limit in putting out five issues; putting out four somewhat larger ones would not decrease the need for labor, but would merely redistribute it slightly in the calendar. Indeed it could be argued that the best economic course for the AHR would be to keep approximately the same amount of material in a volume and move to six issues per year. But that is not feasible with the present size of staff, and it is uncertain that the additional revenue generated by a sixth issue would cover the needed additions to staff.

(2) Cut the size of the journal drastically, whatever the number of issues. To do that would effect major economies in both staff and printing costs. But it would also completely transform the nature of the journal.

(a) The number of significant broad-scale articles we publish is already at about the lowest level consistent with maintaining the journal's obligation to cover all fields of history. To impose draconian limits on the size of articles might very well mean losing articles we would otherwise get; hence, little reduction can be counted on in that area.

(b) A likely candidate for the axe would be the bibliographical service. It should be kept in mind, however, that the present lists of articles, approximately 260 pages a year, cost the member about $.65 of his dues money. Abolishing the operation would save us 10 per cent of our overall costs. But if the bibliographical function were to vanish in an economy drive, nothing would take its place in providing notification of current periodical publication. To be sure, some fields are served, with varying success, by other journals and bibliographies. But what the AHR has been doing, for all fields of history, is unique.

(c) On the reviewing side no very great saving could be accomplished by reimposing the strict four-hundred-word limit that used to obtain. Real economy in this area would arise only by moving from a comprehensive to a highly selective reviewing policy—the form of reviewing that is practiced by every other historical journal in this country. Again much would be lost: perhaps half to three-quarters of books of the kind currently reviewed would be passed over and left to specialized journals, who might in their turn pass them over or touch on them only lightly; a good many foreign books that now come only to the AHR would simply not be reviewed in this country at all. Without claiming that the reviewing in the AHR is incapable of improvement, either in coverage or quality, we insist that in its present form it provides a service that, like the bibliographical operation, is vital to scholarship.

(d) Finally, it must be remembered that there is no other journal like the AHR. If, to paraphrase, the AHR were to lose all its distinctiveness by losing half its grossness, it might lose a great deal more besides. It would be less attractive to a number of readers who prize it for its comprehensiveness, to librarians who value its service as a record, and—crucially—to advertisers. It is impossible to predict what loss of membership and subscriptions might result, but that there would be loss seems certain. That loss might very well wipe out whatever gains were made by the economies.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE?

The AHR cannot promise any windfalls to match those stemming from the change in publishers in 1969 or from the new technology and the accompanying redesign in 1970–71. The staff can promise to continue to seek economies in operation and to find ways of increasing the income that the AHR itself generates. Certain economies beyond those already mentioned are being effected for the duration of the current crisis:

(1) One of the two meetings of the board of editors has been cancelled, as it was last year, although omitting this meeting necessarily increases staff work and inhibits effective planning.

(2) Funds for staff travel have been sharply reduced, even though attendance at scholarly meetings is an important way of recruiting articles and advertising, an aid to promotion, and the best means of extending the personal acquaintance so important to the effective working of the AHR, as a broadly based journal and as the principal publication of the major scholarly association in our discipline.

(3) Some improvements in our internal operations (for example, improved organization of a sadly outdated reviewer file) are sufficiently expensive that they must be stretched out over a longer period than we anticipated two years ago.

(4) Effective this past February, the board of editors decided, with great reluctance, to do away with the modest honorarium the AHR had offered (without advertising the fact) to authors of articles. It was only five dollars per printed page, and it helped to cover some typing and postage costs for authors. But it seemed better to save two or three thousand dollars a year there than to accept the alternative of doing away with the minimum quota of reprints we provide to authors of articles.

These small sums may mount up to something useful, but they are not going to solve the AHA's problems.

The present editors and staff of the AHR have, we believe, turned in a remarkable record of improved services, greater attractiveness, and genuine economy. With a stable and highly professional staff, a clearly defined purpose, and a commanding position in the profession and in the market place, the AHR will continue, so long as its present management is concerned with it, to be a journal of the highest quality and broadest interest. It will be maintained as well at the highest possible level of efficiency, both in organization and in cost. It is of course open to the AHA to decide to alter the essential nature of the journal in favor of other activities. But that would be a decision of great complexity, with consequences that would far outrun any obvious short-run gains in money. It is hoped that this editorial will have made clear, not only the rationale and accomplishments of changes in policy implemented over the past four years, but the possible consequences of a radically different definition of the journal and of its place within the American Historical Association and the profession of history in America.

---

The Florentine Palace as Domestic Architecture

---

RICHARD A. GOLDTHWAITE

RENAISSANCE FLORENCE experienced a building boom probably more spectacular than that undergone by any other city in Europe throughout the Middle Ages. From the second half of the fourteenth century to the beginning of the sixteenth century construction was a general phenomenon throughout the city in all spheres of life—ecclesiastical, public, and private. Besides the completion of the cathedral, one of the largest churches in Christendom, with its great dome by Brunelleschi, the churches and monastic buildings of most of the dozen or so major orders in the city were largely, if not completely, remade. Almost a dozen new charitable institutions (ospedali) and many more, smaller convents were founded; and almost all the city's churches underwent some kind of architectural modification. At the same time a number of guilds erected new halls; and then, above all, there were the palazzi, the large private town houses of rich patricians, and their villas outside the city gates. All this building would be remarkable in any circumstance, but it is especially so in the case of Florence, inasmuch as the city, far from expanding, had experienced in the course of the fourteenth century such a drop in its population that by the beginning of the fifteenth century it was less than half the size it had been at the time of Dante—and it showed no signs of very dynamic growth throughout the period of the Renaissance. What is most remarkable is that this veritable building boom occurred during a period of stylistic innovation that marks one of the most glorious moments in the history of architecture.<sup>1</sup>

An earlier version of this article was delivered at a conference on the Renaissance at Wellesley College in February 1970. Additional research in Italy was made possible by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

<sup>1</sup> The subject of the building of Renaissance Florence has hardly been touched by scholarship. A good general view is to be found in Gene Brucker, Renaissance Florence (New York, 1969), ch. 1. There is nothing comparable to the treatments of the medieval Tuscan city in W. Braunfels, Mittelalterliche Stadtbaukunst in der Toscana (2d ed.; Berlin, 1959) and in Enrico Guidoni, Arte e urbanistica in Toscana, 1000-1315 (Rome, 1971); but for some provocative ideas, see P. Francastel, "Imagination et réalité dans l'architecture civile de '400," Homage à Lucien Febvre—Éventail de l'histoire vivante, 2 (Paris, 1953): 195-206. For the later sixteenth century, see Giorgio Spini, "Architettura e politica nel principato mediceo del Cinquecento," Rivista storica italiana, 33 (1971): 792-845. An impressive list of buildings attributed to the Michelozzo

Private construction was by far the major sector of this building boom; perhaps as many as a hundred palaces were built in the course of the fifteenth century. In the history of art they represent an important stage in the elevation of domestic architecture to the realm of the fine arts and the introduction of a palace style that was picked up by the rest of Italy as well as all of Europe and imitated for the next three centuries. In the history of the city it is obvious that the total effect of the building of so many such vast works of art was the transformation of the physical appearance of the medieval city into the Florence we know today. Fourteenth-century descriptions of the city hardly mention private buildings; but for Benedetto Dei, writing about 1470, they were as important as public buildings in contributing to the glory of his "Fiorenza bella";<sup>2</sup> and a half century later Varchi almost tripled Dei's list of thirty notable palaces, adding that if one were to name merely those built after Dei wrote one "would have too much to do."<sup>3</sup> For Florentines at the time all this palace building clearly had a dramatic effect on the appearance of their city.

As much of an impression as the building of palaces made on contemporaries and as prominent as the palaces are even today on the Florentine scene, they have not been big enough to impress scholars. Even as art objects, to take the most salient aspect of the palaces, they constitute what one of the best architectural historians of Florence has called a no-man's land.<sup>4</sup> Almost all such structures are anonymous as works of art; they have not even been adequately cataloged. In these circumstances it goes without saying that we know hardly anything about the evolution of palace style in the Renaissance.<sup>5</sup> From an economic point circle alone is to be found in Howard Saalman, "The Palazzo Comunale in Montepulciano: An Unknown Work by Michelozzo," Zeitschrift für Kunstgeschichte, 28 (1965): 44-46. The standard bibliographical guide to printed materials for churches and other ecclesiastical buildings is Walter and Elisabeth Paatz, Die Kirchen von Florenz (Frankfurt, 1952-55); but the catalog of buildings in general by Walther Limburger, Die Gebäude von Florenz (Leipzig, 1910), is inadequate and long outdated. It is to be hoped that the recent international effort to inventory surviving urban buildings of the Middle Ages and the early Renaissance will arouse some interest in the urban development of Florence. See Robert S. Lopez, "Enquête sur l'architecture domestique et civile," in Les constructions civiles d'intérêt public dans les villes d'Europe au Moyen Âge et sous l'Ancien Régime et leur financement (Pro Civitate, série Histoire, no. 27 [1969]), annexe, 7-12.

---

<sup>2</sup> Benedetto Dei, "Cronache," Archivio di Stato di Firenze (hereafter ASF), MSS, no. 119, fol. 34v.

<sup>3</sup> Benedetto Varchi, Storia fiorentina (Florence, 1888), bk. 9, sec. 38. Other Florentines who mention specific palaces are Francesco Baldovinetti (C. von Fabriczy, "Aus dem Gedenkbuch Francesco Baldovinetti," Repertorium für Kunstwissenschaft, 28 [1905]: 539-44); Antonio Billi (Il libro di Antonio Billi, ed. Carl Frey [Berlin, 1892]; "Il libro di Antonio Billi," ed. C. von Fabriczy, Archivio storico italiano, 7 [1891]: 299-368); and Agostino Lapini (Diario fiorentino, ed. G. Odoardo Corazzini [Florence, 1900]).

<sup>4</sup> Howard Saalman, "The Authorship of the Pazzi Palace," Art Bulletin, 46 (1964): 388.

<sup>5</sup> The catalog of Limburger with all of its inadequacies remains the most complete bibliography of printed materials; but Carocci's unpublished "Elenco degli edifizii monumentali" (1896) in the library of the Museo di Firenze com'era (shelf mark 25.D.27) is also useful. There is, however, a recent catalog of those palaces with decorated façades in Gunther and Christel Thiem, Toskanische Fassaden-Dekoration in Sgraffito und Fresko, 14. bis 17. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1964). A new series of fascicles, Tutta Firenze ieri e oggi, which began publication in of view these palaces are an even bigger unknown. The construction of so many of them represented a significant shift in investment habits of the rich and at the same time provided a considerable stimulus to the internal economy of the city; yet none of this has ever been taken up by economic historians in their continuing and for the most part fruitless debates over the state of the Florentine economy.<sup>6</sup> Finally, the palace remains as big an unknown as a social phenomenon with respect to its function as a home—and what was a palace after all if not a home? It is the social aspect of the palace that is the subject of this article, and I offer it as the prolegomenon to the study of the palace not as an art object that marked a new era in taste but as a home that performed a new function in society.

Fig. 1. This detail of Bonsignori's aerial view of Florence in the late sixteenth century shows quite clearly how little built up some areas were, even those right in the center of the city. Photograph: Alinari.

IN THE COMMUNAL ERA the distinguishing feature of a great family's presence in the city was the concentration of the households of its various members in the same vicinity so that the family as a whole had a geographic identity in the city.<sup>7</sup> The great monuments of private architecture were in fact those structures that represented the families' collective public status and expressed their outward involvement in communal affairs. These structures were principally the great towers, where families defended themselves in their violent feuds with one another, and the open loggias on the streets, where residents assembled for public ceremonies in more tranquil times. The tower and the loggia served important public functions for the communal consorteria and symbolized its broad sociability and its internal cohesion in an era when public authority was still very feeble; and they were the focus of the family's location in the city. Even after the heyday of tower building, however, "new" families still tended to cluster together as they proliferated and grew in importance in business and politics. The Strozzi, for instance, at the opening of the fourteenth century bought up properties concentrated in the area of the present piazza Strozzi, including the piazza itself, which was bound by agreements among all the Strozzi to be preserved forever as their property;<sup>8</sup>

1971, is providing the popular market with a very full photographic coverage of palaces; another series has begun with Mario Bucci and Raffaello Bencini, Palazzi di Firenze, introduzione all'architettura. Quartiere S. Croce (Florence, 1971). This is not the place to present a full bibliography of the literature on the purely stylistic problems of Florentine palaces; but for two different general interpretations see Walter Paatz, "Ein antiker Stadthauptypus im mittelalterlichen Italien," Römisches Jahrbuch für Kunstgeschichte, 3 (1939): 129-40, and Bernhard Patzak, Palast und Villa in Toscana: Versuch einer Entwicklungsgeschichte (Leipzig, 1912-13).

<sup>6</sup> In Florence it was in the construction industry and woodworking (which would include furniture) that the artisan class showed the greatest growth between 1352 and 1551. Pietro Battara, La popolazione di Firenze alla metà del '500 (Florence, 1935), 85.

<sup>7</sup> An attempt to locate these family areas in the thirteenth century has been made by F. J. Carmody, "Florence: Project for a Map, 1250-1296," Speculum, 19 (1944): 39-49.

<sup>8</sup> There are a few surviving fragmentary records of the purchase of parts of the piazza by several Strozzi in 1326, along with a seventeenth-century copy of their agreement to maintain and the area became permanently identified with their presence. In the earlier period these family residential areas may have been something like great compounds, even architecturally enclosing the entire family and offering the possibility of being sealed off in times of public unrest. The sixteenth-century aerial view of the city by Bonsignori in which formal arches serve as entrance-ways to some side streets suggests that areas that may have corresponded to the concentration of residences of particular families achieved identity through architecture. With the possible exception of the so-called loggia of the Cerchi, no such archways survive today in Florence (although in Venice such structures can still be seen).<sup>9</sup>

Towers, loggias, family residential concentrations—these were the features of private architecture in the era of the commune. Individual buildings or palaces, although sometimes quite large, were not in themselves prominent monuments. Contemporaries do not even bother to mention them in their descriptions of the city.<sup>10</sup> Such buildings had little of what can properly be termed style; hence they lacked esthetic identity. Façades were often made of rusticated stone, but there was little variety and a minimum of decorative elements. At the street level there was usually a row of arched openings for entrances and shops (archi da bottega, as they are referred to in the documents) that ran continuously from building to building, so that the identity of each was somewhat lost in the continuity of the motif. Furthermore, to judge from the literary evidence of their destruction by fire and flood, riot and political vendetta, these earlier buildings could not have been very substantial structures. The worst fire was the holocaust of 1304, which, according to Villani, destroyed more than 1,700 buildings; and we have more than his testimony for the disaster wrought by the flood of 1333, which swept away almost everything along the river. Especially serious was the threat of fire, which was so ever-present that Paolo da Certaldo advised keeping large sacks and rope about the house so that when the alarm came one could collect his personal possessions and make a quick escape. The threat of political violence was just as serious: how often it is that the political annals tell us about the destruction by mob action of the houses of men whose political fortunes had gone awry. Considering all these it always as a piazza, with a 1,000 florin penalty to whomever might build on it. ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 3, no. 123, fol. 66; no. 191, fols. 4–12. There are records of the acquisition of properties in this area by the Strozzi going back to the beginning of the fourteenth century; earlier than this they apparently were not concentrated there. See the plan of Carmody, "Florence: Project for a Map," passim.

<sup>9</sup> An architectural description of Florence about 1300 (with bibliography) has recently been made by Ugo Procacci in the Enciclopedia dantesca, 2 (Rome, 1970): s.v. "Firenze: l'aspetto urbano di Firenze dai tempi di Cacciaguida a quelli di Dante."

<sup>10</sup> The only private palace mentioned by these early chroniclers is that of the Tossinghi, which is described impressively by Malispini: "alto novanta braccia, fatto a colonnelli di marmo, e una torre con esso alta braccia centotrenta"; but it was destroyed in 1239, and considering the problems of dating Malispini's chronicle we can hardly be sure about the accuracy of the description. See Patzak, Palast und Villa in Toscana, vol. 1, bk. 1: 58, where there is a fanciful reconstruction of the palace.

Fig. 2, left. The palaces of the Mozzi family, which probably have undergone much re-finishing on the exterior, are among the few that survive from an earlier period. With their series of arches at street level, their unadorned façades, and the base of a tower, they represent something of the anonymity of the architecture of earlier palaces. Photograph: Alinari.

Fig. 3, below. Domenico Veneziano's A Miracle of St. Zenobius, a mid-fifteenth-century street scene. Notice the extensive use of wood buttressing (sporti) for protruding upper floors and roofs, a particularly hazardous feature that contributed to the prevalence of fires in the earlier period. Reproduced by permission of the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge.

aspects of their vulnerability it is not difficult to conclude that many of these medieval buildings could not have been the structures their successors were. The fifteenth-century biographer of Brunelleschi, looking back to the historical antecedents of the new palace style of his own era, was probably right in commenting that "during that period the method of building was very crude as may be observed in contemporary and earlier buildings."<sup>11</sup>

These earlier private buildings not only lacked structural monumentality and esthetic identity, but for the most part they had no precise functional identity. They must have been very much like the modern Italian palazzo, with shops below and apartments within. With the commercial activity of the shops at street level and stairways that opened directly onto the streets there was a constant penetration of street life into the palace, so that the private and public worlds were not so clearly demarcated. Within the palace ownership was frequently divided; and shops, apartments, and even single rooms could be held by a number of different parties not necessarily of the same family.<sup>12</sup> Buildings, therefore, did not identify single private residences; and conversely, the private household—even that of a patrician—did not necessarily have an architectural identity. When the very wealthy Messer Pagolo di Baccuccio Vettori wrote out in his diary a description of his house, he found that it was structurally all jumbled up with his neighbor's, with common walls, shared loggias, and division by floors—and he apparently was not very sure of being able to get an agreement on what the division actually was.<sup>13</sup> A century later Bartolomeo di Tommaso Sassetti (brother of Francesco, the rich business associate of the Medici) inherited the family house, or palace, as he calls it; but it was hardly a very private and distinct building. When the brothers divided it a room that should have remained part of the house somehow went instead to Francesco's house next door. Moreover, the window of an adjacent house was situated in Barto-

<sup>11</sup> Antonio Manetti, The Life of Brunelleschi, ed. Howard Saalman (College Park, Pa., 1971), 40 (commenting on Brunelleschi's first palace, for Apollonio Lapi).

<sup>12</sup> This vagueness about the identity of a building is frequently encountered in the tax declarations of the catasto. There it was customary to describe property in the city by identifying all contiguous properties; and when a declarant listed, for example, a shop that he may have owned in a larger building, he may not have described it as being in the building but may merely have listed the owners of the adjacent properties, whether or not they were other parts of the building. In such a case the fact that the shop was in a larger building would only emerge (if at all) from information on other declarations. This is a major obstacle to using catasto records to reconstruct the city as it appeared in the fifteenth century.

<sup>13</sup> "Ricordanza che addì xv di febraio cccxviii io Pagolo Vettori feci una scritta di mia mano a Capponcino che la pancha e'l tetto della loggia che passa il mio pilastro del muro è in su quello di Capponcino; e il muro della loggia della corte come tiene la loggia e la sala insino al bordone della sala è tutto del detto Capponcino, e dal bordone in su è tutto mio tanto quanto tiene la mia casa, e dinanzi dov'è la loggia è tutto mio il muro infino a' merli; e a ogni sua petizione debbo levare ciò che io tengo del suo e'l simile de' fare a nme di sgonbrare dove lui achupassi [sic] del mio"; but then he added out at the side, "non ebbe la scritta da nme." ASF, Carte Riccardi, no. 521 (ricordi of Messer Pagolo di Baccuccio Vettori, 1331-77), fol. 26r. Besides this residence, which was in the parish of San Jacopo sopr'Arno, Vettori possessed five other houses in the city and seventy-eight rural properties. Ibid., fols. 18r-20r.

lomeo's courtyard, and it was possible to enter his house from the window.<sup>14</sup> A product of the fifteenth century, when standards of privacy were more highly developed than they had been in the previous century, Sassetti eventually bought up these other properties precisely so he could close himself off in his own residence. But in the fourteenth century it must not have been unusual for even the rich and powerful to live in such an architectural hodgepodge. There may in fact be some basis in Trecento architectural reality for that marvelous sense of space in the Decameron where the continual flow of characters in and out of bedrooms and houses almost defies a definition of privacy.

It is not until the second half of the fourteenth century that the palace begins to come into its own as a distinctive and more conspicuous monument with a clearer stylistic and functional definition. In fact, although archeological research is still lacking, the few palaces traditionally considered medieval are very likely to have actually been built (or much rebuilt) after the Black Death. In any case, the pace of building increased toward the end of the century; and in contrast to the anonymous buildings of an earlier era the homes men now built slowly assumed something of the individuality of minor works of art. Unfortunately that process has never been subjected to a careful morphological analysis. It seems to have begun with the esthetic isolation of façades from their neighbors by emphasis of the principal entrance and eventually by elimination of all other openings at the street level. Slowly over the next century more possibilities were developed for treatment of the entire façade, usually with a complex system of rustication or contrasting use of intonaco and stone, but sometimes with an elaborate surface decoration in fresco or sgraffito; and there was more conscious use of decorative elements such as string lines, window moldings, cornices, and even pilasters. Inside, too, there were innovations, notably interior vaulted staircases, the opening up of a large rectangular courtyard surrounded by arcaded porticos and loggias, and the beginning of systematic planning of internal space. With such ideas as these—all expressed with an increasingly classical vocabulary—architects were finally able to endow the private Florentine home with what can properly be called style.

Another dramatic feature of these new homes is the scale on which they were built. There were of course very large medieval palaces (if one is to accept the traditional but dubious dating of some surviving buildings), but even the average Renaissance palace is an extraordinarily massive building for a home, a social fact not usually commented on by art historians. Henry James, for one, was struck by the sheer height of the structures; four centuries after they were built he could still write that they were "the tallest habitations in Europe that are frankly and amply habitations—not mere shafts for machinery of the American grain-elevator pattern.” They are so beautifully proportioned that we can easily overlook the fact that their usual elevation of three stories is two, perhaps even three, times the height of three-story buildings in our less spacious (and less well proportioned) age. Their horizontal extent is no less impressive. As we know from tax records (the catasto) in almost all cases each palace replaced three or more pre-existing structures, usually including the former family residence. Some, in fact, were not altogether new constructions but primarily new façades behind which several older buildings were simply thrown into a single residence. Virtually all had a large open interior space in the form of an arcaded courtyard; and many originally had private gardens attached to them, even those in the center of the city—so many that both Dei and Varchi considered the fact worth mentioning as a distinguishing characteristic of the Florence they were describing.<sup>15</sup>

<sup>14</sup> ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 5, no. 1750 (accounts and ricordanze of Bartolomeo di Tommaso Sassetti, 1455-71), fols. 181 left, 184 left.

The Renaissance palace, in short, represented the esthetic identification of the private home and at the same time a dramatic enlargement of residential space. These buildings were more significant structurally as well. Looking at this new generation of palaces today it is hard to imagine that flood or fire or even the will of an infuriated mob could do much damage to them, and indeed by the fifteenth century we do not hear anything more about this kind of destruction in the annals of the city. It can be no accident that they increasingly come to be called palaces, not simply houses—“a house, or rather a palace,” as they are described time and time again by their owners in tax declarations and private accounts. According to Varchi they were veritable palaces, which had “all the ornaments and all the comforts that houses can have, such as terraces, loggias, stables, courtyards, hallways and rooms, and above all”—he concludes on a more practical note—“if not two, at least one well with healthy and fresh water.”<sup>16</sup> And the very word palazzo was generally reserved by the architectural theorists only for the homes of princes.

One could speculate on the urban shift, as we would call it today, that must have occurred with the building of palaces throughout the city. To the extent that they replaced former commercial space, the building of so many of them must have had a considerable total effect on the dislocation of local commerce, so that in those areas where palaces were concentrated—contemporary observers singled out the via Maggio, the via dei Servi, the via Tornabuoni, and borgo Pinti—the bustle of street life must have been appreciably reduced. A good example of this transformation is the piazza Strozzi. Although since the early Trecento this was the nucleus of the great Strozzi clan, it was also a busy urban area, full of many modest houses and shops of all kinds. In the mid-fifteenth

<sup>15</sup> Dei, “Cronache,” fols. 29r–35v; Varchi, Storia fiorentina, bk. 9.

<sup>16</sup> Storia fiorentina, bk. 9, sec. 38.

Fig. 4, above. The Castellani palace, built in the second half of the fourteenth century (and later enlarged), represents a stage in the development of increased esthetic identification of the palace. Besides the somewhat irregular arched openings, the principal entrance becomes the central focus of the building; and the rustication of the lower level is an additional embellishment. Photograph: Alinari.

Fig. 5, below. The Pazzi palace, with its contrasting use of rustication and intonaco and its richly decorated window moldings. Photograph: Alinari.

Fig. 6, above. Some idea of the scale of Florentine palaces can be had from this comparison of a ten-story modern building and two palaces, the Bartolini (left) (from Grandjean di Montigny and Famin), about the average size of Florentine palaces, and half the short side of the Strozzi (right) (after Stegmann and Geymüller), the largest of fifteenth-century palaces (cf. fig. 8). Rendering by Implementation, Baltimore.

Fig. 7, below. The Corsi palace, whose size is typical of Florentine palaces. Its façade, a combination of intonaco and stone, represents one of the characteristic stylistic types. The palace has no more than a dozen rooms, but notice its size with respect to neighboring buildings. Photograph: Brogi-Alinari.

century Palla di Palla Strozzi cleared out over a half dozen of these small houses (casette, casolari) to erect the palace known as the Strozzi; a generation later Filippo di Matteo Strozzi transformed several more into a small palace, and by the end of the century over a dozen different kinds of shops (along with three buildings identified as patrician residences, one complete with tower) were replaced by the great Strozzi palace.<sup>17</sup> Altogether, the building of these three palaces, not to mention a few others in the same square, removed considerable street activity from the vicinity and transformed it into a patrician residential center. A more notable instance is the via Maggio, which in the fourteenth century was one of the two principal centers of the flourishing wool business, the single most important industrial activity in the Florentine economy. In the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries it became lined with the great palaces that even today make it one of the most authentic Renaissance streets that survive in all Florence, and with their construction the bustling trade was removed from the area. One observer tells us that these palaces in the via Maggio displaced sixty wool shops, and by the mid-sixteenth century only five remained in the entire Oltrarno quarter.<sup>18</sup> The new palace style, therefore, not only detached the private residence from street activity but in some cases at least led to a removal of much of that activity from the vicinity, which thereby became more strictly residential. In a sense the Renaissance palace was a kind of coagulant that reduced the fluidity of medieval urban life with its continual interpenetration of the public and private spheres.

With this newly gained aloof presence on the Florentine scene the patrician residence moved into its own as the characteristic monument of private architecture; and if this was the consequence of the withdrawal of the family into a new realm of privacy, so the same social process of involution led to the obsolescence of those earlier patrician monuments that had formerly symbolized the family's active outward involvement in the public affairs of the commune—the tower and the loggia. The towers had for the most part disappeared by the fourteenth century primarily as a result of the emergence of a new concept of public authority and the government's deliberate policy of tearing them down in order to reduce the political and military might of the clan. On the other hand, the loggia, the public assembly point for the family, simply became outmoded as the family itself dissolved.<sup>19</sup> One sixteenth-century chronicler implies that by his time the loggia was no longer being used;<sup>20</sup> and as far as we know only two of the new projects for palaces in the Renaissance included loggias. The corner of the Medici palace originally opened as a loggia—although the Medici, of course, are never the appropriate example of patrician practice in general; one could argue that their public prominence makes them the exception that proves the rule. Still, in the early sixteenth century even they enclosed their loggia. The other example is the loggia of the Rucellai across the street from the palace designed by Alberti. Built by the most prominent private builder in Renaissance Florence after Cosimo de' Medici, the Rucellai loggia was erected on the occasion of a marriage between the two families.<sup>21</sup> It is, however, perhaps the last loggia to have been constructed. When in the early sixteenth century Varchi drew up a list of surviving loggias there were only twenty-six names on it.<sup>22</sup> It can be ascertained that clearly a third of those had nothing to do with palace projects in the fifteenth century, and there is no evidence that it was otherwise with the rest. Loggias simply had no more function in the life of the patrician family, many of whom walled up these areas to use them for other purposes. In the later sixteenth century they were considered signs of ancient family nobility by some men who looked with nostalgia on these outmoded and disappearing family monuments of a past age. Hence, when a Frescobaldi heiress closed up her family's loggia in order to make space for four shops, she was accused of avarice and of putting utility before honor and respect for ancient tradition.<sup>23</sup> Sentiment, however, could not revive practicality. By the end of the century Borghini, commenting on the nobility of these family monuments, was able to discern only fourteen, and of these at least six had already been walled up or were in ruins.<sup>24</sup> Public assembly in the streets was obviously a thing of the past for the patrician family, just as it no longer had need for mass defensive action in its towers. The new symbol of its status was now the residence itself.

<sup>17</sup> The property descriptions in the catasto declarations of Palla di Palla Strozzi (not Messer Palla di Nofri, as they are identified by Fabriczy) are published by Cornelius von Fabriczy, in "Michelozzo di Bartolomeo," Jahrbuch der königlich preuss. Kunstsammlungen, 25 (1904), Beiheft, 102-04. Properties replaced by the palace of Filippo Strozzi are listed in Guido Pampaloni, Palazzo Strozzi (Rome, 1963), 44n.

<sup>18</sup> "Di poi insino a questo anno 1520 in via maggio semurato molte chiese bellissime elevato via piu di sessanta botteghe darte dilana ghrosse vi si faceva." Baldovinetti, "Memoriale," 543. For the distribution of wool shops in the mid-sixteenth century see Pietro Battara, "Botteghe e pigioni nella Firenze del '500: un censimento industriale e commerciale all'epoca del granducato mediceo," Archivio storico italiano, 95 (1937), pt. 2: 9.

<sup>19</sup> For general remarks on loggias, see Guido Carocci et al., Il centro di Firenze: studi storici

HOW DO WE EXPLAIN why men felt the urge to build on such a grand scale? Perhaps it is obvious that, in part at least, the phenomenon can be explained as the desire for public display of private status; and if it

e ricordi artistici (Florence, 1900), 49-53; Marco Tabarrini, "Le consorterie nella storia fiorentina del medio evo," La vita italiana nel Trecento (Milan, 1904), 115-16; Attilio Schiaparelli, La casa fiorentina e i suoi arredi nei secoli XIV e XV (Florence, 1908), 67-72; and Patzak, Palast und Villa in Toscana, vol. 1, bk. 1:39.

<sup>20</sup> "Nelle loggie, che in questi tempi qualche poco ancor si frequentavano." Filippo Nerli, Commentari dei fatti civili occorsi dentro la città di Firenze dall'anno 1215 al 1537 (Florence, 1859), 1: 62.

<sup>21</sup> Thiem, Toskanische Fassaden-Dekoration, 69-70.

<sup>22</sup> Storia fiorentina, bk. 9, sec. 40.

<sup>23</sup> "Con molto biasimo d'avarizia d'una gentildonna di quella famiglia, antepoendo l'utile all'honore e al mantenimento della memoria di tanta antichità." Baccio Cecchi, "Memorie," ed. I. Del Badia, Miscellanea fiorentina di erudizione e storia, 1 (1902): 37.

<sup>24</sup> "Delle famiglie nobili fiorentini," ASF, MSS., no. 190, doc. 3.

is not surprising from the point of view of our consumer-oriented society that rich men engaged in such conspicuous consumption, it is something strikingly new in the history of moral thought that now intellectuals broke out of the context of the medieval world and actually sought to justify such spending on moral grounds. In an earlier era extravagant spending was something writers warned against, either because it was improper in a Christian society inspired by Franciscan ideals and on its guard against excessive materialism or (perhaps more realistically in the competitive business community of Florence) because it simply was too dangerous to expose one to the jealousy and envy of other men. The anonymous fourteenth-century Florentine merchant who said that "spending a lot and making a big impression are in themselves too dangerous" offered the kind of advice that is typical of his age.<sup>25</sup> At the beginning of the fifteenth century, however, the humanists introduced a new civic ethic; they rejected traditional ideals of Franciscan poverty and worked out instead an explicit moral justification for private wealth.<sup>26</sup> Drawing heavily on Aristotle's ideas about magnificence and the good man, they praise wealth precisely because it gives man the wherewithal to express his status publicly. Leon Battista Alberti and Matteo Palmieri in their moral tracts could still counsel against extravagant expenditures and call for personal economy, although their arguments were slightly different from those of their medieval predecessors; but when it comes to building, an altogether new attitude is introduced. "The magnificence of the buildings," says Alberti, talking about houses, "should be adapted to the dignity of the owner."<sup>27</sup> And Palmieri warns that "he who would want . . . to build a house resembling the magnificent ones of noble citizens would deserve blame if first he has not reached or excelled their virtue."<sup>28</sup> "But since all agree," concludes Alberti, "that we should endeavor to leave a reputation behind us, not only for our wisdom but our power too, for this reason . . . we erect great structures, that our posterity may suppose us to have been great persons."<sup>29</sup>

Alberti was right; in Florence building did become a measure of a man's greatness. Giovanni Rucellai, one of the wealthiest merchants and most vigorous builders in mid-fifteenth-century Florence, was explicit on the point: "I think I have given myself more honor, and my soul more satisfaction, by having spent money than by having earned it, above all

<sup>25</sup> "Troppe male circhunstanzie à in sè il tenere grande stato e fare grande spese." Gino Corti, ed., "Consigli sulla mercatura di un anonimo trecentista," Archivio storico italiano, 111 (1952): 118. See also Robert S. Lopez and Irving W. Raymond, eds., Medieval Trade in the Mediterranean World (New York, 1955), 423.

<sup>26</sup> Hans Baron, "Franciscan Poverty and Civic Wealth as Factors in the Rise of Humanistic Thought," Speculum, 13 (1938): 1-37.

<sup>27</sup> Ten Books on Architecture, trans. James Leoni (ed. Joseph Rykwert; London, 1955), bk. 9, ch. 1.

<sup>28</sup> "Chi sequitasse e valesse assimigliare le magnifiche case de' nobili cittadini, merita biasimo se prima non ha aggiunte o superate le sue virtù." La vita civile (Bologna, 1944), 164.

<sup>29</sup> Ten Books on Architecture, bk. 9, ch. 1.

with regard to the building I have done."<sup>30</sup> Furthermore, what is it that Florentines talk about when they discuss the art patronage of their fellow citizens? Building, almost exclusively. For the adulators of Cosimo de' Medici his building projects were the best proof of the magnificence of the man; and commentators from Vespasiano to Machiavelli hardly mention anything else with respect to Medici patronage in general.<sup>31</sup> It is impossible to find any comment in the chronicles and histories of the period on men's patronage either of sculpture or of painting, the puny private arts; but when men built they made an impression on their fellows and on history, not only with the buildings themselves but in written commentary about them. Furthermore, despite popular myths it was the patron not the artist who made the impression. In his highly laudatory biography of his father, Lorenzo di Filippo Strozzi puts particular emphasis on Filippo's building projects but never once bothers to mention an architect's name—not even that of Cronaca, the creator of the Strozzi palace, whom Lorenzo, a man of great learning and interest in the arts, knew well.<sup>32</sup> In fact, before Vasari there is hardly a contemporary attribution for any of these Florentine palaces, including the Medici and even the Pitti, which was immediately recognized as one of the great landmarks of the city. Palaces were seen not as creations of artists but as monuments to their builders' magnificence.

The personal splendor these palaces conferred on their builders was amplified by the hope that the structures were to be the monumental foundation of the dynasty that was to extend from the builders themselves. Filippo Strozzi was obsessed with the concern that his great monument be forever exclusively the residence of his family, and in his exceptionally lengthy testament he rambles on in tortuous detail to anticipate all contingencies in the line of his descent to make sure that it would always remain Strozzi property and would never be alienated.<sup>33</sup> Giovanni Rucellai was less verbose but just as insistent that his palace was always to belong to someone with the name Rucellai ("genie seu stirpe vel consorteria de oricellaris") and was never to be alienated or even rented. He was particularly adamant in his insistence that whatever happened the palace was under no circumstances to belong to any other Florentine family; in the case of the extinction of the Rucellai the building was to pass to the commune to be used (appropriately) as the residence of an ambassador of a foreign prince—provided that he not be

<sup>30</sup> Giovanni Rucellai ed il suo zibaldone, vol. 1: Il zibaldone quaresimale, ed. Alessandro Perosa (London, 1960), 118.

<sup>31</sup> See A. D. Fraser Jenkins, "Cosimo de' Medici's Patronage of Architecture and the Theory of Magnificence," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes, 33 (1970): 162-70, and also Rab Hatfield, "Some Unknown Descriptions of the Medici Palace in 1459," Art Bulletin, 52 (1970): 240-41.

<sup>32</sup> Vita di Filippo Strozzi il Vecchio scritta da Lorenzo suo figlio, ed. Giuseppe Bini and Pietro Bigazzi (Florence, 1851).

<sup>33</sup> ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 5, no. 1221.

Florentine or of Florentine origin!<sup>34</sup> By the sixteenth century a man could best satisfy dynastic ambitions by building a palace; as it was expressed by Michelangelo, who wanted perhaps nothing more from his spectacular career than to re-establish the fallen patrician status of his family in Florence, "a noble house in the city brings considerable honor, being more visible than all one's possessions, and because we are citizens descended from the noblest of lines."<sup>35</sup> Most of the great palaces built in the later sixteenth century were in fact built by those men whose status had been newly established by the grand dukes.

As Michelangelo observed, palaces gave visibility to the status of a family, and to leave no doubt of their identity they were endowed with sure signs of their ownership. Façades proudly bore the coats of arms of their owners; and in some the armorial bearings of the family and even the personal devices of their builders were worked into the very fabric of the structure as decorative motifs. The Pazzi dolphins, for example, constitute the principal element of the capitals and corbels of that family's palace; on the stairway of his, Giuliano Gondi put a modified form of his private insignia on the faces of each of the step ends;<sup>36</sup> and running all the way across the façade of the Rucellai palace are the sails of fortune that had such a personal symbolic importance for Giovanni, its builder.<sup>37</sup> Undoubtedly the most exaggerated case of palatial flouting of ownership is the Strozzi palace, where the Strozzi moons appear everywhere—in the spandrels of the windows, incised on virtually every piece of iron on the façade, worked into the interior corbels (along with falcons and sheep, the builder's own personal devices). Furthermore, a horoscope was cast for the Strozzi palace to determine the propitious moment to begin its construction; an elaborate ceremony celebrated the occasion and a medal was struck to commemorate it. And it may be that such rituals accompanied the construction of other palaces, endowing them with a kind of mystic personality that loomed behind the public symbols of their identity.

In a society of entrepreneurs, where personal magnificence and dynastic ambitions could find such conspicuous public expression, where the competitive instinct must have taken its own course once men started to build, how was the proud patrician to resist the challenge? An ambassador from Venice was impressed with the amounts of money being spent by the Florentines, who, he says, were building on the heels

<sup>34</sup> ASF, Notarile antecosimiano, L 130, no. 31. My thanks to Rab Hatfield for this reference. Cf. Il zibaldone quaresimale, 144.

<sup>35</sup> "Perchè una casa onorevole nella città fa onore assai, perchè si vede più che non fanno le possessioni, e perchè noi sian pure cittadini discesi di nobilissima stirpe," cited in Ugo Procacci, ed., La casa Buonarroti a Firenze (Florence, 1965), 6.

<sup>36</sup> See John Pope-Hennessy, Catalogue of Italian Sculpture in the Victoria and Albert Museum, 1 (London, 1964): 183–87.

<sup>37</sup> Aby Warburg, "Le ultime volontà di Francesco Sassetti," in La rinascita del paganesimo antico (Florence, 1966), 236.

of one another at such a pace that some who had only 60 or 70 florins income in cash might spend as much as 6,000 or 7,000 florins or more for a palace in the countryside.<sup>38</sup> Although apparently he was talking about villas and his figures (and ratios) are exaggerated, he must have sensed something of the building craze Florence was experiencing at the time. The palace of the average patrician—to judge from the evidence of accounts and ricordi—had a book value of between 1,500 and 2,500 florins, which could have represented as much as fifty per cent of his total estate. The really big ones, of course, cost much more—Filippo Strozzi (and his heirs) paid almost 40,000 florins for what was probably the most expensive in the city (equal to over a thousand times the annual salary of a highly skilled workman),<sup>39</sup> and this represented over a third of his total wealth. The builders of some of the most famous of these palaces, however, were not so fortunate as to be rich enough, or secure enough, to afford the luxury of indulging in the new fad of trying to make an impression. For all his smug satisfaction, Giovanni Rucellai did not finish his palace, which after all was primarily no more than a façade. Giuliano Gondi made all Florence sit up and take notice of the new palace he started building in 1489, but he was not able to get it half built (and it stood unfinished until the nineteenth century). Bono Boni presumably finished his in the mid-1460s, but within a decade he was bankrupt and had to sell it.<sup>40</sup> And so with other builders, like Lorenzo de' Larione, who had to sell his on the heels of bankruptcy,<sup>41</sup> and Bartolomeo Barbadori, whose burden of debts forced him to halt construction.<sup>42</sup> It is surprising how many of these palaces changed hands within a generation of their construction; one suspects that in these cases the family fortune was simply not up to the drain of capital a palace required. Nevertheless, it is in this context of competitive, extravagant, and sometimes wreckless egotism that we can partly understand the scale on which these men built as well as their awakening consciousness of style.

The building of palaces appears all the more extravagant when one considers that the inflation of space they represented had a minimum economic value almost entirely limited to its importance for the household economy of the family. To be sure, the rooms on the ground floor might have included an office for the commercial and banking business of the owner, and to this extent he saved something in rent. Datini's

<sup>38</sup> Relazioni degli ambasciatori veneti al senato, ed. Arnaldo Segarizzi (Bari, 1912-16), 3, pt. 1: 19.

<sup>39</sup> Obviously even approximate equivalents of the dollar and the florin cannot be made; but the cost of the Strozzi palace in relation to today's skilled worker's income of ten thousand dollars would be ten million dollars.

<sup>40</sup> Today Palazzo Antinori. Maddalena Trionfi Honorati, "Il palazzo degli Antinori," Antichità viva, 7 (1968), no. 2: 65-80 (based on unpublished research of Guido Pampaloni).

<sup>41</sup> Today Palazzo Canigiani, via de' Bardi, 28/30. Saalman, "The Authorship of the Pazzi Palace," 391n.

<sup>42</sup> Manetti, The Life of Brunelleschi, 99.

office (but not his fondaco), for instance, was on the ground floor of his palace, as was the scrittoio of many other merchant bankers, to judge from surviving inventories. But if in addition to these financial interests a patrician had warehouses or shops that were used for industrial production, for the manufacture of silk or wool cloth—and most Florentine patricians probably had investments in such establishments—these were not located on residential premises; they were located elsewhere and sometimes the owner even paid rent for the shop rather than turn over a part of his home for its operation. Furthermore, it was not likely that any space in these palaces was rented out. The earliest of them still had shops that opened onto the street for commercial use, but as palace style evolved these were excluded. To judge from a comment of Lorenzo Strozzi's such an arrangement was considered a blight on the beauty of the building as well as an inconvenience for the owner.<sup>43</sup> Moreover, no interior space was rented as living quarters, and we have no evidence that these palaces were used then as most are used today, as apartment houses. As a matter of fact, in those cases where the entire palace was later rented out, usually as a result of difficulties among heirs or the absence from Florence of the owner, the income was so small that it would have been an insignificant return on the total capital outlay represented by the building. In the 1490s the Antinori (then Martelli) palace was rented for between eighty and a hundred ducats a year;<sup>44</sup> in the middle of the following century half the Strozzi palace (it was built as two residences) was offered for rent at forty-five florins;<sup>45</sup> and a few years later the Corbinelli rented one of their palaces in the via Maggio to Bianca Cappello for fifty florins.<sup>46</sup> At a time when eight per cent was a normal return on an investment these rents would have represented a capital investment of 500 to 1,000 florins, hardly anything like the building costs of such structures.

This extraordinarily low rental potential meant that the market value of a palace was a very nebulous matter. At the end of the sixteenth century, for example, when the Pazzi palace was sold to Lorenzo di Carlo Strozzi, the price was no easy thing to determine. Several consultants were called in. One based his calculation on the capitalization of its net rental value of 180 scudi (after taxes and maintenance expenses) at three per cent. Three per cent was a very low return on an investment for a Florentine, even in the late sixteenth century, and it was obviously used

<sup>43</sup> "Disegnando di fare sotto la casa molte botteghe per entrate dei suoi figliuoli: il che arditamente gli era contradetto, mostrando di quanta bruttezza, servità e incommodo saria alli abitatori." Vita di Filippo Strozzi, 25.

<sup>44</sup> Owned then by Carlo d'Ugolino Martelli. ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 5, no. 1468 (accounts and ricordi of Luigi d'Ugolino Martelli, 1489-92), fol. 108r; no. 1469 (accounts of Luigi d'Ugolino Martelli, 1492-93), fol. 11.

<sup>45</sup> ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 5, no. 136 (accounts and ricordanze of Palla di Lorenzo di Filippo Strozzi, 1552-55), fols. 204r-208v.

<sup>46</sup> Illustratore fiorentina, calendario storico, 1906, ed. G. Carocci, 27-29.

to push the value as high as possible; yet the resulting figure of 6,000 scudi was so ridiculous that the assessors, "considering the nobility of the site and its beauty as well as other things," arbitrarily increased it by one-third to 8,000 scudi. On the other hand, a detailed builder's estimate of replacement costs drawn up for the same purpose put a value of 11,900 scudi on the structure, a remarkable sum considering the fact that inflated labor costs in the second half of the sixteenth century probably meant that the building could not have been built for even that figure.<sup>47</sup> In 1659 the Medici palace was sold to the Riccardi for 40,000 ducats, about the same price it had cost to build two centuries earlier, but as a result of inflation the sale price represented only half the value of the original building cost. Moreover, the Riccardi spent close to three times again that amount (116,623 ducats) to enlarge it to its present size.<sup>48</sup> Not only was the rental value of a palace very low, but its resale value was hardly equal to its cost. The enormous structures, in short, were utterly nonproductive as investments.

Although these palaces are to be seen as one of the most flagrant examples of conspicuous consumption by the bourgeoisie that Europe had known up to that time, the intellectuals, the so-called civic humanists, were nevertheless able to find a higher social justification for all this private energy. Above selfish interests there was the common good, and the purely selfish objective could be justified by regarding the total effect such generous and magnificent expenditures had for the embellishment of the city as a whole. It was Palmieri's view that "although made by individuals it is nonetheless better to treat [such buildings] as communal utilities rather than as private comforts, because they are very important for the universal ornament of the city and they compose the beauty of the city."<sup>49</sup> One could say that this is nothing but the medieval virtue of largesse now given a purely esthetic outlet. Most palaces were self-contained projects, but at least a few were planned more dramatically, in a setting that reached out beyond the buildings themselves to reorganize the immediate vicinity. For instance, we know now that there were plans for a large square next to the Medici palace on which Brunelleschi's church of San Lorenzo also would have opened.<sup>50</sup> Similarly Filippo Strozzi's plans to build his huge palace included widening the street, opening a piazza, and possibly incorporating the façade of a nearby church in which he had already shown considerable interest. At any rate (if we are to believe his son) Strozzi was able to plan for such an impressive structure in the first place only by playing up to Lorenzo de' Medici's expressed desire to have the city adorned with such beautiful and magnificent buildings.<sup>51</sup> The great Pitti palace, now expanded almost beyond recognition of its original appearance, was deliberately perched on high ground with a piazza to set it off; and the success of this plan is evident in all the early views of the city, where it indeed appears "more resplendent even than Monte Morello," to quote a contemporary bit of poetry on the subject.<sup>52</sup>

<sup>47</sup> ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 3, no. 177 ("Scritture spettanti alla compera del Palazzo de' Pazzi, fatta dal sig. Lorenzo Strozzi"), fols. 78, 102r-103r, 112r-13v, 117r-18r, 152: The statement that because of "la nobiltà del sito et bellezza che è et ancora altre cose lo stimi più scudi 2000, che tutti fanno scudi 8000," is found alone at the top of fol. 119r; and considering its location, the hand, and the way these documents are bound together, I have linked it with fols. 102r-103r, where the assessment made on the basis of the rental value of the property occurs.

<sup>48</sup> Frank Büttner, "Der Umbau des Palazzo Medici-Riccardi zu Florenz," Mitteilungen des Kunsthistorischen Institutes in Florenz, 14 (1970): 394-95.

<sup>49</sup> "Questo sarebbe posta in narrare del commodo e ornamento dello splendido vivere, dove si comprende le case magnifiche, gli edifici in publico fatti, le masserizie abbondanti, i famigli, cavalli, e altre cose che più tosto per bellezza di vita che per nostro bisogno s'appetiscono, cercano e tengono. Tali cose benchè da particolari sieno fatte, nientedimeno perchè sono atissime all'universale ornamento della città e fanno la bellezza civile, della quale seguita grandezza, stima et utile civile, più tosto si convengono trattare infra l'utilità commune, che infra i privati commodi, faremo dunque fine a' privati commodi, e diremo di quegli essere a bastanza detto, e per l'avenire diremo dell'utilità comuni, cioè di quelle che all'universale corpo della città e tutta la repubblica s'appartengono." Della vita civile, 154.

Our knowledge of these few projects, however, is vague; and they were at any rate the exceptions. Most palaces were inserted into the medieval city freed from the earlier communal controls for orderly town planning and without the opening up of vast public spaces characteristic of later urbanistic ideals. The beauty of the urban scene in Renaissance Florence was not (and still is not) found in large squares and public spaces, and certainly not in unitary schemes imposed on the city by either communal or princely authority, but in the collective impression of numerous self-contained private efforts.<sup>53</sup> That impression, however, is not without its own internal coherence. The new palace style did not represent, as has been claimed, "an esthetic of maximum individuality" (which could perhaps be more appropriately said of a modern American city).<sup>54</sup> Indeed, architectural historians have always been impressed with what they call a strong conservatism in Florentine palace style, a point that is especially telling in considering the utter failure of the most original of them all, Alberti's palace for Giovanni Rucellai, to find any imitators; or the failure of Brunelleschi's for Cosimo de' Medici to get built at all; or the discrepancy between the fantasy of architectural settings in painting and the reality of the city's streets. This conservative taste—albeit with considerable variety within the bounds of its canons—may in fact have been a subconsciously imposed upper limit to the competitive egotism that these palaces represent, so that despite the lack of urbanistic schemes a peculiar stylistic unity emerged, however fortuitously, from all this private and unregulated activity.

<sup>50</sup> Carol Herselle Krinsky, "A View of the Palazzo Medici and the Church of San Lorenzo," Journal of the Society of Architectural Historians, 28 (1969): 133-35. For an unrealized early sixteenth-century project for a square, see Alessandro Parronchi, "Due note," Rinascimento, 8 (1968): 358-59.

<sup>51</sup> Lorenzo Strozzi, Vita di Filippo Strozzi, 22-28.

<sup>52</sup> "Di Luca Pitti o visto la muraglia che sfavillava più che mongibello"; see Emilio Pasquini, "Il codice di Filippo Scarlatti," Studi di filologia italiana, 22 (1964): 429.

<sup>53</sup> In this respect the comments of Francastel ("Imagination et réalité") are very suggestive.

<sup>54</sup> J. S. Ackerman, The Architecture of Michelangelo (New York, 1961), 76.

At any rate, Florence (after Venice) may well have been the first city in Europe where the individual private residence comes into its own as the distinctive feature of the urban scene, although palaces elsewhere in Italy have been so much less studied than those of Florence that any generalization on the subject is difficult to make. Here a distinction must be made between private bourgeois residences and those of princes and courtiers, of popes and prelates. Venice, of course, had an even older tradition of spectacular palace building, but the palace there definitely served both a commercial function and a rather more extensive social one as the residence of a larger family group (the fraterna). On the other hand, fifteen-century Genova, another city with a wealthy mercantile aristocracy, was still very medieval in its appearance; and the elevation of domestic architecture there to a notable art form does not get underway until well into the sixteenth century.<sup>55</sup> At any rate, the public display of private residences is certainly not to be found in the great cities of Northern Europe at the time—not in aristocratic Paris, where throughout the entire Renaissance into the seventeenth century the town house fails to make the public appearance it does in bourgeois Florence in the fifteenth century,<sup>56</sup> and certainly not in contemporary London, where street frontages of great houses were rented out as tenements.<sup>57</sup>

JUST AS THE FAÇADE of the palace as a public monument embodies the public and civic implications of a new individualistic morality, so the living arrangements behind the façade reflect the changed social conditions underlying that new morality—the withdrawal of the family into a world of privacy. It has been observed that inside a Florentine Renaissance palace the windows are so high that simply to look out from within one has to climb up steps in the window bays to peer over the high sills; such was the exclusion of the outside world. What kind of family was it, then, that enjoyed this privacy? The rationale for building the palaces in the first place was partly at least a desire to express the nobility of the individual patrician, to give vent to his proud ego in a public monument; but when he withdrew within, it was to enjoy its privacy with his family. That is to say, as a residence the palace housed primarily the owner's immediate family—his wife, his children, perhaps a stray unattached relative here and there, a widowed mother, for example —and, originally at least, it was certainly not the residence of the larger extended family or clan. Even in those cases where the palace was built by a father for his sons, or by brothers, the building was distinctly divided into the appropriate number of parts, usually with separate entrances at the street level.<sup>58</sup> The privacy of a man's home meant not only withdrawal from public life but also detachment from most relatives who were not members of his immediate family.

<sup>55</sup> Ennio Poleggi, Strada nuova: una lottizzazione del Cinquecento a Genova (Genova, 1968), ch. 1; Jacques Heers, Gênes au XV<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris, 1961), 197.

<sup>56</sup> "Nous sommes bien loin de la masse imposante du palais italien en quadrilatère, îlot seigneurial qui s'impose du public par la majesté de son architecture externe." Jean-Pierre Babelon, Demeures parisiennes sous Henri IV et Louis XIII (Paris, 1965), 120. On domestic architecture in late medieval Paris see Simone Roux, "L'Habitat urbain au Moyen Âge: le quartier de l'Université à Paris," Annales: E.S.C., 24 (1969): 1198-1219.

<sup>57</sup> C. L. Kingsford, "On Some London Houses of the Early Tudor Period," Archaeologia, 71 (1921): 17-54; Kingsford, "A London Merchant's House and Its Owners, 1360-1614," ibid., 74 (1925): 137-58.

That these palaces were built primarily for smaller family groups emerges from the history of their occupancy and ownership through the generations immediately following that of their builders. Here much can be learned from the history of private wealth, especially from the settlement of estates and the disposition of palaces at each juncture as they passed to successive generations. Since at least as early as the mid-fourteenth century it was usually the case in Florence after the death of a father that estates were eventually divided among his sons. It did not always happen immediately—indeed, legally it could not be done until the youngest son came of age—but one senses that the division could not be put off for long. Anyone who has read through the numerous testimony of private books of accounts and ricordanze is familiar with this process of disintegration of patrimonial wealth with each successive generation, a process that resulted in what one might call the individualization of wealth in contrast to what seems to have been the corporate nature of patrician fortunes of an earlier era. The phenomenon is obviously related to the dissolution of the consorteria and the emergence of the conjugal family with its own private wealth distinct from that of even the closest of relatives. It goes without saying that such division of estates could create financial problems even for the heirs of rich men. Gino di Neri Capponi, for instance, advised his sons to put off the division at least until their financial condition would permit;<sup>59</sup> but his very concern reveals a basic fact of patrician society: the old economic bonds were broken and it could not be taken for granted that patrimonies could be shared by larger family groups.<sup>60</sup>

Periodic division so characterized the history of family fortunes that one feels that by the fifteenth century individual private wealth had become an essential condition of a man's happiness and that to preserve peace in the family it was probably even necessary eventually to divide

<sup>58</sup> The Strozzi and Busini palaces were designed as two separate residences. Palaces with two separate entrances include the Corsi (via Maggio, 50/52), the Velluti-Martellini (via Maggio, 9), the Rustici (via de' Rustici) and the Machiavelli (via S. Spirito, 5/7); the Strozzi has three (and within there were three separate households. See Uffizi drawing 1561A, reproduced in Pampaloni, Palazzo Strozzi, 57).

<sup>59</sup> "Da soffrire è lo stare insieme un pezzo, tanto che abbiate il modo a dividervi con unità, a che abbiate megliorato condizione." Rerum italicarum scriptores, ed. Lodovico Antonio Muratori (Milan, 1723-51), 28, col. 1150. The same concern is found in the testament of Francesco Sassetti, Warburg, "Le ultime volontà," 226-30.

<sup>60</sup> For elaboration of this thesis, see Richard A. Goldthwaite, Private Wealth in Renaissance Florence: A Study of Four Families (Princeton, 1968).

a patrimony among brothers so each could have his own estate. We have at least one explicit expression of such a sentiment in the ricordanze of Ugolino di Niccolò Martelli, an important partner in the Medici business enterprises.<sup>61</sup> He and his eight brothers made no division of their patrimony after their father's death in 1425, partly because several of them were still minors, partly because some of them were living abroad; but with time the pressures mounted. In 1440, probably because the youngest, Alessandro (b. 1417), had recently come of age, two of the brothers, Francesco and Messer Domenico, took their shares of the patrimony and went their own way; and five years later another, Giovanni, did the same. In 1451 the remaining six divided into two groups—Ugolino, Bartolomeo, and Martello on one hand; Antonio, Roberto, and Alessandro on the other—and made a property settlement, "which division," wrote Ugolino, "was prompted by Antonio and us in order not to be disunited and . . . to conserve us in peace."<sup>62</sup> They divided virtually everything (except certain military gear, which was to be available to any brother who might take public office) down to the sheets and kitchen utensils, and the inventories were written up in the presence of their mother. "We remain content with this," continues Ugolino after having made a complete copy of the inventories; "I first sought every opportune remedy in order not to make this division so that no harm should come to our family universally in all things, but for peace and unity among us we made it."<sup>63</sup> For their part, Ugolino and Bartolomeo kept their property in common—in 1451 Martello was away in Brittany, and in 1455 he made a final settlement with them—and in 1457 the two were living together with their large families.<sup>64</sup> Yet by the time Ugolino died in 1484 he had a completely private estate, no part of which was shared with any of his brothers; and hardly a year passed before his estate in turn was completely divided among his surviving sons.<sup>65</sup> As Ugolino clearly recognized, the family could stay together only as long as they did not have to share together, as long as each member had his private wealth and was free to go his own way.

This development in the history of the family obviously has profound implications for the history of the home. With the inevitable division of estates as they passed from one generation to the next and the forma-

<sup>61</sup> ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 5, no. 1461 (ricordanze of Ugolino di Niccolò Martelli, 1432–82). References to the property divisions discussed below are fols. 26v–30r, 83r, 65r–70r, 71r.

<sup>62</sup> "La quale divisa fu mossa d'Antonio e noi per non istare disuniti e a presso perchè eravamo multiplicati in famiglie e per chonservarci con buona pace." Ibid., fol. 65r.

<sup>63</sup> "E noi rimanemo chontenti. Ciercho prima ogni oportuno rimedio di non dividere perchè ne seghuitava danno della chasa universalmente in ciaschuna chosa, ma per la pace e unità di noi lo faciamo." Ibid., fol. 69r.

<sup>64</sup> ASF, Catasto, no. 823 (Leon d'oro, 1457), doc. 181 (declaration of Ugolino and Bartolomeo).

<sup>65</sup> Ugolino left six sons. One of these, Carlo, had already received his share of the patrimony before his father's death; references to the subsequent division among the other five are found in their books of accounts and ricordi: ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 5, no. 1467 (Messer Ludovico), fol. 89v; no. 1466 (Carlo), fols. 123r, 127v, 128r; no. 1463 (Luigi), fol. 114r.

tion of completely private wealth for the individual patrician, he tended to establish his own living arrangements by withdrawing with his immediate family into a private household. It was not altogether unusual for married sons to live with their father, even when they had their own families; but as soon as the father died, they more often than not sought their own homes. The history of the occupancy and ownership of palaces reveals what seems to be their natural tendency to remain single household dwellings.

In the division of estates, therefore, a family palace could present very special problems. At the same time that there was a tendency for heirs to divide all wealth and to establish independent living arrangements there were pressures to maintain the family residence as a prestigious property that rightfully should belong to them all. It was in fact not infrequent that a testator declared his palace indivisible ("per non diviso") and inalienable. In cases where such strictures were observed the palace could remain the shared property of heirs even beyond one generation, and ownership could thus be fractured into a number of shares. In this way after a couple of generations a palace could become hopelessly divided and would have to be sold. When in 1311 the Strozzi bought two  $\frac{1}{18}$ , two  $\frac{1}{36}$ , and one  $\frac{1}{6}$  shares of the same house, each segment was acquired from a different member of the Mazzinghi family; and in 1326 the Strozzi bought another  $\frac{1}{4}$  share.<sup>66</sup> In the mid-fourteenth century the Medici bought first nine and then eleven of the twenty parts of a house on the via Larga;<sup>67</sup> when the Busini palace was sold in 1473 (to another branch of the family) it involved four transactions for purchase of two  $\frac{1}{8}$ , one  $\frac{1}{4}$ , and one  $\frac{1}{2}$  shares;<sup>68</sup> and when the Medici bought the Pitti palace in 1550 the sellers consisted of seven parties representing thirteen individuals.<sup>69</sup>

It is certainly not at all clear that in these cases of multiple ownership the palace actually became the residence of all the owners; but in the fifteenth century when ownership of a palace was divided it could very well mean that if the owners intended to make their residence there, the palace would be physically divided into separate homes. Entries in the ricordanze to this effect are not infrequent: there are descriptions of the division and sometimes lists of the resulting remodeling expenses, so there is no doubt about actual physical division.<sup>70</sup> In 1476 Jacopo and

<sup>66</sup> ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 3, no. 191, fols. 4r-5v (seventeenth-century copy of records of purchase); cf. p. 980 above.

<sup>67</sup> ASF, Medici avanti il principato, no. 152 (ricordi of Foligno di Conte d'Averardo de' Medici), fols. 40v-41r.

<sup>68</sup> ASF, Catasto, no. 1005 (Leon nero, 1480), fols. 67-68; this today is the Bardi palace in via de' Benci.

<sup>69</sup> Francesca Morandini, "Palazzo Pitti, la sua costruzione e i successivi ingrandimenti," Commentari, 16 (1965), no. 1-2: p. 44 n. 2 (where purchase document is published).

<sup>70</sup> For example, in 1459 Bernardo Rinieri and his cousin Luca made a notarized division of their house in via del Cocomero (today via de' Ricasoli), with the former getting three-fourths of it and the obligation to build a dividing wall; ASF, Conv. supp., 95, no. 212 (accounts and Priore di Messer Giannozzo Pandolfini, who had been left without residences after the division of the estate of their very wealthy father (who had died in 1456), bought a large house; but in the presence of a notary they made an agreement by which they very carefully divided it into two separate parts, splitting the entrances, stairways, stables, and two necessari, building a dividing wall and adding a second well, so that each half would be a completely separate residence.<sup>71</sup> Likewise in 1522 Cristofano di Bernardo Rinieri made an entry in his book of ricordanze of how he and his nephew divided their palace at a cost of 410 florins, and he included all the detailed instructions given to the builders about how new walls were to be built to allow each residence complete separation from the other, even without a means of direct communication between the two.<sup>72</sup> Yet to judge from other entries in the same source Rinieri and his nephew were on the best of terms; they simply wanted private households. In 1516 two grandsons of Pierfrancesco de' Medici, Giovanni di Giovanni and Pierfrancesco di Lorenzo, divided a palace by lot after engaging two builders to make the division and estimate remodeling costs. The entrance way went entirely to one part and so did the garden; remodeling expenses included walling up doorways, dividing a large room on the piano nobile, and enclosing one side of the courtyard so that each part was completely sealed off from the other.<sup>73</sup> When this kind of division occurred each part of the palace was henceforth considered a separate property. Hence the Del Pugliese palace in the sixteenth century was actually owned by two different families;<sup>74</sup> and likewise in the seventeenth century the great medieval palace of the Spini, which had long been broken into apartments, was divided between ricordi of Bernardo di Stoldo di Luca di Piero Rinieri, 1457-1503), fol. 155r ("Giudichomi detti entrata della via del Chochomero e una cortte con 1° pozo e 1° necessario era alla mia chamera terrena andassi in quel modo sino al tetto, e io avessi a fare il muro della trameza di 1/2 braccio"). Buonaccorso Chelli (or Serchelli) likewise described the work done in his house in via Maggio when he and his brother Piero divided it in 1479 ("ognuno di noi ispendemo in chasa per istare ognuno di per sè. Facciamo certi achoncini in chasa chome si vede"). ASF, Montalve di Ripoli, S. Piero a Monticelli, no. 185 (accounts and ricordi of Buonaccorso di Leonardo di Piero Serchelli, 1476-1507), fol. 12r.

<sup>71</sup> Ospedale degli Innocenti (Florence), 149, no. 648 (accounts and ricordi of Jacopo di Messer Giannozzo d'Agnolo Pandolfini, 1467-87), fols. 166r-68r. This house, purchased from Francesco Sassetti for 2,500 florins, was on the via del Proconsolo, across the street from the Pazzi palace.

<sup>72</sup> "Richordo chome questo dì viiii di maggio 1522 noi Andrea di Francesco Rinieri mio nipote e io Christofano di Bernardo Rinieri abbiamo fatto insieme chompromesso per dividere la chasa di Firenze che al presente abitiamo a chomune; e detto Andrea à chiamato Bernardo Pistochi muratore e io ò chiamato Antonio Pilacchi muratore, i quali anno a fare 2 parti di detta chasa e anno tempo tutto dì 24 del presente mese, le quale due parti anno a paregiare, e quella valessi meno anno a rifare chon danaro; e quando aranno fatto dette parti se sarenò d'achordo a pigliare quello arà a rifare denari; ne à avere tempo mesi xviii prossimi futuri allora paghando ongni mesi 6 la terza parte insino al'intero paghameto"; the detailed instructions follow. The house was in via de' Ricasoli. ASF, Conv. sopp., 95, no. 220 (ricordanze of Christofano di Bernardo Rinieri, 1496-1553), fols. 31v-33v. Cf. n. 70 above.

<sup>73</sup> ASF, Medici avanti il Principato, no. 86, doc. 138 (a copy of the builders' report). An inventory of the contents of this palace also survives. Ibid., no. 104, doc. 19 (in the archival inventory the two parties, Giovanni and Pierfrancesco, are incorrectly identified as brothers).

<sup>74</sup> Illustratore fiorentino; calendario storico, 1907, pp. 9-12.

two families (and one-half of it was further divided into three separate residences).<sup>75</sup>

The fact is, however, that most palaces were probably not actually subdivided either legally or physically with the passing of the generations. In Siena a great palace like that of the Tolomei remained the shared property of all members of the vast clan right up through the eighteenth century; by the thirteenth century there already were as many as 120 shares.<sup>76</sup> In Florence ownership was less diffuse. A man's grown and married sons might live with him in his palace, which according to his testament was to remain the common property of them all, but following his death, and sometime after the legal settlement of the estate, the usual arrangement was a private agreement that turned the palace over to only one of the sons and required the others to move out and find homes of their own. When Ilarione and Andrea di Lippaccio de' Bardi divided their patrimony in 1430, they should have excepted the sizable palace if they were to honor their father's instruction. They thought about dividing it into two households, but they found it could not be done conveniently without ruining the entire structure, despite the fact that during the immediately preceding period when they were living in it together they had spent over 800 florins for improvements; and so it passed to Ilarione alone.<sup>77</sup> When Ugolino di Niccolò Martelli died in 1484 his patrimony was divided immediately, and this included partition of two palaces among six sons. The family palace in the via Martelli was to be shared by five of them, but within a few months Cosimo and Luigi had bought out the shares of the other three, and by 1487 Luigi bought Cosimo's half and thus came into possession of the entire palace.<sup>78</sup> Meanwhile the other palace (today the Antinori palace), which Ugolino had acquired for his sons, was likewise bought up by Carlo alone.<sup>79</sup> Perhaps the best example of the businesslike way in

<sup>75</sup> Biblioteca Nazionale di Firenze, MSS Tordi, no. 523 ("Quaderno della muraglia che io Geri Spini farò nelle mie tre case del palazzo delli Spini per ridurle a una per mio uso," 1606-14; Spini possessed one-half of the palace). There are some miscellaneous papers attached to this document that trace the occupancy and ownership of the palace; see also Luigi Passerini, "Il palazzo Spini," in his Curiosità storico-artistiche fiorentine (Florence, 1866-75), 2: 63-89.

<sup>76</sup> G. Prunai, G. Pampaloni, and Nello Bemporad, Il palazzo Tolomei a Siena (Florence, 1971), 81-84.

<sup>77</sup> "Anchora veduto e ritrovato che il detto Andrea e Ilarione tenevano e possedevano chomunemente e per non diviso uno palagio grande chon due orti nel quale amendue abitavano . . . e perchè il detto palagio non si potrà comodamente dividere che non si ghustasse però ongni parte del detto palagio a vero overo à nel detto palagio è tutto e intero, il detto palagio al detto Ilarione agiudichiano e a esso Ilarione dicierniamo apartenersi per piena ragione di dominio e proprietà, avere tenere e possedere e ciò che al detto Ilarione e alle sue rede da quinci innanzi piacerà perpetualmente di fare." Today Palazzo Canigiani, via de' Bardi, 28/30. The palace had been bought in 1414 for 2,200 florins; when the division of the patrimony was made it had a value of Fl. 3,039 3s. 3d. ASF, Conv. supp., 79, no. 119 (accounts and ricordi of Ilarione di Lippaccio de' Bardi, 1420-31), fols. 255v-57v, 172. Cf. above, p. 993.

<sup>78</sup> ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 5, no. 1463 (accounts and ricordi of Luigi d'Ugolino Martelli, 1484-88), fols. 12, 114r, 119v-120r, 122r, 125v-126r. The palace, which had a value of 2,000 florins di suggello, was in via Martelli; cf. above, p. 999.

<sup>79</sup> ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 5, no. 1466 (accounts and ricordi of Carlo d'Ugolino Martelli, which brothers could settle the problem of commonly owned palaces is the case of the five sons of Antonio di Leonardo Gondi. They lived together for twenty years after his death in 1486 until the youngest reached his majority in 1506 and the patrimony was finally divided. When it came to the palace the brothers drew up a written agreement by which they recognized that the house would remain in the possession of two of them while the other three were to move out; and since obviously the three could not move out immediately further arrangements were made and again there was a written agreement, according to which the three were to share expenses at specified rates and pay rent until such time as they could find new quarters. Within only a few months, however, all three had left, while Antonio, one of the two remaining brothers, took up what was to become a permanent residence in France. The family palace therefore remained in effect the single family dwelling of Alessandro. Finally there is the case of the five Guicciardini brothers, who shared ownership if not residence of their father's palace for about eleven years after his death; but when Girolamo married in 1524 it was, significantly, one of the stipulations of his bride that he have the palace for himself alone. Thus came the inevitable settlement, and the other brothers had to find homes of their own.<sup>80</sup>

The Florentine palace, then, was more often than not a residence of a single conjugal family. Despite the desires of testators to save the family residence from the inevitable division of their estates among sons, it usually ended up as the property—and the residence—of only one man; and by the sixteenth century, in some cases at least (the great Pandolfini palace, for example),<sup>81</sup> primogeniture became an explicitly recognized principle of inheritance of palaces. Hence the enlargement of the private family dwelling that these palaces mark in the history of domestic architecture was not a consequence of family growth. On the contrary, as we have already seen, the enlargement of the private family dwelling occurred precisely at a time when the communal clan had lost much of its cohesive force and the family was reduced to its minimum size. Perhaps we can say that the enlarged private dwelling was an ironic consequence of the dissolution of the family clan, inasmuch as that dissolution of the larger social group released the forces of individualism that led to such spectacular palace building. Likewise, the abandonment of the loggia, long the public symbol of the sociability of the clan, is an aspect of the phenomenon of the social fragmentation of the family. In short, the peculiar development of palace architecture in Renaissance 1490-94), fol. 127v; also ibid., no. 1468 (accounts and ricordi of Luigi d'Ugolino Martelli, 1489-92), fols. 102v, 108r. Cf. above, p. 999. The palace had a value of between 3,500 and 4,000 florins.

<sup>80</sup> Goldthwaite, Private Wealth, 132, 157, 167.

<sup>81</sup> ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 2, no. 116, doc. 2 (copy of act of donation of the palace by Giannozzo to his nephew Pandolfo d'Agnolo, 1520).

Florence reflects a fundamental transformation at the very base of Florentine society. Alberti, with all his nostalgia for a former style of family life (which he probably in fact never really experienced), sensed that something very profound and ultimately inexplicable was happening in Florentine society: "To make two families out of one requires double expense, and many things happen that it is easier to judge of by experience than by talk, easier to feel than to explain. Indeed, I am not pleased with this dividing of families, this going in and out of separate entrances."<sup>82</sup>

THE PALACE REPRESENTED a new world of privacy, and it was the privacy of a relatively small group. Further evidence for this proposition—and at the same time the best indication we have of the kind of private world that the Florentine patrician created for himself—comes from a closer inspection of the general disposition of space within the palace. Perhaps the most striking characteristic of the use of that space is the small part of the total cubic area incorporated in these vast structures that was available for actual residential use. If from the outside these palaces appear to spread over a vast area it must be remembered that inside an appreciable part of that area—perhaps a fourth, sometimes a third—was actually left open. The center of the palace and of life within it was the enlarged square or rectangular courtyard with open arcades on the ground level and usually an open loggia on the third, or top, level. As to their elevation, as high, as has been said, as a six- or seven-story modern office building, we again find the exterior appearance deceptive. For the most part there were actually only three floors, and of these the lower had little living space while a good part of the upper opened as a loggia facing onto the courtyard. Consequently the inhabited apartment consisted of not much more than a dozen or so rooms—if indeed even that many—mostly on the middle floor. This basic plan remains essentially the same regardless of the size of the overall structure, so that the largest palaces simply had larger rooms, not more of them. In other words, despite the massive block these buildings appear to be from the outside, there was not a correspondingly large residential space within at the disposition of the family. These palaces are indeed impressive for their sheer size if for nothing else, but they loom even larger when one realizes how deceptive their appearance is in disguising the relatively small internal area that was actually inhabitable. They were obviously designed to give a small family an extraordinarily spacious, private world of its own that extended well beyond their actual living chambers. The most innovative feature of the palace, in short, is perhaps best described as the luxurious inflation of private space around the nucleus of a relatively modest-sized apartment.

<sup>82</sup> The Family in Renaissance Florence, a translation of Della famiglia by Renée Watkins (Columbia, S.C., 1969), 86.

Fig. 8. The ground area of the Strozzi palace (left) (from Stegmann and Geymüller) is almost fifty per cent larger than that of the White House (right). The Strozzi palace is also almost twice as high (see fig. 6), but it has only three floors to the White House's four. The upper floors of the White House, with the president's private quarters, contain several dozen rooms laid out to the even smaller scale of twentieth-century living. Although the Strozzi palace is exceptional in being the largest palace to have been built in the fifteenth century and in having been designed for the two families of brothers, it illustrates clearly that a dramatic increase in scale did not change the basic plan for a palace. The number of rooms did not increase, but their size did—perhaps the clearest evidence we have that the function of these buildings was not to accommodate a highly complex patrician style of life. Rendering by Implementation, Baltimore.

It is difficult to penetrate much further into the privacy of these palaces to determine the deeper social implications of living arrangements within. We simply lack the kinds of documentation that would lead us directly into the subject. Florence of course is exceptional for the survival of a remarkable quantity of personal diaries and letters, chronicles and histories, and imaginative and thoughtful literature written by her citizens from the fourteenth century onward; but personal household arrangements and the intimate relations of members of a family were not the subjects that Florentines very often wrote about. In all the vast literature we find only random remarks here and there that at best bear indirectly on the subject of the disposition of space within a palace. There are, for example, numerous contemporary descriptions of the Medici palace in the fifteenth century, but most of them are literary ventures occasioned by great quasi-public ceremonies and none mentions actual domestic arrangements in the Medici home.<sup>83</sup> Likewise Alberti's famous treatise, where there is much about domestic economy and familial affections, has little to say about practical household management that is relevant to understanding the internal organization of a palace.

Even the authors of the theoretical architectural literature on houses seem to have little sense of the physical arrangements and internal functions of a palace. In the great treatises by Alberti and Filarete, both Florentines of the fifteenth century, despite considerable interest in the higher social functions of buildings and the city as a whole, there is nothing about how the architect is to lay out the private palace for actual living other than very general advice on kitchens, stables, plumbing, storage, and so forth.<sup>84</sup> When it comes to arrangement of living quarters there is virtually nothing, and it is almost impossible to uncover the underlying assumptions of these theorists about the kind of life the family was to have within. In this respect, incidentally, their relatively slight interest in the private patrician palace may be related to the fact that although they were both born in Florence, they lived most of their lives away from the city, so that they really did not have Florence in mind when they wrote. When Alberti writes, for example, that the townhouse should have a chapel and that more attention should be given to the merchant's shops than to the beauty of the interior of his house, one can rightfully wonder whether Alberti was thinking about Florence.<sup>85</sup> He was, of course, more interested in discussing humanist ideals than in describing reality; but the irrelevance of much of what he has to say may also be evidence that the private bourgeois palace (as distinct from the princely palace with which he as well as Filarete concern themselves) was indeed a distinctively Florentine development during the early Renaissance and not yet a reflection of architectural practice elsewhere.

It is generally held that architectural theorists of the later sixteenth century broke the spell of humanist idealism, so that no longer was there the Albertian preoccupation with the city in the platonic sense, as the perfect abode of the perfect society. Yet for all their greater practicality with respect to urban planning, the treatises (or rather the notes for treatises) of the Florentines Bartolomeo Ammanati<sup>86</sup> and Giorgio Vasari il Giovane<sup>87</sup> show as little concern for practical living arrangements. Both

<sup>83</sup> Hatfield, "Some Unknown Descriptions of the Medici Palace in 1459," 240. A recent attempt to reconstruct the interior of the Medici palace has been made by Wolfer A. Bulst, "Die ursprüngliche innere Aufteilung des Palazzo Medici in Florenz," Mitteilungen des Kunsthistorischen Institutes in Florenz, 14 (1970): 369-92.

<sup>84</sup> Alberti, Ten Books on Architecture, especially bk. 1, ch. 9; bk. 5, chs. 14, 18; bk. 9. Filarete, Treatise on Architecture, ed. and trans. John R. Spencer (New Haven, 1965), bks. 11, 12.

<sup>85</sup> I know of only two Renaissance palaces with chapels: the Medici-Riccardi and that of Pierfrancesco de' Medici (see above p. 1001)—and the Medici, of course, are always a very special case. Chapels were added to many palaces later, however.

<sup>86</sup> La città: appunti per un trattato, ed. Mazzino Fossi (Rome, 1970).

<sup>87</sup> La città ideale: piante di chiese (palazzi e ville) di Toscana e d'Italia, ed. Virginia Stefanelli (Rome, 1970).

men were interested in houses for all strata of urban society, and both left actual designs; but apart from service arrangements there is no indication of the function of rooms. On Vasari's designs the terminology consists of salone, sala, and camera, but these are related to size not function; and the terms are no more precise than they are either in the fifteenth-century inventories or in the seventeenth-century dictionary prepared by Baldinucci. In short, the Florentine architectural treatises from Alberti to the younger Vasari give us no help in understanding the domestic uses of interior space; and the readers of what these men have to say about palaces might well remark, along with a critic of another era, that "tis very fine; but where d'ye sleep and where d'ye dine?"

This is not the kind of question that has even been raised by architectural historians; their interest in the practical problems of the organization of interior domestic space is as slight as Renaissance theory is irrelevant. Historians at best follow the theorists themselves in exalting the organization of space within these palaces for being based on certain rational principles that somehow allow the creation of a more purely human environment.<sup>88</sup> When historians get around to considering actual living arrangements, however, they are likely to dismiss them as completely inadequate and to explain that the motivation for building palaces in the first place was a desire to impress rather than to accommodate.<sup>89</sup> While it is not difficult to be somewhat put off by the inconveniences posed by these palaces for twentieth-century living one must remember that to ignore the question of practical domestic accommodations is to overlook the fact that however unplanned and inadequate these palaces may appear to us today they must nevertheless have conformed to the patrician style of life. It may in fact be the case that in this respect these palaces hold the key to an understanding of that life style. If architectural historians would concentrate more on the social realities of a building's function than on architectural theory, style, and techniques, some of the most innovative features of domestic architecture in the Renaissance might be uncovered, and at the same time we might learn something very significant about private aspects of patrician culture.

<sup>88</sup> "Quest'edificio [the Palazzo Medici] che può veramente dirsi la prima Wohnhaus moderna in Italia, non tanto per i criteri di comodità domestica cui risponde, ma proprio perchè tali criteri sono superati in un'invenzione, governata da una ragione puramente umane: e in questo Michelozzo è pianamente rinascimentale." Ottavio Morisani, Michelozzo architetto (Milan, 1951), 52. "The building [also referring to the Medici palace] is intended to absorb evenly the life of the patron in all its complexity, and there is nothing to prevent us from seeing this coordination of purposes as a result of the desire for uniform development of personality." Paul Frankl, Principles of Architectural History: The Four Phases of Architectural Style, 1420-1900, trans. and ed. James F. O'Gorman (Cambridge, Mass., 1968), 165. Frankl's call for the study of "purposive intention" has not been heeded by architectural historians of the Renaissance (although in various places Ackerman has hinted at its importance); and the sociologists have been as negligent in the study of domestic space (see, for example, Amos Rapoport, House Form and Culture [Englewood Cliffs, N.J., 1969]).

<sup>89</sup> "Naturally, these structures were built to be looked at more than to be lived in . . . and it is hard to imagine where one slept, washed, or found privacy." Ackerman, The Architecture of Michelangelo, 78. Cf. Giuseppe Samonà, "Palazzo," in Enciclopedia italiana, 25: 962.

The best prospect for penetrating the interior of these palaces and getting some sense at least of the physical organization of domestic space is the study of household inventories and the interior decorative arts. Schiaparelli's remarkable book was a first attempt at presenting a description of palace interiors based on inventories, but it is seriously flawed by its failure to consider various problems of his sources.<sup>90</sup> Nevertheless, it has yet to be followed by a more analytical study. Indeed most of the decorative arts—furniture, maiolica, tapestries—have remained largely untouched by scholarship, and virtually nothing has been done on them from the wider perspective of social history. It is quite clear, however—and not at all surprising, considering the implications of the enlargement of domestic space represented by the palace—that paralleling the evolution of domestic architecture there is a very notable development of the decorative arts. Palaces, after all, had to be furnished—and they were, in ways not at all possible heretofore. Earlier all kinds of domestic activities went on in the same rooms, and furniture tended to be simple in its forms and adaptable to different functions. By the fifteenth century, however, the inventories reveal quite clearly that rooms were beginning to have more specialized functions not only with respect to domestic activities but also with respect to their occupancy by specific members of the family. Furniture therefore became more appropriate to these functions. For example, storage furniture, such as chests, developed in a number of forms as it was increasingly necessary to have more space for the storage of the more numerous possessions of a society that consumed more luxury objects, and the chair evolved with respect to both comfort and form. The new style of private life found expression in these interior decorative arts, and it is in this period that such mundane objects as chairs, tables, chests, pottery, and even picture frames were raised at least to the level of the minor arts. In fact it was precisely this extraordinary demand for such possessions that gave birth to a vigorous Florentine artisan tradition whose importance for the total Florentine economy has never been properly assessed either for the Renaissance or for the continuing tradition of arts and crafts that is the economic basis for Florence's survival today. The social, economic, and artistic repercussions of palace building go much beyond their mere construction.

Despite the lack of documents and scholarship on the organization of interior space and on the decorative arts, one thing is clear: the palace represented a new world of privacy, and it was the privacy of a relatively small group. Although Alberti may have longed for the old sociability his sense of private family life was distinctly of his own time. The household he depicts in his dialogue on the family is that of a single conjugal family, a self-contained social organism living in isolation and privacy and sealed off from the broader social and civic world outside its palace door. For Alberti privacy is the hallmark of family life. Not even servants intrude; and he has nothing to say about old and faithful family retainers who might have endeared themselves to their master and become virtually members of the family. When the one servant, Buto, appears it is not in the discussion of domestic life but at the beginning of book 4 as comic relief; and he certainly is not an utter dependent of the family. To judge from private books of accounts and ricordi and from household inventories, servants seem not to have been very numerous. There were perhaps not more than two or three for wealthy families, even those with large palaces. Moreover, the rate of turnover among servants could be quite high, employment sometimes lasting only a few months.<sup>91</sup> There is nothing in all this of the social expansiveness of the aristocratic family of the baroque age surrounded with its retainers and servants and playing out a sumptuous quasi-public social life on a truly palatial scale.

<sup>90</sup> La casa fiorentina e i suoi arredi nei secoli XIV e XV (Florence, 1908). Mario Praz's La filosofia dell'arredamento (Rome, 1945) is not without merit, but it lacks systematic analysis of style and function.

Within the isolation of the palace with its spacious privacy and increasing elegance, where relations were more secluded and less extended, where the family withdrew into itself, is it surprising that men found a keener appreciation of the values of domestic life? Alberti's book itself is the most attractive expression of this new sense of the home as an intimate relation among husband, wife, and children, but is not much of the culture of the Florentine Renaissance rooted in the new style of life being played out within the palace? The focus of that culture, in fact, is put on women and children, with the renewed interest in the education of children—merchant pedagogy, as it has been recently termed<sup>92</sup>—and with the remarkable rise in the status of women—for Alberti (at least in the dialogue on the family) the woman was a veritable capofamiglia, keeper of the keys, mistress of the household, and privy to almost all her husband's secrets. And the other woman in the lives of these patricians is invariably their children's wet nurse, on whom they lavished gifts and whose importance is to be measured by her prominence among the vital family statistics that constitute the private diaries of the period.

How else is one to explain the fascination, almost the obsession, with children and the mother-child relation that is perhaps the single most important motif in Florentine art during the first century of the Renaissance, with its putti, its children and adolescents, its secularized madonnas, its portraits of women. Works of art with these themes dominated <sup>91</sup> In the mid-sixteenth-century census the population included a large number of servants (Battara, La popolazione), but few households had very many; in via Maggio only eight of twenty-seven households had more than two, and only three had more than five; and the two households in the great Strozzi palace had only five each. ASF, MSS, no. 179 ("Strade di Firenze"), fols. 210-11, 253r.

<sup>92</sup> Christian Bec, Les marchands écrivains, affaires et humanisme à Florence (Paris, 1967), 286-99.

the local art market; they were produced in great number and in the cheapest media to meet the increasing demand for them. What is their essential quality if not "the naive idealization of home life, the love for children and the pure cult of womanhood that speak to us from them,"<sup>93</sup> those very values that were being bred within the privacy of the family palace? The first point Cardinal Dominici makes about the education of children in his tract on the family written at the beginning of the fifteenth century (and dedicated to a woman) is that children should be surrounded with pictures of child saints and young virgins.<sup>94</sup> According to the cardinal a child's initial learning process is through the eyes, and the underlying assumption that this experience involves the child in a subject-object identification with pictures may have important implications for our understanding of the fascination with children in Florentine art. Is it possible to understand in these terms such developments in Florentine art as the juvenescence of formerly venerable older men like King David, who from bearded Old Testament king in the medieval tradition becomes the youthful symbol of the political vigor of the city,<sup>95</sup> or like Saint John the Baptist, heretofore represented as a hairy semibarbarian, who now sheds so many years in the course of a century that the patron saint of the city himself ends up being represented as a mere baby playing alongside the Christ child under the protective care of the Mother of God?<sup>96</sup> How else is one to understand the strikingly peculiar iconography of much of Florentine Renaissance art?

Perhaps it is nothing but a happily appropriate coincidence (for this argument) that the building inaugurating the Renaissance in architecture was Brunelleschi's Ospedale degli Innocenti, an orphanage for abandoned children; but it is certainly not coincidence that the interior arrangements were planned with the most remarkable care and sensitivity to make the buildings suitable to their function. Further study of the gradual evolution of the internal organization of the Innocenti as an orphanage will most likely reveal a number of innovative features designed to bring the life of the children more in line with the domestic temper of the times.<sup>97</sup> It was probably as original for its institutional organization as for its architecture. And if the new sense of domesticity and fascination with children surfaced to the level of public sensibilities

<sup>93</sup> Wilhelm von Bode, Florentine Sculptors of the Renaissance (London, 1908), 143.

<sup>94</sup> Giovanni Dominici, Regola del governo di cura familiare (Florence, 1860), 154.

<sup>95</sup> Charles Seymour, Michelangelo's David. A Search for Identity (Pittsburgh, 1967).

<sup>96</sup> Marilyn Aronberg Lavin, "Giovannino Battista: A Study in Renaissance Religious Symbolism," Art Bulletin, 37 (1955): 85-101.

<sup>97</sup> For the volume to commemorate the recent restoration of the Ospedale, A. Piccini has made the first step to reconstruct the functional organization of the buildings: G. Morozzi and A. Piccini, Il restauro dello spedale di Santa Maria degli Innocenti, 1966-1970 (Florence, 1971). The documentation for the administration of this orphanage in the fifteenth century is considerable; and it merits study.

in the Innocenti, the same concern also may have penetrated the inner sanctum of the cloister in a most intriguing way—at least we might so judge from the testimony of Francesco di Tommaso Giovanni, a well-off property owner on the via Maggio. In 1452 he recorded giving his daughter, a nun in the convent of Monticelli, a wooden Christ child, with two changes of elegant clothes, three velvet hats, a tabernacle and altar, and “other little things for him.”<sup>98</sup> The mind boggles trying to imagine what Suor Angelica did with her doll and her Lord and his wardrobe in the sanctity of her convent, yet is this not to be seen as another of the varied manifestations of the fascination with children so characteristic of Florentine culture? Perhaps there is in part a demographic explanation, as David Herlihy has suggested, for the enhanced importance of the mother within the home and a consequent change in child-rearing practices.<sup>99</sup> But perhaps also the vast internal domestic space of the palace is to be understood ultimately as the objectification of what Eric Erikson has called the spatial mode of woman, so that by heightening her “sense of vital inner potential” and opening her life to those “modes of activity which include and integrate her natural dispositions,” the wider stage of domestic life brought altogether new cultural forces into play.<sup>100</sup> At any rate we shall very likely need more psychological penetration into the palace and into domestic life if we are ever to understand much of Florentine civilization.

IN A SENSE the Florentine palace sums up a civilization. Representing the new esthetic consciousness of the patrician and at the same time reflecting the changed conditions of family life that accompany the social transformations of the fourteenth century, the palace is the expression of Renaissance individualism both as a monument to its proud builder and as his castle where he could escape into the luxurious privacy of domestic life. And the furnishings with which he enjoyed that privacy, from pottery to religious pictures, reflect the values of domestic privacy and intimacy that he cultivated within. If the Renaissance begins to fade away in the later sixteenth century, so in fact did the palace have to adapt to new conditions and functions. In fact perhaps nothing better brings home the points I have tried to make about Renaissance palaces

<sup>98</sup> ASF, Carte strozziane, ser. 2, no. 16 bis (ricordi of Francesco di Tommaso di Francesco Giovanni, 1444–58), fol. 16r: “Ricordo che insino a dì . . . di giugno 1452 donai a Suora Angelicha mia figlia monacha in Monticelli al lato alla Porta di San Piero Gattolini 1° bambino di legno con 2 veste, 1° di chermise piano con fermiglio di perle e 1 di velluto allesandro con fregi d'oro, e 3 berette di velluto chermise e 1° ghirlanda di frangia rossa grossa e 1 tabernacolo di legno dipinto e con 1 altaruzo e con pali d'altare e veli e altre cosette per lui; avemolo da mona Lapa de' Damiani da Pisa el quale donò alla Mea dicendo volendo per dare a Suora Angelica.”

<sup>99</sup> David Herlihy, “Vieiller à Florence au Quattrocento,” Annales: E.S.C., 24 (1969): 1338–52.

<sup>100</sup> “Womanhood and the Inner Space,” in Erikson's Identity, Youth and Crisis (New York, 1968), 261–84.

---

The American Civil War Considered as a Crisis in Law and Order

---

PHILLIP S. PALUDAN

DESPITE THOUSANDS OF VOLUMES written about the Civil War we still know almost nothing about one of the central questions that that struggle poses: why did men rush to fight for their endangered country? Indeed why did they believe that secession endangered it? We know with some precision why the South seceded. The answer is obvious at first glance and remains clear upon deeper investigation—the South seceded because it saw in the election of Lincoln a threat to the survival of slavery, the foundation for the Southern way of life. Tradition, psychology, and economics all spoke clearly the same message—without slavery we cannot survive. And so secession came.

But a description of the decision for secession is not a description of why the war came. Although the South prepared for war there would be none unless the North contested the Southern action. Lincoln's assertion that "both parties deprecated war; but one of them would make war rather than let the nation survive; and the other would accept war rather than let it perish,"<sup>1</sup> is imprecise and thus misleading. The decision to make war for the Union was made not in Richmond or Montgomery but in Washington, and Boston and New York, and Indianapolis, and Columbus, and Springfield. This decision was made by Lincoln and by thousands of men who throughout the secession winter and especially after Sumter rushed to the colors. To understand why the war came we must look not at secession but at the Northern response to it.

In that response, as we shall see, the concept of law and order loomed large. The concept is a complex one, contemporary political rhetoric to the contrary notwithstanding. The order of a society depends on more than the rigid enforcement of all of its laws. It depends on maintaining an enduring consensus about a people's fundamental goals and beliefs, and hence on the success of the institutions created to secure this consensus. Fundamental to social stability is the family with its role of passing on ideals and attitudes about the nature of man, the relationship between man and God, and the duties, roles, and responsibilities of individuals to themselves and to others. In inculcating these ideas the family is supported by a whole environment including schools, churches, and informal and formal groups. Together these social institutions engender a collection of usually unexamined beliefs that act as society's silent, internal police. They say, "You must," "Thou shalt or shalt not," or "This is not done," and they operate wherever men carry their consciences.<sup>2</sup>

I gratefully acknowledge the assistance provided by the University of Kansas General Research Fund.

<sup>1</sup> Abraham Lincoln, "Second Inaugural Address," in Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln, ed. Roy P. Basler, 8 (New Brunswick, 1953): 332.

Although order depends most fundamentally on these social institutions, any society that advances beyond a primitive level requires the creation of a political order and of institutions that secure it. These institutions provide the means for resolving intergroup conflicts, for utilizing the power of government to achieve the ambitions of society, and for preserving whatever freedom its citizens demand. As the political theorist Carl Friedrich points out, political order is "a term suited to designate the political situation of the community in which component parts, or units, are arranged in such a way that the actions required for the attainment of the purposes of the community will be taken."<sup>3</sup>

In discussing the issue of law and order in the Civil War era it is useful to take Friedrich's definition as a focus. Specifically, order in the nineteenth-century United States refers to a condition in which the people were convinced that those institutions were secure that stabilized the protean nature of their society, restrained the potential for conflict in an environment that encouraged avarice, harmonized the diversity of opinions and influences fostered by a free society, and gave them a voice in determining their future. It is my contention that secession and the firing on Sumter provoked a crisis in which all these things seemed threatened and that, because of the widespread involvement of Northern citizens in the creation and maintenance of legal and political order, saving the Union was not merely an abstract issue but a matter of compelling personal concern.

An investigation of the reasons for this intense personal interest in the survival of the Union reveals serious shortcomings in existing descriptions of the Northern decision to fight for the Union. The traditional way that historians have looked at the reasons the North went to war has been to ask "What did 'Union' mean to Northerners who fought for it?" Thus we have studies of the idea of Union by Paul Nagel and of American nationalism by Merle Curti, Hans Kohn, and Yehoshua Arieli. All of these works describe in one fashion or another the ideas people had about the United States that made them willing to fight to keep it united. Through these works we discover the many images that came to Northerners when they said "Union" or "United States." Northerners visualized a large, prosperous, magisterial land whose continued success depended on unity. They saw the nation as "the last best hope" of democracy in the world, a country with a mission to demonstrate that a nation "dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal" might work. They believed that here individualism and nationalism were mutually agreeable, not in conflict; that the nation did not submerge but rather expanded the individual by maximizing his opportunities to achieve his dreams.<sup>4</sup> Such inquiries are thoughtful analyses of the issue. But they share what I believe are enfeebling faults. First, insofar as they deal directly with the question, they analyze why the common man went to war by reporting what intellectuals wrote about an idea of national union. Second, they focus their studies of nationalism in the United States too much on the nation as a whole and insufficiently on local experience.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>2</sup> J. O. Hertzler, Social Institutions (Lincoln, Nebr., 1946); James S. Campbell, Joseph R. Sahid, and David P. Stang, eds., Law and Order Reconsidered: Report of the Task Force on Law and Law Enforcement (New York, 1970), 3-11.

<sup>3</sup> Carl Friedrich, "The Dialectic of Political Order and Freedom," in Paul J. Kuntz, ed., The Concept of Order (Seattle, 1968), 346; see also Hertzler, Social Institutions, 113-24.

The first of these faults is the least serious. There are, of course, obvious differences between the attitudes of Emerson, Lowell, Hawthorne, and Melville and those of the average American of their time—differences in values seen in the criticism that these men leveled against the excessive materialism of the years from the 1830s to the 1860s. Still, both intellectuals and common people shared a common experience, and while some intellectuals might deplore and common people revel in the potentials for acquisition, we may see the fact and dimensions of materialism in the culture of the time. Emerson's observations of that world are expressed in language more refined than the common man might use, but the crude materialism of Emerson's world is not altered by his intellectual approach. Yet the concept of the Union held by intellectuals is really only secondhand information on why those who fought, fought. Without study of a vital aspect of the daily experience of the future soldiers—their daily involvement with the processes of governing—we should suspect the adequacy of such observations.

The weakness that arises from too nationalistic a focus is that the nation these historians describe was a federal union of states with a national government singularly inactive, a prevailing constitutional philosophy that discouraged national activity, and a population that feared its excesses. "States' rights and sovereignty" was a potent rallying cry whose validity and attraction was not diminished but rather demonstrated by the fact that all sections used it when it suited their purposes.<sup>6</sup> In addition the excessively national orientation defies even one of the most tenacious of nineteenth-century images of nationhood. What many Americans admired about their nation was its federal nature, the tradition that kept in local hands the administration of local problems and that gave the people control over their own destiny. This is seen most clearly in discussions over why the nation could and should expand. To assertions that expansion would create tyranny, supporters of manifest destiny replied with discourses on the merits of federalism. Nationalist Edward Everett well expressed their arguments. "By the wise and happy partition of powers between the national and state governments, in virtue of which the national government is relieved of all the odium of administration, and the state governments are spared the conflicts of foreign politics, all bounds seem removed from the possible extension of our country, but the geographical limits of the continent."<sup>7</sup>

<sup>4</sup> Paul Nagel, One Nation Indivisible: The Union in American Thought (New York, 1964); Merle Curti, The Roots of American Loyalty (New York, 1946); Hans Kohn, American Nationalism: An Interpretive Essay (New York, 1957); Yehoshua Arieli, Individualism and Nationalism in American Ideology (Cambridge, Mass., 1964).

<sup>5</sup> Both Kohn and Curti point out the states' rights and localistic interests of the North but persist in discussing ideas about nationalism rather than considering the relationship between the way the people lived and their beliefs about nationhood. Kenneth M. Stampp, And the War Came: The North and the Secession Crisis (Baton Rouge, 1950), is an able study of the Northern reaction to secession but confines itself to the secession winter and fails to examine deeply the sources of the sentiments of 1860–61. In addition Stampp discounts the importance of legal-constitutional concern, an error that seriously impedes an understanding of the period he studies. Instead of examining the reasons for constitutional arguments, he assumes that such arguments were "philosophical rationalizations . . . decorated with seductive words" and "self-deception" (p. 31).

In addition the trouble with emphasizing the nation when discussing pre-Civil War nationalism is that such an emphasis misconstrues the nature of loyalty and allegiance. It implies that loyalty to the nation precludes other loyalties, that the dilemma of Robert E. Lee about whether to join his state or his nation describes a necessary dichotomy. But from what social sciences suggest about loyalty it is likely that Lee and those attracted by his agonizing decision saw the problem too simply. Morton Grodzins argues at length that direct national loyalty [is] a misnomer. It does not exist. Loyalties are to specific groups, specific goals, specific programs of action. Populations are loyal to nation as a by-product of satisfaction achieved within non-national groups, because the nation is believed to symbolize and sustain those groups. From this point of view, one is loyal not to nation, but to family, business, religion, friends. One fights for the joys of his pinochle club when he is said to fight for his country.

Other authors insist that multiple loyalties are possible and indeed that loyalties to things familiar and nearby are the imperative foundations for attachments to larger and more general and hence more vague ideals and entities. Page Smith, discussing the American Revolution, insists that the creation of local communities that attracted the intense devotion of the colonists was indispensable for generating the "power of common action" that resulted in successful rebellion. Martin Buber adds his insight concerning the inextricable connection between local and national loyalty with the observation that "a nation is a community to the degree that it is a community of communities." Such observations were predicted in the nineteenth century by Tocqueville. With characteristic insight he observed, "Public spirit in the Union is, in a sense, only summing up of provincial patriotism. Every citizen of the United States may be said to transfer the concern inspired in him by his little republic into his love of the common motherland."<sup>8</sup>

<sup>6</sup> See Arthur M. Schlesinger, Sr., "The State Rights Fetish," in his New Viewpoints in American History (New York, 1935), 220-44.

<sup>7</sup> Edward Everett, "The Circumstances Favorable to the Progress of Literature in America," Aug. 26, 1824, in Everett, Orations and Speeches on Various Occasions, 1 (Boston, 1850): 33, as quoted in Albert K. Weinberg, Manifest Destiny (Baltimore, 1931), 106. See also Frederick Merk, Manifest Destiny and Mission in American History (New York, 1963), 26-27.

If we are to understand the reason that the North went to war for the Union we need to follow such suggestions and direct our attention toward the local experience, toward the environments in which the majority of Northerners lived. To focus locally is to ask the question about why men fought for the Union in a different and I hope more useful and precise way. The question changes from the general "Why fight for the Union?" to "What was there in the daily experience of most Northerners that made them sensitive and responsive to those images the Union evoked?"

As the North reacted to the secession crisis one theme was repeated constantly, and it suggests a crucial fact about Northern society. Again and again newspaper editors and political leaders discussed the degree to which secession was likely to produce disorder, anarchy, and a general disrespect for democratic government. The future president Andrew Johnson pictured for his congressional colleagues "this Union divided into thirty-three petty governments, with a little prince in one, a little potentate in another, a little aristocracy in a third, a little democracy in a fourth and a republic somewhere else . . . with quarreling and warring amongst the little petty powers which would result in anarchy." Congressman Zachariah Chandler announced that if secession were tolerated "I shall arrange for emigration to some country where they have a government. I would rather join the Comanches; I will never live under a government that has not the power to enforce its laws." The conservative Philadelphia North American called secession "Lawlessness on a Gigantic Scale" and remarked, "The world must regard with profound astonishment the spectacle of national lawlessness which the southern States of this Union now exhibit. . . . Resistance to law, . . . contempt for order . . . defiant rebellion against the entire structure which we call the United States government." The Boston Traveller argued that had the founders of the country provided for peaceable secession they "would have organized anarchy." Allow Southern states to secede, the Douglas-supporting Burlington Weekly Sentinel said, and "the Union with all its glory . . . high hopes . . . power, with all its interest has gone and stands in history as another monument of the inability of man to govern himself under the forms of constitutional law."<sup>9</sup>

<sup>8</sup> Morton Grodzins, The Loyal and Disloyal (Chicago, 1956), 29; Page Smith, As a City upon a Hill (New York, 1966), 14; Martin Buber, The Writings of Martin Buber, ed. Will Herberg (New York, 1956), 130; Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America, ed. J. P. Mayer and Max Lerner, tr. George Lawrence (New York, 1966), 147. See also David M. Potter, "The Historian's Use of Nationalism and Vice Versa," in his The South and the Sectional Conflict (Baton Rouge, 1968), 48; and Harold Guetzkow, Multiple Loyalties (Princeton, 1955), 37-39. It was David Potter in the above essay who first pointed to the relevance of works by Grodzins and Guetzkow to the Civil War. His aim in doing so was to suggest that historians consider the possibility of Southern nationalism confronting Northern nationalism rather than seeing Southerners as crabbed sectionalists endangering a national consensus.

These warnings and fears, intense as they were, still did not sound the depths of outrage and concern over the threat of lawlessness. It took the firing on Sumter to do that. Until early April men were still debating the question of secession with hope that its potential for disorder might be defused. Many who feared the precedent of successful lawbreaking that secession portended sought to solve the problem by transforming the crime into a lawful act. Newspapers, private citizens, and public figures asked for constitutional amendments that would legalize secession.<sup>10</sup>

The cannonades from Charleston ended such equivocation. Now the issue was not the validity of one constitutional view as opposed to another but the need to uphold government and the rule of law against forceful disruption. Earlier warnings of anarchy were multiplied and intensified. From Chicago: "Without a Union that is free, without a Constitution that can be enforced, without an authority to command respect and obedience . . . our Republic ceases to be a government, our freedom will be quickly supplanted by anarchy and despotism." From Madison, Wisconsin: "This contest is not so much about territorial limits as to demonstrate whether we have government or not." From Indianapolis: "We are fighting for the existence of our own government, and not for the destruction of that at Montgomery." Roxbury, Massachusetts: "Every man instinctively feels that the moment has at last arrived for crushing treason and asserting the supremacy of law and the constitution." Cincinnati: "If [the] doctrine of secession as illustrated and enforced by [its] practice, is true, then there is no such thing as government authority or social obligation. . . . A surrender to Secession is the suicide of government." Philadelphia: "Establish the authority of the Constitution and laws over violence and anarchy." The Republican parties of Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois rallied around the cry "enforce the laws." Two hundred thousand people attended a rally at Union Square in New York City on April 20, 1860, and listened for hours to speakers from throughout the North asserting that the rule of law was at stake. Orators such as the New York Democrat John A. Dix, the Whig attorney William Evarts, the city's mayor and future Copperhead Fernando Wood, the Ohio politician Robert Schenck, the Oregon senator Edward Baker, and many others supported the contention of the lifelong Democrat, Robert J. Walker that "we must resist and subdue [secession] or our government will be but an organized anarchy." On April 17 the New York Tribune had summarized the prevailing sentiment: "We have a civil war on our hands. There is no use looking away from the fact. For this year the Chief Business of the American people must be proving that they have a Government, and that freedom is not another name for anarchy."<sup>11</sup>

<sup>9</sup> Andrew Johnson, "The Constitutionality and Rightfulness of Secession," Dec. 18-19, 1860, in Speeches of Andrew Johnson, comp. Frank Moore (Boston, 1866), 150, as quoted in Lloyd Paul Stryker, Andrew Johnson: A Study in Courage (New York, 1929), 60; Zachariah Chandler: An Outline Sketch of His Life and Public Services (Detroit, 1880), 192-93; newspaper quotations from Howard Cecil Perkins, ed., Northern Editorials on Secession (New York, 1942), 1: 172-73, 195-96, 520-22. See also Frank Moore, ed., Rebellion Record (New York, 1962), 1: 82-102; Arthur C. Cole, Era of the Civil War, 1848-1870 (Springfield, Ill., 1919), 253-55; Kenneth M. Stampp, Indiana Politics during the Civil War (Indianapolis, 1949), 58-60; Eugene Roseboom, The Civil War Era, 1850-1873 (Columbus, 1944), 376-79; New York Tribune, Apr. 17, 1861; George B. McClellan, McClellan's Own Story (New York, 1887), 31-32; James Russell Lowell, "E Pluribus Unum," Atlantic Monthly, Jan. 1861, p. 238; A. P. Peabody, "Loyalty," North American Review, Jan. 1862, p. 156; and Stampp, And the War Came, 33-34, 54, 75, 200, 220-25.

<sup>10</sup> See Allan Nevins, War for the Union (New York, 1959), 1: 35; Sidney George Fisher, A Philadelphia Perspective: The Diary of Sidney George Fisher, ed. Nicholas B. Warnwright (Philadelphia, 1967), 375-77; Frank L. Klement, The Limits of Dissent: Clement Vallandigham and the Civil War (Lexington, 1970), 54; and New York World, Dec. 15, 1860.

Did secession in fact threaten the order of society in the North? Not this particular secession; a section different in so many ways from the North might justify its departure by pointing to the conflicts that its presence produced. Whatever the reality, however, the factor motivating the Northern response was what men then believed secession might mean and what they foresaw as its consequences. The idea of secession, applied generally, suggested that conflicts between parties should be settled not by harmonizing differences in the service of higher ends but by ignoring those ends in the service of the quarrel of the moment. What community was safe if such a pattern were established and endorsed? But despite this fear, it is possible that peaceful secession would have been tolerated if some regular procedure for division had been adopted or if a way of giving the action some semblance of legality and regularity had been discovered and utilized. The firing on Sumter eliminated this possibility. The issue was now no longer the means of division or the justice of the cause of secession or the right of the national government to use its power to hold a state that sought to depart. The issue after Sumter was, can the country permit force to settle its disputes, cannons to resolve its differences? No people so dependent for success and stability on respecting and adhering to the processes of self-government, in the absence of any other compulsion, could afford to say yes. It is the purpose of the remainder of this article to suggest what in their experience compelled this answer.

NORTHERN DETERMINATION TO UPHOLD government and order against the threat of anarchy was not simply rhetoric. Both speakers and listeners responded to such sentiments naturally, for in talking about the need for order and stable government they were discussing the topic about which the vast majority of Northerners were experts in practice if not in theory. In raising the issue of law and order the speakers struck Northerners quite literally where they lived. No issue, with the possible exception of acquiring wealth, had attracted so much energy and debate in the prewar years. From the Mayflower Compact and the organization of colonial governments, through the writing of the Articles of Confederation, the creation of the Constitution, the ratification of thirty-two state constitutions from 1776 to 1860 in the states that did not secede (fifteen in the last fifteen years before secession), the debates and elections over constitutions that failed, the countless creations of county, town, and city governments, these Americans had been engaged in government-making.<sup>12</sup> Add to this the millions of words expended debating constitutional questions in the prewar era, the numerous court cases that attracted national attention, the almost constant elections in the country with their concomitant discussions of governmental issues, and it is possible to describe the prewar years as a time of continual concern with questions of government, order, and law.

<sup>11</sup> Newspapers excerpted in Perkins, Northern Editorials on Secession, 2: 808-45.

Although the South shared this history and shared also some of the characteristics of Northern society to be described, Southern fears of losing slavery ultimately overwhelmed countercurrents of loyalty and unionism and a respect for law and order. Had the North been similarly threatened it is probable that Northerners would have risked political disorder to preserve societal order. Many Southerners made this choice reluctantly and seem to have worried about the political disruption secession might provoke. Instead of following their secessionist ideas to logical conclusions, they made sure that no provision for secession would exist in the Confederate constitution. Forsaking uncharted paths they wrote a document that copied in many ways the Constitution of the United States. And again and again they insisted that they were not violating the Philadelphia document but rather upholding its true principles against the lawbreakers of the North. As Confederate President Jefferson Davis told his constituents, "The Constitution formed by our forefathers is that of these Confederate states."<sup>13</sup> Surely the South shared with the North a devotion to the established legal order that only a threat to its way of life could shake.

Yet there were differences in attitudes toward and experience with law and government that may help explain the diminished unionism of the South. Charles Sydnor points to Southern views of law that emphasized unwritten rules of conduct and elevated private over public law codes, the practice of dueling being the most obvious example. He notes the impact of slavery in making every master, and most white men, a law unto themselves when it came to dealing with blacks. Southerners also had fewer opportunities for involvement in the legal-political process than did Northerners. There were fewer towns per capita in the South, less rotation in office, and lower participation in voting—all factors worth exploring to test the degree of personal involvement in issues of order, government, and law in the South. That task, however, must be put off until another time. The focus here is on why the North fought to save the Union, not why Southerners tried to divide it.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>12</sup> See Francis Newton Thorpe, comp., The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters and Other Organic Laws (Washington, 1909).

<sup>13</sup> Jefferson Davis, "Inaugural Address of the President of the Provisional Government," Feb. 18, 1861, in Dunbar Rowland, ed., Jefferson Davis, Constitutionalist, 5 (Jackson, Miss., 1923): 53.

The avalanche of oratory debating questions of law, government, and the Constitution had special meaning for Northerners. It was not merely theorizing about ideals but was a practical debate about the way they lived. Government in the pre-Civil War North was not “them”; it was “us.” The national government was days if not weeks away, and its constitutional powers were strictly limited. It regulated interstate commerce, ran the post office, dealt with Indians, conducted such foreign policy as there was, and paid and administered an army and navy that totaled around 28,000 men as of 1860. In 1861 there were about 36,500 paid civilian employees of the national government, and approximately 30,000 of these were local postmasters. The national government did not tax the public at large. It had no powers in matters of health, education, welfare, morals, sanitation, safety, or local transportation. In short, practically every activity that affected the lives of Americans was the province of either state or local government—and more often than not it was local. An observer in 1850 described the structure of government:

The President has one postmaster in every village; but the inhabitants of that village choose their own selectmen, their own assessors of taxes, their own school-committee, their own overseers of the poor, their own surveyors of highways, and the incumbents of half a dozen other little offices corresponding to those which, in bureaucratic governments, are filled by appointment of the sovereign. In all these posts, which are really important public trusts, the villagers are trained to the management of affairs, and acquire a comprehensiveness of view, a practical administrative talent, and a knowledge of business. . . . This training is very general; for owing to our republican liking for rotation in office, the incumbents of these humble posts are changed every year or two.<sup>15</sup>

Nowhere was this description more true than in the states of the Middle West. Indeed the recent frontier experiences of that region guaranteed a widespread personal involvement in questions of government, law, and order. In the two generations before the Civil War, wilderness and Indian <sup>14</sup> On slavery, the South, and the law, see Kenneth M. Stampp, The Peculiar Institution (New York, 1956), 192–236; Charles Sydnor, “The Southerner and the Laws,” Journal of Southern History, 6 (1940): 3–23; Walter Dean Burnham, “The Changing Shape of the American Political Universe,” American Political Science Review, 59 (1965): 7–21; and Stanley Elkins and Eric McKittrick, “A Meaning for Turner’s Frontier,” Political Science Quarterly, 69 (1954): 340–42, 567–75. This article by Elkins and McKittrick was the stimulus for my thinking about the relationship between government-making and Northern support for the war. The authors, focusing on the nature of the frontier experience, do not draw any conclusions about the coming of the war.

<sup>15</sup> Francis Bowen, “The Rebellion against the Magyars,” North American Review, Oct. 1850, p. 502, as quoted in Leonard D. White, The Jacksonians (New York, 1954), 511–12. See White’s discussion of local government on these pages. See also The Statistical History of the United States from Colonial Times to the Present (Stamford, 1965), 710, 737.

territory had been transformed into states: Ohio, 1803; Indiana, 1816; Illinois, 1818; Michigan, 1837; Iowa, 1846; Wisconsin, 1848; Minnesota, 1858. Such state-making had been preceded by community-making on a vast scale. The early years of settlement in these states lend some support to the popular image of a wild, uncivilized frontier. The predominant pattern, however, was that of a successful struggle for community order, a struggle without much opposition once the permanent settlers arrived. These pioneers carried in their baggage the experience with and devotion to the government institutions of the East. Indeed many of those who came to the West were conservative members of Eastern communities who wanted to re-establish the sort of order they believed was being undermined by liberal domination of their homelands. Their commitment to stability and order can be seen in the fact that they founded churches and schools in the first days of community building. Henry Ward Beecher noted in the 1850s that the frontier settlers "drive schools along with them as settlers drive flocks. They have herds of churches, academies, lyceums; and their religious and educational institutions go lowing along the western plains as Jacob's herds lowed along the Syrian hills."<sup>16</sup>

The institutions the settlers of the Midwest founded were copies of those they had known in the East. The New England model was widely emulated, and it ensured the formation of stable communities, as whole communities often moved together, locating their towns on land that was already plotted and organized into townships. Such activity minimized mad scrambles for land. In some cases settlers found that the apparatus of county and town government preceded them into a region, and they were bound by law and inclination to adopt that organization.<sup>17</sup>

Even in regions lacking such controlled settlement a strong respect for the necessity of an ordered way of doing things tended to prevail. Settlers created their own law and enforced it. The most colorful example of such <sup>16</sup> Henry Ward Beecher, as quoted in Ray Allen Billington, The Frontier and American Culture (n.p., 1965), 7-12. See also Louis B. Wright, Culture on the Moving Frontier (Bloomington, 1955), passim; Richard C. Wade, The Urban Frontier (Cambridge, Mass., 1959), 315-17; and Smith, City upon a Hill, ch. 3. The German visitor Fredrika Bremer observed in 1853, "Whenever Americans establish themselves, the first buildings they erect, after their dwelling house and places of business are schools and churches." The Homes of the New World: Impressions of America, tr. Mary Howitt (New York, 1853), 2: 135. The war, of course, would generate the Copperhead movement in the Midwest. This fact, however, does not significantly weaken the contention that involvement in the processes of government generated a willingness to fight when the Union was endangered. The region shared the patriotic outpouring spawned by Sumter. Until economic depression struck the region in late 1861-62, future Copperhead leaders like Clement Vallandigham and Samuel Medary were lonely men. Even Vallandigham's opposition to the Lincoln administration rested in part on a concern for the Union. This Ohio Copperhead opposed the president, believing that the attempted coercion of the South guaranteed permanent disunion. See two books by Frank L. Klement, The Copperheads in the Middle West (Chicago, 1960), 18, 208; and Limits of Dissent, 62-68.

<sup>17</sup> Merle Curti, The Making of an American Community (Stanford, 1959), 261, 296-97; Albert Shaw, Local Government in Illinois (Baltimore, 1883), 5-19; George E. Howard, Introduction to Local Constitutional History (Baltimore, 1889), 135-238; Smith, City upon a Hill, 11-19; Thomas D. Clark, Frontier America (New York, 1969), 306-07, 598.

action was the claim club. Claim clubs were organizations of settlers who wished to secure title to land that had yet to be organized by national law. In Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, and other territories the clubs sprang up, manifesting the willingness and capacity of Americans to be their own lawmakers. The clubs' success was noted by one Methodist circuit rider who observed a Wisconsin settlement in 1835.

They had, in the absence of all other law, met and made a law for themselves. They have surveyed the township & ascertained that section 16, the school section, was within the grove, & they staked it off & appointed commissioners to take care of it. . . . They had also meted and bounded every mans wood land, allowing each family 40 acres of timber. . . . There was an understanding in the country, equivalent to a law of the land, that the settlers should sustain each other against the speculator & no settler should bid on anothers land.<sup>18</sup>

The experience of Iowa was typical. Settlers there rushed into territorial lands before the government survey was completed. The land was not officially for sale until 1838 but squatters were there in 1837. Such disrespect for federal law did not signal an uncontrolled, wide-open struggle of the rule of the strongest. True to Northern experience the settlers organized their claim clubs to regularize procedures of land acquisition and to maintain stable prices. These clubs represented more than merely claim protectors. As Thomas D. Clark points out, "These settler organizations had an even broader implication than their function in protecting land claims; they helped to maintain law and order in the frontier community."<sup>19</sup>

Similar experiences took place in the mining regions of the West. Miners who rushed to California often arrived before federal or state law had organized the areas. Again these Americans exercised their lawmaking talents. Miners gathered together and drew up regulations that often began, "Whereas, this district is deficient in mining laws and regulations, and disputes have arisen: therefore, we, the miners of ——— district, in convention assembled, do pledge ourselves to abide by the following laws." By 1866 there were over eleven hundred of these self-governing districts in the eight Western states and territories. A Senate committee investigating these laws observed "this great system established by the people in their primary capacities . . . evidencing by the highest possible testimony the peculiar genius of the American people for founding empire and order."<sup>20</sup>

The relevance of this well-known material to the question of fighting the Civil War is this: again and again Americans proved to themselves that they were lawmakers—that the law and order of their communities was their personal responsibility and depended on their actions and efforts.

<sup>18</sup> Quoted in Daniel Boorstin, The Americans: The National Experience (New York, 1965), 75; see also 72–78. And see James Willard Hurst, Law and the Conditions of Freedom in the Nineteenth Century United States (Madison, 1967), 3–5.

<sup>19</sup> Clark, Frontier America, 594.

<sup>20</sup> Quoted in Boorstin, Americans: National Experience, 79.

Their connection with the preservation of that order was intimate, vital, and compelling. This is made even more clear when we consider the way in which Americans gave passionate attention not only to the creation of an ordered community but to the legal battles that continued in the towns after they had been established.

Court terms at county seats in the prewar years were gala social events. People drove or walked into town in large numbers. Big wagons filled with women and children and loaded with provisions entered the town from every direction. People followed their favorite lawyers like modern sports stars and demanded of them not only courtroom performance but speeches in the evenings after the courts had closed. The people knew these lawyers, and it was eminently to the advantage of lawyers to be well known and popular, as practically all cases were decided by juries. The system of legal education that prevailed at the time further encouraged a familiar and popular image of the law. Lawyers were preponderantly local men who received their legal training at the hands of neighbors who were established attorneys. They thus became as familiar with and sensitive to local customs and ideas as they were with Blackstone, Coke, and Littleton, for their success was more dependent on such informal awareness than on formal knowledge. In addition opposing lawyers and judges all knew each other well, usually living together in the same boarding house during the court term. Plaintiffs and defendants were often well acquainted, and all figures in most cases were familiar to the people of the area. The jury system, intense popular interest, local training, and the social intimacy produced by a nation that was essentially a nation of small towns and farmers thus all encouraged a law that tended to mirror the judgment and mores of the town or locality. Page Smith's conclusion rings true: "In the small town law was what the community had ordained, growing directly out of the needs and aspirations of the people. It was not something remote, alien, imposed from without."<sup>21</sup>

Popular involvement in questions of the legal order of course transcended concern with judicial proceedings. More than simply jurors and witnesses, these people themselves were the makers of the law they observed being contested. The creation of communities had meant more than providing a police and judicial function; it meant establishing and manning the institutions that made the community function. For every community that was created there were problems of education, health, housing, and municipal services to be solved and offices to be sought and staffed. The extent of involvement the citizens demonstrated and their interest in the survival and prospering of their governmental order was the measure of community success.

The frontier regions, some of them settled only fifty years before, some

<sup>21</sup> Smith, City upon a Hill, 131. See also Albert J. Beveridge, Abraham Lincoln, 1809-1858 (Boston, 1928), 1: 528-40; and Historical Statistics of the United States, 14.

in the process of settlement in 1860, demanded the most widespread involvement. From earliest cabin raisings, to the creation and maintenance of towns, to the sustaining of large cities, people took part actively. Men without prior experience were drafted as officials or rushed to file for office as eagerly as they filed their land claims. For example, in Hamilton County, Ohio, an election was called for delegates to the constitutional convention of 1802. Of the ninety-four candidates who filed for ten positions, twenty-six received between 121 and 1,635 votes. "Everybody," one Indiana pioneer wrote, "expected at some time to be a candidate for something; or that his uncle would be; or his cousin, or his cousin's wife's cousin's friend would be; so that everybody and everybody's relation's friend, were forever electioneering." Such involvement in politics continued unabated into the decades before the war. As Henry Clyde Hubbart writes of the older Middle West, "The people of the free West in the forties and fifties were a political people. This was true in all senses of the term politics whether the word be held to mean political ideas and philosophy; or social attitudes . . . or in a narrower sense political party programs or activities; or in a still narrower sense, the designs and manipulations of politicians and petty factions." Large numbers of Americans, then, took a personal and active part in creating the institutions of government that made civilized life possible in the West. Commenting on what they see as the crucial element in the frontier experience, Stanley Elkins and Eric McKittrick conclude, "Here was a society in which the setting up of institutions was a common experience."<sup>22</sup>

Concern for the government and politics was not confined to the frontier areas of the West. Indicators of involvement in such questions appear in the East as well. In the first place, the founding of towns and the consequent opportunities and demands for participation were not limited to the West. Five of the twenty-seven towns that in 1851 made up Oneida County in New York had been founded between 1827 and 1846. Between 1823 and 1836 there were four towns established in that state's Herkimer County. Erie County, New York, saw the founding of new towns in 1851, 1852, 1853, and 1857. Bucks County, Pennsylvania, just outside Philadelphia, had newly created towns up to 1838, and Venango County in Pennsylvania organized townships in 1845 and 1850 and would continue to do so up to 1876. Towns that had been long established would often rededicate themselves to maintaining the communities they had and to carrying out the ideals of their founding. Again and again, then, Americans in the nonseceding states involved themselves in government-making, considered the problems of self-rule, and thereby made government their own responsibility.<sup>23</sup>

<sup>22</sup> Bayard Rush Hall, in James A. Woodburn, ed., The New Purchase (Princeton, 1916), 178; Henry Clyde Hubbart, The Older Middle West, 1840-1880 (New York, 1936), 10; Elkins and McKittrick, "A Meaning for Turner's Frontier," 331-36.

<sup>23</sup> Pomeroy Jones, Annals and Recollections of Oneida County (Rome, N.Y., 1851), 13;

Involvement in the governing and political process was not limited to forming governments. Rotation in office apparently was frequent. Herkimer County in twenty-six years re-elected a member of Congress only three times; of twelve state senators, only one man repeated in thirteen years. The town of Caroline in New York saw twenty-six men in the office of town supervisor in a forty-nine-year period. The longest tenure was four years, and only two men held the job that long. The town of Queensbury, New York, had fifty-nine different justices of the peace from 1795 to 1873 and 143 different constables from 1766 to 1873. Town records contain thirteen pages listing seventy men each as highway commissioners from 1766 to 1873, most of them single termers. Similarly great rotation in office occurred in the offices of town and ward supervisor in Buffalo from 1854 and in Venango County, Pennsylvania. A sample of New England towns suggests similar facts of rotation. Worcester, Massachusetts, between 1848 and 1859 had seven different mayors and forty-nine different aldermen out of seventy-two possible positions. Ward supervisor positions show the same pattern. Taking only two wards we see twenty-two different supervisors for thirty-six possible jobs in Ward One and twenty-six different supervisors out of thirty-six possibilities in Ward Four. Roxbury, Massachusetts, rotated officeholders with similar frequency.<sup>24</sup>

One did not have to be an officeholder to maintain an intense interest in public affairs. Visitors noted how passionately Americans were involved in politics, the turbulence and intensity of elections, and the apparent bitterness of party strife. Their observations are borne out by statistics. For the years 1848 to 1872 Walter Dean Burnham estimates the mean turnout for presidential elections to be an impressive 75.1 per cent. (By way of comparison, the national turnout in the 1968 election was 61.6 per cent.) In off-year elections an estimated 65.2 per cent of those eligible voted. (The 1970 off-year elections for the House brought 44.9 per cent of the eligible voters to the polls.) When the South is removed from the sample the figures are more impressive still. Between 1868 and 1880 the mean turnout in presidential elections was 82.6 per cent in the North. In Michigan between 1854 and 1872 the mean turnout in presidential years was 84.8 per cent, in off-years 78.1 per cent. For Ohio from 1857 to 1879 these figures read 89.0 per cent and 78.4 per cent. In New York from 1834 to 1858 the mean turnout in presidential years was 84.8 per cent and in off-year elections 81.5 per cent. Further evidence of involvement is seen in the fact that there was a very small amount of roll-off in the voting process. (Roll-off is the tendency to vote only for major offices and to ignore lesser ones.) Between 1857 and 1879 in Ohio the mean roll-off was 0.6 per cent. New York from 1834 to 1858 witnessed a 1.6 per cent roll-off. From 1854 to 1872 Michigan's mean roll-off was 0.9 per cent. Additional testimony to the intensity of political concern is seen in two notable statistics. First, there was very little split-ticket voting. Political preferences tended to be strong and tenacious. Certainly mid-nineteenth-century voters hoped that the best man would win, but they tended to think that the best men were devoted to Democratic, Whig, or Republican principles. Second, there was very little party switching, with the understandable exception of the election of 1840. When either of the major parties won large majorities, these came not as the result of changes in political allegiances but because of abstentions by the voters of one party. Either one voted for his party or he did not vote; it was a rare man who viewed politics so dispassionately that he could stomach voting for the opposition party.<sup>25</sup>

Nathaniel Benton, A History of Herkimer County (Albany, N.Y., 1856), 389; Cresfield Johnson, Centennial History of Erie County, New York (Buffalo, 1876), 446, 454; W. W. H. Davis, History of Bucks County, Pennsylvania (Doylestown, Pa., 1876), 687, 689; History of Venango County, Pennsylvania (Chicago, 1890), 689, 702, 732, 734, 740, passim.

<sup>24</sup> Benton, Herkimer County, 483, 487-90; Landmarks of Tompkins County, New York (Syracuse, 1894), 287; A. W. Holden, History of the Town of Queensbury (Albany, N.Y., 1874), 64-66, 79-82, 88-100; Johnson, Erie County, 456; Venango County, 141-52; City Documents of Worcester (Worcester, Mass., 1859), 147-48; Roxbury City Documents (Roxbury, Mass., 1854), 138-41; Roxbury City Documents (Roxbury, Mass., 1860), 231-42. See also Bayrd Still, "Patterns of Mid-Nineteenth Century Urbanization in the Middle West," Mississippi Valley Historical Review, 28 (1941): 187-206.

In the prewar period, then, Americans made their own governments, enforced their own laws, staffed their own institutions, and gave intense attention to questions of government, politics, and law. There existed compelling personal reasons to be devoted to the preservation of law and order.

THERE WAS VIOLENCE in prewar American society—a great deal of it. Indians, abolitionists, immigrants, Negroes, Mormons, Masons, as well as the WASP majority all received their share. But violence is not necessarily the opposite of law and order. Modern riots and disruptions have provoked and energized a “law-and-order” movement, but that should suggest that violence may be the instrument of stability as well as disorder. In fact, when we look carefully at the violence of the pre-Civil War years, as well as our own, we discover how much of it, though not all, resulted from efforts to preserve, not to destroy, the existing order.<sup>26</sup> Abolitionists were attacked by “gentlemen of property and standing” for threatening the <sup>25</sup> Fredrick von Raumer, America and the American People (New York, 1846), 267–69; Bremer, Homes of the New World, 2: 149–52; Burnham, “Changing Shape of the American Political Universe,” 7–28. Roy Franklin Nichols blames continual political activity for helping to cause the “hyperemotionalism” that brought on the war. The Disruption of American Democracy (New York, 1948), ch. 28. I would accept this view, but I would eliminate Nichols's negative connotation and suggest that the emotion with which Northerners viewed politics was natural and indicates the worth, not the evils, of the democratic process.

<sup>26</sup> The modern concern with America's violent past has inspired energetic and fruitful searches for incidents of violence. But one wonders if we ought to claim for ourselves a position as a uniquely violent people. One foreign visitor of the nineteenth century denied that Americans deserved special recognition in this field. Writing in 1846, Fredrick von Raumer cataloged violence against the Mormons, rent strikes in New York, and the Dorr Rebellion in Rhode Island, but he cautioned against too hasty a judgment against democracy because of such incidents. “Those who regard such acts of violence as a natural necessity, an inevitable consequence of republican institutions, take a one-sided and erroneous view of the matter.” There was as much violence in England, Wales, Ireland, and even in Canada during a single year as there was in the United States, and Paris alone, he argued, outdid this country in violence. America and the American People, 257–66.

existing economic and racial status quo. Indians were seen as savage threats to the expansion of a prosperous and comparatively well-organized society. Immigrants threatened to inject foreign ideas and practices into a political system that demanded consensus. Mormons outraged the morals of their neighbors and seemed to endanger the prevailing ideology by their exclusiveness. Masons were charged with an anarchistic atheism that would destroy the Christian sinews of society. And Negroes who forgot their assigned place knew that their punishment would not be restrained by charity.<sup>27</sup>

Much of this violence was part of the persistent vigilante tradition in American society. Although hardly the sort of law and order that civil libertarians admire, vigilantism is "as American as cherry pie" and springs from the same sentiment that is the focus of this essay—the belief that individual Americans are responsible for the preservation of stability, that the law is an expression of popular sentiment, and that the people have the duty to maintain it even if procedural due process is not respected. Vigilantism is, as Richard M. Brown argues, socially conservative—an attempt to secure and maintain a society that respects property, stability, and order. To the degree that he feels personally responsible for maintaining order, therefore, every American is potentially a vigilante. Michel Chevalier saw this in 1833 and thought that it was admirable. Local saloonkeepers, he observed, were often the "police commissioner," and the tavern regulars "would in case of necessity be ready to act the part of constables." In a society that lacked a powerful state, he concluded, "This is real self-government; these are the obligations and responsibilities that every citizen takes upon himself when he disarms authority."<sup>28</sup>

Recognition of the strength and pervasiveness of such law-and-order sentiment and of the personal involvement of Americans in the creation and sustenance of government suggests weaknesses in the predominant historiography describing prewar society. David Donald, Stanley Elkins, and Rowland Berthoff have emphasized the unstructured and hence disordered nature of pre-1860 America. Burgeoning popular rule and expanding self-esteem weakened faith in old institutions, Donald argues, and social mobility further weakened society's sinews. Elkins emphasizes the breakdown of key institutions in explaining why Northern intellectuals attacked slavery with such unrestrained intensity. Quoting Henry James, as does Donald, Elkins describes American society: "No State, in the European sense of the word, and indeed barely a specific national name. No sovereign, no court, no personal loyalty, no aristocracy, no church, no clergy, no army, no diplomatic service, no country gentlemen, no palaces . . . no cathedrals . . . no great universities nor public schools . . . no literature . . . no political society." Americans are "an unsettled people," Berthoff insists, adding to the strictures of Donald, Elkins, and James a family structure weakened by growing industrialism, the explosive fears of immigrant impurities, and the extraordinary mobility of this people.<sup>29</sup>

<sup>27</sup> Leonard L. Richards, Gentlemen of Property and Standing (New York, 1970); Ray Allen Billington, Protestant Crusade (New York, 1938); Lorman Ratner, Antimasonry: The Crusade and the Party (Englewood Cliffs, 1969).

<sup>28</sup> Richard Maxwell Brown, "The American Vigilante Tradition," in Hugh Davis Graham and Ted Robert Gurr, eds., Violence in America: Historical and Comparative Perspectives (Washington, 1969), 121–70; Michel Chevalier, Society, Manners and Politics in the United States (Gloucester, Mass., 1967), 321–22. One of the interesting features of vigilantism is how respectful its practitioners often were of due process of law. After apprehending their victims they frequently held trials with appointed judges, juries, prosecutors, and defending attorneys. Brown distinguishes such activity from "instant vigilantism," which dispenses with due process. See also Laurence Veysey, "Freedom and Disorder in American History: An Interpretation," in Veysey, ed., Law and Resistance (New York, 1970), 17–19.

The weaknesses in the arguments of Donald and Elkins arise from their sources. Both men use extensively the arguments of elites—intellectual, political, and/or economic—men very likely to believe that as control of society slipped from their hands it fell into the hands of incompetents. Certainly Calhoun and Webster, like Walter Bagehot, distrusted the untutored masses, and it is not surprising to find Henry James, just returned from years in London society, believing that a nation lacking a church, aristocracy, clergy, country gentlemen, cathedrals, and English public schools was about to atomize. As for Elkins, it is reasonable to doubt that one can describe the stability of a whole society by analyzing, however brilliantly, the ideas of Concord, Massachusetts, of Transcendentalists whose emphasis was the intensely aware, free individual seeking community with the Oversoul.

Doubtless, Berthoff and Donald (when the latter describes prewar society rather than relying on the judgments of Bagehot, Calhoun, and Webster) do describe essential characteristics of antebellum America. Industrialization did threaten the family and weaken established economic patterns. The lust for wealth encouraged roaring boom towns and boom-town mentalities: a callousness about anything but the acquisition of wealth. Certainly many feared that immigrants threatened the stability of American society, and there was a unifying force in seeming to defend democracy against an insidious invasion of "popery." Surely America would have been more unified had the national government consistently compelled, by its energy, the admiration of its people. Mobility did uproot Americans and not only transformed communities left behind but influenced the form of those that were created. And there is a strong element of truth in Berthoff's suggestion that the Union garnered devotion because it was an "overarching abstraction" that compensated for the breakdown of families, churches, and old elites. But there is more, I believe, to the fight for the Union, and more to prewar society than this.<sup>30</sup>

<sup>29</sup> David Donald, "An Excess of Democracy," in his Lincoln Reconsidered (New York, 1956), 235; Stanley M. Elkins, Slavery: A Problem in American Institutional and Intellectual Life (Chicago, 1959), 140-56; Rowland Berthoff, An Unsettled People: Social Order and Disorder in American History (New York, 1971), 175-233.

<sup>30</sup> On the issue of the order of prewar society Clinton Rossiter comments, "Several scholars,

What is omitted in all these discussions is the factor that must be included in any description of the structure of society and the meaning of nationhood: the daily experience of the people with government. The weakness of current historical literature on the subject is its failure to consider common experience as an important element of social unity, its failure to discuss the ubiquitous personal familiarity of Americans with the institutions of law and order.

But evidence abounds to suggest the importance of this experience—primarily in the record of daily activities but also in the observations of visitors and of the nation's literary figures as well. Despite the protean nature of prewar society visitors noted again and again the ease with which Americans preserved and developed the tools of self-rule. They were struck especially by the facility with which the American people created the communities and associations they needed. "These people associate as easily as they breathe," Fredrika Bremer noted. The need for American settlers to work together, encouraged by the absence of government energy, produced a capacity for self-generated unity that overcame the natural centrifugal tendencies of equality, Tocqueville observed. After over twenty years in this country, the German-American political thinker Francis Lieber was still struck by "the thousandfold evidences of an all pervading associative spirit in all moral and practical spheres."<sup>31</sup>

What they were describing of course was the fact of democratic government—the constantly demonstrated ability of the people to make government and use it for their purposes. On the national level, as representatives from Maine tried to solve the issue of Southern slavery and senators from Alabama sought to establish a government for Kansas territory, in short, as national legislators wrestled with moral issues fomenting in places unfamiliar to them, democratic government was demonstrating its limitations. But in the range of life most people lived, self-government was creating abilities and commitments that would ensure that democratic government would endure in the United States whatever its national infirmities. Men were developing a sense that government was them and that they were responsible for order.

This personal experience with self-government was of course local, as it must be. How could one feel that he was a meaningful part of a government of thirty million people? How could one feel that his wishes were known and respected in a national government that elected presidents notably Stanley Elkins and Rowland Berthoff, have found so many signs of disorder in this period that they have written forcefully a shattering 'institutional breakdown.' Much as their researches command respect I cannot agree with so dismal a view. They have exaggerated the orderliness of eighteenth century America, underestimated both the tenacity of the family and importance of voluntary associations in the nineteenth century, made a false equation of proliferation with anarchy (as Elkins does in the case of churches) and somehow assumed that man on the move is man completely naked and exposed." The American Quest, 1790-1860 (New York, 1971), 170.

---

<sup>31</sup> Bremer, Homes of the New World, 2: 153; Tocqueville, Democracy in America, 481-84; Francis Lieber, On Civil Liberty and Self Government (Philadelphia, 1851), 129.

through electoral colleges, senators through state legislatures, and in which the only popularly elected national officials, members of the House of Representatives, represented, at the minimum, thirty thousand people? Men will always view larger concepts and institutions through the prism of their own experience.

And yet when the Union was attacked Northerners equated an attack on the national government with a threat to the self-government they had experienced. Why? The question of course defies absolute answer, but some speculation is in order. Surely important answers have been suggested by the work of Nagel, Curti, Kohn, and Arieli: men thought of themselves as a nation for the reasons these scholars suggest. But we must add to these reasons what the private experience of Northerners contributed. Among other things the blossoming national economy undoubtedly provided many of them with personal experience of connections with other states, other regions. And migration certainly was a factor. Many citizens of the West had been born in other parts of the country; their experience of what the nation comprehended was thus broader than their present locality.

But what is striking is the fact that throughout the disunion crisis of 1860-61 men spoke not merely of a national economy or of the ties of sentiment that bound them to their birthplace but constantly and passionately of the destruction of self-government should secession succeed. They were thus seriously concerned with the preservation of the institutions of government that they were a part of, and they linked their experience with that government to the survival of the Union. Local personal experience was somehow bound to the preservation of national institutions. How?

First of all, they knew that the Union was a federal union, that local government performed administrative functions that Washington could not, and should not, supply. Local government was an inextricable part of the nation's governing process. Functions of local and national government were divided, and debates raged over state versus national rights and powers. Yet the division of power and responsibility existed not for its own sake but because men believed that a national government could not function, nor could it remain the government of a free people, if it took to itself the governing of a vast continent. Men wanted to preserve local government so that the nation could function and continue to be free.

Second, and perhaps of greatest importance in establishing the connection between local self-government and the survival of the Union, was this fact: not only was local government an administrative necessity; it was the fundamental characteristic of this nation. The country had been founded with the ideal of self-rule in mind, had fought a revolution to secure it, and had created a constitution that respected it. Americans endorsed and validated this national ideal every time they established institutions of self-government.

Americans were not attached to a place; constant migration demonstrated that. They were not devoted to the land; the image of the land as real estate, the continuing land speculation attested to that. What made them Americans was that they ruled themselves wherever they went. The Scotsman Alexander McKay saw this with notable insight. What distinguished this people, he observed, was "the feeling which they cherish towards their institutions." Europeans loved the land that they and their ancestors had occupied for centuries. But "the American exhibits little or none of the local attachments which distinguish the European. His feelings are more centered upon his institutions than his mere country. . . . His affections have more to do with the social and political system with which he is connected than with the soil he inhabits." Europeans tended to be miserable when separated for long periods from their birthplace, but "give the American his institutions and he cares but little where you place him." McKay admitted that in places like New England there was strong local feeling but what was "astonishing" was "how readily even there an American makes up his mind to try his fortunes elsewhere, particularly if he contemplates removal to another part of the Union, no matter how remote . . . providing the flag of his country waves over it, and republican institutions accompany him on his wanderings."<sup>32</sup> Local institutions of democratic self-government were thus a nationalizing force, and devotion to them was the imperative bond of union.

Of course not every Northern soldier would go to war against the South with the words "law and order" on his lips. Many would enlist in the excitement of the moment. Many would seek the cheap glory of a short war and sign up for ninety days to march under the banner "the Union forever." A response of simple outrage at being attacked was natural enough and was probably widespread. Many believed that the time had come when war might purge the nation of many of its corrupting impurities—the willingness to value material wealth over nobility of character, the inclination to serve personal selfishness rather than the good of society. Republicans naturally were unwilling to destroy their party and repudiate the principles on which they had been elected by yielding to Southern threats and then rebel gunfire. The vast majority accepted the assertion of Richard Henry Dana that the North should not "buy the right to carry on the government, by any concession to slavery." For these reasons and others men went to war.<sup>33</sup>

Yet admitting these expressions of anti-Southern sentiment does not weaken the argument so far advanced for the importance of the idea of law and order in generating a willingness to fight. The source of much of this sentiment was a widespread fear that the institutions of self-government that maintained ordered liberty were threatened by slavery and the South. To describe the incidents of the 1850s that spawned or encouraged anti-Southern feelings is practically to catalog apparent threats by slavery on such Northern institutions.

<sup>32</sup> Alexander McKay, The Western World, or, Travels in the United States in 1846-47 (London, 1850), 3: ch. 11, quoted in Allan Nevins, ed., America through British Eyes (New York, 1948), 260-61.

<sup>33</sup> Richard Henry Dana, Jr., Speeches in Stirring Times, ed. Richard Henry Dana, III (Boston, 1910), 145; George M. Fredrickson, The Inner Civil War (New York, 1965), 36-50; Otto Eisenschimel and Ralph Newman, eds., The American Iliad (Indianapolis, 1947), 31-37; Eric Foner, Free Soil, Free Labor, Free Men (New York, 1970), 219-25.

The outrage against the Fugitive Slave Law was provoked in part by the Northern belief that this law defied local custom and traditions of self-government. The Kansas crisis was often described as proof that local government might be despoiled by slavery and its supporters. When Presidents Pierce and Buchanan supported the proslavery government in Kansas, despite the Free-Soil majority in the territory, their action was taken by many as a sign that the corrupting hand of slavery had captured the nation's executive office. When the Supreme Court produced the Dred Scott decision opponents saw evidence that courts were not immune from the same corruption. When Charles Sumner was attacked in Congress the event was described as more than the beating of one fire-eater by another; it was declared to be one more Southern attack on the principle of free speech in a free government and hence on Congress itself. The impact of these events would lead many of the North's conservative legal thinkers, men devoted to the preservation of existing legal and governmental institutions, to take anti-Southern positions even though they deplored the extremism of abolitionism. A potent source of anti-Southern sentiment was thus a widespread fear that slavery and its proponents endangered the institutions of self-government of the nation. Such a threat, of course, would shake Northerners profoundly, for it involved institutions that were an inextricable part of their experience as citizens of a democracy.<sup>34</sup>

Examining the strengths of democracy on the eve of secession one perceptive author hit the mark: More than any other government, wrote Henry Flanders, democracy identified the citizen with his government and thus instilled a powerful patriotism. The citizen in such a state was "an indirect but influential agent in the administration of its affairs, watches with eager interest its course and whenever difficulty or danger impends, with something more than a sense of duty or spirit of loyalty, acts boldly and greatly in its service." Such people were deeply devoted to the law, he continued, for "in doing homage to law, they do homage to themselves, the creators and preservers of law." Three years later, with the war raging, Andrew Preston Peabody was equally struck by the way in which self-government created patriotic citizens. Men who made the laws themselves felt personally responsible for them and their survival. Pea-body's language was ornate, but the meaning for the war was precise: "He in whom resides an aliquot portion of the sovereignty" he wrote, "will bear his kingly estate in mind on the numerous occasions in daily life on which he might else forget even his manhood."<sup>35</sup>

<sup>34</sup> Ableman v. Booth 21 Howard 506 (1859); Cecil [Sidney George Fisher], Kansas and the Constitution (Boston, 1856), 50-58; U.S. Congress, House, Kansas Affairs, 34th Cong., 1st sess., 1855-56, H. Rept. 200, serial set, no. 869; Joel Parker, The True Issue and the Duty of the Whigs (Cambridge, Mass., 1856), 5-11; Phillip S. Paludan, "Law and Equal Rights: The Civil War Encounter" (Ph.D. dissertation, University of Illinois, 1968).

Urging the energetic prosecution of the war James Russell Lowell had observed that "our Constitution claims our allegiance because it is law and order." Northerners did not forget their responsibility for that law and order. Foreign observers might have doubted that the nation with the least powerful national government in the world, a nation apparently so centrifugal, could and would find soldiers for a struggle to maintain unity, but those who knew the nation were not surprised. Exulting in the proof of strength that was indubitable by 1864 an obscure writer in the Atlantic Monthly remarked, "The bubble of Republicanism, which was to display such alacrity at bursting, is not the childish thing it was once deemed. . . . We have proved that we are a nation equal to the task of self-discipline and self-control."<sup>36</sup> The daily experience of Americans with self-government, with fashioning and maintaining law and order, had done its work well.

<sup>35</sup> Henry Flanders, "British Strictures on Republican Institutions," North American Review, July 1859, pp. 104-07; Andrew Preston Peabody, "Mill on Representative Government," North American Review, July 1862, p. 232.

<sup>36</sup> James Russell Lowell, "Loyalty," North American Review, Jan. 1862, p. 156; T. J. Trowbridge, "We Are a Nation," Atlantic Monthly, Dec. 1864, p. 771.

---

Buenos Aires as a Commercial-Bureaucratic City, 1880-1910: Characteristics of a City's Orientation

---

JAMES R. SCOBIE

ARGENTINA'S CAPITAL CITY and major port grew and prospered in the late nineteenth century far more than most other world cities. Its principal functions consisted of administration and commerce. For a period the development of Buenos Aires largely determined the course of national evolution, and the city virtually became the nation. That phase of rapid urban expansion failed, however, to evolve into sustained national growth, and in retrospect it may have hindered the overall development of Argentina. This article describes some internal processes of the expansion of Buenos Aires and tentatively suggests the relationship of the resultant characteristics to national development and possibly to cities elsewhere.

Europe's unprecedented demand for hides, wool, cereals, and meat from the fertile pampas region; the availability of foreign capital for railroads, port works, utilities, urban construction, and land speculation; and the massive immigration of European laborers at the peak of their productive years—all of these stimulated Argentine economic expansion at the end of the nineteenth century and nurtured the development of Buenos Aires as a commercial-bureaucratic city. Between 1880 and 1910 the value of Argentina's exports, between 96 and 98 per cent agricultural, increased more than sixfold. By 1913 over eight billion dollars (at 1950 prices) in foreign capital had been invested in Argentina; in one boom year, 1889, Argentina absorbed between 40 and 50 per cent of all British

I express my appreciation to the Social Science Research Council and to the John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation for support to begin field research in Argentina in 1968-69 on the development of the city of Buenos Aires in the late nineteenth century. I am also indebted to the directors and staffs of numerous institutions in Buenos Aires including the Biblioteca Municipal, Biblioteca del Honorable Concejo Deliberante, Biblioteca Nacional, Biblioteca del Congreso, Biblioteca de la Unión Industrial Argentina, Biblioteca del Banco Tornquist, Biblioteca del Instituto Torcuato di Tella, Biblioteca del Banco Hipotecario Nacional, Biblioteca de la Bolsa de Comercio, Biblioteca del Colegio Nacional de Buenos Aires, Biblioteca de La Prensa, Biblioteca del Instituto de Investigaciones Históricas Dr. Emilio Ravignani, and to the personnel of the archives and map collections of the Museo Mitre, Municipalidad de Buenos Aires, Dirección Geodesia de la Provincia de Buenos Aires, Archivo General de la Nación, and the Archivo Gráfico de la Nación.

capital invested outside the United Kingdom.<sup>1</sup> European immigrants flooded into Argentina to meet the demand for labor. Over four million Europeans entered Argentina in these thirty years, slightly more than the total Argentine population in 1895, and of those nearly 60 per cent remained in Argentina.<sup>2</sup>

These inputs redounded to the benefit of Buenos Aires and its immediate environs. The population of the city and province of Buenos Aires rose from 28 to 46 per cent of the national total between the first Argentine census in 1869 and the third in 1914, with an expansion from 500,000 inhabitants to 3,600,000. Twenty per cent of the national population resided in the federal district alone.<sup>3</sup> The political pre-eminence that Buenos Aires first enjoyed as viceregal capital in the late eighteenth century gained economic backing as the city became the country's major port, railhead, and financial emporium. For the world Argentina meant Buenos Aires. The other provinces remained vestiges of a colonial past, useful primarily for the production of crops or animals. The ambitious and talented, attracted by the opportunity and promise of this primate city, shook provincial dust off their shoes as quickly as possible.

The effect of these developments on Buenos Aires was reflected in a population growth from 300,000 to 1,300,000 and in a startling spread that spilled beyond the 400 blocks (2.5 square miles) built up by 1880 and reached to the limits of the federal district's 73.5 square miles by 1910 (see map). Census data clearly document the city's dependence on immigration to achieve this growth. The age pyramids and percentage distributions of the city's population constructed for 1887, 1904, and 1909 (see diagram 1 and table 1) demonstrate the tremendous contribution by the foreign born in the productive-age categories of 15 to 59. Initially the foreign-born influx had been heavily weighted in these categories toward male immigrants: the proportion of males to females stood at 2:1 in 1887. By 1904 and 1909, among foreign born in the 15 to 59 bracket the proportion of males to females had dropped to 1.3:1. Even more significant in an economy heavily dependent on manual labor was that foreign-born males in this highly employable age span outnumbered native born by 3.5:1 in 1887, 2.7:1 in 1904, and 1.7:1 in 1909.

Commerce constituted the principal activity of Buenos Aires. Although the city had to wait until nearly the turn of the century before new

<sup>1</sup> Aldo Ferrer, The Argentine Economy: An Economic History of Argentina, tr. Marjory M. Urquidí (Berkeley, 1967), 229; Henry S. Ferns, Britain and Argentina in the Nineteenth Century (Oxford, 1960), 397.

<sup>2</sup> James R. Scobie, Revolution on the Pampas: A Social History of Argentine Wheat, 1860-1910 (Austin, 1964), 169, table 1.

<sup>3</sup> In 1880 the struggle to determine the location of Argentina's national capital ended with legislation that established the federal district—the city of Buenos Aires endowed with generous boundaries to allow for expected urban growth. The subsequent expansion has led to the definition of Greater Buenos Aires with a population in 1970 of more than eight million, in which is included the federal district's three million.

DIAGRAM 1. AGE PYRAMIDS FOR THE CITY OF BUENOS AIRES, 1887, 1904, 1909<sup>a</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Compiled from the municipal censuses of Buenos Aires for 1887, 1904, and 1909.

TABLE 1. AGE DISTRIBUTION OF POPULATION IN BUENOS AIRES, 1887, 1904, 1909, BY PERCENTAGES<sup>a</sup>

|         | 1887             |         | 1904             |         | 1909             |         |
|---------|------------------|---------|------------------|---------|------------------|---------|
| Males   | Argentine        | Foreign | Argentine        | Foreign | Argentine        | Foreign |
| 0-14    | 23.3%            | 5.2%    | 30.8%            | 3.0%    | 23.9%            | 3.1%    |
| 15-29   | 10.1             | 22.6    | 12.8             | 15.4    | 14.8             | 17.5    |
| 30-44   | 3.6              | 22.7    | 5.2              | 17.6    | 8.8              | 17.1    |
| 45-59   | 1.4              | 8.4     | 1.7              | 9.7     | 2.2              | 9.1     |
| 60-74   | .5               | 1.9     | .4               | 2.9     | .4               | 2.6     |
| 75-     | .1               | .2      | .1               | .4      | .1               | .4      |
|         | 39.0%            | 61.0%   | 51.0%            | 49.0%   | 50.2%            | 49.8%   |
|         | 100.0% = 242,800 |         | 100.0% = 492,100 |         | 100.0% = 652,000 |         |
| Females |                  |         |                  |         |                  |         |
| 0-14    | 30.5%            | 5.8%    | 33.6%            | 3.1%    | 26.7%            | 3.3%    |
| 15-29   | 16.4             | 15.9    | 17.0             | 13.4    | 21.8             | 14.5    |
| 30-44   | 6.0              | 13.4    | 6.3              | 13.1    | 7.8              | 12.6    |
| 45-59   | 3.1              | 5.1     | 2.0              | 7.4     | 2.0              | 7.4     |
| 60-74   | 1.4              | 1.8     | .9               | 2.6     | .7               | 2.6     |
| 75-     | .4               | .2      | .2               | .4      | .2               | .4      |
|         | 57.8%            | 42.2%   | 60.0%            | 40.0%   | 59.2%            | 40.8%   |
|         | 100.0% = 189,900 |         | 100.0% = 452,800 |         | 100.0% = 579,700 |         |

<sup>a</sup> Calculations based on Censo general de la ciudad de Buenos Aires de 1887, 2: 37-42; de 1904, 2: 37-42; de 1909, 2: 37-42.

port works and channels overcame the handicaps of the estuary's shallow mud flats, the city easily maintained its role as the country's leading port, a position established at its foundation in the late sixteenth century. During the period from 1880 to 1910 approximately half of all overseas tonnage to Argentina entered the country through Buenos Aires, a total four to six times greater than its closest competitor, Rosario. Construction of the country's railroad network, accomplished largely during these same decades, confirmed this position of dominance. Through this railroad system passed both agricultural products destined for Brazil and Europe and manufactured goods from abroad.<sup>4</sup>

Shops and stores, always numerous for the city's size, kept pace with overall population growth and increased from 9,000 in 1887 to nearly 28,000 by 1914. In the three decades between these two censuses, while such establishments tripled in number, their value increased twelvefold. Industry lagged, with a capital investment usually half that in commerce. Most important, industrial facilities and employees were concentrated in meat packing, flour milling, wool washing, food processing, and construction, all of which supported the city's role as the entrepôt for an agricultural hinterland.

The city's dedication to bureaucratic activity cannot be measured as clearly, although its role and functions as the federal district after 1880 implied major involvement in national administration. The country's bureaucracy had long been centered at Buenos Aires. The city had served since 1618 as the seat of a governorship with authority reaching to Santa Fe and Corrientes in the north, and in 1776 it had become the capital of the viceroyalty of the Río de la Plata, which controlled all of Argentina as well as Bolivia, Paraguay, and Uruguay. During the disturbed, early years of independence Buenos Aires continued to be recognized as the center of authority. The final step, definition of a federal district in 1880, merely confirmed an establishment administrative function. Almost all political and economic decisions that affected national development were made in Buenos Aires. Here, after 1862, were the two houses of the national congress as well as the presidency, ministries, and supreme court. Men from the provinces came to the city, drawn by opportunities and offices. Repeatedly these individuals adopted Buenos Aires as their own. After 1880 the congress, largely composed of provincials, lavished funds to transform this large village of low, one-story buildings into Latin America's most elegant metropolis, a Paris of the Southern Hemisphere. National expenditures, devoted in substantial proportion to increasing the city's splendor and commercial-administrative importance, rose accordingly, from 44.5 million gold pesos spent annually in the first five years of the 1880s to 131 million annually between 1905 and 1909.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>4</sup> See Scobie, Revolution on the Pampas, 40-41, for maps of the railroad network in 1880 and 1910.

Buenos Aires at the end of the nineteenth century can thus be defined as a commercial-bureaucratic city in which almost all economic activity was concentrated in commerce and government or in closely related and subordinated fields.<sup>6</sup> The expansion of the agricultural economy with its heavy dependence on external supplies of labor and capital and its nearly total reliance on outside markets for the sale of agricultural products stimulated the growth of a major administrative and exchange center. The particular cluster of characteristics that developed from the commercial-bureaucratic orientation in turn reinforced that trend. This is not to suggest that Buenos Aires held a monopoly on these urban traits. Cities with other types of specialization clearly possess some of these characteristics. It was, however, the combination of traits brought together for a period of time that helps to characterize this particular orientation. The maturation of Buenos Aires as a commercial-bureaucratic city can be presented in simplified schematic form, as in diagram 2.

DIAGRAM 2. DYNAMICS OF THE COMMERCIAL-BUREAUCRATIC CITY

The six characteristics outlined in this diagram are explored in the following pages as a basis for suggesting the impact of the commercial-bureaucratic experience on Argentine development and the possible application of the commercial-bureaucratic example to the study of other urban centers.

EVEN IN THE 1970s the central business district for the metropolitan area of Greater Buenos Aires, with its more than eight million inhabitants, is limited to an amazingly small area of one hundred blocks (see map). The downtown core has shifted slightly northward since the colonial period but still contains the Plaza de Mayo, the heart of the city from its founding in 1580 (figure 1 shows the Plaza de Mayo and the Avenida de Mayo in 1898).

<sup>5</sup> Calculated from tables on government expenditures in Ernesto Tornquist y Cía, El desarrollo económico de la República Argentina en los últimos cincuenta años (Buenos Aires, 1920), 279-80.

<sup>6</sup> See appendix, "A Note on the Nature of the Commercial-Bureaucratic City," pp. 1071-73.

Characteristic of the Spanish city, and perhaps of the preindustrial city, is the physical location of those persons with prestige, wealth, and power around the principal plaza.<sup>7</sup> From the time of the foundation of Buenos Aires the fort, principal church, and municipal offices occupied positions on the Plaza de Mayo. The most important business and community leaders built their commercial houses and residences around the two open squares of the plaza. The intellectual and social center of the city, with the University of Buenos Aires established in 1821, the theaters, the elegant shops, and the more elite residences, developed at the south edge of the plaza and extended south for five or six blocks. As one moved away from the plaza the wealth and prestige of the residents tended to decrease until one reached open fields and small farm plots. At mid-nineteenth century these outskirts still encircled the city at distances of less than a mile from the plaza.

During the period from 1880 to 1910 the commercial and elite center of the city moved northward. By the end of the century it extended eight or nine blocks north and west from the Plaza de Mayo and only one or two blocks south. The colonial-style architecture, which gathered family and servants around three interior patios (see floor plan of colonial-style house in diagram 3), no longer satisfied the wealthy. This earlier type of architecture presented a wall to the outside world broken only by a heavy wooden door and two or three barred windows. Such dwellings sheltered the family and its way of life from outsiders, even from neighbors. By the end of the nineteenth century, however, the rich increasingly aspired to lavish and ostentatious three- and four-storied mansions. To acquire necessary space they abandoned much of the area south of the plaza to tenements or slums and built up the district of Barrio Norte,<sup>8</sup> fifteen to twenty-five blocks northwest of the plaza (figure 2 shows an established street of elite residences, Avenida Alvear, around 1900).

Despite this slight northward adjustment the affluent clung to the city's center, in large measure because of the extraordinary spatial concentra-

<sup>7</sup> Particularly useful in understanding Latin American urban development is the extensive work done by Richard M. Morse. His bibliographical articles in the Latin American Research Review are especially pertinent: "Recent Research on Latin American Urbanization: A Selective Survey with Commentary," vol. 1, no. 1 (1965): 35-74; "Trends and Issues in Latin American Urban Research, 1965-1970," vol. 6, nos. 1 and 2 (1971): 3-52, 19-75, respectively. Also helpful is Morse's "Some Characteristics of Latin American Urban History," AHR, 67 (1961-62): 317-38.

<sup>8</sup> The use of the word "barrio" in the name of this district, which covered approximately sixty city blocks, has nothing to do with the small neighborhood unit of two to five blocks discussed later on pages 1052-56.

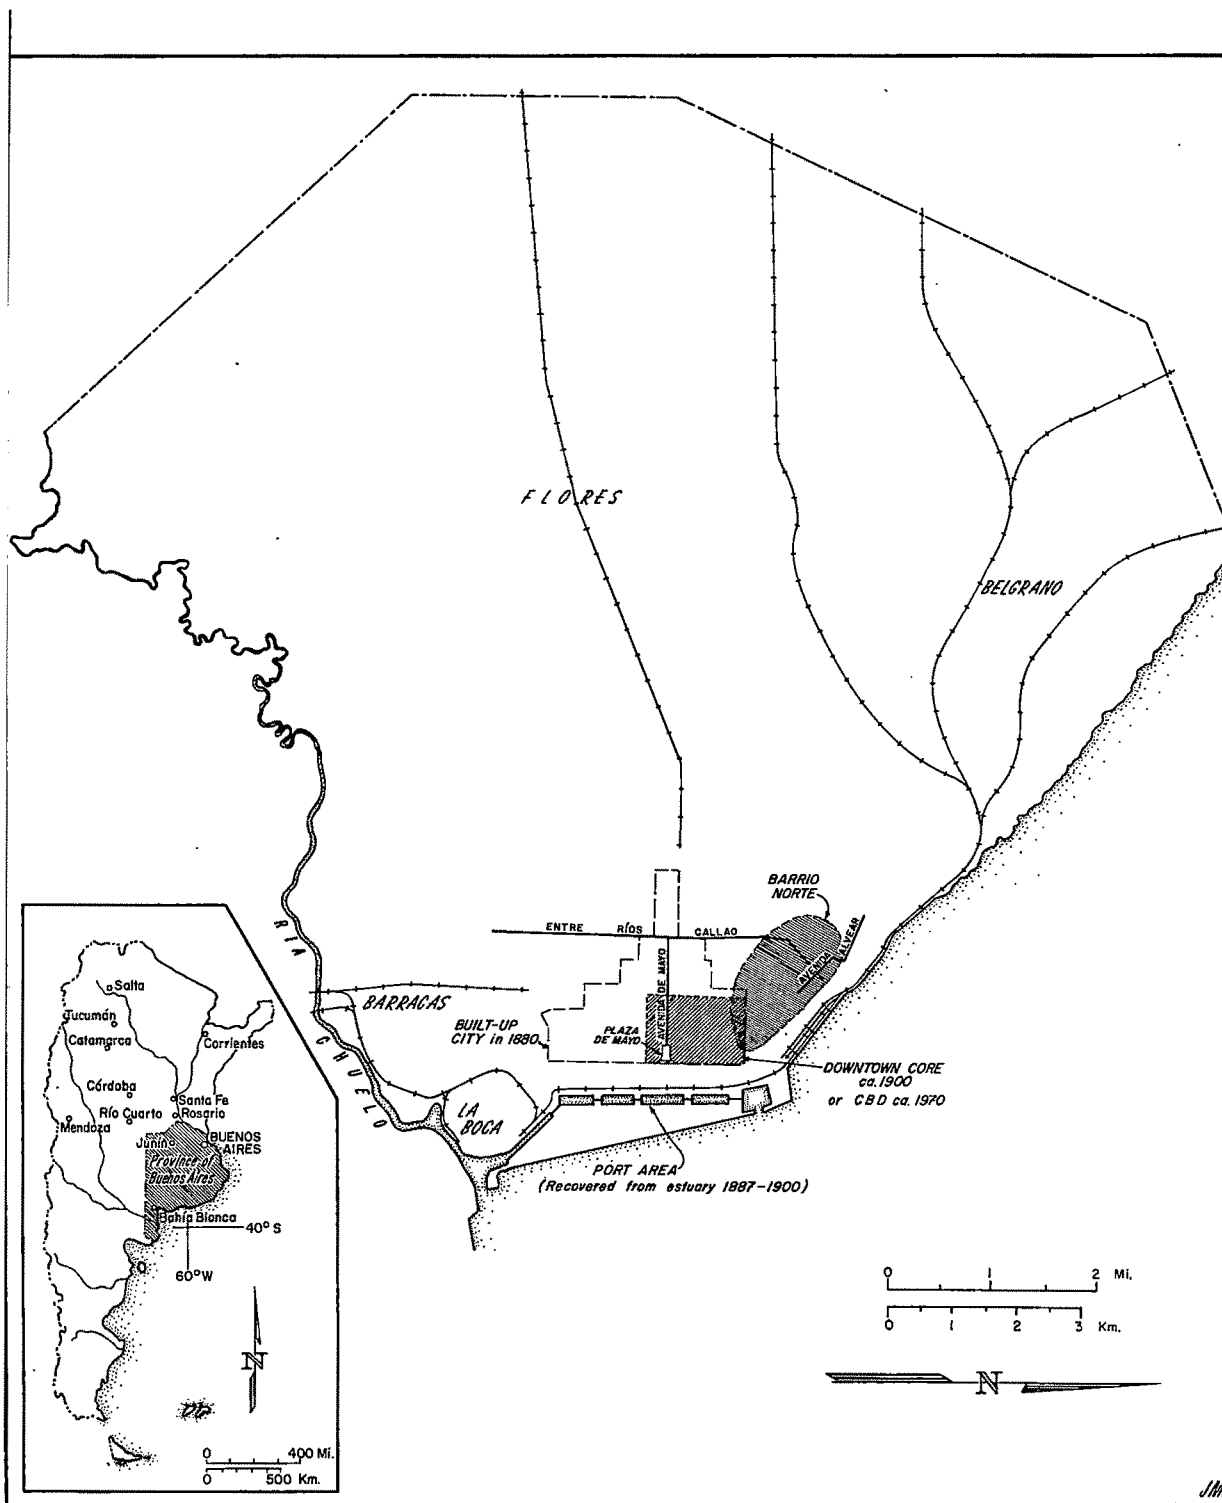

tion of commercial, financial, administrative, social, and intellectual activities in the downtown core. In a commercial-bureaucratic city, housing and services designed primarily for the elite classes tend to be concentrated at the core, partly for the convenience and economy of those classes and partly because the smallness of the elite allows for such compactness. Buenos Aires has often been compared to Goliath's head, and many have attributed Argentina's problems to the fact that a sprawling nation is dominated by a single primate city. But as the Revista Municipal noted in 1910, "The comparison also has application within the city of Buenos Aires itself, which suffers from the same defect of an enormous extension served by a tiny nucleus at its center where an attempt is made to concentrate all urban activities."<sup>9</sup> The financial affairs of the nation—in the stock exchange, cereal exchange, and the country's twenty-two major banks—were conducted along a few blocks of San Martín and Bartolomé Mitre, two blocks from the Plaza de Mayo (figure 3 shows a section of this financial district around 1910). When the city's first large department stores, Gath y Chaves and A la Ciudad de Londres, opened at the end of the nineteenth century, each occupied several-storied buildings only a block from the plaza. The national congress, executive office building, ministries, law courts, and municipal and national offices were all located on the plaza or within a block's distance.<sup>10</sup> Other activities also crowded into the core. Wholesale trade remained concentrated in the blocks adjoining the plaza, despite increasing problems of storage and traffic. Not until the decade of the 1910s did the law and medical faculties move from the core to a location twenty blocks northwest of the plaza. Theaters and social clubs likewise remained close to the plaza. The first two elite clubs, the Club del Progreso and Club del Plata, both established in the 1850s, were located just to the south of the plaza. When these were supplanted in the 1880s by two new prestige clubs, the Jockey Club and the Círculo de Armas, the preferred locations had shifted several blocks to the north. The opening in 1908 of the magnificent Colón Opera House nine blocks to the northwest of the plaza served to enlarge slightly the social and cultural core but did not change the pull that the center exerted on the city's well-to-do.

While the concentration of these urban and frequently national activities may well have contributed to the elite's desire to remain near the downtown core, the fact that this core provided services, offices, and often residences primarily for the upper classes but not for the mass of the porteño populace<sup>11</sup> explains how such concentration was feasible. The

<sup>9</sup> Revista Municipal, Aug. 15, 1910, p. 11.

<sup>10</sup> A new building for the national congress was erected at the opposite end of the mile-long Avenida de Mayo from the Plaza de Mayo. The congress moved its sessions from the old building on the Plaza de Mayo to this new location in 1906.

<sup>11</sup> The term porteño is used as a noun or adjective to describe association with the city of Buenos Aires.

THE FEDERAL DISTRICT OR THE CITY OF BUENOS AIRES, 1880-1910 (WITH INSET OF ARGENTINA)

Fig. 1. The Plaza de Mayo and the recently completed Avenida de Mayo in 1898, looking west from the Casa Rosada, or executive office building. Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, Archivo Gráfico, Colección Sociedad Fotográfica Argentina de Aficionados (hereafter AG, SFAA).

Fig. 2. An elite residential area along Avenida Alvear in Barrio Norte, ca. 1900. Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, AG, SFAA.

Fig. 3. The financial district, ca. 1910, corner of Bartolomé Mitre and Reconquista looking west along Bartolomé Mitre. Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, AG, SFAA.

number of porteño men in the upper classes increased from 7,000 in 1887, to 11,000 in 1895, to 16,000 in 1904, to 20,000 in 1909, and to 27,000 by 1914, but remained constant at 4 to 5 per cent of the total employed male population in the city (see table 2 and the discussion of social structure, pp. 1056–64).<sup>12</sup> When these figures are divided by a factor of at least four to compensate for extended families, the evidence suggests that the upper classes were constituted by fewer than 2,000 families in 1887 and approximately 7,000 families by 1914. Such numbers clearly could be accommodated in areas north of the Plaza de Mayo and in Barrio Norte without creating major pressures or problems. In 1910, therefore, the elite still looked to the downtown core as its place of business and pleasure and frequently as home. For these individuals this was the city.

<sup>12</sup> The principal sources for census materials used in this article are the published reports of national and municipal censuses: Censo nacional de 1869 (Buenos Aires, 1872); Censo general de la ciudad de Buenos Aires de 1887, 2 vols. (Buenos Aires, 1889); Censo nacional de 1895, 3 vols. (Buenos Aires, 1898); Censo general de la ciudad de Buenos Aires de 1904 (Buenos Aires, 1906); Censo general de la ciudad de Buenos Aires de 1909, 3 vols. (Buenos Aires, 1910); Censo nacional de 1914, 10 vols. (Buenos Aires, 1916–17).

DESPITE THE PRESTIGE attached to the center of a commercial-bureaucratic city, pockets of slum settlement inhabited largely by recent arrivals develop at the heart of the city in a fashion similar to that in many other types of urban centers. In these slum settlements the newcomers benefit from low rents in high-density housing and closeness to work while they acquire familiarity with the city and its ways. Thus in Buenos Aires the downtown area served as an initial place of residence for many of the immigrants who entered Argentina.

The porteño population growth at the end of the nineteenth century was extraordinary. To a population of 300,000 in 1880 was added one million by 1910. A trickle of migration from the Argentine provinces; a rapid fall in the death rate after 1900 because of improved public health and sanitation; a continued high birthrate, especially among immigrant women; and, most important, a massive influx of immigrants from Southern Europe—all of these contributed to the demographic explosion. The largest group, the recently arrived European laborers, gravitated to the urban core and settled in slum housing. Some of these tenements, or conventillos, were interspersed in the same block as the homes of more accommodated groups; others were concentrated in areas abandoned by the wealthy in their northward push.

The only two censuses that record conventillo dwellers, those of 1887 and 1904, indicate a concentration of tenement settlement adjacent to the Plaza de Mayo. Twenty-seven per cent of the 193,000 individuals in the three census districts surrounding the Plaza de Mayo, an area extending sixteen blocks west, thirteen blocks south, and eight blocks north of the plaza, occupied slum housing in 1904. The smaller census districts used in 1887 reveal that this proportion increased to one-third or more in the areas immediately to the south of the plaza and along the waterfront southeast and northeast. The number of slum dwellers declined as one moved away from the downtown core and virtually disappeared at a distance of forty blocks from the plaza. According to the 1887 census, foreign born constituted 72 per cent of the slums' inhabitants. If one could allow for the children born in Argentina to foreign parents as well as for recently arrived migrants from the provinces, the percentage of new arrivals more likely approximated 90 or 95 per cent.

These slums shared the characteristics of high-density, low-income settlements of inner cities elsewhere. The porteño slum dated from the mid-nineteenth century when the increasing need for manual laborers at the city's center and port and the rising tide of immigrants showed that workers and their families could be profitably crammed into small spaces. As old colonial-style buildings constructed around two or three interior patios deteriorated and became less desirable as single-family dwellings, rooms that opened off the patios were rented to families or groups of single men. Gradually property owners devised more profitable ways to divide up space. In the highest density type of construction a corridor ran from the street entrance to the rear of the building. Partitions and extensions on both sides of the corridor filled most of the patio space with rooms measuring roughly twelve feet by twelve. Thus the colonial-style house that had been typically occupied by a family of twenty-five (fifteen members and ten servants) served 340 persons when subdivided (see diagram 3). Profits were so high—estimated at 3 to 4 per cent per month—that by the late 1860s buildings were constructed specifically for this purpose.<sup>13</sup>

Descriptions from the beginning of the twentieth century depict the conditions of conventillo life.<sup>14</sup> The one-room dwelling with forty to one hundred cubic yards of air served a family with two to five children or a group of four or five single men. At the door to each room stood a pile of wooden boxes. One generally held a basin for washing; another a charcoal brazier on which to cook the daily watery stew, or puchero; and garbage accumulated in a third. Two or three iron cots, a pine table, a few wooden chairs, an old trunk, perhaps a sewing machine, and more boxes completed the furnishings. Light came from the open door and one window, from an oil or gas lamp, or occasionally from a bare electric light bulb. On the once-whitewashed walls were tacked pictures of popular heroes, generals, or kings torn from magazines, an image of the Madonna and a couple of saints, perhaps a faded photograph of family members in Europe. The women often eked out miserable incomes by taking in laundry and washing and drying it in the patios. Others ironed or sewed on a piecework basis. Some men worked here: in one corner a shoemaker might ply his trade, in another a man might bend over a small table repairing watches. The great majority of men left at 4:30 on summer mornings and at 6:00 on winter days and returned twelve hours later after strenuous labor on the docks and construction sites.

Municipal authorities waged a constant struggle with the conventillo owners, "who are the richest and most respected men of Buenos Aires."<sup>15</sup> By 1900 regulations ruled that conventillos had to be above street level, receive a yearly whitewashing, have a concrete patio at least fifteen feet wide, contain latrines and baths, and include one window plus a door in each room. Rooms, if anything, decreased in size, baths remained a rarity, and a latrine served as many as seventy persons. But there was an undeniable improvement in the water supply and in sewage disposal, which was reflected in the falling death rate at the city's center.

Newly arrived laborers in the city thus adjusted to the environment of Buenos Aires largely through the conventillos located in or near the down-

<sup>13</sup> La Prensa, Sept. 8, 1901, p. 4.

<sup>14</sup> Particularly vivid descriptions of conventillo life and conditions are found in Boletín del Departamento Nacional del Trabajo, no. 5 (1908): 230-40; Adrián Patroni, Los trabajadores en la Argentina (Buenos Aires, 1898), 126-33; Guillermo Rawson, "Estudio sobre las casas de inquilinato en Buenos Aires," Escritos y discursos, 2 vols. (Buenos Aires, 1891), 2: 110-14, 142-44; and Samuel Gáché, Les logements ouvriers à Buenos-Ayres (Paris, 1900).

<sup>15</sup> La Prensa, Jan. 3, 1874, p. 1.

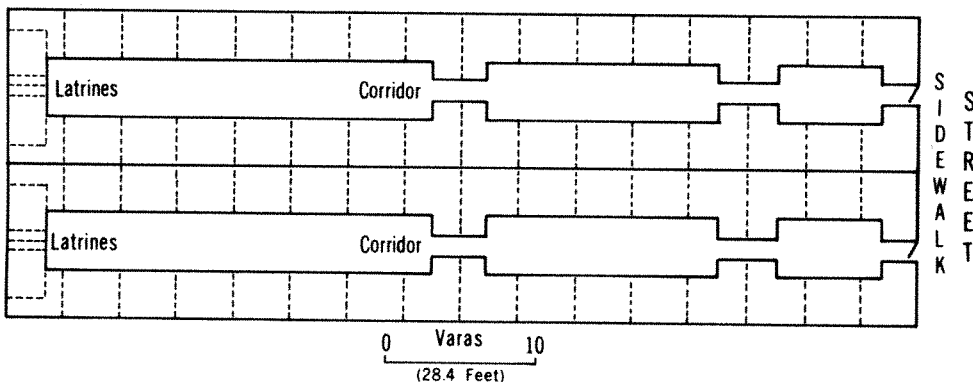

DIAGRAM 3. COLONIAL-STYLE HOUSE AND ITS CONVERSION INTO A CONVENTILLO, CITY OF BUENOS AIRES

COLONIAL-STYLE HOUSE: Built on lot 20 varas by 60 (56.8 feet by 170.4), occupied normally by 25 persons (15 members of the family and 10 servants).

CONVENTILLO: Formed on the same city lot, but with 68 rooms, each normally housing 5 inhabitants, or a total of 340 persons.

town core. Some of the poor and humble, particularly the native-born migrants from the interior provinces, also ringed the city's outskirts with their shacks and thus continued a pattern established in the colonial period. Swampy or frequently flooded areas, public domain slated for port works, and localities far removed from transportation facilities provided these squatters with land. The huts might vary according to location and time from straw-thatched roofs and mud-plastered walls to corrugated iron sheets and flattened oil cans, but they all shared remoteness from rent and tax collectors (figures 4 and 5 show shacks in the port area and the interior of a hut around 1900). The graphic term of cinta negra, or "black belt," did not emerge until years later, but the description printed in the Revista Municipal in 1896 vividly suggests the environment of these outlying squatter settlements.

The stream bed of Maldonado, the marshes of Flores, the slaughterhouse district, the Riachuelo stream, La Boca district, and the lagoons in the port zone surround the central city like a chain, the links of which are formed by morasses, bogs, pools of stagnant water, and piles of garbage, reinforced by a rosary of workshops, small plants, and other establishments that have no means to dispose of their wastes without endangering public health.<sup>16</sup>

THE CITY'S MOST IMPRESSIVE spatial growth occurred in the areas between the remote and undesirable outskirts and the downtown core. This striking transformation of the landscape emerges graphically in two photographs (figures 6 and 7), taken from the same spot but at an interval of thirty years, of the main avenue leading south from the downtown core toward Barracas. The initial experience of Buenos Aires as a "walking" city had been to push outward in a rough semicircle from its center at the Plaza de Mayo. The building of railroads in the 1860s and of streetcar lines after 1870 distorted this expansion with three prongs, one south from the center toward the coastal trade and fishing operations in La Boca, one due west from the plaza to Flores, and the other north along the estuary to Belgrano. The subsequent addition of two more major railroad lines in the northwestern section of the federal district further attracted population in this direction. Built-up blocks gradually replaced the small farms and open fields that until the 1880s had separated these villages from the central city.

The city's highest population density in the 1880s occurred in an area well served by streetcar lines, a band several blocks wide and some fifteen blocks long located eight to ten blocks west of the Plaza de Mayo. This band moved outward, expanding slightly in width and length, until by 1910 it stabilized immediately west of the streets of Entre Ríos/Callao, fifteen blocks from the plaza. From this area and from the conventillos that were located even closer to the downtown core came the men and women who helped extend Buenos Aires from a one-mile walking radius in 1880 to built-up zones scattered throughout the federal district by 1910, some as much as ten miles from the Plaza de Mayo.

In the commercial-bureaucratic environment the masses of blue-collar-white-collar workers, not drawn together by concentrations of industry and lacking the class consciousness and the access to lineage, education, and wealth monopolized by the upper classes, seek their own kind of upward mobility and security in ownership of individual house lots and homes remote from the downtown core. The outward expansion of Buenos Aires thus owed much to the push of the common man toward better living conditions and cheaper land or rents on the urban periphery. Once established by several years' residence in a conventillo or in other high-density housing near the downtown core, the immigrant or migrant

<sup>16</sup> Revista Municipal, Jan. 8, 1896, p. 2. A commentary on the cinta negra appears in Alcides Greca, Problemas del urbanismo en la República Argentina (Santa Fe, 1939), 34-35.

Fig. 4. Squatter shacks in the port area of Buenos Aires, ca. 1905. Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, AG, SFAA.

Fig. 5. Interior of a squatter hut, ca. 1900. Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, AG, Colección Witcomb.

Fig. 6. A view taken ca. 1875, looking south toward Barracas along Calle Larga (subsequently renamed Avenida Montes de Oca), the main street linking this suburb to the central part of Buenos Aires. Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, AG, Colección Witcomb.

Fig. 7. A view taken in 1905, from the same spot as figure 6, looking south toward Barracas along Avenida Montes de Oca. Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, AG.

laborer began to aspire for his plot of land on the outskirts.<sup>17</sup> So did the sons and daughters, the second generation now tied to Argentina and to Buenos Aires by birth, education, and environment. These were the individuals who sought security and mobility in one- to three-room houses along the dirt streets that sprouted for six or seven blocks on each side of streetcar or railroad lines. As with the squatter settlements, however, cheap lands and easy terms of payment also brought penalties in the form of streets that became quagmires of mud when it rained, stagnant ponds of slaughterhouse residue, a nearly total lack of police protection, and the noise, dust, smoke, and smell of tanneries, distilleries, brick factories, and sawmills.

Two major economic booms, 1884-89 and 1905-12, encouraged the construction of modest worker dwellings as well as of public works, warehouses, railroads, mansions, and chalets. Real wages for the unmarried laborer, especially the skilled worker, or for the family with several teen-aged and consequently employable children, increased slightly between 1905 and 1912. Fortunate workers could put aside as much as two or three days of wages per month. Home ownership thus came within the grasp of a number of workers. A suburban lot at the beginning of the twentieth century could be paid for with two hundred days of labor by a skilled mechanic, and a one-room house built for the equivalent of one hundred days of work, totaling an investment of roughly twelve to fifteen years of savings.<sup>18</sup> Auctioneers and landowners amassed fortunes from the sale of low-lying, often marginal lands on the city's fringe, but after 1900 they provided opportunities to purchase tiny lots with small monthly payments over six, eight, even twelve years. The rapid expansion of population and housing in census district number 1, which covered the whole southwest corner of the federal district with its nearly twenty-one square miles, gave evidence of those who advanced their social standing. Population had increased in this district from 17,000 in 1904, to 48,000 by 1909, and to 103,000 by 1914; of the 7,600 houses in 1909, 4,500 had three rooms or less; by 1914, out of a total of 13,900 houses, 9,300 fell into that modest category.

The move to the outskirts, occasionally by renting but more often through ownership of lot and house, brought personal improvements. The modest home, especially if built by the owner himself on holidays and Sundays, typically began with one room located five to ten yards back from the street. At one end was the kitchen, consisting merely of a brazier and a wooden shelf with some pans and dishes. Toward the back of the lot a well was sunk to the depth of fifteen or twenty feet, while close to the house, and unfortunately too close to the well, was a latrine. At that stage it might appear that little had been gained over the conventillo, and indeed the conviviality of close neighbors, the bustle of downtown streets, and the closeness to work had been lost. But within a decade, with the lot paid for and the labor of his oldest children to swell the family income, this rising member among porteño blue-collar-white-collar workers could add two more rooms, usually bedrooms. In the second decade, with his younger daughters aspiring to some degree of social advancement, he might build a living room on the front of the house and bring his front door and windows flush with the recently constructed sidewalk.<sup>19</sup> Improved transportation, especially electrification and unification of the streetcar system between 1900 and 1910, speeded the outward movement. The conventillo provided a place to adapt to Argentine culture and customs. But one had to leave the conventillo in order to move upwards socially. Each immigrant wave—the French in the 1850s, the Italians in the 1870s, and the Spanish in the first decade of the twentieth century—occupied downtown conventillos for a decade or so. Once the adjustment had been made, the newcomer or his children were usually on their way toward the outskirts where lands or rents were cheap and where the dream of being a landowner and householder might be realized.

<sup>17</sup> Additional investigation is needed to link this dream of land on the outskirts to the social and reform ideologies present in Buenos Aires. The suggestions that emerge from Sam B. Warner, Jr., Streetcar Suburbs: The Process of Growth in Boston, 1870-1900 (Cambridge, Mass., 1962), cast light on this process in the United States and raise questions that still need to be answered in the case of Buenos Aires.

<sup>18</sup> Calculated on the basis of a daily wage of 2.50 gold pesos, the average for a skilled workman in the period from 1904 to 1912, and a monthly savings of two days' wages. Average suburban lots ranged in price from 200 to 500 gold pesos, while a one-room house could be built for the equivalent of 200 to 250 gold pesos.

BECAUSE OF THE TENDENCY of a commercial-bureaucratic city to sprawl outward as the common man searches for cheap land and because the principal function of the downtown core is to serve the upper classes, the local neighborhood acquires particular significance and importance for the mass of the population. The outward expansion of Buenos Aires was really built around tiny neighborhoods that provided the social, psychological, and economic focus for the common man in much the same fashion that the downtown core served the upper classes. No censuses or statistical reports survey the neighborhood unit, since the barrio rested merely on the relationships and attitudes of its inhabitants. Only where isolation or ethnic characteristics imposed visible boundaries or distinctive atmosphere could the components of the barrio be measured. Beyond that the researcher must rely on local reminiscences and draw conclusions from still existent barrio phenomena in the city.<sup>20</sup>

<sup>19</sup> Manuel de Oliveira Lima, En la Argentina: Impresiones de 1918-19, tr. Valentín Diego (Montevideo, 1920), 99-100.

<sup>20</sup> Treatment of some of these characteristics in an outlying and isolated barrio appears in the recollections of Lucas Benítez, "Los Olivos:" Barracas al Norte, 1895-1960 (Buenos Aires, 1965). Contemporary newspaper accounts of conditions in the compact settlements or ghettos of Russian Jews and of Syrians, or turcos, add further insights. It is nearly impossible, however, to present the barrio phenomenon in precise, measurable terms. Some understanding of its existence emerges from examining the manuscript census returns for 1869 and 1895 (see

The area of a barrio was small (see diagram 4). It rarely exceeded five blocks and more usually consisted of two or three; yet its population might range from fifty persons to three thousand. The elementary school provided a common denominator for a group of barrios, but school districts did not outline the barrio's area. Churches likewise served large sections of the city, and a parish might encompass from five to as many as fifty barrios. Butcher shops, grocery stores, and bakeries afforded meeting places for women and stimulated the sense of neighborhood. The grocery store, or almacen, especially in outlying areas, served as credit institution, post office, and social center. Here the women shopped, and the men gathered to exchange small talk or to read a newspaper. The area from which a store drew clientele provided, however, only one of several measurements to define the barrio. In more developed areas bars or cafés gave another basic link. For the workingman these were his clubs. The social communication and importance attached to these cafés by common people were as vital as membership in the Jockey Club was to the porteño elite.

The attachments to the barrio, however, existed mainly at a surface level. The barrio brought with it little sense of cooperative effort or close personal contact between its inhabitants. Neighbors might gossip at the local store counter, or on hot summer evenings they might pull chairs out to their sidewalk entrance and exchange salutations and perhaps a few pleasantries with adjoining households. But the patio style of architecture and the sheltered and guarded home life that had characterized the affluent classes until the 1880s continued to be followed by the artisan, skilled-labor, and white-collar masses (figure 8 shows the street and house fronts of an established and prosperous barrio around 1900). While the three-patio design was not strictly adhered to, the result was a home that enclosed its members rather than turning them outward toward the street. Surveyors still used the earlier measure of ten varas, or 8.66 meters (28.4 feet), as a standard frontage. House lots, even when carved out of open fields, emerged as elongated rectangles with a depth three to six times the frontage. The owner tended to enclose this lot with an adobe or brick wall, which ran along the boundary lines, and to construct his building so the front door would open on the sidewalk. The inhabitants of a barrio, therefore, knew each other superficially and only infrequently entered one another's homes. Significantly, common action or cooperation to secure sewers, gas, electricity, or other local improvements occurred rarely and only when generated throughout a parish or group of barrios by some business or political spokesman.

The barrio, nevertheless, brought a type of village atmosphere to the note 21 below). Its characteristics can be grasped by those who have lived in such small neighborhood units. Why does one patronize a grocery store at one end of the block, yet never enter another at the opposite end of the same block? Or why does one always go to one of two equidistant cafés? The barrio's description, therefore, owes much to personal experiences and local reminiscences.

DIAGRAM 4. SCHEMATIC PLAN OF A TYPICAL PORTEÑO BARRIO

Fig. 8. An established barrio, ca. 1900, with sidewalks and substantial housing.
Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, AG.

city. Before 1910 the place of work for shopkeepers and most skilled laborers and artisans was located in the same barrio as their residences. Others, particularly white-collar workers and day laborers, traveled to the central business district or port area to work but turned to the barrio for all other needs. The barrio protected the immigrant and native alike from the impersonality and tensions of a metropolis. In much the same way that the conventillo bridged the gap from the Old World to the New for many immigrants, so the barrio afforded attachments, amusements, and amenities in tiny units over the whole city. Individuals belonged to a particular barrio and only secondarily and in minor degree to a parish or the city. Many persons, especially women, rarely left the several blocks of their neighborhood.

The barrio changed continually with the rapid expansion of the city. It first began to display an ethnic character during the massive European immigration to the Río de la Plata that started in the 1860s. Within barrios subneighborhoods developed, often consisting merely of several adjacent households of Piedmontese, Neapolitan, or Genoese immigrants or of Asturian, Catalan, or Basque newcomers. Occupational groups tended to reproduce a similar pattern of subneighborhoods. Unpublished census returns tell of clusters of unskilled manual laborers, of artisans and skilled laborers, and of white-collar employees.<sup>21</sup>

By 1910 the barrio had reached the height of its psychological, social, and economic importance. In the vast reaches of Buenos Aires there remained innumerable small units, often possessing imprecise or changing boundaries and loyalties. The neighborhood workshop, grocery store, butcher shop, bakery, and café continued to play important roles in the lives of barrio dwellers. Local gossip, children's play, and elementary schooling still provided contact and satisfaction. One could stroll along shade-covered and mud-rutted streets within a few blocks of any of the city's thoroughfares and feel years removed from the metropolis. But the city had begun to supplement the barrio. New forces—increased educational facilities, broadening occupational opportunities, improved transportation, large downtown stores, and popularized entertainment—drew individuals out of the barrio. With the low, ten-centavo fare on streetcars, resulting from electrification and unification of the streetcar system in the first decade of the twentieth century, the common man could range further afield in search of work. He also on occasion took his family outside the barrio. The laboring masses, although only when dressed in their best clothes, began to stroll the downtown avenues. The huge sums spent on horse races and other forms of gambling, the gradual improvement of the porteño parks, the audiences drawn to circuses, musical reviews, theatrical farces, lectures, and the increasingly popular Sunday pastime of marches and demonstrations all suggest that the barrio was losing some influence in the lives of its residents.

<sup>21</sup> These characteristics do not emerge in the published census returns because the size of census districts is too large, ranging from the smallest district in 1869 and 1887, which encompassed forty blocks or one-quarter of a square mile, to the largest district in 1895, 1904, 1909, and 1914, covering twenty-one square miles. Visual inspection of the manuscript census returns for 1869 and 1895, just recently uncovered in the Archivo General de la Nación, provides the basis for these statements. I am starting systematic analysis of this data, especially for the blocks closest to the Plaza de Mayo, in order to establish the spatial and social characteristics of the city's growth.

But even with such changes the barrio retained certain aspects of its vitality. In the Buenos Aires of the 1970s the downtown center attracts porteños of many backgrounds and social classes for business or amusement. The growth of secondary centers in the suburbs provides additional and often more convenient places for the concentration of marketing and entertainment facilities. But most city dwellers still attach themselves to an area of several blocks, which contains the institutions they most frequently use and where they feel at home.

THE DEDICATION TO TRADE and administration within a city requires a broad spread of occupations from manual through blue-collar-white-collar. The outward sprawl of the commercial-bureaucratic city, the absence of concentrated industrial zones, and the opportunity for social mobility throughout a whole range of occupational categories tend to postpone the sense of belonging to a particular class or classes among nonelite groups. The small numbers of elite individuals needed to control land, commerce, and government are closely interrelated by family ties. They possess, furthermore, a virtual monopoly on higher education and sizable fortunes as well as a clear class consciousness separating them from the rest of society.

In Latin America the application of a three-class model—upper, middle, and lower—has long troubled historians as well as political scientists and sociologists.<sup>22</sup> Although such categories seem to have some value once industry has developed or subgroups become conscious of common interests, the categories tend to confuse understanding of late nineteenth-century and early twentieth-century social realities. Even today these categories have little relevance to Paraguay, Haiti, and several of the Central American republics. More appropriate to the late nineteenth-century porteño scene, therefore, are terms that point to the sharp social distinction between those with family, education, and wealth, namely the upper classes, and the vast range of occupational strata filled by the common man or worker.

The upper classes possessed class consciousness and saw themselves as those who controlled Argentina. Below them, however, it is difficult to discover any homogeneity, common interests, group identification, or even any realistic subdivisions. The common man in Buenos Aires knew he did not belong to the upper classes, but he rarely considered himself a member of any class category.<sup>23</sup> He fitted into a particular occupational stratum. Between strata there might be considerable differentiation in training, income, and status. But there also existed considerable mobility.

<sup>22</sup> John J. Johnson, Political Change in Latin America: The Emergence of the Middle Sectors (Stanford, 1958), has applied the model with some misgivings and difficulties to the Latin American scene. Works such as Gino Germani, Estructura social de la Argentina (Buenos Aires, 1955), and his Política y sociedad en una época de transición de la sociedad tradicional a la sociedad de las masas (Buenos Aires, 1962); Claudio Veliz, ed., Obstacles to Change in Latin America (New York, 1965); and Irving L. Horowitz, ed., Masses in Latin America (New York, 1970), suggest further problems with the application of such a model.

In the Argentine context, therefore, the best classifier of social structure is occupation. It reflects the primary factor of differentiation, the family, which in turn largely determines other components such as education and wealth. Occupation also can be readily extracted from published census reports.

The professional, administrative, and owner groups of society constituted the upper classes. Within this elite fell the lawyers and other professionals such as physicians, architects, engineers, and accountants; students at university and colegio (roughly high school-junior college) level; ranchers and cattlemen; owners of large industrial and commercial establishments; and heads of sections or offices in the government bureaucracy.<sup>24</sup> The occupational breakdown for the male population over fourteen years of age taken from the censuses of 1887, 1895, 1904, 1909, and 1914 (see table 2) indicates that between 4 and 5 per cent qualified as upper class in the city.<sup>25</sup>

<sup>23</sup> By the end of the period under discussion an awareness or consciousness of class had begun to appear in certain highly unionized trades and occupations in the city of Buenos Aires, as evidenced by strike manifestoes, anarchist propaganda, labor department reports, Socialist party activity, and other signs of labor solidarity. See Hobart A. Spalding, Jr., ed., La clase trabajadora argentina: Documentos para su historia, 1890-1912 (Buenos Aires, 1970), and Sebastián Marotta, El movimiento sindical argentino, 3 vols. (Buenos Aires, 1960-70).

<sup>24</sup> Overlaps, discrepancies, and disagreement inevitably arise when one manipulates gross figures that provide no indication of the most easily quantifiable factor, namely wealth or income. For that reason I have counted only those categories that can be accepted as elite or prestige positions in early twentieth-century Argentina. From the extensive list of occupations given in the 1914 national census (4: 201-12) I have selected the following as upper class: criadores, cabañeros, estancieros, hacendados, invernadores, banqueros, capitalistas, empresarios, exportadores, gerentes, importadores, clérigos, sacerdotes, abogados, contadores públicos, escribanos, procuradores, dentistas, médicos, químicos, estudiantes secundarios y universitarios, profesores de enseñanza secundaria y universitaria, agrimensores, agrónomos, doctores, escritores, ingenieros, matemáticos, periodistas, péritos. These categories or easily recognizable substitutes appear in all the preceding censuses. In such a list, however, appears no specific enumeration of heads of government offices or owners of major industrial and commercial establishments, since there is no reliable measure from census data to establish the percentage or number of such positions as distinct from government employees, artisans, or shopkeepers in general. Several assumptions are made in justification of this omission: that the numbers of top bureaucrats and wealthy owners, as developed from other sources such as almanacs and city directories, were small and did not amount, even in 1914, to more than one thousand individuals; that inclusion of individuals in categories on the borderline of elite status such as contadores públicos, procuradores, and periodistas balance some of those omitted in administrative and owner functions; and, most important, that given the role of professional titles and landed wealth in Argentina, a large proportion of the elite administrative-owner category will appear under headings of banqueros, capitalistas, empresarios, abogados, escribanos, and ingenieros or as estancieros and hacendados.

<sup>25</sup> Women have been omitted from these calculations since a valid sense of the social structure as related to occupation in Argentina can only be secured at this time from male em-

TABLE 2. PERCENTAGES OF TOTAL EMPLOYED MALE POPULATION OVER FOURTEEN YEARS OF AGE IN THE CITY OF BUENOS AIRES, DISTRIBUTED BY SOCIAL STRUCTURE<sup>a</sup>

|   | 1887    | 1895    | 1904    | 1909    | 1914    |
|---|---------|---------|---------|---------|---------|
| Elite or Upper Classes <sup>b</sup>                                       | 4.3%    | 4.5%    | 5.1%    | 4.3%    | 4.5%    |
| Blue-Collar-White-Collar <sup>b</sup>                                     | 63.3    | 66.7    | 69.9    | 72.7    | 71.1    |
| Manual Labor <sup>b</sup>   | 32.4    | 28.8    | 25.0    | 23.0    | 24.4    |
|   | 100.0%  | 100.0%  | 100.0%  | 100.0%  | 100.0%  |
| N =   | 156,900 | 234,000 | 312,800 | 462,300 | 597,800 |
| less secondary anduniversity students notlisted in census in 1887 | -2,700  |         |         |         |         |
|   | 154,200 |         |         |         |         |
| plus individuals listed as"unclassified" in census                    | +20,300 | +18,100 | +21,800 | +25,700 | +29,100 |
| Total numbers ofindividuals registeredby census                   | 174,500 | 252,100 | 334,600 | 488,000 | 626,900 |

<sup>a</sup> Calculations based on Censo general de la ciudad de Buenos Aires de 1887, 2: 43-47, 541-42; de 1904, 55-63; de 1909, 1: 53-60; Censo nacional de 1895, 2: 47-50; de 1914, 4: 201-12.

<sup>b</sup> See footnotes 24, 26, and 27 and pages 1056-64 for descriptions of these three categories of the social structure.

TABLE 3. FOREIGN-BORN MALES AS PERCENTAGE OF TOTAL MALE POPULATION OVER FOURTEEN YEARS OF AGE EMPLOYED IN MAJOR CLASSIFICATIONS
OF THE SOCIAL STRUCTURE<sup>a</sup>

|                                       | 1887 | 1895 | 1904 | 1909 | 1914 |
|---------------------------------------|------|------|------|------|------|
| Elite or Upper Classes <sup>b</sup>   | 25%  | 31%  | 26%  | 29%  | 19%  |
| Blue-Collar-White-Collar <sup>b</sup> | 79%  | 70%  | 67%  | 64%  | 65%  |
| Manual Labor <sup>b</sup>             | 79%  | 82%  | 79%  | 68%  | 86%  |

<sup>a</sup> Calculations are based on the same sources as in table 2. The base for each percentage entry is the absolute figure that could be calculated for that entry in table 2.

<sup>b</sup> For descriptions of these three categories of the social structure, see footnotes 24, 26, and 27, and pages 1056-64.

Distinctions among groups below the upper classes are more difficult to make without resorting to the nearly four hundred nonelite occupational ployment. With the exception of some primary school teachers and a few clerical jobs, all employed women fell into the lower reaches of the occupational scale—as seamstresses, laundry women, and servants. As mentioned earlier, it is well to remember that the number of males in the upper classes does not equal the number of independent households. Because of extended families among the elite the number of males in these classes should be divided by at least four in order to estimate households.

categories listed in the national census of 1914. For the purposes of this study the only distinction made among nonelite occupations is that of the manual dependent laborers whose outstanding characteristic was physical toil. These individuals at the bottom of the occupational ladder included stevedores, porters, unskilled constructions workers, dockmen, cartmen, house servants, street cleaners, and day laborers generally.<sup>26</sup> Once this purely manual labor group, numbering between 20 and 30 per cent of the employed males in the city, is removed, there remains a wide range of semiskilled and skilled laborers, artisans, small shopkeepers, machinists, and white-collar employees in government and commerce. Consequently within these two-thirds of the employed males in the city, broadly categorized as blue-collar-white-collar, existed such variations as bookkeepers and carpenters, primary school teachers and butchers, grocery store owners and streetcar conductors, or government clerks and bakers.<sup>27</sup>

These statistics further suggest that the foreign born posed no threat to Argentine social structure. The native born predominated in the upper classes. Foreigners among the upper classes entered Argentina as managers, directors, or technicians, and consequently claimed that status on the basis of family, education, and wealth. In the period from 1880 to 1910 roughly one-quarter of the upper classes were foreign born. On the other hand, immigrants comprised approximately 80 per cent of the unskilled labor force and two-thirds of the blue-collar-white-collar sector (see table 3). By 1914 the Italian and Spanish immigrants who entered the system at the bottom outnumbered the native born as manual laborers by a ratio of 6:1. Further up the scale the proportion of foreigner to native had gradually declined from 4:1 in 1887 to 2:1 by 1914, largely due to the inclusion of sons of immigrants in the ranks of the native born.

Considerable aspiration and mobility existed within the broad spectrum of nonelite occupations. As long as urban construction and the agricultural export market boomed, the upward climb in three generations from an illiterate, immigrant stevedore to an Argentine-born bank clerk with a few years of colegio education seems to have occurred quite frequently.<sup>28</sup> Only in extremely rare cases, however, by dint of parental

<sup>26</sup> A list of occupations with at least one thousand males (asterisk when over ten thousand) over fourteen years of age in the 1914 census registers *carreros, cocheros, *personal de servicio, marinos, militares, *jornaleros, *peones, vendedores ambulantes*.

<sup>27</sup> A list of blue-collar-white-collar occupations with at least one thousand males (asterisk when over ten thousand) over fourteen years of age in the 1914 census registers *agricultores, jardineros, *albañiles, aparadores, aprendices, carboneros, carniceros, *carpinteros, confiteros, constructores, curtidores, ebanistas, electricistas, encuadernadores, estibadores, foguistas, fundidores, gasistas, *herrerros, hojalateros, industriales, lecheros, maquinistas, marmoleros, *mecánicos, mosaiqueros, muebleros, operarios, panaderos, peluqueros, *pintores, *sastres, sombrereros, talabateros, tipógrafos, yeseros, *zapateros, *comerciantes, corredores, dependientes, *empleados de comercio, repartidores, tenedores, conductores, empleados de ferrocarril, empleados de tranvía, guardas de tranvía, motormen, telegrafistas, rentistas, *empleados de gobierno, jubilados, maestros de escuela primaria, dibujantes, escultores, músicos, *empleados en general*.

<sup>28</sup> The absence of comparable data from the Argentine censuses and the large interval between the two national censuses for which manuscript returns are available (1869 and 1895) may sacrifice toward education, by extraordinary financial success, or by an advantageous marriage could such a rapid climb boost an individual across the barrier into the upper classes. As noted above, the upper-class, foreign-born individual almost always possessed those necessary class attributes before entering Argentina.

Fig. 9. Recently arrived European immigrants receiving a free meal at the immigrants' asylum, ca. 1910. Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, AG, SFAA.

Fig. 10. A view of the Avenida de Mayo, corner of Bolívar just off the Plaza de Mayo, in 1900. Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, AG, SFAA.

Fig. 11. A workingmen's streetcar in 1912. Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, AG.

The common man of Buenos Aires in the late nineteenth century sought to display his material advancement. Appearance, especially in clothing, became exceedingly important in order to show the world that one was "on the way up." A Spanish visitor in 1904 noted that one virtually did not see "workers" on the streets.<sup>29</sup> Clothes literally made the man. As reported in a revealing newspaper account in 1902, the well-dressed man could go anywhere, but appear in a worker's blouse at the halls of congress or at a bank and all doors would shut.<sup>30</sup> The differences in concern with dress between those "just off the boat" and those who had begun "to climb the ladder" are graphically shown by the views of recently arrived immigrants in the dining hall of the immigrants' asylum and of pedestrians a block from the Plaza de Mayo along the Avenida de Mayo (figures 9 and 10). Everyone sought to hide the link with manual labor. In the first decade of the twentieth century special workingmen's cars, in effect open preclude quantified evidence along the lines suggested for the United States by Stephan Thernstrom in Poverty and Progress: Social Mobility in a Nineteenth Century City (Cambridge, Mass., 1964).

<sup>29</sup> Federico Rahola, Sangre nueva: Impresiones de un viaje a la América del Sud (Barcelona, 1905), 83.

<sup>30</sup> La Prensa, Aug. 12, 1902, p. 4.

vehicles equipped only with wooden benches or sometimes just flatcars, began to be coupled to regular streetcars during the early morning or late afternoon hours. On these one could ride at half price. Often, however, these cars went nearly empty, or even when they were filled the passengers rarely sported workingmen's garb but rather the traditional coat and tie (note the dress of workers in figure 11). Even Peronist efforts in the 1940s and 1950s to dignify labor with one's hands encountered subtle resistance among construction workers who arrived at and left their jobs in coats and ties, with their work pants and blouses neatly tucked away in briefcases. This spirit found further expression in the egalitarianism evident among the widely different nonelite occupations. In the public mind and in the numerous contemporary and popular sainetes, or one-act plays, no one was innately superior to another and anyone might rise to the top. Often the sainetes suggested that in this type of "democracy" advancement came not so much by means of drudgery, economy, or the use of one's hands as by luck and wits.

In contrast to the egalitarianism and materialism proclaimed at the workingman's level, among the upper classes these values and the search for economic advancement had to be disguised. The fortune created by the ingenuity of that one-in-a-million immigrant acquired respectability only in the hands of his children or preferably his grandchildren. Commercial wealth presented a better face when transformed into cattle or sheep ranches. Even a corporation lawyer or congressman was supposed to be more interested in Fénelon or Monet than in fees or constituents.<sup>31</sup>

Yet while the means of acquiring wealth had to be camouflaged, its possession was increasingly and ostentatiously paraded. The simple style of the Argentine elite until the 1870s was swallowed up by the petit hôtel and the palace. Those persons whose fortunes had been inflated by the rising value of land built one mansion on their cattle ranches, another on an elegant residential street in Barrio Norte, and a summer house along the estuary north of the city (figures 12 and 13 show typical examples of a palace and a summer home built in the late nineteenth century). The modest and closely guarded family life of earlier years gave way to a gaudy social whirl, highlighted by sumptuous feasts and splendid parties. The golden wedding anniversary of the Guerricos in 1906 titillated even a blasé porteño society: hundreds of workmen transformed the family garden into one vast salon fully equipped with gas heating, electric lights, and running water; twelve hundred guests, including the president, sat down to a feast that started off with tiny woodcocks stuffed with pâté de foie and chestnuts and reached its climax with the invariable

<sup>31</sup> Suggestive of these attitudes are the recollections found in Ramón Columba, El congreso que yo he visto, 3 vols. (2d ed.; Buenos Aires, 1953-55), 1: 53; Antonio J. Pérez Amuchastegui, Mentalidades argentinas, 1860-1930 (Buenos Aires, 1965); and Julia V. Bunge, Vida: Época maravillosa, 1903-1911 (Buenos Aires, 1965).

Fig. 12. The palace of the Peña family built in 1903 in Barrio Norte at Arenales and Maipú.
 Photograph courtesy of the Archivo General de la Nación, AG, SFAA.

Moët Chandon at dessert.<sup>32</sup> In dress, art collections, furniture, table service, and carriages the Argentine wealthy appeared determined to copy the nobility of Europe. Despite Catholic precepts few of this class felt much relation to the hordes of dirty, uneducated immigrants who swarmed in the downtown slums. Reform ideologies, freshly introduced from Europe, flowed in genteel discussions over brandy and coffee at the Jockey Club or were aired on the floor of congress. But most of the upper classes viewed laborers as little more than work animals. Characteristically the Sociedad Rural Argentina, the association of the country's major livestock growers, established a prize in 1896 to be awarded for the design of a ship's hold that could transport cattle on the hoof to Europe and return loaded with immigrants.<sup>33</sup>

By the 1930s the growth of industry and the increasing political activity of such groups as labor unions helped to promote a social structure in Buenos Aires more similar to the three-class model. The city, nevertheless, had been characterized by the sharp social distinction of the upper classes from the broad mass of common people long after economic prosperity suggested a more thoroughly bourgeois society. Attitudes toward class, manual labor, materialism, and egalitarianism sprang from Latin or Hispanic backgrounds, but they also received reinforcement from the commercial-bureaucratic heritage.

SINCE THE COMMERCIAL-BUREAUCRATIC CITY relies for its stimulus and growth largely on an externally dependent agricultural economy, it follows that continuation of the commercial-bureaucratic orientation is linked to the prosperous expansion of agricultural exports and the importation of manufactured goods, capital, and immigrants. A final characteristic of this type of city, therefore, is that the very prosperity of the exchange arrangements postpones industrialization.

Despite the bustle and prosperity of the Buenos Aires environment in 1910, nothing stimulated industrialization, encouraged import substitution, or prodded landowners or merchants to invest capital in factories. The political structure of the city as well as that of the nation remained firmly in the hands of upper classes whose traditions and wealth came from landowning, commerce, or politics. Immigrant labor dedicated itself to retail commerce, crafts, construction work, harvest labor, or menial services. Foreign and domestic investment entered real estate and commerce, was lent to national, provincial, or municipal governments, or financed railroads, utilities, and port works. The exchange of wool, cereals, meats, and hides for manufactured items appeared to be good business, at least until the 1930s. The barriers against foreign imports, essential to industrial development, could not be built as long as Argentina and Buenos Aires remained so dependent on foreign markets for the sale of agricultural products and the purchase of consumer goods.

<sup>32</sup> La Prensa, Aug. 14, 1906, p. 8.

<sup>33</sup> La Agricultura, Aug. 20, 1896, p. 620.

Certain industries flourished, but only those endeavors related to Argentina's export business received major inputs of capital and technology. Flour mills and meat-packing plants, along with a few consumer-goods industries such as breweries and manufacturers of shoes and biscuits, represented the only establishments employing skilled operatives, complex machinery, and electrical energy. Furthermore many of these plants were owned by foreign corporations or were largely dependent on foreign credit. The bulk of so-called industry remained scattered around the city, in small home workshops employing fewer than ten laborers and owned by immigrants who brought with them a small hoard of skills and tools. Although reserves of technical and entrepreneurial abilities were thus accumulated and safeguarded, no forces promoted modernized and diversified industry. Tax structures, tariff rates, and credit operations all conspired against an independent and influential industrial class.

In addition to these economic forces the very success of the commercial-bureaucratic orientation fostered values that, although not anti-industrial, did little to stimulate industrialization. Manual labor continued to be held in disrepute. Aside from the upper classes there existed little cohesiveness or awareness of group interests among the population. Family and personal relationships predominated. The immigrant continued to be looked upon as a manual laborer and little else, even by the second-generation children of immigrant parents.

Such values remained unshaken by the massive European immigration to Argentina. Immigrants contributed labor but politically remained outside the system. The dream of Italian and Spanish laborers was hacer la América, or the achievement of rapid economic success in the New World, not political expression. In addition local police and election officials actively discouraged naturalization by the foreign born. Skillful obstruction by means of red tape and procrastination voided the liberal naturalization laws and the flowery rhetoric voiced in the halls of congress. Finally there was the undeniable fact that the foreigner gained virtually no privileges by naturalization. As a resident alien he could work or conduct business on an equal footing with the native-born Argentine. He could move around the country, marry, and own property as freely as any Argentine citizen. In the city of Buenos Aires he could even vote in municipal elections. And as a foreigner he was not subject to the military service required of all adult males after the turn of the century. Hence, despite exhortations by the Socialist party and other groups, naturalized citizens in Buenos Aires in 1904, 1909, and 1914 represented only 2, 2.5, and 4 per cent respectively of the city's foreign-born male population—in striking contrast to figures that frequently reached 50 per cent in United States cities.

In like manner the school system, while spreading the benefits of one or two years of primary education to most children in Buenos Aires, continued to be highly elitist in structure. At the beginning of the twentieth century only 5 per cent of those pupils who began first grade completed the six elementary years. One explanation for this can be found in the predominant attitude expressed by a national congressman in 1907: "The child is in school—and in a very healthy one—when he is in the workshop and has a tool in his hand."<sup>34</sup> Among the common people only parents who had financial resources and who valued education enormously could push a child through the narrow funnel of primary education into the still narrower funnel of the colegio and finally into the professional preparation of the university. The cost itself of such education might not be prohibitive, but few could forego their children's services until the completion of colegio at the age of eighteen or nineteen or the university at twenty-three or twenty-four.

The educational system also reinforced elite traditions. For the mass of school children who completed only the first or second grade, a principal thrust of the curriculum lay in the indoctrination of Argentine patriotism and values. As the nineteenth century drew to a close and legislators and educators became more concerned about the flood of European immigrants entering the country, the symbols of flag, nation, independence, and Argentine greatness acquired a predominant position. As one Spanish observer noted, the whole purpose of the Argentine school seemed to be the preparation of the child to celebrate the national independence days of May 25 and July 9.<sup>35</sup> Beyond these initial years of primary school, which also gave pupils a rudimentary degree of literacy, the training became humanistic and classical. Preparation then was geared to entrance into the colegio, where literature, philosophy, and languages received particular attention. Technical education tended to be for orphans or other wards of the state, and applied sciences and technology continued to receive low priority in Argentina until well after 1910. Those who emerged from colegio training in Buenos Aires prior to 1910 were perhaps the best read and most literate students in the Western Hemisphere, but they had received relatively little orientation or stimulus toward questions involving innovation or the everyday world around them.

The upper classes also received significant assistance from the sons and daughters of immigrant parents in maintaining existing values. Most immigrants arrived in Argentina between the ages of twenty and forty. Their spouses usually came from the same country of origin or were Argentines born of immigrant parents. Most immigrants were of peasant backgrounds or came from the lower levels of the urban working classes in Italy and Spain. Argentine values thus echoed certain aspects of their own cultural baggage: the dominance of the male, admiration of virility, and acceptance of the gulf between the elite and the common people. In Buenos Aires the vast majority of immigrant men engaged in grinding manual labor twelve hours a day, six days a week, while women took on monotonous piecework, laundering, ironing, or domestic service in addition to raising a family. The children of these immigrants received great incentives and pressures from the host culture to conform to Argentine ways, even more so if the mother were Argentine born. Epithets of gringo or gallego might bounce harmlessly off the immigrants' ears, but they sank their shafts deeply into many of the children.<sup>36</sup> If the father mutilated Spanish with his Gallic or Genoese phrases, the son roared with laughter at the sainetes that caricatured the clumsy immigrant. The son also admirably slurred the local slang. If the father proudly wore a beret, enjoyed an afternoon at the bocce court with his cronies, or hungered for paella to celebrate a special occasion, it was certain that his son sought in dress, amusements, and food to avoid anything that might identify him as a foreigner and, if possible, as a laborer. Even the grinding toil of the father seemed to find rejection in the continued denigration of manual labor and the apparent reliance on other methods of getting ahead—the long shot, the assist from friends, or the stroke of luck. At the beginning of the twentieth century newspapers and even government officials began to express concern at one symptom—the tremendous surge of gambling on lotteries, horse races, and other sports. In the decade of the 1890s, at a moment when the Argentine economy was anything but flourishing, the porteño public had invested nearly half a billion pesos in gambling, or approximately one-fifth of the country's total exports for the decade.<sup>37</sup>

<sup>34</sup> Antonio Piñero, June 26, 1907, Cámara de Diputados, Sesiones, 1907, 1: 138.

<sup>35</sup> Adolfo Posada, La República Argentina (Madrid, 1912), 224.

These values supplemented the powerful economic incentives that encouraged and rewarded porteños in their administrative and trade functions. Because of the very success of these values in the period from 1880 to 1910, the commercial-bureaucratic orientation helped the export-import economy further delay the need for industrialization.

THE UNPARALLELED AND PREVIOUSLY UNEXPLOITED productivity of Argentina's pampas region in the late nineteenth century redounded to porteño benefit and not to the growth of the rural or hinterland regions. The success of the accompanying commercial-bureaucratic orientation at Buenos Aires reinforced certain spatial and mental characteristics and helped ensure that Argentina remain locked into an agricultural economy and external dependence at least until the 1930s. The reliance on a tiny downtown core that largely continued as the elite's place of residence; the location of tenement housing in the central part of the city; the outward spread of the common man toward the city's fringe; the extreme importance to urban life of the local neighborhood and its institutions; the marked separation of the upper classes from the broad spectrum of blue-collar-white-collar and manual laborers; the delay of industrialization brought on by the advantages of exchanging agricultural goods for manufactured commodities—all these effectively contributed to the prosperity, pleasantness, and stability of the porteño environment from 1880 to 1910. Not until the world depression of the early 1930s emphasized the impact of declining yields from the undercapitalized rural sector, accelerated the drying-up of outside sources of immigrants and capital, and caused a decline in European demand for pampas products did the shortcomings of such an orientation become apparent.

<sup>36</sup> In the Argentine context the gringo, or Italian, represented society's drudge, determined to make a fortune in America and consequently unable to enjoy any of life's pleasures. The gallego, or generically the Spaniard, was usually characterized as an inoffensive and somewhat stupid workhorse. Also see Gladys Onega, La inmigración en la literatura argentina (Buenos Aires, 1969).

<sup>37</sup> La Prensa, Aug. 19, 1901, p. 5.

Despite attempts since 1930 at state planning, subsidization of industry, and regional diversification, the commercial-bureaucratic heritage has proved hard to dispel. The city of Buenos Aires still shows its effects. Settlement patterns in the federal district have not basically changed since 1910. The central business district provides commercial, financial, administrative, cultural, and amusement services for the upper and upper-middle classes in the same small area. Conventillos survive downtown, while shanty towns, or villas miserias, ring the outskirts. Increasingly the wealthy have moved out to the northern river bank beyond the federal district, although many cluster in Barrio Norte. Industry has concentrated on the south side and beyond the federal district to the west and the south, but small plants and workshops remain scattered throughout the city, even close to the Plaza de Mayo. The barrio has lost considerable psychological and economic significance in an age when work, school, and play push inhabitants outward, but for several million porteños it still represents the basic outlook of their daily life. The city, with its overwhelming commercial, administrative, and now industrial preponderance, has drawn talents, resources, and products to itself. This success has exacted a price in strained railroads and congested port facilities. The head continues to rest on an extended but underdeveloped body, while new economic zones or other urban areas appear slowly or assume secondary roles. Even industry, accepted since 1930 as one of Argentina's needs, has received limited inputs of capital and technology.

Despite the growth of Buenos Aires as a metropolis, the city's social structure and values have changed slowly. The class system has become more complex, and a middle sector has emerged. But these middle groups lack unity and continue to imitate the upper classes. From another perspective political authorities fear the laboring class and seek to repress it. Attitudes toward manual labor, social distinctions, or materialism recall those of sixty years ago. The social and educational patterns reflect much of the values of an earlier age.

To a marked degree the experience of Buenos Aires, springing out of Argentina's agricultural economy and external dependence, has been replicated in other Argentine cities. In the late nineteenth century population had begun to move from the countryside toward the towns and cities. The urban-rural ratio (based on 2,000 inhabitants as the smallest urban unit) changed from 25:75 per cent in 1869 to 53:47 per cent by 1914. Ports such as Rosario or Bahía Blanca (223,000 and 44,000 population, respectively); provincial capitals turned railroad centers such as Córdoba, Tucumán, or Mendoza (135,000, 91,000, and 59,000); administrative capitals and provincial markets such as Salta or Catamarca (28,000 and 13,000); or small rail and local trade nuclei such as Río Cuarto or Junín (30,000 and 21,000)—all these by 1914 shared strikingly similar demographic, physical, and ecological patterns. Each received migrants and raw materials from its immediate area and transmitted them along with capital toward the coast, primarily toward Buenos Aires. Each had its small elite of landowners, merchants, bureaucrats, and professionals. In each the residences and activities of the elite centered on the plaza, while nonelite groups spread outward in search of cheaper lands. The commercial-bureaucratic outlook dominated the secondary cities in Argentina and made them way stations for channeling goods, services, and capital toward Buenos Aires.

The timing and indeed the initial prosperity of the rapid growth of Buenos Aires from 1880 to 1910 contributed to the nation's contemporary problems. Buenos Aires entered the twentieth century as a cosmopolitan metropolis drawing from the provinces and from its position between the pampas and Europe. The city's monopoly of human resources, its social structure, and its lack of an industrial base owed much to the way the Argentine economy had developed around exploitation of the pampas. Economic success available to the upper classes and in more limited fashion to the common man brought an air of complacency that hung over Buenos Aires for several decades. The promise of continued expansion that porteño growth had forecast began to dissipate, however, by 1930. A static per capita gross national product, a sterile political conflict, and subsequently a people's loss of faith in their future revealed the handicaps of agriculture/external dependency for the nation and of a commercial-bureaucratic orientation for the cities. The nation as a whole had not received an adequate share of the gains from the spectacular growth of its cities, especially from that of its capital and principal port. That city's orientation during its late nineteenth-century period of rapid expansion had further ill prepared Argentina for changing patterns of world trade, for industrialization, or for popular rule.<sup>38</sup>

<sup>38</sup> Philip M. Hauser suggests in slightly different terms that in underdeveloped nations such as a single major city frequently grows excessively because of its position as entrepôt between the

THE EFFECTS OF AN agricultural economy and external dependence on urban growth undoubtedly have taken many different forms. This article describes one result, characterized as commercial-bureaucratic and experienced at Buenos Aires in the late nineteenth century. I have not embarked on the extensive research needed to compare or contrast this particular experience with those of other cities that emerged under similar economic conditions. The experience of Buenos Aires, however, doubtless has parallels elsewhere.<sup>39</sup> In order to suggest possibilities for further study, I conclude with a resumé of generalized characteristics that develop from the agricultural and external dependency features of a region's economy and from the self-reinforcing aspects of the commercial-bureaucratic orientation.

First, the elite tends to reside at the city's core. Commercial activities and political administration of the city and hinterland, as well as the financial, social, and intellectual services for the elite, remain extraordinarily concentrated at this core. Second, newcomers to the city cluster for several years in high-density slums at the city's center, often interspersed with or adjacent to the residences of the well-to-do. Third, in the absence of large industrial establishments, the tendency of nonelite groups is to push outward, seeking cheap lands, individual homes, and often ownership—that is, upward mobility—in outlying areas. As a result the city, barring geographical obstacles, sprawls rather than growing upward or developing particularly concentrated settlements. Fourth, in the outward thrust numerous self-contained neighborhood units develop, which provide economic and social services for the nonelite inhabitants. Many individuals find employment in small workshops and stores within the neighborhood where they reside. All inhabitants form social and psychological ties to neighborhood institutions and identify first with their individual neighborhood rather than with larger political or religious units or with the city itself. Fifth, in social structure the upper classes remain distinct from the common people. Considerable mobility exists among the multitude of manual, blue-collar, and white-collar occupations. The upper classes occasionally recruit from below on the basis of wealth, education, or family connections, but they permit no challenge to the existing values. And sixth, as long as world markets absorb the area's agricultural products and manufactured imports remain available, no

---

"colony" and the imperial country. Disruption of the imperial system often leads to some loss of the city's basic economic function. "To the extent that this has occurred, such cities must await further national economic growth adequately to support their present size." "Urbanization: An Overview," in Philip M. Hauser and Leo F. Schnore, eds., The Study of Urbanization (New York, 1965), 36.

<sup>39</sup> One such parallel appears in the "commercial city" described by John W. McCarty, "Australian Capital Cities in the Nineteenth Century," Australian Economic History Review, 10 (1970): 107-37. In addition to Australia, the study of certain urban centers in the Southern United States and in South Africa might yield interesting parallels or contrasts to the porteño experience.

pressures develop to industrialize or to alter the profitable dedication of human resources within the city to trade and administration.

Further research into other urban experiences may reveal if these characteristics of the Argentine case appear in other cities that develop within an agricultural hinterland, serve as the major commercial and administrative center for their region, and depend overwhelmingly on immigration, foreign capital, and foreign markets for expansion. Such investigation and comparison may also clarify whether the commercial-bureaucratic orientation holds back a city and its hinterland from adjusting to a changing world environment. In the Argentine case, at least, this orientation seems to have served as a brake on national development.

APPENDIX:

A Note on the Nature of the Commercial-Bureaucratic City

AT THIS STAGE of research it would be imprudent to assign precise values to the degree of commercial and administrative dedication required to qualify a city as commercial-bureaucratic. Two indicators available in many nineteenth- and twentieth-century urban sources—the amounts of labor and capital involved in various sectors of the economy—suggest that such indicators could be developed. As a preliminary step several measurements that apply in Buenos Aires are advanced for consideration as variables to be refined and extended by research in cities elsewhere.

From the published Argentine census reports it is difficult and at times impossible to extract any reliable estimate of numbers employed in the various sectors of the economy. I have not attempted to isolate industrial workers, since artisans, independent skilled laborers, and industrial workers are lumped together within categories and these categories change from one census to the next. For commercial and administrative employees there is somewhat more continuity, although omissions and changed categories suggest caution in the use of these statistics. A rough measure of occupations in commerce and bureaucracy gives the following results for the city of Buenos Aires.

TABLE 4. PERCENTAGE OF MALES OVER FOURTEEN YEARS OF AGE EMPLOYED IN GOVERNMENT AND COMMERCE<sup>a</sup>

|            | 1887    | 1895    | 1904    | 1909    | 1914               |
|------------|---------|---------|---------|---------|--------------------|
| Government | 7.6%    | 5.7%    | 12.3%   | 8.6%    | 8.8%               |
| Commerce   | 20.5%   | 23.1%   | 27.1%   | 23.7%   | 14.2% <sup>b</sup> |
| N =        | 156,900 | 234,000 | 312,800 | 462,300 | 597,800            |

<sup>a</sup> See table 2 for explanation of sources and of N.

<sup>b</sup> The 1914 figure for commerce seems particularly suspect since 9,000 individuals shifted from commercial to skilled labor categories in the 1914 reporting and several major categories used in 1909 disappeared completely. Furthermore, despite the recession of 1913-14, the numbers of both comerciantes and empleados de comercio increased from 1909 to 1914, thus suggesting some increase in commercial establishments.

Capital invested in various areas of the economy affords another rough measure of relative importance of sectors. In Buenos Aires the amount of capital invested in industry, including processing of agricultural commodities for export, amounted to 45 per cent in 1909 and 55 per cent in 1914 of that invested in commerce.

TABLE 5. TOTAL CAPITAL INVESTED IN INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE<sup>a</sup>
(in millions of pesos, moneda nacional, m$<sub>n</sub>)

|   | 1895             | 1904              | 1909  | 1914  |
|---|------------------|-------------------|-------|-------|
| Industry                                | 95 <sup>b</sup>  | .... <sup>c</sup> | 324   | 548   |
| Commerce                                | 167 <sup>b</sup> | 521               | 724   | 996   |
| Industry as a Percentageof Commerce | 56.7%            | .... <sup>c</sup> | 44.8% | 55.0% |

<sup>a</sup> Calculations based on Censo nacional de 1895, 3: 273, 365; Censo general de la ciudad de Buenos Aires de 1904, 138-49, 164-75; de 1909, 1: 117-22, 143-47; and Censo nacional de 1914, 7: 115-20; 8: 141-45.

<sup>b</sup> Because of fluctuations in the gold equivalent of the m$<sub>n</sub> prior to 1903, the absolute values given in the 1895 census of 144 million m$<sub>n</sub> for industry and 254 million m$<sub>n</sub> for commerce have been multiplied by a correction factor—m$<sub>n</sub> required to purchase a gold ounce after 1902 divided by m$<sub>n</sub> required in 1895 (227/344 or .66)—in order to make them comparable as absolute figures with 1904, 1909, and 1914.

<sup>c</sup> The 1904 census gives 99 million m$<sub>n</sub> as the total capital invested in industry. This total appears grossly undervalued in light of the 1909 figures. One might achieve a more accurate figure by assuming, since there is no evidence to the contrary, that the ratio of capital invested in industry (C), to the value of goods produced by industry (V), remained constant in periods (1) 1904, (2) 1909, and (3) 1914. Since the 1904 census gives a reliable value for goods produced, one can apply the average of the 1909 and 1914 ratios to calculate C<sub>1</sub>; thus,

$$C_1 = V_{1/2} (C_2/V_2 + C_3/V_3)$$

This calculation gives a value of 205 million m$<sub>n</sub> for capital invested in industry, or 39.4 per cent of that invested in commerce in 1904. This also correlates better with the corrected 1895 figure of 95 million m$<sub>n</sub> invested in industry.

In conjunction with the relative distribution of capital between industry and commerce, it is also desirable to examine the distribution of capital within the secondary sector. At Buenos Aires in 1914, activities important to an industrializing economy, such as metallurgy, textiles, and chemicals, received respectively 10.7, 5.8, and 2.5 per cent of total capital invested in industry. At the same time 31.7 per cent of the total was invested in activities directly related to the agricultural export-oriented economy, such as food processing, burlap bags for grain, tanning, and grain elevators.

TABLE 6. DISTRIBUTION OF CAPITAL INVESTMENT IN INDUSTRY BY PERCENTAGES<sup>a</sup>

|                 | 1895             | 1904            | 1914             |
|-----------------|------------------|-----------------|------------------|
| Food Processing | 18.9%            | 16.3%           | 23.6%            |
| Clothing        | 18.6             | 16.3            | 14.3             |
| Construction    | 12.3             | 7.9             | 14.3             |
| Furniture       | 10.5             | 7.6             | 6.7              |
| Ornamentation   | 3.6              | 3.4             | 1.3              |
| Metals          | 8.9              | 12.9            | 10.7             |
| Chemical        | 4.3              | 3.2             | 2.5              |
| Printing        | 4.3              | 6.8             | 4.7              |
| Textiles        | 3.3              | 6.8             | 5.8              |
| Burlap Bags     | .5               | 2.6             | 4.3              |
| Cigarettes      | 7.4              | 5.4             | 6.7              |
| Tanning         | 4.6              | 5.1             | 1.8              |
| Grain Elevators | 1.9              | 3.9             | 2.0              |
| Miscellaneous   | .9               | 1.8             | 1.3              |
|                 | 100.0%           | 100.0%          | 100.0%           |
| N =             | 144 <sup>b</sup> | 99 <sup>c</sup> | 447 <sup>d</sup> |

<sup>a</sup> Calculations based on Censo nacional de 1895, 3: 273, 365; Censo general de la ciudad de Buenos Aires de 1904, 164-75; and Censo nacional de 1914, 7: 115-20.

<sup>b</sup> Expressed in millions moneda nacional, m$n. The correction factor mentioned in table 5 does not affect the percentage calculations, so the value of 144 million m$n given for industry in the 1895 census is used.

<sup>c</sup> Expressed in millions m$n. Despite the undervaluation of capital invested in industry noted in table 5, the value given in the 1904 census is used in these calculations on the assumption that the basis for determining the value of capital distributed to various activities within the industrial sector remained constant. Percentages, therefore, can validly be calculated on the basis of the 99 million m$n figure.

<sup>d</sup> Expressed in millions m$n. Electricity and gas, valued at 101 million m$n, was included in the census total for capital invested in industry in 1914; it has been removed in this table in order to make categories and percentages comparable with 1904 and 1895.

In an exploratory fashion, therefore, I suggest that these measures applicable to Buenos Aires in the period from 1880 to 1910 might be used as a starting point and, with refinement in other case studies, be expanded in order to secure a more precise definition of the commercial-bureaucratic city.

---

New Perspectives on the Republican Party, 1877-1913

---

A Review Article by LEWIS L. GOULD

JOHN BRAEMAN. Albert J. Beveridge: American Nationalist. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1971. Pp. x, 370. $12.50.

RICHARD JENSEN. The Winning of the Midwest: Social and Political Conflict, 1888-1896. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1971. Pp. xvii, 357. $12.50.

HORACE SAMUEL MERRILL and MARION GALBRAITH MERRILL. The Republican Command, 1897-1913. [Lexington:] University Press of Kentucky. 1971. Pp. xi, 360. $12.50.

RICHARD E. WELCH, JR. George Frisbie Hoar and the Half-Breed Republicans. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1971. Pp. 364. $14.00.

WITH THE EXCEPTION of Theodore Roosevelt's presidency the four decades between the election of Rutherford B. Hayes and the disaster of 1912 have not impressed historians as a glorious period in the history of the Republican party. They recognize that the GOP rose to majority status between 1876 and 1896 and that the party dominated American politics in the thirty-five years after the election of 1896, but the scholarly appraisal of the Republican record has been generally negative. The party's reputation as an agent of capitalism, its conservative position in contemporary affairs, and the general preference among historians for reformers over professional politicians account to some degree for the critical stance usually adopted toward the GOP. In classroom and textbook, men like James G. Blaine, Benjamin Harrison, and William McKinley lingered until recently as figures of fun, objects of moral scorn, or lessons in the dangers of weak presidents. Renewed interest in the Grand Old Party after 1877 has disturbed many stereotypes and refurbished some damaged reputations.<sup>1</sup> Two of the books under review explore the improvement in party fortunes in the Gilded Age and do much to restore William McKinley to his deserved place as the architect of Republican success. The other studies examine the party in the years of power that followed 1896 and illuminate the problems that confront students of this fascinating era of American political history.

<sup>1</sup> See, for example, Carl N. Degler, "American Political Parties and the Rise of the City: An Interpretation," Journal of American History, 51 (1964): 41-59; Stanley L. Jones, The Presidential Election of 1896 (Madison, 1964); John G. Sproat, "The Best Men": Liberal Reformers in the Gilded Age (New York, 1968); H. Wayne Morgan, From Hayes to McKinley, National Party Politics, 1877-1896 (Syracuse, 1969); H. Wayne Morgan, ed., The Gilded Age (Syracuse,

Until Roosevelt's second term Republicans told each other that, unlike the Democrats', theirs was the party of action and change, "the party that does things, instead of one that opposes them."<sup>2</sup> Richard E. Welch's thoughtful biography of George Frisbie Hoar of Massachusetts uses the career of a single senator to examine the real basis for this staple of campaign oratory and to reveal the complexity of the Republican party's internal history in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. In his effort to safeguard Negro voting rights, his concern with the trust problem, and his advocacy of the protective tariff, Hoar exemplified the constructive energies that his party brought to national issues. Its record of achievement was a mixed one, but Welch's analysis avoids the simplistic charges of insincerity and hypocrisy so often leveled at the work of politicians in this period. He rejects the notion of an unbroken descent "from unblemished idealism to corporate reaction" in party history between 1865 and 1900 and correctly notes that "the transformation of the Republican party in the generation after Appomattox was a more subtle process than is usually recognized."<sup>3</sup>

Like other leaders whom Welch groups under the label of Half-Breed, Hoar believed that the Republicans should promote the growth of the economy with a protective tariff and a general encouragement of business enterprise. This attitude represented more than a commitment to corporate wealth. It reflected a vision of a harmonious, interdependent society in which assistance to business raised the level of all groups and did not preclude attention to the human problems of an industrial nation.<sup>4</sup> This was not an easy political creed to sustain, and it gave way after 1900 under the pressures of an increasingly pluralistic economy and political system.

---

1970), 171-87. Robert D. Marcus, Grand Old Party: Political Structure in the Gilded Age, 1880-1896 (New York, 1971), finds little to admire in the Republicans and in American politics generally. The more favorable evaluation of the party before 1877 has aided the reappraisal of the GOP in the Gilded Age. Eric Foner, Free Soil, Free Labor, Free Men: The Ideology of the Republican Party Before the Civil War (New York, 1970).

<sup>2</sup> John Milton Hay, "Fifty Years of the Republican Party," in Addresses of John Hay (New York, 1906), 300. For other expressions of this theme, see John Coit Spooner to L. D. Coombs, Mar. 29, 1902, John Coit Spooner Papers, Manuscripts Division, Library of Congress; "Address of Joseph G. Cannon," in Official Proceedings of the Thirteenth Republican National Convention Held in the City of Chicago, June 21, 22, 23, 1904 (Minneapolis, 1904), 183.

<sup>3</sup> Welch, George Frisbie Hoar, 336.

<sup>4</sup> A. Maurice Low, Protection in the United States (New York, 1904), 42-43; Herbert Croly, Progressive Democracy (New York, 1915), 87-102; Gerald W. Wolff, "Mark Hanna's Goal: American Harmony," Ohio History, 79 (1970): 138-51. Any investigation of Republican thought, especially with regard to the tariff, should concentrate on the pivotal role of James G. Blaine in the 1880s. Professor R. Hal Williams has begun a political biography of Blaine that will address itself to this problem.

But in the Gilded Age Republicans of Hoar's persuasion could still believe in, and act upon, the principle "that while the demands of social continuity forbade radical experimentation they occasionally required legislative revision."<sup>5</sup>

The treatment of Hoar's participation in the lawmaking process is judicious and balanced. Welch sees that the tariff embraced more than a narrow parochialism and that Hoar and many of his colleagues endorsed protection from ideological conviction as well as self-interest. The discussion of the Federal Elections Bill of 1890 summarizes well the unhappy consequences of Republican failure to enact that reform measure. Welch is sometimes unnecessarily defensive on the actions of the GOP and fails to see how James G. Blaine functioned as a party leader, but the larger strengths of his book make it an excellent political biography.

This study also joins a growing list of books that are reappraising more favorably the policies and character of William McKinley. Hoar's opposition to the expansionism of the McKinley administration forms an important chapter in the narrative, and Welch is perceptive about his subject's attempts to change the nation's foreign policy. While describing the strains upon the relationship between senator and president, Welch realizes that McKinley was an uncommonly effective executive. There is the customary rhetorical obeisance to the erroneous notion that McKinley was weak, followed by remarks on the president's adroit management of the Senate and his deft maneuvers to secure ratification of the Treaty of Paris in 1899. Welch contributes further evidence of McKinley's unusually productive relations with Congress, an area where few presidents have done well. In dealing with Capitol Hill or in shaping public opinion McKinley employed techniques that historians applaud in his successors. Students of the growth of presidential power need to look again at his tenure in office in light of the work of Welch and other scholars. If results rather than mere activity are a valid measure, then McKinley was as strong a president as his immediate successors.<sup>6</sup>

An appreciation of McKinley's political genius is a major theme of Richard Jensen's superb study of Midwestern electoral politics in the 1890s. Well written and closely reasoned, The Winning of the Midwest brilliantly combines the techniques of the social scientist and the historian to produce a convincing narrative of developments in the principal regional battleground of partisan conflict at the end of the nineteenth century. Jensen traces the breakdown of the even balance between the major parties after 1888, the brief Democratic upsurge in the early 1890s, and the decisive Republican triumphs of 1894 and 1896, and he argues that ultimate GOP success rested on the party's pluralistic appeal to a broad range of ethnic groups and economic interests. The Republicans built their majorities in the Midwest not through coercion, fraud, or deception, but with hard work, flexibility, and a close attention to the concerns of the voters.

<sup>5</sup> Welch, George Frisbie Hoar, 334.

<sup>6</sup> For the emerging revisionism on McKinley, see John A. S. Grenville and George Berkeley Young, Politics, Strategy, and American Diplomacy: Studies in Foreign Policy, 1873-1917 (New Haven, 1966), 239-66; Paul S. Holbo, "Presidential Leadership in Foreign Affairs: William McKinley and the Turpie-Foraker Resolution," AHR, 72 (1966-67): 1321-35; Paul S. Holbo, "The Convergence of Moods and the Cuban Bond 'Conspiracy' of 1898," Journal of American History, 55 (1968): 54-72; Morgan, From Hayes to McKinley, 482-93; Edward Ranson, "The Investigation of the War Department, 1898-1899," The Historian, 34 (1971): 78-99. Some historians who dislike the results of McKinley's presidency concede his ability. See Walter LaFeber, The New Empire (Ithaca, 1963), 327-33. Graham A. Cosmas, An Army for Empire: The United States Army in the Spanish-American War (Columbia, Mo., 1971), 102-04, criticizes McKinley for doing too much, not too little, as a war leader.

Lucid chapters on the styles of campaigning, on election practices, and on the religious basis of party affiliation are a part of Jensen's persuasive and sophisticated description of the Midwestern political environment. His work should dispose of the idea that Gilded Age politicians avoided serious issues and debated irrelevancies. The monetary question, the tariff, and prohibition were important because of their direct connection with the problems of an ethnically diverse industrial society. Similarly, politicians were hardly the gray nonentities of legend. A man who picked his way successfully through the hazards of Midwestern public life had survived a testing process that put no premium on mediocrity.

William McKinley's career before his election to the presidency offers a case in point. Jensen follows closely McKinley's rise through Ohio politics in the first half of the 1890s and stresses that he evolved a program of moderation on religious matters and a tolerance of ethnic difference. With its overtones of nationalism, assumption of social harmony, and promise of prosperity, the protective tariff gave McKinley a broadly based issue with which to woo majority support. Tirelessly preaching his message in graceful speeches across his state and the nation, he made himself the party spokesman for the doctrines of protection and pluralism. In 1896 a masterful campaign and the appeal of his policies carried the GOP to victory and dominance. Jensen's account plausibly suggests that McKinley played as large a part in building his party's enduring coalition as Franklin D. Roosevelt did for the Democrats after 1932.

The Winning of the Midwest is a tart, forthright work that abounds with stimulating insights. The innovative treatment of the shift in campaign tactics from the militaristic to the merchandizing style illuminates a neglected topic in the history of American elections and presents provocative clues about the decline of partisanship in this century. The impressive analysis of the impact of prohibition on the major parties confirms the need for a satisfactory history of that pervasive source of social discord. There are discerning and incisive remarks about the troubles of the Harrison administration, interesting observations on such prominent second-line figures as James S. Clarkson, and fascinating pages on the larger themes of William Jennings Bryan's candidacy in 1896.

Though clearly sympathetic to the victorious Republicans, Jensen is no mere apologist. His greater allegiance is to pluralistic politics, a point of view that understandably shapes his favorable attitude toward the GOP in the McKinley era. Obviously relishing the rough and tumble world of American politics, Jensen has recreated a decisive period in its development with richness and subtlety.

The review by Horace Samuel Merrill and Marion Galbraith Merrill of the Republican leadership between 1897 and 1913, on the other hand, moves in a much simpler conceptual world. They write from a profoundly cynical view of public life in which corrupt office-holders served dominant business interests and oversaw a docile, kept electorate. The authors find little genuine conviction behind Republican policies and regard the electoral process as a sham contest to mask sinister machinations between organized capital and politicians. Relying heavily on innuendo and implications of misconduct, the Merrills have constructed an indictment of the GOP and predictably render a verdict of guilty. "The party command," they assert, "could have served the nation much better had it performed with less elitism and more democracy."<sup>7</sup>

The resulting narrative reflects the passion and intensity of this position but will leave the knowledgeable reader unpersuaded. In their eagerness to make their case the Merrills repeat themselves,<sup>8</sup> commit errors of fact and citation,<sup>9</sup> and on occasion bend the evidence to prove a point.<sup>10</sup> More important, they have failed to assimilate the work of historians who have eroded older interpretations of politics in the Progressive era. It is no longer sufficient to invoke the specter of "the Republican-business alliance" as an inclusive explanation for party policy in light of studies that demonstrate deep divisions within the business community on specific issues.<sup>11</sup> The handling of factional contests within state Republican organization is equally unsatisfactory. To describe Robert M. La Follette as an angel of virtue and his opponents as members of "the cynical, unsavory Wisconsin Republican hierarchy" shows inadequate awareness of recent scholarship on politics in Wisconsin.<sup>12</sup> Though the Merrills cite some, but by no

<sup>7</sup> Merrill and Merrill, The Republican Command, 7.

<sup>8</sup> Ibid., 24-25, 190-91; 111, 177; 28-29, 50, 52, 71, 166; 80, 96-97.

<sup>9</sup> Errors of citation include ibid., 110, 188, 214 n.63. For errors of fact, see ibid., 12, 13, 46-47, 55, 58, 81, 98, 185-86, 234, 244, 278, 285, 317.

<sup>10</sup> The authors use a letter from William Howard Taft in 1922 criticizing Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. as evidence of Taft's views in the early 1900s. They treat Elihu Root in similar fashion. Ibid., 100, 110-11. Chiding Roosevelt for not campaigning in 1904, they do not mention the custom against presidents on the stump. Ibid., 174, 179. They note that Republican Charles D. Hilles received private letters in 1911 and "slyly passed" them on to Taft. Ibid., 329. (At the time Hilles was Taft's secretary.) Finally, they cite a letter from Senator Orville H. Platt as evidence of an admission of his ignorance on financial matters and later call this an "elusive device." Ibid., 29, 61.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., 54. The Merrills cite, but do not grasp the implications of, Robert H. Wiebe, Businessmen and Reform (Cambridge, 1962). Unaccountably they do not use Richard M. Abrams, Conservatism in a Progressive Era: Massachusetts Politics, 1900-1912 (Cambridge, 1964).

<sup>12</sup> Merrill and Merrill, The Republican Command, 33. Herbert F. Margulies, The Decline of means all, of the more significant books on early twentieth-century public policy, their analysis remains rooted in categories and theories fashionable before the Second World War.

The tariff was a persistent source of dissension within Republican ranks after 1900, and the Merrills concentrate much of their text upon party efforts to resolve the question. But an archaic view of the political process prevents them from doing justice to the problems of protection. Apparently disdaining extended use of the Congressional Record and close scrutiny of debates and votes, they have depended too heavily on selected primary sources and secondary accounts, and their analysis suffers accordingly. In the case of the Dingley Tariff of 1897, for instance, they charge that Republicans regarded the final product as an embarrassment. Their evidence is a statement attributed to a senator but actually made by his biographer, a single newspaper clipping of dubious relevance, and the erroneous assertion that William McKinley "avoided public discussion" of the measure.<sup>13</sup> They also claim that the Republicans inserted a twenty per cent increase on certain unnamed goods into the Dingley Bill to compensate certain unspecified producers against possible injury from reciprocal trade provisions in the law. Yet their own evidence discloses the partisan origin of this allegation and the vigorous contemporary denials from the Republicans.<sup>14</sup> The analyses of McKinley's reciprocity the Progressive Movement in Wisconsin, 1890-1920 (Madison, 1968); Stanley P. Caine, The Myth of a Progressive Reform: Railroad Regulation in Wisconsin, 1903-1910 (Madison, 1970); and David P. Thelen, The New Citizenship: Origins of Progressivism in Wisconsin, 1885-1900 (Columbia, Mo., 1972), all make clear the complexity of the Wisconsin situation.

---

<sup>13</sup> For the error in attribution, see Merrill and Merrill, The Republican Command, 47, and William Dana Orcutt, Burrows of Michigan and the Republican Party (New York, 1917), 2: 104-05. The Merrills refer to a clipping from the New York Sun, July 30, 1897, in which a railroad president, Melville E. Ingalls, failed to mention the tariff in a general discussion of the economy. Merrill and Merrill, The Republican Command, 47-48. A Gold Democrat who supported McKinley in 1896 and 1900 and William Jennings Bryan in 1908, Ingalls was cool toward protection and is a dubious source for Republican tariff attitudes. Melville E. Ingalls, "The Duty of the Democrats," North American Review, 171 (1900): 299-300; Dictionary of American Biography, s.v. "Ingalls, Melville Ezra." McKinley's "avoidance" of the tariff is discussed in Merrill and Merrill, The Republican Command, 48, but see also James D. Richardson, ed., A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents, 1789-1907 (Washington, 1908), 10: 26; McKinley's speech to the National Association of Manufacturers, Jan. 27, 1898, in Speeches and Addresses of William McKinley from March 1, 1897 to May 30, 1900 (New York, 1900), 65, and his speech at Danville, Illinois, Oct. 11, 1899, ibid., 257-58; Official Proceedings of the Twelfth Republican National Convention, 1900 (Philadelphia, 1900), 148-49, 158.

<sup>14</sup> Merrill and Merrill, The Republican Command, 46. The charge about the Dingley Bill seems to have originated with McKinley's reciprocity commissioner, John A. Kasson, in testimony before a Senate committee in 1900. U.S. Senate, Committee on Foreign Relations, Reciprocity Convention with France, Senate doc. 225, 56th Cong., 1st sess., 1900, p. 69. It was expanded in John Ball Osborne, "Expansion through Reciprocity," in Robert M. La Follette, ed., The Making of America (Washington, 1907), 2: 382. The Merrills cite Osborne but not the Kasson testimony. For an effective refutation of Kasson's charge, see David Arganian, "McKinley and Commercial Reciprocity," (master's thesis, University of Wisconsin, 1958), 83-85. In September 1902 a Philadelphia newspaper carried a story that Nelson Dingley had admitted raising the rates in the bill for the purpose of securing reciprocity agreements. The Washington Post, Sept. 22, 1902, commented on the story, and the Merrills cite this editorial. They do not appear to have consulted the congressional debates that grew out of Democratic use of the allegation, or the detailed Republican denials that followed. Congressional Record, vol. 36, 57th campaign, the Payne-Aldrich Tariff, and the struggle over Canadian reciprocity in 1911 demonstrate similar tendencies toward oversimplification and distortion.<sup>15</sup>

The Republican Command has the apparatus of scholarship, but it is actually a tract for the times, written out of the Merrills' concern "with the unnecessary suffering, waste, and danger which legislative inadequacy perpetuates in our society."<sup>16</sup> A deep contempt for the professional politician and an impatience with the mixed results of the democratic process pervades the book and shapes the Merrills' jaundiced appraisal of Republican action. In its simplistic view of what constitutes corruption, its readiness to see conspiracy in normal compromise, and its intolerance of explanations less melodramatic than its own, The Republican Command looks back to the era of Matthew Josephson and Charles Beard. This intellectual perspective gives it a certain nostalgic charm but makes it an unreliable guide to the Republican party in the period it covers.

After 1901 Republican unity, the product of the McKinley era, faded as the party divided over the proper role of government in regulating an industrial society. Few men participated more directly in the quarrels that rent the GOP than Albert J. Beveridge, and few careers more accurately mirrored the tensions within the party. Entering national politics in 1899 as an expansionist senator of conservative convictions, Beveridge became a proponent of reform causes, an insurgent against the leadership of William Howard Taft, and finally an ally of Theodore Roosevelt in 1912. During the last fifteen years of his life he combined successful excursions into biography with a fruitless quest for a political comeback as an opponent of the reforms he had earlier endorsed. John Braeman's careful biography goes directly to the problem of Beveridge's Progressivism and, in the process, clarifies the central question of Republican history in this period, the trauma of 1912.

The transition from regular to reformer owed something to Beveridge's well-known presidential ambitions but more to his belief that the party should advocate policies to alleviate popular discontent and avert more drastic social change. Unlike the Republicans of Hoar's stamp who legislated from a faith in social cohesion, Beveridge and his fellow Progressives wanted to preserve the stability of society through moderate reform. In the era of Theodore Roosevelt this position made him an innovator in comparison with conservatives who clung to the view that government might encourage enterprise but should not regulate it. But Cong., 2d sess., Jan. 6, 1903, p. 517; Jan. 8, 1903, pp. 598-97; Jan. 12, 1903, pp. 668-71; Jan. 13, 1903, pp. 711-15. The U. S. Tariff Commission, Reciprocity and Commercial Treaties (Washington, 1919), 202-03, summarized the highpoints of this controversy, and the Merrills rely heavily on this source. They did not, however, trace down the footnote on page 203 that would have led them to the Congressional Record, vol. 44, 61st Cong., 1st sess., July 3, 1909, pp. 4081-85, and a recapitulation of the 1903 debates.

<sup>15</sup> Merrill and Merrill, The Republican Command, 87-90, 279-98, 317, 320-24.

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., ix.

Beveridge's reform impulse was fragile. When he confronted the demands of interest groups, like organized labor, more concerned with concrete goals than social harmony, he retreated toward the conservative stance of his former enemies. This process paralleled the experience of other Progressives and suggests why the Republicans forfeited their place as the party of change to the Democrats after 1912.

Since tariff reform played a large part in Beveridge's evolution as an insurgent, Braeman closely scrutinizes such crucial episodes as the Payne-Aldrich Tariff fight of 1909. A revival of interest in this central problem of Republican policy is overdue. Protection stood at the heart of party doctrine, but it has been passed over in favor of more glamorous topics like conservation or the railroads. Detailed studies of the various tariff bills, and of the reciprocity movement generally, are necessary before the exact course of the Republican decline can be traced. Braeman shows, for example, how Beveridge's opposition to high tariffs reinforced his suspicion of partisan politics and implicitly hints that the tariff was a key element in shaping the antiparty sentiment of the Progressive years. The references to the tariff and the high cost of living indicate that an investigation of the relationship between inflation and Republican misfortune after 1908 is in order. There is also further evidence of Theodore Roosevelt's timidity on the tariff, a subject that needs more attention.<sup>17</sup>

After Beveridge's election to the Senate at the age of thirty-six, friends forecast further successes for the young Hoosier statesman. Somehow the bright hopes were never fulfilled, and he remained a "promising" young man for the next two decades. Traces of the anticlimactic quality of Beveridge's life appear in this biography. The fault is probably Beveridge's, but Braeman's fondness for clichés and tendency toward repetition slow the narrative. Just as his subject was happiest working on biographies of John Marshall and Abraham Lincoln so Braeman appears more comfortable in the concluding chapters when Beveridge leaves politics for the delights of history.

Several years ago Richard Abrams urged his colleagues to "get on with 'The History of Progressive Era Politics.'"<sup>18</sup> Taken together these four books reveal how much remains to be done in that regard for the Republicans. Until there are studies of the tariff that go beyond the work of Frank W. Taussig and Edward Stanwood, the essentials of Republican theory will remain unclear. Investigations of the presidential administrations of William McKinley and William Howard Taft would enable <sup>17</sup> Braeman, Beveridge, 122-67. George E. Mowry, Theodore Roosevelt and the Progressive Movement (Madison, 1946), 45, Wiebe, Businessmen and Reform, 95, and Abrams, Conservatism in a Progressive Era, 90-91, 222-23, 233, among others, have noted the impact of the high cost of living, but the subject needs more examination. Albrow Martin, Enterprise Denied: Origins of the Decline of American Railroads, 1897-1917 (New York, 1971), 11-17, among its many other merits, stresses the effect of rising prices. Richard C. Baker, The Tariff Under Roosevelt and Taft (Hastings, Nebr., 1941), is still the best study of Roosevelt and protection.

<sup>18</sup> AHR, 74 (1968-69): 314.

historians to place the contributions of Theodore Roosevelt in a more balanced perspective. Roosevelt's relationship with his party needs dispassionate examination; one fruitful approach would be to look at his dealings with Republicans in states like New York, Iowa, and Ohio. The presidential elections that followed the contest of 1896 also require systematic scrutiny along the lines of Jensen's work. In particular the election of 1912 demands a full-scale exploration of the huge mass of available sources on the Republican disaster. Finally, important party leaders like Henry Cabot Lodge, Albert Baird Cummins, and Robert La Follette should receive fresh biographical treatment of the caliber of Welch on Hoar and Braeman on Beveridge.<sup>19</sup>

Intense partisan debate characterized American politics between 1877 and 1913, and echoes of these battles have persisted in historical scholarship. The survival of analytic premises left over from contemporary controversies remains an important obstacle to a proper understanding of the Republican party in this period. As the Merrills' book demonstrates, the sterile categories of "reformer" and "conservative" no longer answer the important questions about the rise and fall of the GOP. Welch, Jensen, and to a lesser extent Braeman avoid facile moralistic generalizations and go about the serious business of writing party history. They accept politics as a legitimate occupation in a democratic society, recognize the internal rules of that profession, and mete out judgment only after a careful evaluation of context and circumstance. As a result their work contributes to a more balanced appraisal of the Republicans and enriches the literature of political history.

<sup>19</sup> David W. Detzer, "The Politics of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff of 1909" (Ph.D. dissertation, University of Connecticut, 1970), and James O. Wheaton, "The Genius and the Jurist: A Study of the Presidential Campaign of 1904" (Ph.D. dissertation, Stanford University, 1964), show what still can be done with worked-over or seemingly uninteresting topics. Joel A. Tarr, "President Theodore Roosevelt and Illinois Politics, 1901-1904," Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society, 58 (1965): 245-64, is a model for an analysis of Roosevelt's dealings with state parties, and Tarr's A Study in Boss Politics: William Lorimer of Chicago (Urbana, 1971), makes an even more substantial contribution. Ralph Mills Sayre, "Albert Baird Cummins and the Progressive Movement in Iowa" (Ph.D. dissertation, Columbia University, 1958), is sound, but Cummins's tariff and railroad views could stand more investigation. James E. Hewes, Jr., "Henry Cabot Lodge and the League of Nations," Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society, 114 (1970): 245-55, suggests the possibilities in a new study of Lodge. Professor David P. Thelen is at work on a biography of La Follette that should provide a balanced perspective on the Wisconsin senator.

---

Reviews of Books

---

GENERAL

MATTHEW MELKO. The Nature of Civilizations. Introduction by CRANE BRINTON. (Extending Horizons Books.) [Boston:] Porter Sargent Publisher. 1969. Pp. xvii, 204. $4.95.

BERNARD NORLING. Timeless Problems in History. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press. 1970. Pp. x, 301. Cloth $8.00, paper $3.25.

Professor Melko's work deals principally with periods; Professor Norling's book deals principally with problems of history. The first work tries to grapple with the knowledgability of all history, the second book proceeds from the historicity of our knowledge. They should thus complement each other. Unfortunately they do not. There is a profound difference between the quality of these works. Much of this difference results from the divergent scope of the two authors. Professor Melko has tried to do (or perhaps outdo) a Spengler or a Toynbee. He tries to establish certain basic laws, or at least certain basic characteristics, of what must necessarily constitute an entire civilization. He feels compelled to use heavy sociological language, at times skidding into formulations where vocabulary comes close to serving as a kind of substitute for thought. Elsewhere the style is jagged, a curious mix of popular cheeriness and academic jargon. There are also certain oddities, not always endearing, as when Professor Melko chooses to utilize the crankish lucubrations of a New England colleague, called "The Bowler Continuum," which "can also be used to describe fluctuations in attitudes. Thus Sam Jones, sitting in church, may concentrate alternately on the sublime love of God and the temporal beauty of Susie Smith, sitting in a summer frock, two rows down and to the left" (p. 77). There follows an imbecilic chart in which God and Susie Smith float suspended between "Total Material Concern" and "Total Spiritual Concern," Bowler's sublime formulas. This kind of silliness is not untypical of Professor Melko's work.

Professor Norling is more modest; and, consequently, also more serious. It is not easy to sum up his book either, but for the opposite reason from Professor Melko's. Norling deals with many serious matters. These include illusions in history, a discussion of inevitability and of determinism, the legacies of revolutions and of national character, and certain conditions of cultural achievements. This list does little justice to this book, which is both an important corrective and a useful introduction for the purposes of undergraduates (and also of first-year graduate students) who ought to know something about what historical problems are. Professor Norling's thinking is in the tradition of Herbert Butterfield's to the effect that the principal purpose of historical study should deal with problems rather than with periods. While Melko speculates about the nature of periods Norling is deeply interested in the nature of problems. His brief footnotes reveal an extraordinary breadth of reading in many different fields. Timeless Problems in History may be too modest a title. The book fulfills a potential service that is comparable to the late Crane Brinton's Anatomy of Revolution. (By a curious, and perhaps paradoxical, coincidence Professor Melko's book is furnished with a brief introduction by Crane Brinton.)

JOHN LUKACS
Chestnut Hill College and La Salle College

MORTON A. KAPLAN. On Historical and Political Knowing: An Inquiry into Some Problems of Universal Law & Human Freedom. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1971. Pp. xvi, 159. $6.50.

Books like this one in which a learned scholar seriously "reflects" on significant critical and philosophical problems associated with rich conceptual subject matter are very much needed. Yet they seldom achieve a clear-cut success. Their brevity prohibits a sufficiently detailed analysis of the issues to satisfy the experts, while the inherent difficulties of the topics treated will often discourage interested "by-standers" working in other scholarly fields. Professor Kaplan has done about as well here as can be expected.

Two lengthy essays, "Knowing and Explaining" (pp. 3-71) and "Historical Consciousness and Truth" (pp. 73-137) account for most of the book. In the first essay Professor Kaplan clearly sides with the "covering-law" theorists and criticizes Professor Michael Scriven, a prominent philosopher, for arguing that historical explanations are "nontrivial truisms." Seven pages are quoted from a relevant article by Scriven (pp. 24-31), followed by the author's pointed criticisms in rebuttal (pp. 31-37). Yet Professor Kaplan later admits that historians normally achieve only "explanation sketches" (rather than laws), though these are stronger than mere truisms. Summarizing this valuable essay he writes: "Even though we do not have real theories or laws in social science—at least yet—we do have some theory sketches and explanations of a looser sort" (p. 69). His claim is that in practice social scientists find difficulty in formulating scientifically convincing laws.

In "Historical Consciousness and Truth" the argument again claims that "most social science theorizing will likely remain qualitative and comparative" after a careful five-page analysis (pp. 121-25) of why quantitative success is improbable. A valuable part of this challenging essay (pp. 130-37) is concerned with the tormented "question" whether and to what extent social science is and can be value free.

A briefer concluding essay, "Freedom in History" (pp. 139-59), argues in a lively way that freedom is a relational as well as a contextual concept. Unlike the earlier two, this essay seldom refers to important arguments and theories in other books by Professor Kaplan; hence it is more self-contained and easier to understand. Probably his Macropolitics: Essays on the Philosophy and Science of Politics (1969) and Dissent in the State in Peace and War (1970) are important to a proper grasp of the reasoning in this volume.

In this stimulating but difficult book Professor Kaplan contributes assorted logical, methodological, and evaluative observations of the best kind to the wisdom literature of modern social science.

WHITAKER T. DEININGER
California State University,
San Jose

MARTIN BALLARD, editor. New Movements in the Study and Teaching of History. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 1970. Pp. vi, 234. $6.95.

HAROLD PERKIN, editor. History: An Introduction for the Intending Student. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul; distrib. by Humanities Press, New York. 1970. Pp. vii, 214. Cloth $5.50, paper $2.50.

These books are collections of essays on the study and teaching of history written chiefly by English practitioners. The more significant of the two has been edited by Martin Ballard, who is director of the Educational Publishers Council of England and has taught history at both Burlington Comprehensive School in Bristol and Clare College, Cambridge. In it is assembled a stimulating and highly useful group of essays by a wide range of authors, including noted historians such as William S. McNeill (one of two Americans represented), Arnold Toynbee, G. R. Elton, and Peter Mathias, as well as teachers in English schools of education and secondary schools. Notable among the contributions are McNeill's call for new patterns for comprehending the past to accommodate new needs, including an intelligible picture of world history; Toynbee's plea that historians see themselves as both generalists and, in some particular part of their work, specialists and that they aim both their teaching and their writing at a cultivated and intelligent but nonspecialized public; a discussion of the implications of Piaget for history teaching at different age levels by Roy Hallam; and a highly suggestive essay on the use of sources in the classroom by Peter Bamford of Richard Taunton Sixth Form College, Southampton, which includes practical suggestions for preparing students and for using such immediately available sources as the local church. Equally notable and suggestive are discussions by E. A. Wrigley and Mathias of the implications for both study and teaching of new methodology, particularly in connection with family, demographic, and economic history; an essay by Marcus Cunliffe suggesting the particular resonance of United States history for the asking of modern questions, with useful suggestions of particular themes as examples; and a challenging essay on the relationship between the study of history and biology by C. D. Darlington, professor in botany at Oxford.

As Ballard points out in a thoughtful introductory essay, the collection has no common point of view except an assumption that history teachers must face up to change. By inference the collection suggests several crucial and related ideas. One is that in considering change, questions of how and why one teaches in the field are inextricably connected with questions of how and why one studies in it. One regrets that missing in the essays, except the one on Piaget, is any serious consideration of the still more fundamental question of how and why people learn. A second is that pressures for change are springing up not only outside the discipline, in demands for "relevance" and competition from other disciplines, but also within, where they emanate from new questions historians are asking and from new methodology. A third is that the problems of history study and teaching are much the same at all educational levels, even though the answers may necessarily be different, and that practitioners at all levels have much to learn from one another if only they would make the effort to communicate.

Harold Perkin, professor of social history at the University of Lancaster, has compiled a book less committed to change. Designed "for the intending student" at the university level, the book asks where the study of history stands in various traditional subject matter fields: what themes are being emphasized, what research methods used, what questions asked. Answers are offered in brief but thoughtful essays, all by present or former faculty at the University of Lancaster. All are "content" oriented. None is much concerned with the methodology either of teaching or of learning. And yet all take seriously the teaching-learning task, as do the essays in the Ballard book. Both books are examples of a genre of historical literature and of professional concern that have too few equivalents in the United States.

RICHARD H. BROWN
Newberry Library

PAUL F. KRESS. Social Science and the Idea of Process: The Ambiguous Legacy of Arthur F. Bentley. Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1970. Pp. xiv, 260. $8.95.

The stature of Arthur F. Bentley (1870-1957) may be indicated by political scientist Peter Odegard's remark that Bentley's The Process of Government (1908) stands as "one of the very few indispensable books" in the literature of the behavioral sciences. Paul Kress's monograph on Bentley and the idea of process should also prove indispensable, especially to those historians, and their number seems to be growing, concerned about the methodological bases of their projects.

Kress goes beyond previous commentators to show how Bentley's work contains implications still largely ignored by American social scientists. Bentley has generally been studied as the father of "the group theory of politics," because of the influence of the second part of his 1908 work entitled "Analysis of Governmental Pressures." Scholars working in this tradition, in Kress's words, "seem to have made the 'group' their central concept and to have allowed 'process' to become the general milieu in which the group 'functions.'"

Kress focuses on "process" rather than on "group," and he succeeds in demonstrating that Bentley was far more interested in the former concept than he was in the latter. The heart of Kress's analysis is a close reading of Bentley's major theoretical works combined with an assessment of the extent to which American sociologists and political scientists have met the challenge posed by Bentley's image of a universe of process. To paraphrase Kress, if Bentley and subsequent analysts conceived of the social realm as "homogeneous, continuous action" then they were faced with the task of creating "differentiating principles, ways to re-introduce discreteness—in short, new units of investigation.” Kress contends that Bentley and his successors at the task have by and large failed. The chapters on “Process in American Sociology,” “Process as Transaction,” and “Process as System,” though at times unnecessarily opaque, are superb essays in their own right. They describe both the evolution of Bentley’s intellectual constructions and the socio-intellectual context of later writing pertinent to the issue. Bentley’s attempts to confront the philosophical issues central to the process concept culminated in a transactional analysis replete with arcane terms such as “communicane,” “dicaudane,” and “scriptillect.” Bentley hoped with such a vocabulary to express the “relative stresses and emphases” in a process social realm, as well as to avoid the dualisms inherent in everyday language.

While Kress regards Bentley’s attempt as heroic, he by no means sees Bentley as his hero. In company with other political scientists skeptical of “pluralism” and influenced by phenomenology and existentialism, Kress argues that political theory is “seriously threatened by the abolition of units [called for by the process concept] whether particulars, individuals, or persons. . . . Bentley’s mistake was to seize upon the explanatory weakness of common sense thought and then find himself forced to repudiate the integrity of human experience itself.” This conclusion, like the entire monograph, raises critical questions for historical studies as well as for social science. Any historian interested in “the behavioral approach,” in “the new political history,” or in the relationships between history and the social sciences should put this book on his list of required reading.

WILLIAM H. ISSEL
California State University,
San Francisco

EDWARD WHITING FOX. History in Geographic Perspective: The Other France. New York: W. W. Norton and Company. 1971. Pp. 190. $6.95.

In a slim book full of things Professor Fox reconsiders the history of France as a test case for “the proper reintroduction of the geographical dimension” into historical study. To this timely invitation one would like to add a plea for geography in its own right. More often than not in American universities geography is not even recognized as a unified subject for doctoral dissertations but split between the departments of geology, anthropology, the natural and the social sciences; history gets no part of it. Is this not the best method to turn out geologists who are reckless of ecology, anthropologists who are unaware of environment, planners who disregard cultural and climatic variables, and historians who cannot tell Washington from Moscow? “Area studies,” carried no further than the introductory level, can hardly make up for the murder of geography or its expulsion from history.

The editor of the Oxford atlases of European and American history, Professor Fox has been once more attracted to the geographical dimension by his search for a method in the apparent madness of contemporary French political behavior. None of the learned, ingenious, or witty explanations offered by French historians explains every turn and contradiction of the latest two hundred years; Herbert Lüthy, a Swiss historian, sums them up under the title France Against Itself. Professor Fox plunges far back into historical precedents, broadens his exploration into European and Mediterranean events of the ancient and early medieval periods, and concludes that there are two Frances acting at cross-purposes. The inner core is fundamentally agrarian, self-supporting, inward-looking, and devoted to a strong government (whether monarchic or republican it does not matter greatly) that will give the country law, order, and a thorough administrative guidance. The outer fringe, mainly consisting of seaports and other cities accessible to water-borne commerce, is open to foreign influences, change, nonconformist thought and practices, and unafraid of radical tendencies and self-governing institutions. This bipolarity is neither abnormal nor peculiarly French: it can be observed again and again in history, ever since maritime Greece faced land-based Persia.

These considerations are less novel for the ancient and early medieval world than for modern France; but even where he runs over thoroughly explored ground, Professor Fox offers a few incidental remarks that strike the specialist of the field as a graphic observation of a perceptive foreign correspondent that may impress a native (one example among many: "The Franks had not been deprived of important revenues by the rise of Islam, simply because the trade from which this income would have had to derive played no significant role in the economy of Gaul").

I am not fully convinced that his explanation of modern French politics takes care of all objections; it is well documented and sounds plausible, but every effect has many causes, and there usually is no single key to any complicated safe. Here and there, one senses a certain effort in correlating every quirk to the same leitmotif. Still the leitmotif rings clearly, and it was important to attract attention to it. What is more, the geographical dimension has been properly introduced in a pattern of behavior that is French because human, and human because French.

ROBERT S. LOPEZ
Yale University

JOHN HICKS. A Theory of Economic History. New York: Oxford University Press. 1969. Pp. vii, 181. Cloth $5.00, paper $1.95.

JONATHAN HUGHES. Industrialization and Economic History: Theses and Conjectures. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company. 1970. Pp. xii, 336. $6.95.

The English Industrial Revolution is the focal point, the burning glass of modern history. Into its decades streams a diffuse light—the flickerings of capitalism from Greece through the Dutch Republic. From it pours out the intense heat of modern industrial civilization. This at least is the form imposed on history by a study of economics. It is wholly congruent to the form imposed by a faith in the divinity of Christ. The decades of the Industrial Revolution are the decades from Christmas to the Passion in the material history of the modern world.

The two books here noticed fit together almost exactly at the point of this revolution. Both are extended essays in the grand synoptic tradition of economic history. Both betray that subject's origins in the Enlightenment and the urge to provide a rational alternative to Christian myth. In ten compelling—though hardly conclusive—chapters, J. R. Hicks turns the mind of a great economic theorist to the materials on the rise of capitalism. His theme is an old one—how the growth of trade and the culture of the trader undermined and transformed the economic organization of agrarian societies, producing at last the thoroughgoing capitalism out of which nineteenth-century industrialism could grow. J. R. T. Hughes begins with that growth and follows the nineteenth-century diaspora of elements of income growth among the nations from England to the Continent and overseas and the progressive wreckage of economic forms and ideologies, both "native" and capitalistic, that has littered the world since Marx, Mill, Marshall, and Queen Victoria.

To note their complementarity in coverage, theme, and viewpoint, however, is to give little of the flavor of the two books. Both are highly personal artifacts and derive from persons of markedly different temperaments and culture. Hicks, casting his web over the West, weaves arguments like a spider, one strand at a time. His concern at all points is to be not exhaustive but plausible and, above all, clear. One catches him on occasion in that tone of faint condescension, reminiscent of the language of Alice in Wonderland, that theorists must adopt in order to communicate with the academic multitude. Unfortunately, the materials of history do not readily give themselves to the devices of so cool a rhetoric. Nor can an American review suppress a provincial irritation at the casualness with which an Oxonian scholar surveys the world. Of sixty-three references to other works, the frequency distribution of places of publication is as follows: Oxford 13; London 13; Cambridge 11; New York 3; Paris 2; all others, 1 each. The result of Hicks's mind working on history is not the perfect and satisfying magic of Value and Capital (1946), his great work in economic theory. He has produced not a theory of economic history, but a theorist's economic history—a different, but a more human and interesting thing.

Hughes's personal style is quite different—and thoroughly American. Superficially, he appears to have written a book highly usable as an undergraduate text. Written with clarity and vigor, with ample bibliography, forthright judgments, and immense coverage, the book must interest students who, however, may fail to appreciate the breadth of its learning and the subtlety of its judgments. The essays on imperialism, economic doctrines, and the interwar period are particularly original and valuable.

If economic history, then, is a religion whose theology has a certain chronological form, Hicks expounds the Old Testament in the style of an Anglican bishop and Hughes proclaims the New a bit in the manner of the Methodist minister of a large city church. Yet the message is the same—it is a message of redemption through modern capitalistic forms and industry. What is missing from it is a sensitivity to the inner logic by which economic and social life may be organized outside the market economies and directed to other ends, less individualistic and less materialistic. Yet what is interesting in the whole span covered by the two books together is the cyclical character of the evolution, from nonmarket forms through the market back to nonmarket organization again. Splitting economic evolution at the Industrial Revolution tends to obscure this huge cyclical form that the history exhibits.

And oddly enough, one other omission in both books appears: the omission of technology as a historical force. Hicks explicitly excludes it in his definition of things economic (p. 71). And Hughes, having given the topic full credit in the initial English developments, loses it in a discussion of entrepreneurs, laws, thought, policies, and capital movements of the nineteenth century and thereafter. Yet Hicks presumably would not deny that it was the presence of this catalyst that distinguished the late eighteenth-century revolution from its predecessors in Greece or in early modern times. Nor could Hughes deny that the spread of modern industry occurred most easily where resource and transport conditions were best suited to the developing technology. Hicks and Hughes then must be supplemented by David Landes, who supplied if not Christ, then at least Prometheus, as the superstar to the story. The three authors' books taken together supply an interested historian with a useful and intriguing introduction to modern history as modern economists view it. If all three get lost in their subjects to some degree, that should not be taken to show their hopeless indifference to modern economics, as some recent critics of Landes in this journal have averred (AHR, 76 [1971]: 467–74). It is but a sign of their baptism in the subject matter of economic history—by a sprinkling of holy water in the case of Hicks and, for Hughes and for Landes, by total immersion.

WILLIAM N. PARKER
Yale University

JACQUELINE MURRAY. The First European Agriculture: A Study of the Osteological and Botanical Evidence until 2000 B.C. Edinburgh: University Press; distrib. by Aldine Publishing Company, Chicago. 1970. Pp. vii, 380. $10.75.

Derived from a doctoral thesis at Edinburgh University this book represents an ambitious attempt at summarizing the botanical and osteological data produced by more than one thousand excavations in the Near East and Europe. The author has not undertaken new identifications but instead has assembled the published evidence and drawn conclusions that she hopes will "mark the culmination of one stage of research, and provide the basis for the beginning of another."

The conclusions so reached show that agriculture began in the Near East ca. 9000 B.C. with the domestication of sheep and goats. Some time before 7000 B.C. the dog was also domesticated and the cultivation of plants begun. Included were two species of wheat, einkorn and emmer (both of which have wild relatives extant), and barley of the two-rowed type that is quite similar in its characteristics to the present-day wild barley of the Near East.

During the late Neolithic cattle and pigs were added to the domestic stock, and six-rowed barley and bread wheats made their first appearance. The author erroneously attributes the origin of these wheats to a chromosome aberration in the tetraploid emmer. Since geneticists regard the discovery and cultivation of the hexaploid bread and club wheats as one of the most important developments in the evolution of Old World agriculture, this error is not minor. It has been known for many years that these wheats are allopolyploid hybrids—the product of adding a third genome to the tetraploid complex. Since 1956 it has been well established that this third genome is derived from the wild grass Aegilops speltoides.

From the Near East the practice of agriculture spread first to Greece, ca. 5000 B.C., and later across Europe. The author treats the spread as a form of colonization; she recognizes no evidence of an independent origin of agriculture in Europe. This is perhaps the book's most important conclusion.

In pursuing her prodigious labors the author has reviewed the literature up until February 1968 to produce a bibliography that includes about 450 entries of works embracing at least ten different languages. Although this will prove useful as a reference work it is already incomplete because of a number of significant contributions published in 1968 or later. Because of the enormous amount of detail involved in the text, the 210 tables and the 137 histograms, the lack of an index is an especially unfortunate omission.

PAUL C. MANGELSDORF
University of North Carolina,
Chapel Hill

G. J. CUMING and DEREK BAKER, editors, Councils and Assemblies: Papers Read at the Eighth Summer Meeting and the Ninth Winter Meeting of the Ecclesiastical History Society. (Studies in Church History, Number 7.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 1971. Pp. xiv, 359. $16.00.

Twenty-two essays presented at the eighth summer meeting and the ninth winter meeting of the Ecclesiastical History Society are brought together here. All deal with some piece of legislation or aspect of life connected with a Church synod. The temporal span covers the Early Middle Ages to the twentieth century. The geographic area is Western Europe, with the exception of D. M. Nicol's paper on the Byzantine reaction to II Lyons (1274), Peter Hinchliff's remarks on Bishop Gray's work in South Africa at the middle of the last century, and S. P. Mews's survey of Anglo-Catholic criticism of the Kikuyu Conference (Kenya, 1913). There are fifteen studies of Roman Catholic assemblies and seven of Anglican or Protestant gatherings. The councils of Christian antiquity do not appear nor, among the Latin ecumenical convocations, do III, IV, V Lateran, I Lyons, Vienne, and Trent. Of recent interfaith movements—Life and Work, Faith and Order, the World Council of Churches—none provides basis for an essay. Several studies probe substantial questions, with wide-ranging implications; others are more limited. As a collection of independent essays, both quality and scholarship are commendable.

The following gives a brief sense of the contributions: Walter Ullmann's "Public Welfare and Social Legislation in the Early Medieval Councils" shows that Frankish and Visigothic synods of the sixth to ninth centuries continued to concern themselves with alleviating the condition of the poor, the ill, the slaves, etc. as had their predecessors in fifth-century France. J. L. Nelson's "National Synods, Kingship as Office, and Royal Anointing: An Early Medieval Syndrome" traces royal anointing in Spain to 672, in France to 848, in Germany to 911, and in England to 973, and interprets it as an episcopal monopoly. In "The Case of Berengar of Tours" Margaret Gibson discusses the eucharistic statements accepted by Berengar at councils in 1059 and 1079, which foreshadow later teaching on transubstantiation. M. J. Wilks's "Ecclesiastica and Regalia: Papal Investiture Policy from the Council of Guastalla to the First Lateran Council, 1106-23" indicates that Pope Paschal II's policy at Sutri-Rome (1111) was in line with a developing distinction between episcopal possessions and jurisdiction to be regulated by canon law and a bishop's regalian functions legitimately subject to the law of the land. In "Viri religiosi and the York Election Dispute" Derek Baker argues that the twenty-eighth canon of II Lateran Council (1139) giving religious orders a consultative voice in episcopal elections had little influence upon the choice of a successor to Archbishop Thurstan of York in 1140. Peter Linehan's "Councils and Synods in 13th-century Castile and Aragon" gives a capsule description of the efforts of the Aragonese archbishop Pedro de Albalat of Tarragona (d. 1251) to eliminate concubinage and to improve the education of the clergy in contrast to the lack of concern in these matters evidenced by the Castilian prelate Rodrigo Ximénez de Rada of Toledo (d. 1247). In "The Byzantine Reaction to the II Council of Lyons, 1274" D. M. Nicol chronicles in depth eleven years of rejection at Constantinople of the union with the papacy accepted at Lyons on July 6, 1274. Brenda Bolton ("The Council of London of 1342") describes the twenty-nine enactments of a provincial assembly under Archbishop Stratford of Canterbury. R. M. Haines's "Education in English Ecclesiastical Legislation of the Later Middle Ages" is a recounting of the measures taken by thirteenth- to sixteenth-century English bishops to insure a minimal doctrinal formation for parish priests and laity. Joseph Gill's "The Representation of the universitas fidelium in the Councils of the Conciliar Period" deals with the nonmitred participants at Pisa (1409), Constance (1414), Basel (1431), and Florence (1438), and it questions whether they were representative of any but themselves. Margaret Harvey's "Nicholas Ryssheton and the Council of Pisa, 1409" describes four short quaestiones presented at or after the 1409 synod by an English canonist. In "The Condemnation of John Wyclif at the Council of Constance," E. C. Tatnall extricates from the 1414-15 proceedings of the synod against Jan Hus its measures in condemnation of Wyclif (d. 1384). A. N. E. D. Schofield's "Some Aspects of English Representation at the Council of Basle" lists what is known of the two English delegations sent to the council in 1433 and 1434-35. A. J. Black ("The Council of Basle and the II Vatican Council") sees Basel's themes on the sovereignty of the whole Church, episcopal collegiality, and the ministry as service in relationship to the deliberations of the recent ecumenical council. Basil Hall's "The Colloquies between Catholics and Protestants, 1539-41" views the discussions at Hagenau, Worms, and Regensburg as reflective of a spirit of understanding that reappears in twentieth-century ecumenical dialogue. W. B. Patterson's "King James I's Call for an Ecumenical Council" depicts royal proposals in 1603 and 1604 for an interfaith gathering, which Pope Clement VIII rejected. In "John Hales and the Synod of Dort" Robert Peters describes the reactions of a sympathetic English observer at the assembly (1618-19) who grew disillusioned with its rigid Calvinism. "Assembly and Association in Dissent, 1689-1831" by G. F. Nuttall is an account of the Nonconformist ministerial Exeter Assembly in Devon from its founding to the establishment in 1831 of national Congregational and Baptist Unions. G. V. Bennett's

"The Convocation of 1710: An Anglican Attempt at Counter-Revolution" relates the unsuccessful efforts of the High Churchman Francis Atterbury to forge a working partnership between the lower houses both of Convocation and Parliament toward the renewal of Church of England discipline. Peter Hinchliff's "Laymen in Synod: An Aspect of the Beginnings of Synodical Government in South Africa" treats the steps from 1855 to 1870 whereby Bishop Gray of Capetown succeeded in bringing the laity into diocesan and provincial synods. In "The First Vatican Council," E. E. Y. Hales suggests that the handling of papal primacy and infallibility at the synod of 1869-70 was both balanced and the outcome of genuine debate. S. P. Mews contends in "Kikuyu and Edinburgh: The Interaction of Attitudes to Two Conferences" that contemporary Anglo-Catholics were happy with the approach to Christian unity at the Edinburgh Missionary Conference (1910) but fearful that an open communion service used at Kikuyu (Kenya, 1913) would lead to a jerrybuilt Christianity.

HENRY G. J. BECK

Lyndhurst, New Jersey

MONTE D. WRIGHT and LAWRENCE J. PASZEK, editors. Science, Technology, and Warfare: The Proceedings of the Third Military History Symposium, United States Air Force Academy, 8-9 May 1969. [Washington:] Office of Air Force History, Headquarters USAF; [USAF Academy, Colo.:] United States Air Force Academy. [1971.] Pp. xvi, 221. $1.25.

In 1969 the third in a series of conferences on the history of war sponsored by the Air Force Academy addressed itself to a theme of great contemporary importance, much of whose earlier history remains uncertain: the interaction of science and technology with military organization and performance. The papers and commentaries have now been published, together with the Eleventh Harmon Memorial Lecture, delivered during the conference by Elting E. Morison.

In an admirably lucid survey A. Rupert Hall demonstrates that until the eighteenth century warfare owed little to science. He is effectively supported by his commentators—J. R. Hale, who identifies organizational, social, and intellectual elements in the military that insulated them from science, and John B. Wolf, whose suggestion that the two realms could not draw closer until sophisticated civil-military bureaucracies developed after the Thirty Years' War introduced a secondary theme of the conference—the role of management. In the second major paper David Bien disputes the view that the founding of the École militaire in 1751 was a response to the French army's new technical needs. Indeed such needs scarcely existed. Rather the new stress on mathematics in the training of subalterns was intended to guard them against possibly corrupting, antiprofessional influences of the standard classical education. Not surprisingly Bien's elegant reinterpretation troubled some members of the symposium; nevertheless the thesis that scientific subjects rose to prominence in military curricula for psychological rather than technical reasons is buttressed by two informative comments: Gunther Rothenberg's review of conditions in the Austrian army and John Shy's comparative analysis of European military academies during the revolution and the Napoleonic Age.

In contrast to the imaginative approach taken to the early modern period the paper by I. B. Holley, Jr. on the evolution of operations research in the Air Force is largely narrative. The fact that some protagonists are still living obviously presents problems, as does the unavailability of important documents; yet Robert L. Perry in his critique shows how much scholars can do already to identify and interpret the central elements in the failure of the Air Force to establish a research office competent to deal with the major technological and strategic issues of the 1950s and 1960s. Finally Melvin Kranzberg suggests models for the interaction between science, technology, and warfare in America since 1945.

While the symposium could not hope to explore its theme evenly over six centuries, it is too bad that the interests of the main speakers caused a particularly relevant period to be neglected—the years from 1815 to 1945, during which the separation of science and war gradually and decisively came to an end. Professor Morison's lecture, "The War of Ideas; The United States Navy, 1870-1890," might have gone far to fill the gap; but as he was addressing the entire cadet wing rather than the conference proper he was precluded from fully developing his thesis that the navy was incapable of innovation because it lacked a realistic conception of its duties. Nevertheless this is a stimulating volume, of more than specialist appeal, which, incidentally, bears out an impression that American historians who today write on war fall, broadly speaking, into two groups: those who recognize that topics in the history of organized violence are always defined by the interaction of civil and military elements, which must be analyzed before the course of military events can be traced, and others who derive whatever analytic unity their themes might possess exclusively from the beginnings and ends of a campaign or a career.

PETER PARET
Stanford University

CAMILLE LIMOGES. La sélection naturelle: Étude sur la première constitution d'un concept (1837-1859). ("Galien": Histoire et philosophie de la biologie et de la médecine.) Paris: Presses Universitaires de France. 1970. Pp. 184. 25 fr.

Camille Limoges has written a short but excellent account of the development of the theory of natural selection. Mr. Limoges's book supersedes most other work done on the topic in two respects. First, having studied French science he is better acquainted with the great French naturalists of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries than are most English-speaking commentators on the history of evolutionary thought. He has used that familiarity to especially good effect in his discussion of the views held by P. A. Latreille and A.-P. de Candolle on the geographical distribution of species. It is interesting to note, however, that on the central question of why there was an English Darwin rather than a French one, Limoges follows the by now standard interpretation put forward most forcefully by W. F. Cannon and Charles Gillispie that it was the uniquely English version of natural theology that fostered Darwinian thought.

The second recommendation for Limoges's book is that it is the first work to be published on the formative years of Darwin's development since Darwin's notebooks on transmutation were published by the British Museum.

From these notebooks Limoges has drawn several important conclusions as to the order of Darwin's insights. First, contrary to his word, Darwin was not looking for an analogue to artificial selection when he read T. R. Malthus's An Essay on the Principle of Population in late September 1838. Second, the reading of Malthus was in itself the catalyst of his theory. Both points are correct, though I find Limoges's interpretation of them more dogmatic than present knowledge of the early Darwin manuscripts allows. On occasion Limoges also blurs the distinction between the historical development of the components of the idea of natural selection and the route Darwin himself took. For example, he discusses the work of Edward Blyth on points where Darwin very clearly learned much more from Charles Lyell (pp. 66-68). Limoges has nonetheless reconstructed a significant portion of Darwin's early thought in such a way that it illuminates the change involved in the passage from a traditional notion of natural economy to one involving transmutation.

SANDRA HERBERT

University of Maryland

KARL MARX. Critique of Hegel's 'Philosophy of Right.' Translated from the German by ANNETTE JOLIN and JOSEPH O'MALLEY. Edited with an introduction and notes by JOSEPH O'MALLEY. (Cambridge Studies in the History and Theory of Politics.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 1970. Pp. lxxvii, 151. $9.50.

The relationship between the young Marx and the mature Marx is one of the major controversies among contemporary Marx scholars; and the position taken in this controversy determines one's attitudes toward various works of Marx. If his life's entire work is seen to be of one piece, then the early books, articles, and fragments in which he formulated his disagreements with Hegel and the Hegelian Left assume central importance.

Professor O'Malley, who takes this view, has made available to the English-language reader the 150-page manuscript in which Marx criticizes Hegel's political philosophy. Although there are minor errors in the introduction the translation itself is careful and faultless. Still the manuscript presupposes so intimate an acquaintance with Hegelian, Feuerbachian, and Marxian thought that it would not be easily understood even by many scholarly readers.

For this reason the most important part of this book is the brilliant and learned introduction, in which Professor O'Malley carefully explains the circumstances in which the manuscript was written and places it within the course of Marx's intellectual development. He then describes the methodology of his critique of Hegel, dissecting it carefully and convincingly into three distinct devices; and finally he guides the reader painstakingly through every single step.

The argument is convincing. The total work of Marx appears to have coherence and unity. And yet the nagging feeling remains that the opposite case could be made. One regrets that Professor O'Malley argued his case without taking up the points made by those who make a strict separation between the young Marx and the mature Marx. One key to this separation is the contribution to "Marxism" made by Friedrich Engels. O'Malley is perfectly justified in hardly mentioning him; for, after all, when the manuscript on Hegel was being written, Marx and Engels had not yet met. Yet for an understanding of the total work a discussion of their relation to each other's ideas would have been pertinent.

This reservation apart, the work being reviewed is a fine contribution to scholarship.

ALFRED G. MEYER

*University of Michigan,
Ann Arbor*

HEINZ K. MEIER. Friendship under Stress: U.S.-Swiss Relations 1900-1950. Bern: Herbert Lang & Co. 1970. Pp. 423. $10.60.

Professor Meier has given us a well-researched study of American-Swiss relations in the first half of the twentieth century. And his definition of "relations" is commendably broad. In addition to the strictly intergovernmental business Meier's study covers major aspects of public opinion, cultural affairs, and other people-to-people involvements (particularly tourism), with the result that the book produces a picture more colorful and meaningful than the one that generally emerges from more conventional studies in diplomatic history. There is warmth in the book, too, and this comes very definitely from the fact that Heinz Meier was born Swiss but lives in America, and he therefore "relates" personally to both of his subjects. Their friendships (quiet but durable) are his pleasure; their arguments (occasional but sharp) obviously distress him. It is refreshing to read history that has been lived.

While much of the book deals with routine bilateral affairs, the chapters involving Swiss neutrality raise questions of great significance. Although Meier is objective enough to see to it that the contentions of both sides receive a full hearing, it is nevertheless pervasively true that he is a great believer in Swiss neutrality, with all that has meant in terms of trading with the enemy. The fact that the Swiss arguments during World War II struck most American officials as particularly exasperating serves as an interesting reminder of how far the United States had moved since its own neutrality days of 1914-16. Also significant is the fact that Switzerland's neutrality problems carried on into the postwar world and resulted in Swiss abstention from the United Nations. Meier tries valiantly to reconcile these divergent philosophies by asserting that "neutrality and collective security have the same goals, namely the maintenance of peace and the status quo and the prevention of revolutionary change." Somehow one gets the impression that he is reluctant to face the fact that it took two ferocious global wars to make the world safe for neutrality—even temporarily.

The chapter of most general interest is probably the one with the unwieldy title "Wilson, Rappard, the Paris Peace Conference, and the League of Nations." Although much of this ground was covered years ago in the writings of that remarkably able and distinguished Professor Rappard, it is good to have the whole story brought together, as Meier has done, from all pertinent sources.

The least satisfactory chapter is the one dealing with Switzerland's activities as a protecting power in World War II. The author is aware of this shortcoming and indicates, by way of extenuation, that he could not possibly cover this huge story in one chapter. This is true, but then his study is not so large that he could not have devoted more space to a subject so significant and so little studied. Now that the American, British, Canadian, and German documentation is open for the war period, perhaps the Swiss will follow suit, and Professor Meier can give us a fuller treatment of this neglected topic.

WILLIAM M. FRANKLIN
Department of State

